The 18-chapter Guhyasamājatantra was translated into Chinese as the Yīqiè rúlái jīngāng sānyè zuìshàng mìmì dà jiàowáng jīng (一切如來金剛三業最上祕密大教王經; The Great King of Scripture that Teaches the Supreme Secrecy of the Three Kinds of Adamantine Action of All Tathāgatas; T. 885) by Shīhù (施護) in 1012 (Takeuchi, 1975). In this translation, transgressive expressions are either omitted or rewritten. For example, the above mentioned yoṣidbhaga (the vagina of women) is translated as "the purified sphere that is a transformation of right knowledge of all tathāgatas" (一切如來正智出生變化清淨境界; T. 885 [XVIII] 469c25–26).

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

Consequently, the translatio obscure portions.

Development of the Te

The Guhyasamājatantra, with practices and the pantheons, em the system of the Sarvatathāga main and earliest yogatantra translated into Chinese in 723 composition of the Guhyasa by B. Bhattacharrya (1931, xx (1973, 13–19) as the 3rd and th tively, are therefore too early.
tradition, the Sarvatathāgata first section of the expanded dǐng jīng (金剛頂經; The Scripture) in 100,000 verses co According to the Jīngāng dǐn zhǐguī (金剛頂經瑜伽十八會 18 Sections of the Yoga of the Scripture; T. 869), a digest by 705–774), of the expanded v dǐng jīng, the Mìmìjíhuì yúqi
Guhyasamājayoga*; T. 869 [ 15th section. The summary of very brief, and it is implausible of the present 18-chapter Gu contents of the summary, ho that of chapter 5 of the presen and it is therefore not implaus existed in some form, perhaps development, by the time A the digest (c. 746–774 CE; Gieb sunaga, 1978, xxiiif.; 1980, 249– Buddhaśrījñāna's period o to settle the date when th was composed, since the J which Buddhaśrījñāna is rega one of the oldest exegetical s Buddhaśrījñāna is associated Dharmapāla (r. c. 775–812). H argues that Buddhaśrījñāna half of the 8th century and that existed in some form at the ti on the basis of the following e who was a Tibetan and a Tibetan king Khri Song lde introduced the utpannakrama tice (see below) of the Jñāna
(2) Buddhaśrījñāna's works Ldan dkar ma catalogue of scr e several other manuscripts ified from the catalogues ). Since the editio princeps by ya, the Guhyasamājatantra its entirety four times, by Bagchi (1965), Matsunaga s Shastri (1984). Below we eration of Matsunaga's edi-s also edited by F. Fremantle unpublished. The scripture its entirety into modern lan-English by Fremantle (1971),

, and Japanese by Matsunaga unhuang manuscript shows antra proper (i.e. chs. 1–17) etan in the Imperial Period Guhyasamājatantra proper ained as different scriptures he Tibetan title of the former ams cad kyi sku gsung thugs 'dus pa zhes bya ba brtag pa'i P 81). The Tibetan title of the hyi ma (Skt. Uttaratantra*; karavarman and Rin chen d as the translators of both.

s of the canonical Tibetan he respective revisers differ amoto et al., 1989, 231). Com-nhuang manuscript and the eveals that Rin chen bzang a translator but a reviser of man, 1980).

yasamājatantra was trans-he Yīqiè rúlái jīngāng sānyè ángjīng (一切如來金剛三業 Great King of Scripture that Secrecy of the Three Kinds of All Tathāgatas; T. 885) by keuchi, 1975). In this trans-ressions are either omitted ple, the above mentioned a of women) is translated that is a transformation of l tathāgatas" (一切如來正
. 885 [XVIII] 469c25–26).

Consequently, the translation has a number of obscure portions.

Development of the Text

The Guhyasamājatantra, with regard to meditation practices and the pantheons, employed and developed the system of the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha, the main and earliest yogatantra scripture, which was translated into Chinese in 723 CE. The dates for the composition of the Guhyasamājatantra proposed by B. Bhattacharrya (1931, xxxiv) and A. Wayman (1973, 13–19) as the 3rd and the 4th century, respectively, are therefore too early. In the Sino-Japanese tradition, the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha is the first section of the expanded version of the Jīngāng dǐng jīng (金剛頂經; The Adamantine-Pinnacle Scripture) in 100,000 verses consisting of 18 sections. According to the Jīngāng dǐng jīng yúqié shíbāhuì zhǐguī (金剛頂經瑜伽十八會指歸; Key Points of the 18 Sections of the Yoga of the Adamantine Pinnacle Scripture; T. 869), a digest by Amoghavajra (不空; 705–774), of the expanded version of the Jīngāng dǐng jīng, the Mìmìjíhuì yúqié (祕密集會瑜伽; Skt. Guhyasamājayoga*; T. 869 [XVIII] 287a28), is the 15th section. The summary of the Mìmìjíhuì yúqié is very brief, and it is implausible that it is the summary of the present 18-chapter Guhyasamājatantra. The contents of the summary, however, correspond to that of chapter 5 of the present Guhyasamājatantra, and it is therefore not implausible that the scripture existed in some form, perhaps in an early stage of its development, by the time Amoghavajra composed the digest (c. 746–774 CE; Giebel, 1995, 108–109; Matsunaga, 1978, xxiiif.; 1980, 249–253; 1998a, 249–253).

Buddhaśrījñāna's period of activity is important to settle the date when the Guhyasamājatantra was composed, since the Jñānapāda school, of which Buddhaśrījñāna is regarded as the founder, is one of the oldest exegetical schools of the scripture. Buddhaśrījñāna is associated with the Pala emperor Dharmapāla (r. c. 775–812). Hadano Hakuyu (1950) argues that Buddhaśrījñāna was active in the latter half of the 8th century and that the Guhyasamājatantra existed in some form at the time of Buddhaśrījñāna on the basis of the following evidence: (1) Vairocana, who was a Tibetan and a contemporary of the Tibetan king Khri Song lde brtsan (r. 775[?]–797), introduced the utpannakrama/niṣpannakrama practice (see below) of the Jñānapāda school to Tibet; (2) Buddhaśrījñāna's works are recorded in the ldan dkar ma catalogue of scriptures translated into Tibetan; and (3) a commentary on the supplementary scripture by Viśvamitra (D 1844/P 2707) and a commentary on the root scripture by Vajrahāsa (D 1909/P 2772) were translated into Tibetan at the time of the snga dar (former diffusion). On the basis of Hadano Hakuyu's argument, Matsunaga Yūkei (1978, xxivff.) proposes that chapter 18 of the Guhyasamājatantra was composed in the latter half of the 8th century. In addition, the existence of the Dunhuang manuscript mentioned above shows that the root scripture of the Guhyasamājatantra had been composed in circa 800–900 CE (Eastman, 1980).

With regard to the root scripture, we see at least two stages of development, that is to say, chapters 13–17 were probably added later to the first 12 chapters. The reasons that Matsunaga Yūkei (1978, xxviiiff.; 1980, 237ff.; 1998a, 237ff.) proposes are as follows:

1. The Sandhyāvyākaraṇa (D 444/P 83), one of the explanatory scriptures (vyākhyātantra) free from interpretations belonging to a particular school, comments only on the first 12 chapters. This might imply that the Guhyasamājatantra consisted of the first 12 chapters when the Sandhyāvyākaraṇa was composed, or at least that the explanatory scripture regarded chapters 13–17 as not essential.
2. The full set of deities who comprise the 19-deity maṇḍala of the Jñānapāda school is not found in the first 12 chapters, only in the latter five chapters. The maṇḍala taught in chapter 1 consists of 13 deities, and this maṇḍala is identical with the one taught in Indrabhūti's Jñānasiddhi (ch. 15), which is in turn assumed to be identical with the maṇḍala of "Indrabhūti's school" mentioned by Tsong kha pa.
3. The four-limbed meditation (caturaṅgasādhana or caturvidhopāya) is regarded as essential in the supplementary chapter 18. The archetype of this four-limbed meditation is taught in chapter 12. This might imply that the scripture once ended with chapter 12.
4. Compared to the first 12 chapters, chapters 13–17 are relatively long. In addition, with regard to the contents, the characteristics of ritual manuals are conspicuous in chapters 13–17.
5. The supplementary chapter 18 summarizes and elaborates the teachings of the root scripture in the form of questions and answers. All the topics of these questions and answers are found in chapters 1–12.

The supplementary scripture, chapter 18, tries to homologize the different types of yoga taught in the root scripture with each limb of the four-limbed yoga, which is unique to the Jñānapāda school. It is therefore inferred that the Jñānapāda school might have participated in the composition of chapters 13–17 of the Guhyasamājatantra.

Related Scriptures

As mentioned above, the Guhyasamājatantra is related to the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha. Thus, at a later time, the Guhyasamājatantra was classified as a yogottaratantra or a mahāyogatantra, or simply yogatantra. Aside from the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha, there are several scriptures closely related to the Guhyasamājatantra. The Māyājālatantra and the Guhyasamājatantra have a number of parallels (Matsunaga, 1980, 240–244; 1998a, 240–244). With regard to the practice of desire (rāgacaryā) taught in chapter 7, a very similar teaching – namely that tantric practitioners should avoid ascetic practices that weaken their faculties – is found in the chapter 36 of the Paramādya (Mantrakalpakhaṇḍa; D 488, 242a7–243a2/P 120, 252a7–253a1), a scripture classified as a yogatantra, and one of the verses in the relevant passage in the Paramādya is the same as Guhyasamājatantra 7.2 (Tanemura, 2009, 488ff.). The name Ratnaketu – one of the five buddhas, who is situated in the south in the maṇḍala – is identical with the name of one of the four buddhas in the Suvarṇaprabhāsottama, which is different from the name of the buddha situated in the south in the vajradhātumaṇḍala taught in the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha (Tanaka, 2010, 278). The heart mantras of Akṣobhya, Vairocana, and Amitāyus/Amithābha, that is, vajradhṛk, jinajik, and ārolik, are taught in the Susiddhikara (D 807/P 431; Tanaka, 2010, 278).

The schools based on the Guhyasamājatantra developed practices that are not taught in the scripture itself. Thus, at a later time, the explanatory scriptures were composed to authorize those practices. These explanatory scriptures, which are preserved in the Tibetan canon, are the Sandhyāvyākaraṇa, the Vajramālā (D 445/P 82), the Caturdevīparipṛcchā (D 446/P 85), the Jñānavajrasamuccaya (D 447/P 84; D 450 is perhaps a longer version; see Wedemeyer, 2007, 208n8), the Vajrahṛdayālaṃkāra* (D 451/P 86), the Advayasamatāvijaya (D 452/P 87), and so on. Of these, the Advayasamatāvijaya survives in Sanskrit, and an edition of this text has been published (Fan, 2011).

Pantheons

With regard to the pantheons or *maṇḍala*s, one of the greatest differences from those of the previous tantric scriptures is that the main deity is Akṣobhya rather than Vairocana, who became the main deity instead of Śākyamuni in early and middle tantric Buddhism. Akṣobhya is also regarded as identical with Vajrasattva or Vajradhara, who became the supreme deity in later tantric Buddhism.

The pantheon or maṇḍala of the Guhyasamājatantra is described in chapter 1. The maṇḍala consists of 13 deities, namely the five buddhas, the four goddesses, and the four wrathful deities. As mentioned above, this 13-deity maṇḍala is identical with the one taught in Indrabhūti's Jñānasiddhi (Matsunaga, 1980, 237; 1998a, 237; Tanaka, 2010, 282). This "basic" maṇḍala is later developed into the two major *maṇḍala*s associated with the scripture, namely the 19-deity maṇḍala of the Jñānapāda school and the 32-deity maṇḍala of the Ārya school.

The Jñānapāda-school maṇḍala consists of the 13 deities taught in chapter 1 plus the six vajra goddesses (Kanamoto, 1986; Tanaka, 2010; see table 1). In this maṇḍala, the central deity is called Mañjuvajra rather than Akṣobhya. The deities are represented in sexual embrace with their male or female consorts.

The Ārya-school maṇḍala consists of the 13 deities plus five vajra goddesses, the eight great bodhisattvas, and the six wrathful deities (see table 2). The names of the female consorts of the ten wrathful deities are mentioned in the Piṇḍīkrama, which is one of the important sources of the utpattikrama (steps of generation) practice of the Ārya school, but those goddesses are not counted as maṇḍala deities (Tanaka, 2010). The central deity is called Akṣobhyavajra. According to the Niṣpannayogāvalī (an explanatory work by Abhayākaragupta on various *maṇḍala*s), in this maṇḍala, only the central deity is represented as embracing his consort, Sparśavajrā. In addition, the wrathful deities situated in the protection wheel (rakṣācakra) are visualized as copulating with their consorts. It is impossible to reconstruct these two *maṇḍala*s from the Guhyasamājatantra itself. It is the exegetical literature of these two schools that gives us details about these *maṇḍala*s.

One of the important theories concerning the maṇḍala introduced in the Guhyasamājatantra and its exegetical literature is the homologization of the deities with the dogmatic notions such as the five aggregates. This homologizatio the theoretical bases for a pra aware that he or she is the su Vajradhara. With regard to this scripture teaches only corres the five buddhas and the five goddesses and the four eleme and ether (vss. 17.50–51 [verse ing to Matsunage, 1978]; see tab zation was developed later in th

---

Meditation Practices

The Guhyasamājatantra teach meditation or visualization ( difficult to understand how th to one another. In other words find a system of yoga in the scri ter, the Samājottara, tries to sy types of yoga. It introduces the (caturaṅga):

1. service (sevā; chs. 3, 7, an
2. subaccomplishment (up 10, and 14);
3. accomplishment (sādha 16); and
4. great accomplishment (
   9, 13, and 17).

Generally, later tantric Buddh of yoga: (1) utpattikrama (step (2) utpannakrama/niṣpannak perfected/steps for the perfect meditation practice in which t with the visualized deity and e deities. The latter is the medi on psychophysiological techn ner controls the *cakra*s and ch are supposed to exist in the h its energy, by means of sexual ing the state of being without (nirvikalpa).

The Guhyasamājatantra p these two systems. The Sam tions the names of these two a famous verse concerning t Mūlamadhyamakakārikā (24. cson, 2001, 468–469). This fact pilers of this scripture regar as the practice at the mundar the utpannakrama as that at t higher level. The scripture, ho the concrete methods for eith aggregates. This homologization is no doubt one of the theoretical bases for a practitioner to become aware that he or she is the supreme deity, that is, Vajradhara. With regard to this homologization, the scripture teaches only correspondences between the five buddhas and the five aggregates, the four goddesses and the four elements, and Vajradhara and ether (vss. 17.50–51 [verse numeration according to Matsunage, 1978]; see table 3.) This homologization was developed later in the exegetical schools.

Meditation Practices

The Guhyasamājatantra teaches various types of meditation or visualization (yoga), but it is very difficult to understand how these yogas are related to one another. In other words, it is very difficult to find a system of yoga in the scripture. The last chapter, the Samājottara, tries to synthesize the various types of yoga. It introduces the following four limbs (caturaṅga):

1. service (sevā; chs. 3, 7, and 11);
2. subaccomplishment (upasādhana; chs. 2, 6, 10, and 14);
3. accomplishment (sādhana; chs. 4, 8, 12, and 16); and
4. great accomplishment (mahāsādhana; chs. 5, 9, 13, and 17).

Generally, later tantric Buddhism has two systems of yoga: (1) utpattikrama (steps of generation) and (2) utpannakrama/niṣpannakrama (steps named perfected/steps for the perfected). The former is the meditation practice in which the practitioner unites with the visualized deity and emanates the maṇḍala deities. The latter is the meditation practice based on psychophysiological techniques. The practitioner controls the cakras and channels (nāḍī), which are supposed to exist in the human body and guide its energy, by means of sexual yoga, thereby attaining the state of being without conceptual cognition (nirvikalpa).

The Guhyasamājatantra proper does not teach these two systems. The Samājottara (18.84) mentions the names of these two systems and echoes a famous verse concerning the two truths in the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā (24.8) by Nāgārjuna (Isaacson, 2001, 468–469). This fact implies that the compilers of this scripture regarded the utpattikrama as the practice at the mundane or lower level and the utpannakrama as that at the supramundane or higher level. The scripture, however, does not teach the concrete methods for either of these yogas.

The yoga based on the Guhyasamājatantra is developed in the two main exegetical schools, namely the Jñānapāda school and the Ārya school. The principal texts of the former are the works by Buddhaśrījñāna. Of these, the Dvikramatattvabhāvanā Mukhāgama (Oral Instruction Named Meditation on the Reality in Two Steps; D 1583/P 2716), is the revelation by Mañjuśrī to Buddhaśrījñāna. Buddhaśrījñāna was probably the first person who integrated the two systems of meditation into Buddhist tantric practice. The fact that the Dvikramatattvabhāvanā Mukhāgama is said to be the revelation by Mañjuśrī may imply that his system was established by Buddhaśrījñāna himself and thus that it was not entirely based on the Guhyasamājatantra. For the Jñānapāda school, the basic frame of the utpattikrama is the threefold meditation (trisamādhi) established in the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha: (1) ādiyoga (first union), (2) maṇḍalarājāgrī (supreme lord of the maṇḍala), and (3) karmarājāgrī (supreme lord of action). The system of the four limbs is incorporated into this basic frame. Each of the four limbs has three divisions, that is, inferior, middle, and advanced. The ādiyoga of the threefold meditation consists of the four limbs of the inferior and those of the middle, and the maṇḍalarājāgrī consists of the four limbs of the advanced. In addition, the four limbs bring about the four outcomes called natural outcome (niṣyanda), maturation (vipāka), manly action (puruṣakāra), and being free of defilements (vaimalya), respectively. The practitioner unites with the deity through a complicated process that consists of the threefold meditation, the four limbs, and the four outcomes (Tanaka, 2010, 489ff.; Kikuya, 2010; for a synopsis of Buddhaśrījñāna's Samantabhadrasādhana, see Tanaka, 2010, 501–503).

In the utpannakrama of this school, the practitioner attains the purified body (Skt. viśuddhikāya*; Tib. rnam par dag pa'i sku) by means of the yoga of bindu or tilaka (the subtle, imperishable "particle" in the cakra situated in the heart), which involves sexual union with a female consort and the resulting experience of bliss (Hadano, 1950, 43–44; Sakurai, 2007; Kikuya, 2010). Because of the limited number of primary sources and the small number of studies in this field, many parts of this practice are still unclear.

The basic structure of the utpattikrama of the Ārya school is also the threefold meditation. In the system of this school, the ādiyoga, which follows the preparatory process, is divided into the four sub-steps: yoga, anuyoga, atiyoga, and mahāyoga.

Having accomplished the triple body of the Buddha by means of empowerment of his body, speech, and mind through these four substeps, the practitioner becomes a buddha. Next, the practitioner emanates the maṇḍala deities by means of sexual-yogic union with his consort in the maṇḍalarājāgrī. After the third step, the karmarājāgrī, the practitioner who has risen up from the meditation should act as a buddha (Luo & Tomabechi, 2009; Hadano, 1950, 93ff.).

The principal text for the utpannakrama of this school is the Pañcakrama attributed to Nāgārjuna (see Mimaki & Tomabechi, 1994). The present Pañcakrama consists, as the name suggests, of the following five steps:

1. Vajrajāpakrama (Step of Vajra Recitation);
2. Sarvaśuddhiviśuddhikrama (Step of Purification by Purity of All; for different opinions with regard to this chapter's authorship, see Mimaki & Tomabechi, 1994, XIn12);
3. Svādhiṣṭhānakrama (Step of Self-consecration);
4. Paramarahasyasukhābhisaṃbodhikrama (Step of Realization of the Supreme, Secret Bliss) or Abhisaṃbodhikrama (Step of Realization); and
5. Yuganaddhakrama (Step of Cooperative Union).

In the utpannakrama practice of this school, the practitioner controls his or her vital energy called vāyu (wind; i.e. prāṇa) and experiences imaginary death, thereby attaining prabhāsvara (clear light). This state is referred to as "nondual knowledge" or "nonconceptual cognition." This utpannakrama practice is not taught in the Guhyasamājatantra itself. The scriptural basis for this practice is the explanatory scriptures, which were probably compiled by this school.

Esoteric Eroticism and Sacralization of Impure Substances

Esoteric eroticism is found in various parts of the Guhyasamājatantra. For instance, the initiation rites called guhyābhiṣeka (secret empowerment) and prajñājñānābhiṣeka (empowerment of knowledge of wisdom), which are prescribed in chapter 18, involve sexual union with a female consort. In the guhyābhiṣeka, an initiand offers a female partner to his master, and the master has intercourse with her. Then the initiand is made to consume the sexual fluid from the sexual organs, which is taught to be the mind intent on awakening. In the prajñājñānābhiṣeka, the initiand copulates with the consort handed over by the master and experiences bliss, that is, the "state of being without conceptual cognition."

Sacralization of impure substances is also an element that became conspicuous in the Guhyasamājatantra. These impure substances are mentioned as the "five nectars (pañcāmṛta)," that is, urine, feces, semen, blood, and human meat. The scripture prescribes that an initiate should eat these substances and worship the deities with them. The scripture also prescribes that an initiate should eat the "five meats," that is, the meat of cows, dogs, elephants, horses, and humans. Both esoteric eroticism and sacralization of impure substances are influences of Śākta-Śaivism (Sanderson, 2009, 144ff.).

Synopsis

The main topics of this scripture are the pantheons, meditation practice, and the religious observances to be kept by the initiates. However, these are not taught systematically through the chapters. In addition, the lord who gives the teachings of the Guhyasamājatantra is called by various names such as Sarvatathāgatakāyavākcittādhipati ("The Lord of Body, Speech, and Mind of All Tathāgatas"). The outlines of the individual chapters are as follows.

Chapter 1: After the preamble (nidāna), this chapter mainly teaches the emanation of the five buddhas, the four goddesses, and the four wrathful deities (i.e. the 13-deity maṇḍala).

Chapter 2: This chapter mainly teaches the essence of the mind intent on awakening (bodhicitta) in six verses. The four stanzas taught by the four buddhas Akṣobhya, Ratnaketu, Amitāyus, and Amoghasiddhi are also found in the Māyājālatantra; the stanza taught by Vairocana is found in the Vairocanābhisambodhi.

Chapter 3: This chapter teaches the visualization of the maṇḍala and the yoga of expansion and contraction. The iconographies of the five buddhas are also mentioned.

Chapter 4: The way of making the mind maṇḍala, which consists of the pledges of the deities, is taught. This chapter also teaches the sexual yoga with a 16-year-old maiden, who is to be empowered as the goddess Māmakī. Worship of the deities that involves consumption of impure substances is prescribed.

Chapter 5: This chapter prescribes the persons who are suitable to do the practices taught in this scripture. It emphasizes that untouchables, persons who have committed great sins, and persons regarded as impure by mund as practitioners of this scriptu Chapter 6: In this chapter, t the mantras. Akṣobhya teach empowerment of mind, Vair the empowerment of body, A the empowerment of speech, for attachment, and Amogha worship. This chapter also te in which the practitioner co izes a vajra and other sacred t nose, and prescribes the rule of impure substances and me Chapter 7: This chapter te of all desires is necessary for plishment (siddhi). As stated is closely related to that of t teaching, the five objects of t respond to the five buddhas Vairocana, sound to Ratnake flavor to Amoghavajra, and to chapter also teaches visualiz tion (anusmṛti), which invol female partner.

Chapter 8: Requested by teaches how to worship the vi the master. This worship inv enjoyment of objects agreeab ulties and impure substances.
Chapter 9: First, the ple five buddha families are tau dveṣakula (hatred family) is m (ignorance family) theft, of family) sexual pleasure, of th (pledge-attracting family) lyi (jewel family) abuse. The lor practice of desire is the pra which is the supreme practice the reason why the blessed gressive teachings. The lord tice of desire is the practice is the supreme practice. For, everywhere and is not confin likewise the pledges of the above should be understood.
Chapter 10: In this chapte mantras of body, speech, and practices in which those m and the sexual yoga with a mahāmudrā (great seal).
Chapter 11: The three seed vajras (i.e. oṃ, āḥ, and hūṃ) a the knowledge vajra (jñānava being without conceptual ure substances is also ne conspicuous in the e impure substances are ectars (pañcāmṛta)," that od, and human meat. The n initiate should eat these he deities with them. The hat an initiate should eat e meat of cows, dogs, ele-ns. Both esoteric eroticism ure substances are influ-nderson, 2009, 144ff.).

scripture are the panthe-
, and the religious obser-initiates. However, these ally through the chapters.
gives the teachings of the led by various names such cittādhipati ("The Lord of f All Tathāgatas"). The outapters are as follows.
preamble (nidāna), this the emanation of the five sses, and the four wrathful aṇḍala).
pter mainly teaches the t on awakening (bodhicitta) tanzas taught by the four tnaketu, Amitāyus, and und in the Māyājālatantra; airocana is found in the er teaches the visualization oga of expansion and con-ies of the five buddhas are making the mind maṇḍala, dges of the deities, is taught. es the sexual yoga with a is to be empowered as the ip of the deities that involves substances is prescribed. ter prescribes the persons he practices taught in this s that untouchables, per-ted great sins, and persons regarded as impure by mundane ethics are suitable as practitioners of this scripture.

Chapter 6: In this chapter, the five buddhas teach the mantras. Akṣobhya teaches the mantra for the empowerment of mind, Vairocana the mantra for the empowerment of body, Amitāyus the mantra for the empowerment of speech, Ratnaketu the mantra for attachment, and Amoghasiddhi the mantra for worship. This chapter also teaches the subtle yoga, in which the practitioner concentrates and visualizes a vajra and other sacred things on the tip of the nose, and prescribes the rules for the consumption of impure substances and meats.

Chapter 7: This chapter teaches that enjoyment of all desires is necessary for attainment of accomplishment (siddhi). As stated above, this teaching is closely related to that of the Paramādya. In this teaching, the five objects of the sense faculties correspond to the five buddhas: sight corresponds to Vairocana, sound to Ratnaketu, smell to Amitāyus, flavor to Amoghavajra, and touch to Akṣobhya. This chapter also teaches visualization called recollection (anusmṛti), which involves sexual yoga with a female partner.

Chapter 8: Requested by Ratnaketu, Vajradhara teaches how to worship the visualized maṇḍala and the master. This worship involves sexual yoga and enjoyment of objects agreeable to the five sense faculties and impure substances.

Chapter 9: First, the pledges (samaya) of the five buddha families are taught. The pledge of the dveṣakula (hatred family) is murder, of the mohakula (ignorance family) theft, of the rāgakula (desire family) sexual pleasure, of the samayākarṣaṇakula (pledge-attracting family) lying, and of the ratnakula (jewel family) abuse. The lord also teaches that the practice of desire is the practice of bodhisattvas, which is the supreme practice. The bodhisattvas ask the reason why the blessed one gives these transgressive teachings. The lord answers that the practice of desire is the practice of bodhisattvas, which is the supreme practice. For, just as ether pervades everywhere and is not confined in a specific place, likewise the pledges of the tathāgatas mentioned above should be understood.

Chapter 10: In this chapter, the lord teaches the mantras of body, speech, and mind; the meditation practices in which those mantras are employed; and the sexual yoga with a female partner called mahāmudrā (great seal).

Chapter 11: The three seed syllables called three vajras (i.e. oṃ, āḥ, and hūṃ) and the heart mantra of the knowledge vajra (jñānavajrahṛdaya; i.e. bhrūṃ) are taught. The lord teaches the yoga of the three vajras (i.e. the three seed syllables), of the five buddhas, and, again, of the three seed syllables.

Chapter 12: The theme of this chapter is the observances. First, the lord teaches the five kinds of meditations related to the pledges of the five buddhas. Then, the lord teaches the taking of pills that are to be visualized as transformations of the three seed syllables. Subsequently, the lord teaches the visualization of the five buddhas and the wrathful deities. The lord also teaches how to draw down the pledges (samaya). Next he teaches the fruits arising from the consumption of the "five meats" and impure substances and from the practice of the observances. Finally, the lord teaches the outline of the four-limbed yoga.

Chapter 13: The lord teaches various meditation practices such as the three-seed-syllable/vajra recitation (see above) and the ten kinds of recitation. The four kinds of rites – that is, quelling of calamities (śāntika), increase of fortunes (pauṣṭika), subjugation (vaśya), and subduing of enemies (abhicāraka) – and the deities employed in each rite are explained. The lord also teaches the visualization of the ten wrathful deities.

Chapter 14: The lord teaches the mantras of the four goddesses and their effects and then the mantras of the nine wrathful deities and their effects. Next the lord teaches how to draw down the deities. After that he prescribes the abhicāraka rite and, in connection with this rite, the rites in which spikes (kīla), weapons to kill the evil, are employed.

Chapter 15: The lord teaches (1) sexual yoga with a female partner; (2) various rites for the purpose of killing a hostile person; (3) consumption of pills made of impure substances, meats, metals, and so forth and their effects; (4) cure for snakebites and so forth; (5) cure for diseases; and (6) correspondences between dreams and supernatural effects (siddhi). The lord also teaches that all things lack inherent nature, they are like illusion, and therefore the effects of the rites do not exist from the viewpoint of supreme truth.

Chapter 16: First, the lord teaches how to draw the vajra body maṇḍala (vajrakāyamaṇḍala; i.e. the body maṇḍala of all tathāgatas) and the vajra speech maṇḍala (vāgvajramaṇḍala; i.e. the speech maṇḍala of all tathāgatas). Then the lord emanates the secret of the supreme, esoteric maṇḍala from his vajra-like body, speech, and mind. Despite the fact that he teaches these three kinds of maṇḍala, the lord prohibits practitioners from drawing external maṇḍalas. The lord again teaches how to draw a maṇḍala and how to perform the fire rite. The lord also teaches the initiation ritual (abhiṣeka) of disciples, the description of which is simple and short. After this the lord teaches the observances to be kept by the initiates. Next the visualizations of the deities are prescribed. Finally, the lord teaches the postinitiatory observance called vidyāvrata, which is to be practiced with a female consort (vidyā).

Chapter 17: First the stanzas that praise the five buddhas are taught. Then the lord teaches various observances, including the rules for food. The lord states that the vajra of body, speech, and mind is beyond verbal expressions. The lord teaches the correspondences between the five buddhas and the five aggregates and between the four goddesses and the four elements. The greatness of the masters initiated into this scripture is told. Then the lord teaches the visualization of the great maṇḍala named the vajra-like source of all tathāgatas and bodhisattvas, the rite for killing hostile persons, and the worship of the deities with impure substances and sexual intercourse. Nonetheless, in the next passage, external ritual acts are prohibited. After this, the lord teaches the way of detoxification from all poison and how to kill a hostile person. In the prose after verse 71, the lord relates that the reason why the buddhas in the past did not reveal the Guhyasamājatantra is that the audience was not mature enough, but that from now on, initiates of this scripture will attain awakening. Next the four goddesses praise Mahāvajradhara ("Great Vajra Holder") and ask him for sexual intercourse. Finally, the secret of the vajra of body, speech, and mind is revealed.

Chapter 18: This chapter consists mainly of 53 questions from the bodhisattvas to the lord and the answers to those questions. In those answers, the lord prescribes the initiation rites called guhyābhiṣeka and prajñājñānābhiṣeka. He teaches the consumption of the five impure substances called the "five nectars" and the "five meats" and teaches the yoga of four limbs (see above).

Reception

The Guhyasamājatantra was, and partly still is, very successful in India, the Tibeto-Himalayan region, and Mongolia. The popularity of this scripture in India is clear from the number of extant Sanskrit manuscripts. Especially in the Kathmandu Valley, the Guhyasamājatantra is revered as one of the "nine dharmas," the nine scriptures regarded as important. In addition, many exegetical works of this scripture are written by Indian and Tibetan authors.

The scripture and the practices based on the scripture were transmitted by several exegetical schools. Of these, the Jñānapāda school and the Ārya school were the most influential. The system of the practice of the Jñānapāda school was transmitted mainly in the Vikramaśīla Monastery, which was founded and supported by the Pala emperors. The Ārya school became especially popular in Tibet. Tsong kha pa regards the Mādhyamika, especially the so-called Prāsaṅgika strand, as the highest in non-tantric Buddhism, and the Guhyasamājatantra, especially the Ārya school, as the highest in tantric Buddhism. The reason why Tsong kha pa regarded the Ārya school as the highest is probably that the authors of the Mādhyamika and the Ārya school share the same names such as Nāgārjuna, Āryadeva, and Candrakīrti.

Although the Guhyasamājatantra was translated into Chinese, it was not propagated in East Asia. After Amoghavajra, tantric Buddhism in China declined rapidly, and translation of Indian Buddhist literature into Chinese came to an end. This means that the development of tantric Buddhism following the yogatantra hardly reached China or Japan. In this period, Chan Buddhism formed the mainstream of Chinese Buddhism. In this religious climate, the Guhyasamājatantra was much less influential than tantric Buddhism in the earlier Tang period.

Bibliography

Bagchi, S., ed., Śrīguhyasamājatantram, BSṬ 9, Darbhanga, 1965.

Bhattacharyya, B., ed., Niṣpannayogāvalī of Mahāpaṇḍita Abhayākaragupta, GaOS 109, Baroda, 1949.

Bhattacharyya, B., ed., Guhyasamāja Tantra or Tathāgataguhyaka, GaOS 53, Baroda, 1931.

Dwarikadas Shastri, S., ed., Śrīguhyasamājatantram, B 17, Varanasi, 1984.

Eastman, K.W., "Chibettogo-yaku Guhyasamājatantra no Tonkō Shutsudo Shahon" (チベット語訳 Guhyasamājatantra の敦煌出土写本; A Manuscript of the Tibetan Translation of the Guhyasamājatantra Excavated in Dunhuang), NCGK 26, 1980, 8–12.

Fan Muyou (范慕尤), Advayasamatāvijaya: A Study Based upon the Sanskrit Manuscript Found in Tibet 梵文写本《无二平等经》的对勘与研究, Shanghai, 2011.

Fremantle, F., "A Critical Study of the Guhyasamāja Tantra," diss., SOAS, University of London, 1971.

Gäng, P., Das Tantra der verl Guhyasamāja-Tantra. Aus dem S ausgegeben, Munich, 1988.

Giebel, R.W., "The Chin-kang-ting ch chih-kuei: An Annotated Transla 201.

Hadano Hakuyu (羽田野伯猷), "Ta Ningen Sonzai" (Tāntric Buddhi Human Existence in Tantric Bud gaku Shūsei (チベット・イ
Works of Tibeto-Indian Studie 50–165.

Hadano Hakuyu (羽田野伯猷), " okeru Junyānapāda-ryū ni tsuite" けるジュニャーナパーダ流に Jñānapāda in the Guhyasamājat
gaku Shūsei (チベット・イ
Works of Tibeto-Indian Studies 36–49.

Isaacson, H., "Ratnākaraśānti's Hev ies in Ratnākaraśānti's Tantric W Le parole e i marmi: studi in onore 70° Compleanno, vol. I, SOR 92/1, Kanamoto Takuji (金本拓士), "Bu Fugen Jōju-hō ni okeru mandar 生起次第「普賢成就法」に て; On the Maṇḍala in the Sam
Utpattikrama of the Jñānapāda 341–339.

Kikuya Ryūta (菊谷竜太), "Juny Nishidai wo Megutte: Buddashuri Chūshin ni" (ジュニャーナ
第をめぐって：ブッダシュ
ヴィタパーダを中心に; Two S
Jñānapāda School of Indian Tan 60, 2010, 156–134.

Lee Yong-hyun, The Niṣpannayogāv
A New Critical Edition of the Sansk
Seoul, 2004.

Luo Hong & Toru Tomabech Vajrasattvaniṣpādanasūtra (Vajr skrit and Tibetan Texts, STTAR 6, Matsunaga Yūkei (松長有慶), Him aku (秘密集会タントラ和訳; A the Guhyasamājatantra), Kyoto, 2 ne scriptures regarded many exegetical works by Indian and Tibetan

ractices based on the by several exegetical apāda school and the influential. The system pāda school was transaśīla Monastery, which l by the Pala emperors. ecially popular in Tibet.
Mādhyamika, especially rand, as the highest in the Guhyasamājatantra, as the highest in tantric Tsong kha pa regarded est is probably that the ka and the Ārya school as Nāgārjuna, Āryadeva, ājatantra was translated ropagated in East Asia. ic Buddhism in China lation of Indian Buddhist e to an end. This means antric Buddhism follow-ached China or Japan. In formed the mainstream his religious climate, the uch less influential than rlier Tang period.

atantram, BST 9, Darbhanga, nnayogāvalī of Mahāpaṇḍita

, Baroda, 1949.
Guhyasamāja Tantra or
3, Baroda, 1931.
Śrīguhyasamājatantram, B 17, u Guhyasamājatantra no Tonkō ット語訳 Guhyasamājatantra uscript of the Tibetan Translantra Excavated in Dunhuang), asamatāvijaya: A Study Based ript Found in Tibet 梵文写本 研究, Shanghai, 2011.

ly of the Guhyasamāja Tantra," ondon, 1971.

Gäng, P., Das Tantra der verborgenen Vereinigung = Guhyasamāja-Tantra. Aus dem Sanskrit übersetzt und herausgegeben, Munich, 1988.

Giebel, R.W., "The Chin-kang-ting ching yü-ch'ieh shih-pa-hui chih-kuei: An Annotated Translation," NBKK 18, 1995, 107–201.

Hadano Hakuyu (羽田野伯猷), "Tāntric Buddhism ni okeru Ningen Sonzai" (Tāntric Buddhism における人間存在; Human Existence in Tantric Buddhism), in: Chibetto-Indogaku Shūsei (チベット・インド学集成; Collected Works of Tibeto-Indian Studies), vol. III, Tokyo, 1987, 50–165.

Hadano Hakuyu (羽田野伯猷), "Himitsushū Tantora ni okeru Junyānapāda-ryū ni tsuite" (秘密集タントラにおけるジュニャーナパーダ流について; The School of Jñānapāda in the Guhyasamājatantra), in: Chibetto-Indogaku Shūsei (チベット・インド学集成; Collected Works of Tibeto-Indian Studies), vol. III, Tokyo, 1987, 36–49.

Isaacson, H., "Ratnākaraśānti's Hevajrasahajasadyoga (Studies in Ratnākaraśānti's Tantric Works I)," in: R. Torella, ed., Le parole e i marmi: studi in onore di Raniero Gnoli nel suo 70° Compleanno, vol. I, SOR 92/1, Rome, 2001, 457–487.

Kanamoto Takuji (金本拓士), "Bucchisoku-ha Shōki-shidai Fugen Jōju-hō ni okeru mandara ni tsuite" (仏智足派生起次第「普賢成就法」における曼荼羅について; On the Maṇḍala in the Samantabhadrasādhana, the Utpattikrama of the Jñānapāda School) IBK 35/1, 1986, 341–339.

Kikuya Ryūta (菊谷竜太), "Junyānapāda-ryū ni okeru Nishidai wo Megutte: Buddashurījunyāna to Vitapāda wo Chūshin ni" (ジュニャーナパーダ流における二次第をめぐって：ブッダシュリージュニャーナとヴィタパーダを中心に; Two Steps (Dvikrama) in the Jñānapāda School of Indian Tantric Buddhism), TDBKN 60, 2010, 156–134.

Lee Yong-hyun, The Niṣpannayogāvalī by Abhayākaragupta: A New Critical Edition of the Sanskrt Text (Revised Edition), Seoul, 2004.

Luo Hong & Toru Tomabechi, eds, Candrakīrti's Vajrasattvaniṣpādanasūtra (Vajrasattvasādhana): Sanskrit and Tibetan Texts, STTAR 6, Beijing, 2009.

Matsunaga Yūkei (松長有慶), Himitsu Shūe Tantora Wayaku (秘密集会タントラ和訳; A Japanese Translation of the Guhyasamājatantra), Kyoto, 2000.

Matsunaga Yūkei (松長有慶), Mikkyō Kyōten Seiritsushiron (密教経典成立史論; A History of the Development of Tantric Buddhist Scriptures), Kyoto, 1998a.

Matsunaga Yūkei (松長有慶), Himitsu Shūe Tantora no Kenkyū (秘密集会タントラの研究; A Study of the Guhyasamājatantra), Kyoto, 1998b.

Matsunaga Yūkei (松長有慶), Mikkyō Kyōten Seiritsushiron (密教経典成立史論; A History of the Development of Tantric Buddhist Scriptures), Kyoto, 1980.

Matsunaga Yūkei (松長有慶), ed., The Guhyasamājatantra: A New Critical Edition, Osaka, 1978.

Mimaki Katsumi, & Toru Tomabechi, eds., Pañcakrama: Sanskrit and Tibetan Texts Critically Edited with Verse Index and Facsimile Edition of the Sanskrit Manuscripts, BCA 8, Tokyo, 1994.

Sakurai Munenobu (桜井宗信), "Shichi Yuga (sbyor ba bdun) Oboegaki" (七瑜伽 (sbyor ba bdun) 覚書; A Note on the sbyor ba bdun Handed Down in Jñānapāda School), CG 56, 2007, 359–370.

Sanderson, A., "The Śaiva Age: The Rise and Dominance of Śaivism during the Early Medieval Period," in: Shingo Einoo, ed., Genesis and Development of Tantrism, IOCSS 23, Tokyo, 2009, 41–349.

Takeuchi Kōzen (武内孝善), "Guhyasamāja-tantra no Kan'yaku Nendai" (Guhyasamāja-tantra の漢訳年代; The Date of the Chinese Translation of the Guhyasamājatantra), IBK 23/2, 1975, 681–682.

Tanaka Kimiaki (田中公明), Indo ni okeru Mandara no Seiritsu to Hatten (インドにおける曼荼羅の成立と発展; Genesis and Development of the Maṇḍalas in India), Tokyo, 2010.

Tanemura Ryugen, "Superiority of Vajrayāna: Part II: Superiority of the Tantric Practice Taught in the *Vajrayānāntadvayanirākaraṇa (rDo rje theg pa'i mtha' gñis sel ba)," in: Shingo Einoo, ed., Genesis and Development of Tantrism, IOCSS 23, Tokyo, 2009, 487–514.

Tsukamoto Keishō (塚本啓祥), et al., Bongo Butten no Kenkyū IV Mikkyō Kyōten Hen (梵語仏典の研究 IV 密教経典篇; A Descriptive Bibliography of the Sanskrit Buddhist Literature: Vol. IV: The Buddhist Tantra), Kyoto, 1989.

Wayman, A., The Buddhist Tantras: Light on Indo-Tibetan Esotericism, New York, 1973.

Wedemeyer, C.K., Āryadeva's Lamp that Integrates the Practices (Caryāmelāpakapradīpa): The Gradual Path of Vajrayāna Buddhism according to the Esoteric Community Noble Tradition, New York, 2007.

RYUGEN TANEMURA

Hevajratantra

The Hevajratantra is the most important scripture of the yoginītantra class. Shortly after its appearance around 900 CE in East India (Davidson, 2004, 41), it engendered – or promoted in a codified form – a widespread and influential cult of its eponymous deity and his retinue; its teachings became of such authority that there were hardly any esoteric Buddhist authors who could afford to ignore them. While the text continued the antinomian tradition set out in the Guhyasamājatantra and the Sarvabuddhasamāyogaḍākinījālaśaṃvara, it also introduced a number of innovations – most importantly the doctrine of the four blisses – and it is noted for skillfully blending the world of tantric ritual practice and non-esoteric Mahāyāna doctrine. Compared to the other emblematic yoginītantra, the Herukābhidhāna, the Hevajratantra can be said to contain much more theological and philosophical material, showing a confident grounding in the Buddhist world.

The basic scripture was followed by vigorous exegesis in the form of further, explanatory scriptures, commentaries proper, and a large body of satellite texts. The tantra was translated into Chinese by *Dharmapāla (Fahu [法護]) in 1055 CE and into Tibetan at roughly the same time by Gayādhara and 'Brog mi Shā kya ye shes (D 417–418/P 10; the two main chapters are numerated separately in the Derge edition). While until the advent of the Yuan dynasty it failed to gain momentum in China, the Hevajratantra inspired hundreds of further works in Tibet (Sobisch, 2008).

Judging from statuary and other material evidence, the teachings of the Hevajratantra were transmitted in some form to various parts of Southeast Asia (see Lobo, 1998, for the Khmer realm; for Sumatra, see Griffiths, 2014, 228–230, where the cult survived until the 14th century; Reichle, 2007, 139). That the Hevajratantra came to be the emblematic esoteric Buddhist scripture is suggested by the fact that the Śaiva exegete Jayaratha (fl. c. 1213–1236 CE) quoted it with approval, though without actually naming the text (e.g. Tantrālokaviveka ad Abhinavagupta's Tantrāloka 4.243, Shâstrî, 1921, 269; there are two or three further possible quotations).

The cult had among its initiates a number of monarchs and courtiers. In India, the ruler of Khasa, Aśokacalla is described as a worshipper of Hevajra on an inscription from Bodh Gaya dated 1194 CE by one of his dependents (Vidyavinoda, 1913–1914, 30). The Mongol rulers Godan and Qubilai were initiated by the Tibetan masters Sa skya paṇḍita (1182–1251 CE) and his nephew, 'Phags pa (1239–1280 CE) respectively (Willemen, 1983, 16). A Čam inscription from 1194 CE (Finot, 1904, 973, 975) celebrating the military victory of Vidyānandana, the future king Sūryavarman, over a Khmer expedition, records the building of a Heruka temple (śrīherukaharmya), which could possibly have been a Hevajra place of worship.

The Hevajratantra was the first yoginītantra to be fully edited and translated by modern scholars. D.L. Snellgrove's (1959) pioneering work was slightly improved upon by G.W. Farrow and I. Menon (1992), and some progress towards a comprehensive critical edition, which remains one of the great desiderata of esoteric Buddhist studies, has been achieved by the awkwardly constituted but useful editions of R.S. Tripathi and T.S. Negi (2001; 2006). R.F. Meyer's German translation (2005–2006) is not based on such an effort. For the time being, it would seem that the text was transmitted in a fairly stable form, although signs of redaction and possibly slightly different recensions exist.

Structure and Synopsis of Contents

The Hevajratantra consists of two main chapters (or "books", "parts") called kalpas, which are usually divided into 11 and 12 subchapters, and named "The Chapter of the Awakening of Vajragarbha" (who is the petitioner of most of the text) and "The Chapter of Illusion," respectively. (Below the kalpas are indicated with upper case Roman I and II, the subchapters in lower case, and verses with Arabic numerals.) Because of this feature, the text is very often referred to as "the king [of tantras] in two chapters" (dvikalparāja). Some ancillary tantras and commentaries state that the two chapters were

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

---

extracted from a mythical Ur-ta
There is a chance that the Hevaj to some such concept (I.xi.12).

I.i: On the Vajra Family

The text opens with a modified e does contain the customary ope mayā śrutam etc.), but here the been abiding in the womb of opening is inherited from the Although the role of the pet mostly by the bodhisattva V sometimes handed over to the and other goddesses), the first by the lord himself. This is an retinue to hear about Hevajra, of three beings (sattva): vajra and samayasattva. Vajragarb asks for clarification regarding given. He then asks about the
The answer is that he means whereas vajra means wisdom; t the union of the two. A short o follows. The lord then teache background with which Hevajr visualized. Vajragarbha then a (nāḍī) that pervade the body.
be 32 in number, among them important ones (lalanā, rasan avadhūtī). The names of the fou also given: three are named af of the Buddha (nirmāṇa, saṃb last is that of great bliss (mahās of items in sets of four follows, that all these sets are somehow noted that the text displays a p for sets of four. The subchapter verse on the yogic practice of "
better known in its Tibetan re This particular system of tubes as the practice of caṇḍālī, are in

I.ii: On Mantras

The second subchapter deals which are given openly (that is encoding and decoding, althou used later). The mantras given offering (bali), the seed syllabl the heart mantra of Hevajra, a the seed syllables of the yoginī two-armed, four-armed, and s Hevajra, the seed syllables fo ɔng its initiates a number of

ers. In India, the ruler of Khasa, ed as a worshipper of Hevajra n Bodh Gaya dated 1194 CE by s (Vidyavinoda, 1913–1914, 30). odan and Qubilai were initi-nasters Sa skya paṇḍita (1182– ew, 'Phags pa (1239–1280 CE) n, 1983, 16). A Čam inscription 904, 973, 975) celebrating the dyānandana, the future king Khmer expedition, records ka temple (śrīherukaharmya), have been a Hevajra place of

was the first yoginītantra to anslated by modern scholars.
) pioneering work was slightly . Farrow and I. Menon (1992), wards a comprehensive critiains one of the great desiderst studies, has been achieved stituted but useful editions of egi (2001; 2006). R.F. Meyer's 2005–2006) is not based on e time being, it would seem mitted in a fairly stable form, tion and possibly slightly dif-nopsis of Contents

nsists of two main chapters lled kalpas, which are usu-12 subchapters, and named wakening of Vajragarbha" f most of the text) and "The pectively. (Below the kalpas er case Roman I and II, the ase, and verses with Arabic this feature, the text is very he king [of tantras] in two ). Some ancillary tantras that the two chapters were

---

extracted from a mythical Ur-tantra in 32 chapters. There is a chance that the Hevajratantra itself refers to some such concept (I.xi.12).

I.i: On the Vajra Family

The text opens with a modified etiological passage: it does contain the customary opening formula (evaṃ mayā śrutam etc.), but here the lord is said to have been abiding in the womb of vajra women. This opening is inherited from the Guhyasamājatantra. Although the role of the petitioner is assumed mostly by the bodhisattva Vajragarbha (a role sometimes handed over to the consort of Hevajra and other goddesses), the first words are spoken by the lord himself. This is an exhortation to the retinue to hear about Hevajra, who is the essence of three beings (sattva): vajrasattva, mahāsattva, and samayasattva. Vajragarbha intervenes and asks for clarification regarding these three, which is given. He then asks about the name Hevajra itself. The answer is that he means great compassion, whereas vajra means wisdom; the name symbolizes the union of the two. A short overview of contents follows. The lord then teaches the philosophical background with which Hevajra/Heruka should be visualized. Vajragarbha then asks about the tubes (nāḍī) that pervade the body. These are taught to be 32 in number, among them three are the most important ones (lalanā, rasanā, and the central avadhūtī). The names of the four wheels (cakra) are also given: three are named after the three bodies of the Buddha (nirmāṇa, saṃbhoga, dharma), the last is that of great bliss (mahāsukha). A further list of items in sets of four follows, with the implication that all these sets are somehow correlated. It is to be noted that the text displays a peculiar predilection for sets of four. The subchapter closes with a single verse on the yogic practice of "inner heat" (caṇḍālī; better known in its Tibetan rendering, gtum mo). This particular system of tubes and wheels, as well as the practice of caṇḍālī, are innovations of the text.

I.ii: On Mantras

The second subchapter deals mostly with mantras, which are given openly (that is to say, not through encoding and decoding, although that process too is used later). The mantras given include that for food offering (bali), the seed syllables of the tathāgatas, the heart mantra of Hevajra, a spell to shake a city, the seed syllables of the *yoginī*s, the mantras of the two-armed, four-armed, and six-armed ectypes of Hevajra, the seed syllables for the empowerment of body, speech, and mind, a protective spell to purify the ground for ritual purposes, spells for various aggressive rites, and other minor rites such as weather magic, martial magic, and chasing away wild animals.

I.iii: On the Deity/Deities

This subchapter describes the deity Hevajra with some details for the procedure of visualization. He arises from the seed syllable hūṃ, which arises from a vajra, he is dark in color, and is surrounded by eight goddesses who worship him. Their names are Gaurī, Caurī, Vetālī/Vettālī, Ghasmarī, Pukkasī, Śavarī, Caṇḍālī, and Ḍombī. It is noteworthy that the latter four are named after various outcaste groups. There are only minor differences between this retinue and that of Heruka in the Sarvabuddhasamāyogaḍākinījālaśaṃvara. The symbolism of the cremation ground, where the deity and its retinue reside, is prominent. The closing part gives the particulars for two ectypes, a four-armed and a six-armed Hevajra. The former holds a skull bowl filled with blood, a vajra, and embraces his consort, here called Vajravārāhī (who is otherwise the consort of Śaṃvara). The latter has three faces, holds a trident, a vajra, a bell, a chopping-flaying knife, and embraces his consort, who in this case is called Vajraśṛṅkhalā.

I.iv: On Consecration by the Deities

The very short fourth subchapter describes the visualization of being consecrated by the deities (i.e. buddhas and goddesses) once the visualization of oneself as Hevajra is completed.

I.v: On Reality

As the title suggests, here the subject matter is more doctrinal than practical. Some verses are metaphysical statements reminiscent of the Prajñāpāramitā literature, several verses teach details concerning the yogin's consort, but one also finds semantic analyses of technical terms and names, both tantric and non-tantric.

I.vi: On the Observance

This subchapter describes the post-initiatory observance (caryā), in which the practitioner is to assume the physical appearance of the deity. He should first gain a certain amount of mastery over yogic meditation in a solitary place. Then he should acquire a young and beautiful consort, roam the land with her, interact freely with all castes, eat and drink whatever is found; in short, he should free himself of all restrictive social inhibitions. It is hinted that during the time of the observance (the exact time span is not given, otherwise typically six months), the initiate is free of all ritual obligations except reverence to his guru.

I.vii: On Secret Gestures

The seventh subchapter is for the most part dedicated to secret hand gestures (chommā) by which male and female initiates can recognize and communicate with each other. The appropriate places for such meetings (melāpakasthāna) are then listed, with the appropriate days for practice. Further doctrinal injunctions are given: the yogin is not to discriminate between right and wrong deeds, appropriate and inappropriate diet, correct and incorrect thought and speech. All movements and words are to be considered mudrās and mantras of the deity Heruka (i.e. Hevajra), for whose name a semantic analysis is given.

I.viii: On the Circle of Yoginīs

This subchapter gives further details about visualization, especially about the retinue called the circle of yoginīs (yoginīcakra). This consists of the main consort, Nairātmyā in the middle, and 14 goddesses: Vajrā, another Gaurī, Vāriyoginī, and Vajraḍākinī in the inner circle in the intermediate directions, the octet already mentioned above in the outer circle, with Khecarī above and Bhūcarī below. Their iconographic details are given. About halfway through the subchapter the text announces that thus far the stage of generation (utpattikrama) has been taught, with teachings on the stage of the perfected/fully arisen (utpannakrama) to follow. This is described in terms of sexual yoga, where the practitioner experiences the series of four blisses (ānanda): bliss (ānanda), supreme bliss (paramānanda), the bliss of cessation (viramānanda), and innate bliss (sahajānanda). The order is given thus, but later on in the text the last two are given in reverse order. There were two schools of thought on this matter and quite a lot of exegesis has been created around this controversy (Isaacson & Sferra, 2014, 94–109). The subchapter closes with philosophical verses on meditation and its benefits.

I.ix: On Purification

The ninth subchapter deals with the idea of viśuddhi (for an in-depth analysis of the term, see Sferra, 1999), broadly speaking a series of correlations between the tantric world of deities and the realm of Mahāyāna/Abhidharma doctrinal concepts. For example, the four central goddesses with Nairātmyā are said to be the aggregates (skandha), a further set of four are paralleled with the gross elements beginning with earth, the 16 arms of Hevajra are taught to correspond to the 16 kinds of emptiness, and so on.

I.x: On initiation

The penultimate subchapter deals mostly with matters related to initiation (abhiṣeka). A diagram of the deities (maṇḍala) is drawn with colored powders in a carefully purified place. A consort is presented to the officiant, who copulates with her and makes the disciple ingest the resulting sexual fluids. After some elaboration on the four blisses, further details of the diagram are given, such as the threads used to delineate the diagram, its ornamentation, the symbols used in lieu of the anthropomorphic representation of the deities, and so forth. The subchapter concludes with a somewhat obscure passage concerning the relationship between being embodied and innate bliss.

I.xi

The last subchapter of the first kalpa is untitled; some exegetes call it that "On Gazes" (that the practitioner should adopt according to the ritual he wishes to perform), which is indeed the first topic addressed. In addition, for each of the kinds of gazes, phases of breath control and targets for practice, such as grass and trees, are taught. A subsequent passage describes a cannibalistic ritual performed to obtain the power of flying; another, the practice of the goddess Kurukullā for subjugation.

II.i: On Oblation into Fire

The first subchapter of the second kalpa does give various details about the oblation ritual (homa) – the shape and size of the fire pit for example – but it opens with a question about the consecration (pratiṣṭhā) of images.

II.ii: On Ascertaining Accomplishment

The main topic is the practitioner's daily meditation: he should seek salvation by continuously cultivating identity with the deity or deities. After a short solitary practice he should obtain a suitable consort and continue with her. Various praises of the practice are given and it is stated that all can benefit from it, even the greatest sinners. The text reinforces the idea of gradual practice in two stages – that of

---

generation (utpattikrama) anc (utpannakrama) – and explair constructed thus (Isaacson, 20

II.iii: On the Fundamentals and Secret Language

Here the yoginīs join Vajrag and petitioners. The lord tea the initial word evaṃ, the fo and the blisses themselves, th maṇḍala, the vows binding th miscellaneous matters, some tions. The last passage teach codewords (sandhyābhāṣā).

II.iv: The Summary of the I and Sealing

Exceeding a century of vers subchapter of the text; it is plex and often puzzling. The l elucidations on topics only previous subchapters. He ad with due digressions. First, I Apabhramsha, and then tea such as elucidations about th seed syllables of the yoginīs, resolve of enlightenment (b practices with one's consort, t further songs, philosophical tion, the food offering, and "s essence, a kind of viśuddhi.

II.v: The Glory of Hevajra

Requested by Nairātmyā, He tice of the sixteen-armed, ei Heruka and his retinue. This ing most of the details relate practice, and incidental ritu tiation rite are also taught; t direct reference to the embl Tattvasaṃgraha.

II.vi: On the Scroll Paintir

After making love to his teaches the symbolism of th (mudrā) and only then detail painting (paṭa) depicting th pared. The text does not g rather focuses on the cerem actual act of painting.

orld of deities and the realm rma doctrinal concepts. For al goddesses with Nairātmyā gates (skandha), a further set ith the gross elements begin-arms of Hevajra are taught to nds of emptiness, and so on.

apter deals mostly with mat-(abhiṣeka). A diagram of the awn with colored powders in ce. A consort is presented to lates with her and makes the ting sexual fluids. After some blisses, further details of the as the threads used to delinrnamentation, the symbols ropomorphic representation forth. The subchapter con-at obscure passage concern-tween being embodied and f the first kalpa is untitled; at "On Gazes" (that the pracaccording to the ritual he ich is indeed the first topic for each of the kinds of gazes, ol and targets for practice, s, are taught. A subsequent nnibalistic ritual performed flying; another, the practice ā for subjugation.

Fire
the second kalpa does give he oblation ritual (homa) – e fire pit for example – but ion about the consecration

Accomplishment
practitioner's daily meditavation by continuously cultideity or deities. After a short uld obtain a suitable consort Various praises of the prac-stated that all can benefit t sinners. The text reinforces ctice in two stages – that of generation (utpattikrama) and that of the perfected (utpannakrama) – and explains the reason why it is constructed thus (Isaacson, 2001, 468–472).

II.iii: On the Fundamentals of All Tantras and Secret Language

Here the yoginīs join Vajragarbha as addressees and petitioners. The lord teaches elucidations on the initial word evaṃ, the four moments of bliss and the blisses themselves, the four initiations, the maṇḍala, the vows binding the initiate, and further miscellaneous matters, some of which are reiterations. The last passage teaches the initiates' secret codewords (sandhyābhāṣā).

II.iv: The Summary of the Entire Tantra and Sealing

Exceeding a century of verses, this is the longest subchapter of the text; it is correspondingly complex and often puzzling. The lord is asked to provide elucidations on topics only briefly mentioned in previous subchapters. He addresses the questions with due digressions. First, he proclaims songs in Apabhramsha, and then teaches various matters, such as elucidations about the communal feast, the seed syllables of the yoginīs, the nature of semen/resolve of enlightenment (bodhicitta), the sexual practices with one's consort, the bodies of a buddha, further songs, philosophical aphorisms on liberation, the food offering, and "sealing" (mudraṇa) – in essence, a kind of viśuddhi.

II.v: The Glory of Hevajra

Requested by Nairātmyā, Hevajra teaches the practice of the sixteen-armed, eight-faced quadrupede Heruka and his retinue. This is the subchapter giving most of the details related to visualization, daily practice, and incidental rituals. Details on the initiation rite are also taught; this passage includes a direct reference to the emblematic yogatantra, the Tattvasaṃgraha.

II.vi: On the Scroll Painting

After making love to his consort, Hevajra first teaches the symbolism of the five bone ornaments (mudrā) and only then details related to how a scroll painting (paṭa) depicting the deities should be prepared. The text does not go into technicalities; it rather focuses on the ceremonial setting up of the actual act of painting.

II.vii: On the Feast

The title again describes only about half of the subject matter covered. The subchapter opens with details related to preparing and handling a book containing the Hevajratantra: it should be written on birch bark 12 fingerwidths long with human blood as ink and a stylus made of human bone. It, just as the painting, should not be seen by non-initiates and it should be hidden on one's body when traveling. The second part describes a communal feast (gaṇamaṇḍala), which is to take place in a secluded area such as a cremation ground. Under the supervision of a guru, the initiates should sit on tiger hides, eat, and share liquor from a skull bowl.

II.viii: On Those to Be Trained

The subchapter first teaches some physical and behavioral characteristics that an ideal consort, who has already been described as young and beautiful, should possess. The subsequent passage gives a prayer (praṇidhāna) in which the yogin expresses his hope to be continually reborn as a Hevajra initiate. The final few verses describe an inclusivistic propedeutic model to convert and train beings. First, they should be instructed in standard Buddhist morality; then, they should be taught Vaibhāṣika doctrines, then Sautrāntika ones, then Yogācāra, and finally Madhyamaka; after this, esoteric Buddhism (Mantranaya) in general, which culminates with the Hevajra. (For this important verse and some exegesis on it, see Isaacson, 2007, 291–292.)

II.ix: On Decoding Mantras

The first topic to be addressed in this subchapter is a rite to magically kill enemies of Buddhism. The text continues with further viśuddhis and ends with the system of decoding mantras (mantroddhāra).

II.x: On Recitation

The shortest subchapter of the text deals with the various materials to be used for making the beads of the rosary (again customized for various rituals), as well as the corresponding diet.

II.xi: On That Which Has the Innate As Its Purpose

The subchapter opens with teaching the bodily signs of affinity with deity clans and closes with instructions on how to worship the physical consort (here mahāmudrā) sexually.

II.xii

The final subchapter is not named separately. It is very short and teaches verses that are to be used in sexual initiation.

Commentaries on the Hevajratantra

At present we have access in some form to at least 16 Indian commentaries. Among those available in the original, a pithy but most sophisticated example is Ratnākaraśānti's Muktāvalī (ed. Tripathi & Negi, 2001; a project to reedit the text has been announced by Isaacson), which "explicitly attempts to show that tantric practice of the kind taught in the Hevajratantra does not conflict with, but rather is in perfect accordance with, the basic teachings of (non-tantric) Buddhism" (Isaacson, 2002, 151[80]). The author was active in the first half of the 11th century (Isaacson, 2001, 457).

Also available in the original is the Yogaratnamālā of (a) Kāṇha/Kṛṣṇa (or *Samayavajra, or Śāntibhadra), who may have been a disciple of Ratnākaraśānti (Isaacson, 2001, 458) rather than a commentator from as early as the 9th century (tentatively dated so in Snellgrove, 1959, 13–14; accepted without hesitation in Farrow & Menon, 1992, viii), now available in two editions (Snellgrove, 1959; Tripathi & Negi, 2006) and an English translation (Farrow & Menon, 1992).

Vajragarbha's Ṣaṭsāhasrikā Hevajrapiṇḍārthaṭīkā is a commentary from the viewpoint of the Kālacakra doctrine (ed. Shendge, 2004; Sferra has announced a new complete edition, some chapters of which have already appeared accompanied by translations: the first in Sferra 2009a; the tenth in Sferra 2009b).

There are at least two commentaries available in Sanskrit, which have not been translated into Tibetan. Kamalanātha/Mañjuśrī's Ratnāvalī (KLK 231), although the work of an obscure author, can be shown to have been rather influential on the famous Abhayākaragupta. Kelikuliśa's Trivajraratnāvalīmālikā pañjikā (a photographic copy is available at the NSUG Xc 14/36; reported to have survived, KCDS, 146) is an attempt to blend the Guhyasamājatantra doctrine and practice as taught in the Ārya school of exegesis with that of the Hevajratantra (Isaacson, 2009, 91). Not much else is known about this author; since the manuscript is dated to the 19th regnal year of (a) Madanapāla, he must predate the mid-12th century.

The Vajrapadasārasaṃgraha of Yaśobhadra is suspected to be extant in Sanskrit, but for the time being only the Tibetan translation is available (D 1186/P 2316).

A further ten commentaries are available only in Tibetan (D 1181–1182, 1184–1185, 1187–1188, 1190–1193/P 2311–2312, 2314–2315, 2317–2318, 2320–2323), including three that were possibly written in the 10th century (those of Bhavabhaṭṭa, Durjayacandra, and Padmāṅkuravajra).

Satellite Texts

In spite of there having been several initiation manuals for this system, some of which now survive only in Tibetan, the only such work known to be extant in Sanskrit is the anonymous and incomplete Hevajrasekaprakriyā (ed. and French trans. Finot, 1934, 19–48; ed. and notes Isaacson & Sanderson, unpublished). The only such work partially translated into English, that of a *Prajñāśrī (Snellgrove, 1987, 254–260), is very likely a canonized Tibetan composition (Isaacson 2010, 273). Ratnākaraśānti's Hevajrābhyudayamaṇḍalopāyikā does not survive, but the author himself refers to it (Isaacson, 2002, 152[79]).

Among the practical manuals surviving in Sanskrit (and also perhaps among all such works), the most influential was Saroruhavajra's Hevajrasādhanopāyikā/Hevajrasādhanopayikā (anonymous ed., 2003, badly in need of revision; D 1218/P 2347). A commentary on this text also survives, Jālandharipāda/Vajranātha/Suratavajra's Vajrapradīpā (the best ms. so far is NSUG Xc 14/38; D 1237/P 2366), which is yet another attempt to harmonize the meditation system proposed by Ārya exegesis and Hevajra practice. Continuing this tradition is Rāhulagupta's Pañcakramānuttarahevajraprakāśa (bar an apograph, the only known manuscript is dated 1272 CE, microfilmed by the Institute for the Advanced Study of World Religions, MBB-I-39, and the NGMPP, X 1504/1, this witness also contains an appendix on external worship; only partially matching translation D 1238/P 2367).

Very carefully crafted practical manuals are Ratnākaraśānti's Bhramahara on the generation stage (utpattikrama; ed. Isaacson, 2002; annotations in Isaacson, 2007) and the same author's Hevajrasahajasadyoga on the stage of the perfected (utpannakrama; ed. Isaacson, 2001); this latter work also has a commentary, which survives only in Tibetan (Isaacson, 2001, 459).

A veritable treasure trove of practical manuals (but also hymns and other miscellanea) is an anthology preserved in a sin script from Nepal: the 272 f (including an exception, Ānandagarbha, which is a on the Sarvabuddhasamāy a large proportion of which ted to Tibet. (For a descripti see Isaacson, 2010.)

---

Among further survivin close attention are Ḍomb (Shendge, 1967), his Amṛtapra by a student, not a direct 1928, 443–449; D 1306/P 243 Pratipattisāraśataka (abou survives in NAK 1–1679 bau
P 4695; perhaps complet KCDS, 82).

Ancillary Tantras an

Perhaps the earliest and cer tial ancillary scripture inspir is the Ḍākinīvajrapañjara. A this work is reported to exis but for now we have acce translation (D 419/P 11). A anonymous Ḍākinīvajrapañ is available only in Sanskrit, Mahāmatideva's Tattvaviśa
tered: folio 1 in KLK 134; folio folio in NAK 5–23), and in f 2326). Two further comm Tibetan translation (D 1194– scripture already states that Ur-tantra in 500,000 (units to which the commentato in line with a feature known exegetes, claimed to have ac

Another very important Mahāmudrātilaka, survives (Staatsbibliothek zu Berlin, sitz, Orientabteilung, Hs.or CE); the Tibetan translation a different recension. This same mythical source in 50 The main deity is similar to but with 16 faces, some diffe distinctive retinue of 32 god on the entire text is known of *Gambhīravajra (D 1200/very rich in references to t *siddha*s, who are often ident anthology preserved in a single, 14th-century manuscript from Nepal: the 272 folios preserve 45 works (including an exception, the Vajrajvālodayā by Ānandagarbha, which is a practical manual based on the Sarvabuddhasamāyogaḍākinījālaśaṃvara), a large proportion of which has not been transmitted to Tibet. (For a description and list of contents, see Isaacson, 2010.)

Among further surviving materials deserving close attention are Ḍombīheruka's Sahajasiddhi (Shendge, 1967), his Amṛtaprabhā (more likely a record by a student, not a direct work; ed. Bhattacharya, 1928, 443–449; D 1306/P 2436), and [an] Āryadeva's Pratipattisāraśataka (about half of the original survives in NAK 1–1679 bauddhastotra 14; D 2334/P 4695; perhaps complete in ms. reported in KCDS, 82).

Ancillary Tantras and Their Exegesis

Perhaps the earliest and certainly the most influential ancillary scripture inspired by the Hevajratantra is the Ḍākinīvajrapañjara. A Sanskrit manuscript of this work is reported to exist in China (KCDS, 140), but for now we have access only to the Tibetan translation (D 419/P 11). A short commentary, the anonymous Ḍākinīvajrapañjaraṭippati (KLK 230) is available only in Sanskrit, whereas the original of Mahāmatideva's Tattvaviśadā survives in part (scattered: folio 1 in KLK 134; folios 2–15 in NAK 5–20; last folio in NAK 5–23), and in full in Tibetan (D 1196/P 2326). Two further commentaries exist only in Tibetan translation (D 1194–1195/P 2324–2325). This scripture already states that there was an extensive Ur-tantra in 500,000 (units or verses) in 32 kalpas, to which the commentator Vajragarbha, keeping in line with a feature known to be that of Kālacakra exegetes, claimed to have access.

Another very important ancillary scripture, the Mahāmudrātilaka, survives in full in a codex unicus (Staatsbibliothek zu Berlin, Preussischer Kulturbesitz, Orientabteilung, Hs.or. 8711, dated 1823/1824 CE); the Tibetan translation (D 420/P 12) is that of a different recension. This text also mentions the same mythical source in 500,000 (units or verses). The main deity is similar to the 16-armed Hevajra, but with 16 faces, some different implements and a distinctive retinue of 32 goddesses. A commentary on the entire text is known only from Tibetan, that of *Gambhīravajra (D 1200/P 2330), a work that is very rich in references to the teachings of various siddhas, who are often identified by the region they inhabited (Kashmir, Jalandhar, Oḍḍiyana, Bengal, Assam are mentioned). A commentary on the opening lines and various selected topics is by the Kashmiri *Prajñāśrīgupta (D 1201/P 2331), a disciple of his famous compatriot Ratnavajra, who states that he wrote to honor the request of a Tibetan, Rin chen rgyal mtshan. However, careless editing suggests that the text originally consisted of draft notes for himself and his disciples. Both were involved in several Tibetan translations.

A further, perhaps less significant ancillary scripture is the Jñānagarbha* (D 421/P 13) in four chapters, the opening of which explicitly refers to the Mahāmudrātilaka. Oddly, the Mahāmudrātilaka also refers to the Jñānagarbha*; however, the content referred to is not to be found in the version available to us, and therefore we must suspect that this was a different text. The text as we have it deals for the most part with topics related to initiation.

A long, completely unstudied but perhaps important, ancillary scripture is the Jñānatilaka* (D 422/P 14), on which two commentaries are available in Tibetan (D 1202–1203/P 2332–2333).

This text, in turn, is referred to yet another, short ancillary tantra, the Tattvapradīpa* (D 423/P 15), which also contains a prophecy about the king Indrabhūti, a seminal mythical figure who came to stand at the top of several initiation lineages. This text also attracted the attention of exegetes, whose works are also available only in Tibetan: the Ratnamālā* of *Mahāsukhavajra (D 1205/P 2335) is a commentary to the entire text, whereas Prajñāśrīgupta's Ratnamañjarī (D 1217/P 2346) elaborates only on the opening line.

The Sampuṭodbhava (on the constitution of which, see Szántó, 2013) is also mentioned by the Tibetan tradition as an ancillary scripture, but this is perhaps merely on the account of the large number of verses lifted over from the Hevajratantra and their compounding with passages from other texts.

Bibliography

Bhattacharya, B., Sādhanamālā, vol. II, Baroda, 1928.
Davidson, R.M., Tibetan Renaissance: Tantric Buddhism in the Rebirth of Tibetan Culture, New York, 2004.
Farrow, G.W., & I. Menon, The Concealed Essence of the Hevajra Tantra With the Commentary Yogaratnamala, Delhi, 1992.
Finot, L., "Manuscripts sanskrits de sādhana's retrouvés en Chine," JA 225, 1934, 1–85.
Finot, L., "Notes d'épigraphie XI: Les inscriptions de Mison," BÉFEO 4, 1904, 897–979.

Griffiths, A., "Inscriptions of Sumatra III: The Padang Lawas Corpus Studied along with Inscriptions from Sorik Merapi (North Sumatra) and from Muara Takus (Riau)," in D. Perret, ed., History of Padang Lawas North Sumatra II: Societies of Padang Lawas (Mid-ninth–Thirteenth century CE), Paris, 2014, 211–262.

"Hevajrasādhanopāyikā," Dhīḥ 36, 2003, 131–144.

Isaacson, H., "Observations on the Development of the Ritual of Initiation (Abhiṣeka) in the Higher Buddhist Tantric Systems," in: A. Zotter & C. Zotter, eds., Hindu and Buddhist Initiations in India and Nepal, Wiesbaden, 2010.

Isaacson, H., "A Collection of Hevajrasādhanas and Related Works in Sanskrit," in: E. Steinkellner, D. Qing & H. Krasser, eds., Sanskrit Manuscripts in China, Beijing, 2009, 89–136.

Isaacson, H., "First Yoga: A Commentary on the Ādiyoga Section of Ratnākaraśānti's Bhramahara (Studies in Ratnākaraśānti's Tantric Works IV)," in: B. Kellner, H. Krasser, H. Lasic, M.T. Much & H. Tauscher, eds., Pramāṇakīrtiḥ: Papers Dedicated to Ernst Steinkellner on the Occasion of His 70th birthday, part 1, Vienna, 2007, 285–314.

Isaacson, H., "Ratnākaraśānti's Bhramaharanāma Hevajrasādhana (Studies in Ratnākaraśānti's Tantric Works III)," JICABS 5, 2002, 151–176.

Isaacson, H., "Ratnākaraśānti's Hevajrasahajasadyoga (Studies in Ratnākaraśānti's Tantric Works I)," in: R. Torella, ed., Le Parole e i Marmi: Studi in onore di Raniero Gnoli nel suo 70 compleanno, Rome, 2001, 457–487.

Isaacson, H., "The opening verses of Ratnākaraśānti's Muktāvalī (Studies in Ratnākaraśānti's Tantric Works II)," in: R. Tsuchida & A. Wezler, eds., Harānandalaharī: Volume in Honour of Professor Minoru Hara on his Seventieth Birthday, Reinbek, 2000, 121–134.

Isaacson, H., & A.G.J.S. Sanderson, Hevajrasekaprakriyā, unpublished.

Lobo, W., "Reflections on the Tantric Buddhist deity Hevajra in Cambodia," in: P.-Y. Manguin, ed., Southeast Asian Archaeology 1994: Proceedings of the 5th International Conference of the European Association of Southeast Asian Archaeologists, Paris, 24th–28th October 1994, vol. II, Hull, 1998, 113–127.

Meyer, R.F., Das Hevajratantra, private publication, 2005–2006.

Reichle, N., Violence and Serenity, Late Buddhist Sculpture from Indonesia, Honolulu, 2007.

Sanderson, A.G.J.S., "The Śaiva Age: The Rise and Dominance of Śaivism During the Early Medieval Period," in: S. Einoo, ed., Genesis and Development of Tantrism, Tokyo, 2009, 41–349.

Sferra, F., "The Laud of the Chosen Deity, the First Chapter of the Hevajratantrapiṇḍārthaṭīkā by Vajragarbha," in: S. Einoo, ed., Genesis and Development of Tantrism, Tokyo, 2009a, 435–468.

Sferra, F., "The Elucidation of True Reality: The Kālacakra Commentary by Vajragarbha on the Tattvapaṭala of the Hevajratantra," in: E. Arnold, ed., As Long as Space Endures: Essays on the Kālacakra Tantra in Honor of H.H. the Dalai Lama, Ithaca, 2009b, 93–126.

Sferra, F., "The Concept of Purification in Some Texts of Late Indian Buddhism," JIP 27, 1999, 83–103.

Shâstrî, M.K., ed., The Tantrāloka of Abhinava-gupta: With Commentary by Rajanaka Jayaratha, vol. III, Bombay, 1921.

Shendge, M.J., Ṣaṭsāhasrikā-Hevajra-Ṭīkā, A Critical Edition, Delhi, 2004.

Shendge, M.J., Śrīsahajasiddhi, IIJ 10, 1967, 126–149.

Snellgrove, D.L., Indo-Tibetan Buddhism: Indian Buddhists and Their Tibetan Successors, London, 1987.

Snellgrove, D.L., The Hevajra Tantra, A Critical Study, 2 vols, London, 1959.

Sobisch, J.-U., Hevajra and Lam 'bras Literature of India and Tibet as Seen through the Eyes of A-mes-zhabs, Wiesbaden, 2008.

Szántó, P.-D., "Before a Critical Edition of the Sampuṭa," in: C. Cüppers, R. Mayer & M. Walter, eds., Tibet after Empire: Culture, Society and Religion between 850–1000: Proceedings of the Seminar Held in Lumbini, Nepal, March 2011, Lumbini, 2013, 343–365.

Tripathi, R.S., & T.S. Negi, Hevajratantram with Yogaratnamālāpañjikā of Mahāpaṇḍitācārya Kṛṣṇapāda, Sarnath, 2006.

Tripathi, R.S., & T.S. Negi, Hevajratantram With Muktāvalī Pañjikā of Mahāpaṇḍitācārya Ratnākaraśānti, Sarnath, 2001.

Vidyavinoda, V.V., "Two Inscriptions from Bodh-Gaya," EpInd 12, 1913–1914, 27–30.

Willemen, C., The Chinese Hevajratantra: The Scriptural Text of the Ritual of the Great King of the Teaching, the Adamantine One with Great Compassion and Knowledge of the Void, Leuven, 1983; repr. Delhi 2004.

PÉTER-DÁNIEL SZÁNTÓ

Kālacakra ("Wheel of Tim Buddhist tantric deity and o he is worshipped along with Viśvamātṛ ("Mother of the U is the last large-scale Buddh and spread in India. The t times used to refer to the wh rituals, and practices profes described in its scriptural so Laghukālacakratantra (Sho which is the most authori ancient treatises and comm

Since quotations from th are not found prior to the 11 this text contains references customs as well as to the fut (foreigner) troops (i.e. Musli in a sort of allegorical, escha good and evil (comp. e.g. 1.15 is very likely that it has been ning of the 1st century of th an area of northern India was present and resisted. I 1.27, we find a cryptic refere genary cycle. The stanza si sexagenary cycle will finish or Islamic era (mlecchen 622 CE. The Kālacakra teac transmitted for centuries i Śambhala, a fabulous kingd already celebrated in epic will be introduced again i beginning of the new cyc (see Newman, 1998b). Th in prophetic terms and t interpreted as reliable evid namely that the preaching 1026. However, the passage reveals the intention of giv scriptures and their pro historical basis.

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

Śaiva Age: The Rise and Dominance
Early Medieval Period," in: S. Einoo, elopment of Tantrism, Tokyo, 2009,

the Chosen Deity, the First Chapter piṇḍārthaṭīkā by Vajragarbha," in:
and Development of Tantrism, Tokyo, ion of True Reality: The Kālacakra ragarbha on the Tattvapaṭala of n: E. Arnold, ed., As Long as Space Kālacakra Tantra in Honor of H.H.

, 2009b, 93–126.
f Purification in Some Texts of Late 27, 1999, 83–103. antrāloka of Abhinava-gupta: With aka Jayaratha, vol. III, Bombay, 1921. ikā-Hevajra-Ṭīkā, A Critical Edition, iddhi, IIJ 10, 1967, 126–149. betan Buddhism: Indian Buddhists essors, London, 1987.

ajra Tantra, A Critical Study, 2 vols, d Lam 'bras Literature of India and he Eyes of A-mes-zhabs, Wiesbaden, Critical Edition of the Sampuṭa," yer & M. Walter, eds., Tibet after y and Religion between 850–1000: nar Held in Lumbini, Nepal, March –365.

. Negi, Hevajratantram with of Mahāpaṇḍitācārya Kṛṣṇapāda,

i, Hevajratantram With Muktāvalī tācārya Ratnākaraśānti, Sarnath,

Inscriptions from Bodh-Gaya," 30.
Hevajratantra: The Scriptural Text
King of the Teaching, the Adaman-passion and Knowledge of the Void, i 2004.

PÉTER-DÁNIEL SZÁNTÓ

Kālacakra

Kālacakra ("Wheel of Time") is the name of a Buddhist tantric deity and of the tradition in which he is worshipped along with his female counterpart Viśvamātṛ ("Mother of the Universe"). The Kālacakra is the last large-scale Buddhist tantric cycle to arise and spread in India. The term itself is also sometimes used to refer to the whole system of teachings, rituals, and practices professed by this tradition and described in its scriptural sources, particularly in the Laghukālacakratantra (Short Tantra of Kālacakra), which is the most authoritative, and in its most ancient treatises and commentarial literature.

Since quotations from the Laghukālacakratantra are not found prior to the 11th century, and because this text contains references to Islamic doctrines and customs as well as to the future defeat of the mleccha (foreigner) troops (i.e. Muslims' troops) by Buddhists in a sort of allegorical, eschatological battle between good and evil (comp. e.g. 1.154–165; 2.99, 158cd, 168), it is very likely that it has been composed at the beginning of the 1st century of the 2nd millennium CE in an area of northern India where Islamic influence was present and resisted. In Laghukālacakratantra 1.27, we find a cryptic reference to the end of a sexagenary cycle. The stanza simply states that the old sexagenary cycle will finish 403 years after the Higrī, or Islamic era (mlecchendravarṣa), that is, after 622 CE. The Kālacakra teachings, after having been transmitted for centuries in the land of Sambhala/Śambhala, a fabulous kingdom located in the North, already celebrated in epic and puranic literature, will be introduced again in India starting with the beginning of the new cycle, that is, around 1025 (see Newman, 1998b). The statement is couched in prophetic terms and therefore should not be interpreted as reliable evidence for a historical fact, namely that the preaching began precisely in 1025 or 1026. However, the passage is noteworthy because it reveals the intention of giving credibility to the new scriptures and their promulgators through some historical basis.

The Early Texts of the Kālacakra System

In the early Kālacakra literature, geographical references are to places with a religious significance. According to the tradition, the original teaching of the system was revealed by the Buddha in central India at the stūpa of Dhānyakaṭaka (present-day Amaravati, Guntur district, Andhra Pradesh), in the same place where the Mantranaya ("Method of Mantras") was originally preached. The Buddha himself is said to have imparted it to Sucandra, the first dharmarāja (dharma king) of Sambhala, in a year corresponding to 776 bce (Hoffmann, 1973). These references – both geographical and chronological – are to be read, of course, in a mythical sense and not as reflecting the historical truth. From brief accounts in early Sanskrit literature of the system and from later Tibetan records, we know that among the major masters of the school, there were some of Kashmiri origin (e.g. Raviśrījñāna and Somanātha [both 11th cent.]), others of Bengali origin (e.g. Vibhūticandra [12th–13th cents.] and Vanaratna [1384–1468]), and at least one coming from the south, a certain mysterious Piṇḍo (also known as Piṇḍa, Piṇḍi, Piṭo, Piḍo, etc. [10th–11th cents.]; probably an abbreviation of the attribute piṇḍapātika, "beggar"). According to the tradition, Piṇḍo, a master of Dīpaṃkaraśrījñāna (also known as Atiśa/Atīśa [982?–1054]) active during the second half of the reign of Mahīpāla I (r. 986/988–1034/1036; king of ancient northwestern Bengal and Bihar), came to India from Suvarṇadvīpa (i.e. Sumatra) or Yavadvīpa (i.e. Java).

It is certain, however, that the school quickly spread to Bihar and Bengal and to Nepal, and from there, within a few decades, to Tibet, as evidenced by the first translations of Kālacakra works into Tibetan by Bhadrabodhi/Bodhibhadra and Somanātha already in the 11th century. It is significant that authoritative teachers connected with the Kālacakra were active in Bihar, in particular at the famous Buddhist monastic university of Vikramaśīla (present-day Antichak, Bhagalpur district), among them, Abhayākaragupta (1064–1125?) and Nāropā (also known as Naḍapāda, Nāro, Nāropa, etc.;

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

956–1041?). According to the biography of Nāropā written by Lha btsun Rin chen rnam rgyal (1473–1557) at Brag dkar rta so, Nāropā was an abbot at Nālandā, again in Bihar – another famous center of Buddhist learning, with which Abhayākaragupta, was connected as well.

Also noteworthy, although certainly less significant in this regard for being a common characteristic (for reasons related to geography, climate, and history) of almost all Buddhist tantric literature, is the fact that all the extant Sanskrit manuscripts related to this system have a Nepalese or Bengali origin. As far as we know, the two earliest-dated manuscripts come from Bengal:

1. a copy of the Vimalaprabhā by Puṇḍarīka, an extensive commentary on the Laghukālacakratantra, kept in Kolkata at the Asiatic Society of Bengal, dated to the 39th regnal year of Harivarman (r. early 12th cent.; see also Sanderson, 2009, 82 and n. 136);
2. a copy of the Laghukālacakratantra, originally found in the Snar thang (Narthang) Monastery in Tibet (its present location is unknown), dated Śaka 1186 (= 1263–1264 CE), and published in a facsimile edition in 1971 without introductory remarks by L. Chandra (for other early-dated manuscripts, see also Sāṅkṛtyāyana, 1935, 35; 1937, 46).

According to the tradition, the Laghukālacakratantra – redacted in sragdharā stanzas, a refined and unusual meter for tantric scriptures – is the shortened version (uddhṛta; lit. extracted from) of a more extensive teaching in 12,000 verses in the more common anuṣṭubh meter, which is known under the title of Ādibuddha, Paramādibuddha, or simply Mūlatantra (Root Tantra) and of which we find quotations in many Sanskrit works from the late 10th century onward. It is plausible that the Ādibuddha, which we know only through fragments, and its commentary of purportedly 60,000 verses (of which we have only reports but no trace) never existed as an independent composition. Very likely longer or shorter passages assigned to the authoritative Ādibuddha have been composed by the first Kālacakra masters with the purpose of corroborating their own teachings. The style, language, and especially the content of these fragments betray a late origin. As far as we know, the Ādibuddha was never translated into Tibetan.

Some excerpts attributed to the Ādibuddha circulated prior to the Laghukālacakratantra, and references to it and quotations from it appear in two important works written probably between the late 10th and early 11th century: the Laghutantraṭīkā by Vajrapāṇi and the Hevajratantrapiṇḍārthaṭīkā by Vajragarbha. These two texts, both also known as the Ṣaṭsāhasrikā, are, respectively, the commentary on the first ten and a half stanzas of the Cakraśaṃvaratantra and the gloss on the first five paṭalas (chapters) of the Hevajratantra, the portions of the two works that, according to our authors, would contain their concise, core meaning (piṇḍārtha). Typical doctrines of the Kālacakra find in these two commentaries their first formulation. Both of these texts still reflect a formative stage of the system, whose full development took place only a few years (decades?) later with the composition of the Laghukālacakratantra and the Vimalaprabhā.

Although the styles of Vajrapāṇi and Vajragarbha reveal some significant differences, there are important convergences in their works in the choice of subjects, and sometimes in the phraseology. The two texts seem designed with the same purpose, namely, to interpret the two most important yoginītantras of that time – the Cakraśaṃvaratantra and Hevajratantra – in the light of the teachings of the emerging Kālacakra tradition. The authors' unconventional choice to adopt pseudonyms is a further element in common, and it cannot be excluded that the two works are the product of a common strategy, that their authors knew each other, and that they were acting in concert. In each case, the commentator presents himself as a person of unquestionable authority: the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi is the standard petitioner of Vajrayāna scriptures, whereas the bodhisattva Vajragarbha is one of the principal interlocutors of the Bhagavān (a common title of a buddha) in the Hevajratantra itself. Both authors claim to have received the instruction to write a commentary directly from the Buddha. But while Vajrapāṇi states that Vīreśa ("Lord of the Heroes"), an epithet of the Buddha, prompted him to compose the Laghutantraṭīkā for the benefit of yogins, so they can gain merits and the fruit of the Mahāmudrā (LTṬ. 43, 119), Vajragarbha even claims that he was present at the teaching of the root Hevajratantra, a scripture of purportedly 500,000 verses, and that his commentary on the short, actually circulating, Hevajratantra, based on this root Hevajratantra, was written for the benefit of humankind, in order to remove misconceptions and wrong interpretations introduced by wicked masters. In addition to having access to a higher and hidden level of tantric revelation, unavailable to other commentators, both authors also claim to possess the five kinds of higher knowledge (abhijñā):

1. divine eye (divyacakṣus);
2. divine ear (divyaśrotra);
3. knowledge of others' mi
4. memory of past lives (pūr
5. magic powers (ṛddhi).

Some time after the compos by Vajrapāṇi and Vajragarbha Puṇḍarīka quotes dozens Ādibuddha and, in his turn, through a prophecy containe be an incarnation of the bodh (VP. vol. I, 25).

Vajrapāṇi, Vajragarbha, a lying intent was to give a teachings and to establish th particular opposing lay teach tations, which are consequent ginalized. The early Kālacak characterized by a strong ant with the same incisiveness a sions, although with greate the same tendency recurs i another work of Puṇḍarīka, c partially (Sferra, 2007a; 2007 dence that all three authors i to understand the Buddha's the instructions received fro light of other tantras, and, n light of a commentary com is a bodhisattva (see e.g. LT and comment on a few vers (LTṬ. 106–107; HTPṬ. 1.19–3 widespread at that time a tative, in order to explain between a religious teacher to show in their respective t whom the Gurupañcaśikā r selves or were at least subo to monks. Some passages se must have been considerab the Buddhist communities, ety, of that time. Most likely ters believed that closing B unquestioned authority of response to the centrifuga communities and a viable (Hindu) and external (Isla

The Tibetan historiogr accepts the self-proclan Kālacakra authors as bo them as "the three bodhi works as a body of integr he Hevajratantrapiṇḍārthaṭīkā ese two texts, both also known ī, are, respectively, the com-t ten and a half stanzas of the a and the gloss on the first ers) of the Hevajratantra, the works that, according to our ain their concise, core meaning doctrines of the Kālacakra find entaries their first formulation. still reflect a formative stage of ll development took place only ?) later with the composition of antra and the Vimalaprabhā.

s of Vajrapāṇi and Vajragarbha nt differences, there are imporn their works in the choice of nes in the phraseology. The two with the same purpose, namely, most important yoginītantras kraśaṃvaratantra and Hevajra- f the teachings of the emerging The authors' unconventional udonyms is a further element nnot be excluded that the two ct of a common strategy, that ach other, and that they were each case, the commentator a person of unquestionable sattva Vajrapāṇi is the stanajrayāna scriptures, whereas garbha is one of the principal hagavān (a common title of a jratantra itself. Both authors ed the instruction to write a from the Buddha. But while Vīreśa ("Lord of the Heroes"), ddha, prompted him to comṭīkā for the benefit of yogins, erits and the fruit of the 119), Vajragarbha even claims at the teaching of the root pture of purportedly 500,000 mmentary on the short, actujratantra, based on this root itten for the benefit of human-ve misconceptions and wrong uced by wicked masters. In cess to a higher and hidden on, unavailable to other com-ors also claim to possess the owledge (abhijñā):

1. divine eye (divyacakṣus);
2. divine ear (divyaśrotra);
3. knowledge of others' mind (paracittajñāna);
4. memory of past lives (pūrvanivāsānusmṛti); and
5. magic powers (ṛddhi).

Some time after the composition of the two works by Vajrapāṇi and Vajragarbha, in his Vimalaprabhā, Puṇḍarīka quotes dozens of stanzas from the Ādibuddha and, in his turn, declares himself (also through a prophecy contained in these stanzas) to be an incarnation of the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara (VP. vol. I, 25).

Vajrapāṇi, Vajragarbha, and Puṇḍarīka's underlying intent was to give authority to their own teachings and to establish their own superiority, in particular opposing lay teachers and their interpretations, which are consequently denigrated and marginalized. The early Kālacakra literature is actually characterized by a strong anti-secular vein. In effect, with the same incisiveness and with similar expressions, although with greater profusion of words, the same tendency recurs in the Paramārthasevā, another work of Puṇḍarīka, currently published only partially (Sferra, 2007a; 2007b; 2008). It is no coincidence that all three authors insist that it is necessary to understand the Buddha's teaching in the light of the instructions received from a true teacher, in the light of other tantras, and, most importantly, in the light of a commentary composed by someone who is a bodhisattva (see e.g. LTṬ. 51–52). All three cite and comment on a few verses of the Gurupañcaśikā (LTṬ. 106–107; HTPṬ. 1.19–33; VP. vol. II, 4–6), a text widespread at that time and considered authoritative, in order to explain the proper relationship between a religious teacher and a student. They try to show in their respective texts that the teachers to whom the Gurupañcaśikā refers were monks themselves or were at least subordinate and subservient to monks. Some passages seem to suggest that there must have been considerable social tensions within the Buddhist communities, and generally in the society, of that time. Most likely, the first Kālacakra masters believed that closing Buddhist ranks around the unquestioned authority of monks was an effective response to the centrifugal forces within Buddhist communities and a viable defense against internal (Hindu) and external (Islamic) enemies.

The Tibetan historiographical tradition largely accepts the self-proclamation of these early Kālacakra authors as bodhisattvas and refers to them as "the three bodhisattvas," regarding their works as a body of integrated texts, known as the "bodhisattva corpus" (byang chub sems dpa'i skor) or the "bodhisattva commentaries" (byang chub sems dpa'i 'grel pa rnams; sems 'grel skor gsum; comp. Bu ston's Rin chen gces pa'i lde mig 56.3–61.2; trans. Newman, 1987, 76–88).

Among these three works, the Laghutantraṭīkā is probably the oldest, because the Hevajratantrapiṇḍārthaṭīkā and the Vimalaprabhā refer to this text explicitly. Since the Vimalaprabhā paraphrases or incorporates ex silentio, with slight variations, some passages of the Hevajratantrapiṇḍārthaṭīkā, we can establish a relative and likely chronology: (1) the Laghutantraṭīkā, (2) the Hevajratantrapiṇḍārthaṭīkā, and (3) the Vimalaprabhā. The Laghukālacakratantra, which might be contemporaneous with or slightly earlier than the Vimalaprabhā, was still a work in progress at the time of the composition of the first two texts (Sferra, 2005, 260–261).

Vajrapāṇi's Laghutantraṭīkā has been published in C. Cicuzza's edition (2001) and Vajragarbha's Hevajratantrapiṇḍārthaṭīkā partially in M.J. Shendge's (chs. 1–8 [incomplete], 2004) and F. Sferra's (ch. 1, 2009a; ch. 10, 2009b) editions. Puṇḍarīka's Vimalaprabhā has been edited in three volumes by J. Upādhyāya (vol. I, 1986) and by V. Dwivedi and S.S. Bahulkar (vols. II–III, 1994). There is no complete annotated translation of any of these works nor a critical edition of the Tibetan version. Concerning the composition of the Hevajratantrapiṇḍārthaṭīkā and its extant Sanskrit and Tibetan versions, it is noteworthy that the Tibetan version has two colophons. The first colophon is found at the end of the commentary on Hevajratantra 1.5, where also the Sanskrit text finishes, the second at the end of the commentary on Hevajratantra 2.12. Clues in the Sanskrit version and a testimony of the Tibetan historiographer Gzhon nu dpal (1392–1481 CE) in his Deb ther sngon po (book 10, fols. 6v–7r; trans. Roerich, 1976, 764–765) suggest a late origin of the second part of the Tibetan text (commentary on Hevajratantra 1.6–2.12).

Vajrapāṇi's Laghutantraṭīkā is essentially a yogins' manual, subdivided into several vidhis (procedures) and niyamas (rules), sections of varying length, usually brief here, that describe the procedures for formal practice, either individual or collective (the edition of Cicuzza, 2001, in 21 chapters, does not always reflect the internal division of the text). The initial part – resembling in structure the second section of the Hevajratantrapiṇḍārthaṭīkā and the second uddeśa ([brief] account or exposition) of the Vimalaprabhā (for the structure of this text, see below) – is devoted to the description of the content of the Cakraśaṃvaratantra, of its phonic form, of the relationship existing between content and phonic form, of its purpose (i.e. the obtaining of the worldly perfections), and of its ultimate goal (i.e. the realization of buddhahood). This is followed by an explanation of the name Śrīheruka, of the word evam ("thus," the first word of most Buddhist sūtras) and its equivalence with atha (now), the first term of the Cakraśaṃvaratantra, and the first five verses of the text according to both the surface meaning (neyārtha) and the deep meaning (nītārtha; LTṬ. 43–56). The central part of the work is dedicated to the description of the worship of the deities in the maṇḍala, with special attention to the explanation of the appropriate time for the celebration of the gaṇacakra (group circle), the tantric feast, and the changes in position of the yoginīs during the rite (LTṬ. 56–100). The text then describes the preparation of ritual pills (guḍikā), food and beverage to be used during the gaṇacakra (LTṬ. 101–109), as well as the practice of mantras and the ritual of superior and lower initiations (LTṬ. 111–129). Subsequently, the text deals with the practice of the sixfold yoga (ṣaḍaṅgayoga; LTṬ. 135–143). In this section of the text, there are also comments on some verses of the Samājottara (i.e. ch. 18 of the Guhyasamājatantra), which in Buddhist circles of that time represented the main scriptural source for the yoga practice. This section of the Laghutantraṭīkā – later copied and extended by Anupamarakṣita (late 10th – early 11th cents.) and, above all, by Nāropā (956–1041?) – constitutes the first discussion of the sixfold yoga in a Kālacakra text, but it deviates somewhat from the Samājottara. The Hevajratantrapiṇḍārthaṭīkā alludes to the same practices but without reference to the Samājottara. The final part of the Laghutantraṭīkā concerns the practice of the tantric pledges (samaya) and their interpretation with reference to the Guhyasamājatantra and Mañjuśrīnāmasaṃgīti (LTṬ. 145–158).

Vajragarbha's Hevajratantrapiṇḍārthaṭīkā is divided into ten paricchedas (sections):

1. The first section is of particular importance since, in addition to describing the purpose of the work and the necessary qualifications of the authorized interpreter, it explicates the hermeneutical principle by which he must abide. It is based on a concept already reported by Vajrapāṇi as a quote from a direct teaching of the Tathāgata/Buddha (tathāgatavacana), namely that "a tantra must be understood on the basis of another tantra" (see LTṬ. 123–125, 145). Vajragarbha and Puṇḍarīka take a step further and state that it is the knowledge of the Ādibuddha – and, according to Puṇḍarīka, subject to it, of the Mañjuśrīnāmasaṅgīti – that is the only tool available to understand the deep meaning (nītārtha) of all the Buddhist teachings (see HTPṬ. 1.76; VP. vol. I, 52). The inclusivist intent of the early Kālacakra literature clearly emerges here: every Buddhist scripture is valid, provided that it is interpreted in the light of the Ādibuddha and, of course, through qualified teachers, namely, bodhisattvas endowed with supernatural powers.

2. The explanation of the Hevajratantra begins with the second section, devoted entirely to the discussion of the symbolic value of its opening words (vijahārasthāna).

3. The third section explains the three aspects assumed by Heruka (i.e. vajrasattva, mahāsattva, and samayasattva) and generally recognized in the Hevajratantra tradition, their essential iconography, and the correspondences among them, the various blisses experienced by the yogin during sexual rites, and the kāyas (bodies) of the Buddha. The nascent Kālacakra tradition gives particular importance to sets of four, and, accordingly, Vajragarbha rewrites small portions of the tantra itself, inserts a new line in it, and introduces a fourth sattva, that of bodhisattva, which he equates with inter alia the dharmakāya (dharma body); in his interpretation, vajrasattva, mahāsattva, and samayasattva correspond to, respectively, the svābhāvikakāya (inherent body), the sambhogakāya (enjoyment body), and the nirmāṇakāya (transformation body).

4. The fourth section describes the channels (nāḍī) in the human body and the relationship among these, the Sanskrit alphabet, the elements, the substances carried by them (vital breath, blood, semen, etc.), the asterisms, the various joints of the body, and the spiration of the vital breath in five points called maṇḍalas (circles) of the right and left nostrils.

5. The fifth section continues with a description of various correspondences between the inner and the outer world, with the explanation of how the bodhicitta (thought of awakening, here equivalent to semen) is produced, of the death signs (ariṣṭa), and of how the embryo is formed.

6. The sixth section is devoted to mantric recitation and rosaries (akṣasūtra).

---

7. The seventh section, e describes several magic rites (of a tion, etc.) associated with mantr 8. The eighth section, which entirely to a description of th (krodharāja) and of the practi with them, incorporates ex siler zas of the Piṇḍīkrama by the ta influential text of the so-called Ā main traditions of the Guhyasam 9. The ninth section deals v the relationship between caus lishes a comparison between t of mercury and bodhicitta, and mental Buddhist doctrine of (dependent origination) in typ (i.e. with references to the embryo and the stages of initia 10. The last section consists different viewpoints of tattva should not be understood her reality as it is but of buddhah when attained. This state is e a different way of experienci mind as well as every aspect of (dhātu), each aggregate (skand responds to a deity; each gest a true yogin is none other tha word of the deity. In this res a transmutation of the psych the yogin, who, as is clarified i "body of knowledge" (jñānade
With the exception of the Pa (see below) and a few pages (vol. I, 255–271), none of the tem contains a debate, only accepted point of view. Even sometimes discussed, none texts is part of the philosoph the sources cited therein be to Mahāyāna sūtras, and on non-Buddhist traditions or t cal works.
The language of the firs tion is simple: convolutions and the use of technical t the style and syntax. Howe Laghukālacakratantra are in a more complex way, pro tions of meter. In the Sanskri we find the same features th asis of another tantra" (see agarbha and Puṇḍarīka take e that it is the knowledge of according to Puṇḍarīka, sub-śrīnāmasaṅgīti – that is the understand the deep mean-he Buddhist teachings (see 52). The inclusivist intent of rature clearly emerges here: re is valid, provided that it ight of the Ādibuddha and,

ualified teachers, namely,
with supernatural powers. of the Hevajratantra begins , devoted entirely to the dis-value of its opening words explains the three aspects

e. vajrasattva, mahāsattva, d generally recognized in tion, their essential iconogondences among them, the nced by the yogin during yas (bodies) of the Buddha.
a tradition gives particu-
of four, and, accordingly, nall portions of the tantra e in it, and introduces a dhisattva, which he equates makāya (dharma body); in asattva, mahāsattva, and nd to, respectively, the t body), the sambhogakāya he nirmāṇakāya (transforescribes the channels (nāḍī) d the relationship among bet, the elements, the sub-vital breath, blood, semen, various joints of the body, vital breath in five points

s) of the right and left ntinues with a description ces between the inner and e explanation of how the vakening, here equivalent f the death signs (ariṣṭa), formed.

devoted to mantric recita-ra).

---

7. The seventh section, entirely in prose, describes several magic rites (of attraction, pacification, etc.) associated with mantric recitation.

8. The eighth section, which is devoted almost entirely to a description of the wrathful deities (krodharāja) and of the practice of identification with them, incorporates ex silentio numerous stanzas of the Piṇḍīkrama by the tantric Nāgārjuna, an influential text of the so-called Ārya school, one of the main traditions of the Guhyasamājatantra exegesis.

9. The ninth section deals with the criticism of the relationship between cause and effect, establishes a comparison between the alchemical states of mercury and bodhicitta, and explains the fundamental Buddhist doctrine of pratītyasamutpāda (dependent origination) in typical Kālacakra terms (i.e. with references to the development of the embryo and the stages of initiation).

10. The last section consists of a description from different viewpoints of tattva (true reality), which should not be understood here as a description of reality as it is but of buddhahood as experienced when attained. This state is explained primarily as a different way of experiencing the body and the mind as well as every aspect of reality. Each element (dhātu), each aggregate (skandha), and so forth corresponds to a deity; each gesture and each word of a true yogin is none other than the gesture and the word of the deity. In this respect, we can speak of a transmutation of the psychophysical structure of the yogin, who, as is clarified in other texts, attains a "body of knowledge" (jñānadeha).

With the exception of the Paramākṣarajñānasiddhi (see below) and a few pages of the Vimalaprabhā (vol. I, 255–271), none of the first works of the system contains a debate, only the explanation of the accepted point of view. Even if doctrinal issues are sometimes discussed, none of the early Kālacakra texts is part of the philosophical literature. Most of the sources cited therein belong to tantric texts or to Mahāyāna sūtras, and only rarely to works from non-Buddhist traditions or to Buddhist philosophical works.

The language of the first authors of the tradition is simple: convolutions are due to the content and the use of technical terminology, seldom to the style and syntax. However, the stanzas of the Laghukālacakratantra are sometimes constructed in a more complex way, probably because of restrictions of meter. In the Sanskrit works of the Kālacakra, we find the same features that characterize much of the tantric literature in Sanskrit – for instance the change of gender for some terms and the tendency to conjoin by asyndeton, especially in the texts of Vajrapāṇi and Vajragarbha. The works of Puṇḍarīka are undoubtedly more elegant and rich, both in vocabulary and content. Puṇḍarīka declares that grammatical "irregularities" such as the lack of caesura, the omission of case endings, the shortening or prolonging of some vowels, the use of plural for the singular, and the use of the locative for the genitive case, which in fact may on occasion be encountered in the Ādibuddha and Laghukālacakratantra, have the aim of deceiving those who consider the purity of language to be essential (i.e. the Brahmans) and who are attached to the letter and not the spirit of the texts (VP. vol. I, 29–30; see also Newman, 1988). We might think that this is, at least partly, an a posteriori justification to conceal the fact that much of the literature of this tradition was written by people with no perfect control of the Sanskrit language. However, a closer examination of the texts (not only of the Kālacakra tradition) shows that the authors were usually aware of the correct forms of words and so forth, which they used side by side with nonstandard forms (depending mainly on metrical requirements) and that they simply did not feel bound to the correctness of the language, possibly also because the use of nonstandard forms was regarded as appropriate for writings with the status of scripture.

Structure and Contents of the Laghukālacakratantra: Scriptural Appendices

The Laghukālacakratantra, which traditionally is attributed to Śrīyaśas, an incarnation of Mañjuśrī, the father of Puṇḍarīka, and eighth king of Sambhala, currently consists of 1,047 stanzas, but it is likely that the work has undergone some revising in the course of its production, and it seems that when Puṇḍarīka wrote his commentary, the text had only 1,030 stanzas (see VP. vol. I, 25, l. 6; trans. Newman, 1987, 300). In accordance with the Ādibuddha, its supposed source, the text is divided into five chapters (paṭalas); Puṇḍarīka's Vimalaprabhā arranges the content of each of these five chapters in uddeśas (expositions), nirdeśas (specifications), and mahoddeśas (great expositions).

chapter/ subchapter	title	translation	verse
1	Lokadhātupaṭalaḥ (Chapter on the Cosmos)	partly trans. (LKCT. and VP.) Newman, 1987; Henning, 2007
1.1	Parameṣṭadevatāsanmārganiyamoddeśaḥ (Exposition of the Rule Concerning the True Path of the Supreme Chosen Deity)		–
1.2	Bhagavatas tantradeśanoddeśaḥ (Exposition of the Bhagavān's Teaching of the Tantra)		–
1.3	Deśakādhyeṣakamūlatantralaghutantrasambandhoddeśaḥ (Exposition of the Relationship Between the Instructor and the Requestor, and the Root Tantra and the Short Tantra)		–
1.4	Sarvajñetyādinā tantrarājadeśakādhyeṣakasādhanoddeśaḥ (Exposition of Establishing the Instructor and the Requestor of the King of Tantras by means of The Omniscient One, etc.)		1
1.5	Deśakādisaṃgrahoddeśaḥ (Exposition of the Summary of the Instructor, etc.)		–
1.6	Maṇḍalābhiṣekādisaṃgrahoddeśaḥ (Exposition of the Summary of Maṇḍalas, Consecrations, etc.)		2
1.7	Lokadhātusaṃgrahoddeśaḥ (Exposition of the Summary of the Cosmos)		–
1.7.1	Bhagavataḥ prativacanasaṃgrahoddeśaḥ (Exposition of the Summary of the Bhagavān's Reply)		3
1.7.2	Lokadhātusaṃgrahoddeśaḥ (Exposition of the Summary of the Cosmos)		4
1.7.3	Vajrakāyasaṃgrahoddeśaḥ (Exposition of the Summary of the Vajra Body)		5
1.7.4	Rāhvādyutpādasaṃgrahoddeśaḥ (Exposition of the Summary of the Origination of Rāhu, etc.)		6–7
1.7.5	Candrakalādiviśvamantrasaṃgrahoddeśaḥ (Exposition of the Summary of the Mantras of the Universe, i.e. the Digits of the Moon, etc.)		8
1.7.6	Svarāṇāṃ janmasthānanirdeśaḥ (Specification of the Birth-places of the Vowels)		9
1.8	Lokadhātumānasaṃgrahoddeśaḥ (Exposition of the Summary of the Measurements of the Cosmos)		10–25
1.9	Jyotirjñānavidhimahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Procedures for the Astronomical Knowledge)		26–94
1.10	Svarodayayantravidhiniyamamahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Rules concerning the Procedures for the Svarodaya and the War Machines)		95–149
1.11	Mlecchadharmotpāṭanabuddhadharmapratiṣṭhāpanaḥ (Eradication of the Mleccha Dharma and Establishment of the Buddha Dharma)		150–170

(cont.)

chapter/ subchapter	title
2	Adhyātmapaṭalaḥ (
2.1	Kāyavākcittotpattic Exposition of the O Explanation of the
2.2	Samudayasatyādin of Origination [of S
2.3	Cakravartimleccha mahoddeśaḥ (Grea Cakravartin and M Tantras, and the O
2.4	Ariṣṭamaraṇalakṣa Exposition of the and the Severance
2.5	Kṣaṇalakṣaṇakāla Exposition of the [of Emission] and
2.6	Rasāyanādibālata Elixirs, etc., and M
2.7	Svaparadarśanan of the Analysis of Arguments)
3	Abhiṣekapaṭalaḥ
3.1	Vajrācāryādisarv (Great Expositio and of the Mean
3.2	Rakṣācakrapūrv (Great Expositio Preceded by the
3.3	Maṇḍalavartana The Making of t
3.4	Maṇḍalābhiṣeka Initiation in the
3.5	Pratiṣṭhāgaṇaca Exposition of th and for the Gro
3.6	Mudrādṛṣṭiman (Great Expositi of the Maṇḍala,
4	Sādhanāpaṭala
4.1	Sthānarakṣāpā of the Protecti slation verse

y trans.
T. and VP.)
man, 1987;
hing, 2007

–
–
–
1
–
2
–
3
4
5
6–7
8 9 10–25
26–94
95–149
150–170

(cont.)

chapter/ subchapter	title	translation	verse
2	Adhyātmapaṭalaḥ (Chapter on the Individual)	trans. (LKCT. and VP.) Stril-Rever, 2000; Wallace, 2004
2.1	Kāyavākcittotpatticaturāryasatyanirṇayamahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Origination of Body, Speech, and Mind, and Explanation of the Four Noble Truths)		1–26
2.2	Samudayasatyādimahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Truth of Origination [of Suffering], etc.)		27–47
2.3	Cakravartimlecchayuddhakālacakrakulatantranāḍīkulotpattimahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Battle between the Cakravartin and Mlecchas, the Families of Kālacakra, the Tantras, and the Origination of the Families of the Channels)		48–60
2.4	Ariṣṭamaraṇalakṣaṇanāḍīcchedamahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Characteristics of Untimely Death and the Severance of the Channels)		61–81
2.5	Kṣaṇalakṣaṇakālacakraniyamamahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Characteristics of the Moment [of Emission] and Rules of Kālacakra)		82–106
2.6	Rasāyanādibālatantramahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Elixirs, etc., and Midwifery)		107–160
2.7	Svaparadarśananyāyavicāramahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Analysis of Our Own and Others' Viewpoints and Arguments)		161–180
3	Abhiṣekapaṭalaḥ (Chapter on Initiations)	trans. (LKCT.) Andresen, 1997
3.1	Vajrācāryādisarvakarmaprasarasādhanālakṣaṇamahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Characteristics of the Vajrācārya, etc., and of the Means for All the Diverse Kind of Rituals)		1–22
3.2	Rakṣācakrapūrvaṅgamabhūmyādisaṃgrahamahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Summary of the Grounds, etc., Preceded by the Wheel of Protection)		23–35
3.3	Maṇḍalavartanaṃ nāma mahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition: The Making of the Maṇḍala)		36–70
3.4	Maṇḍalābhiṣekamahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Initiation in the Maṇḍala)		71–103
3.5	Pratiṣṭhāgaṇacakravidhiyogacaryāmahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Rules for the Installation [of Images] and for the Group Circle, and the Conduct of the Yoga)		104–169
3.6	Mudrādṛṣṭimaṇḍalavisarjanavīrabhojyavidhimahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Rules for Mudrās, Gazes, Dismissal of the Maṇḍala, and the Food of the Heroes)		170–203
4	Sādhanāpaṭalaḥ (Chapter on Realization)	trans. (LKCT. and VP.) Wallace, 2010
4.1	Sthānarakṣāpāpadeśanādimahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Protection of the Places and Confession of Sins, etc.)		1–7

(cont.)

chapter/ subchapter	title	translation	verse
4.2	Utpattikrameṇa kāyaniṣpattimahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Production of the Body by the Generation Process)		8–49
4.3	Prāṇadevatotpādamahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Origination of the Vital Breath and the Deities)		50–109
4.4	Utpannakramasādhanamahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Practice of the Process of the [Already] Arisen [Nature])		110–133
4.5	Nānāsādhanamahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of Various Practices)		134–234
5	Jñānapaṭalaḥ (Chapter on Knowledge)
5.1	Yoginītantrādispharaṇamahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of the Emanating the Yoginītantras, etc.)	trans. Hartzell, 1997	1–88
5.2	Catuḥkāyādiśuddhinirṇayamahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of Certain Knowledge of the Purification of the Four Bodies, etc.)	trans. Hartzell, 1997	89–126
5.3	Paramākṣarajñānasiddhir nāma mahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition: The Accomplishment of the Knowledge of the Supreme-Unchanging [Moment])	trans. Gnoli, 1997a; Hartzell, 1997	127
5.4	Nānopāyavineyamahoddeśaḥ (Great Exposition of Those to be Trained by Various Means)	partly trans. Fenner, 1979	128–261

The first chapter deals with cosmology and the structure of the external world (lokadhātu). It describes in great detail the correlations among the asterisms, the lunar digits, the solar days, and the phonemes of the Sanskrit alphabet. Where cosmography is treated, we note significant Jain and puranic influences (Newman, 1987, 130). The second chapter deals with the inner world (adhyātman), that is, yogic physiology. After the description of the conception and formation of the embryo, a long section is devoted to an examination of the *cakra*s and the relationship existing among them, the four bodies of the Buddha, and the six families of the *tathāgata*s, as well as to the analysis of the channels (nāḍī), the breaths (prāṇa), and their correspondence with the male and female deities in the kālacakramaṇḍala. Then follows a description of the death signs (ariṣṭa), the calculation of the remaining days of life, and the ways to avoid untimely death. The final part of the chapter reviews the main philosophical positions and reaffirms the superiority of the Madhyamaka (see also Grönbold, 1992; Newman, 1992; Wallace, 2004, 219–252). The next three chapters describe the path of transformation and deal with initiations (abhiṣeka), practice (sādhana), and knowledge (jñāna), respectively. The fourth chapter exclusively examines the generation process (utpattikrama) – the process of the visualization and initial identification with Kālacakra, which requires the use of the maṇḍala and mantras. The second part of the practice, described in the fifth chapter, is the process of the [already] arisen [nature] (utpannakrama), which leads to the gradual realization of buddhahood, that is, the full identification with Kālacakra and the attainment of full wisdom and bliss.

Puṇḍarīka states that the Laghukālacakratantra is a niranvayatantra (Tantra without Partiality), that is, a tantra in which wisdom (prajñā) and salvific means (upāya) are equally prominent. In this sense the Laghukālacakratantra, and the entire Kālacakra system for that matter, are claimed to transcend the distinction between *yogatantra*s and yoginītantras (see VP, vol. I, 18). Once again, we observe a noteworthy attempt to become dominant among the Buddhist circles and, at the same time, to keep them integrated into a coherent whole. In order to promote this integration, the Laghukālacakratantra provides a more systematic arrangement of topics and displays a stronger encyclopedic character than other Buddhist tantras. The great importance given to the correlation between macrocosm and microcosm, between chronological time and breath in the human body, and between the elements of the psychophysical complex and the principles of external reality betray a more or similar speculations found tions, both Śaiva and Vaiṣṇa ence to mlecchas (foreigners) the future degeneration eve adopt the behavior of these as an attempt to incorporat non-Buddhist traditions in (Newman, 1995).

---

The Laghukālacakratant
twice – in 1966, edited by R. in 1985, edited by B. Banerj been reprinted in the editi by J. Upadhyaya, V. Dwivedi, tioned above. Yet the Lag lacks a critical edition that manuscripts available and exist a Tibetan translation and 'Bro Shes rab grags (D lian translation of the 17t into Western languages a table above). Of the Laghu also the Tibetan translati attributed to Kālacakra the (D 1350/P 2067).

Closely connected to th are four scriptural append version of which is lost:

1. the Tantrottara (D verses in sragdharā mete Mañjuśrīyaśas and is only tations in other works; tio some verses of the Piṇḍīkramasādhana;

2. the Kālacakralagh* edition of the Tibetan bK man, 1991, 63), again attri

3. the Kālacakratant* short work in 47 anuṣṭub sixfold yoga; and

4. the Sekaprakriyā* entirety an extract from t of the Laghukālacakrata a commentary, the Sek* Dārikapā, only available

The Vimalaprabh
the Commentaries Mañjuśrīnāmasaṃ

Puṇḍarīka's Vimalaprab
most of the Laghukālaca

nslation	verse
	8–49
	50–109
	110–133
	134–234
s. Hartzell, 1997	1–88
s. Hartzell, 1997	89–126
s. Gnoli, 1997a; zell, 1997	127
y trans. Fenner,	128–261

alization and initial identifiwhich requires the use of the
. The second part of the prac-fifth chapter, is the process n [nature] (utpannakrama), adual realization of buddha-dentification with Kālacakra full wisdom and bliss.
at the Laghukālacakratantra antra without Partiality), that wisdom (prajñā) and salvific ally prominent. In this sense tra, and the entire Kālacakra are claimed to transcend the gatantras and yoginītantras e again, we observe a note-come dominant among the
the same time, to keep them rent whole. In order to pro-
, the Laghukālacakratantra matic arrangement of topics encyclopedic character than The great importance given een macrocosm and micro-logical time and breath in etween the elements of the x and the principles of external reality betray a more or less direct influence of similar speculations found in tantric Hindu traditions, both Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava. The polemical reference to mlecchas (foreigners) and the warning about the future degeneration even of the Brahmans who adopt the behavior of these mlecchas can be read as an attempt to incorporate, albeit subordinately, non-Buddhist traditions in the fight against Islam (Newman, 1995).

---

The Laghukālacakratantra has been published twice – in 1966, edited by R. Vira and L. Chandra, and in 1985, edited by B. Banerjee. The latter version has been reprinted in the edition of the Vimalaprabhā by J. Upadhyaya, V. Dwivedi, and S.S. Bahulkar mentioned above. Yet the Laghukālacakratantra still lacks a critical edition that takes account of all the manuscripts available and of the testimonia. There exist a Tibetan translation of the text by Somanātha and 'Bro Shes rab grags (D 362/P 4) and a Mongolian translation of the 17th century. Translations into Western languages are only partial (see the table above). Of the Laghukālacakratantra we have also the Tibetan translation of the commentary attributed to Kālacakra the Elder entitled Padminī* (D 1350/P 2067).

Closely connected to the Laghukālacakratantra are four scriptural appendices, the original Sanskrit version of which is lost:

1. the Tantrottara (D 363/P 5), a text in 157 verses in sragdharā meter, which is attributed to Mañjuśrīyaśas and is only known from a few quotations in other works; it incorporates ex silentio some verses of the Kāyatrayastava and the Piṇḍīkramasādhana;
2. the Kālacakralaghutantrarājahṛdaya* (Lhasa edition of the Tibetan bKa' 'gyur, 373; see also Newman, 1991, 63), again attributed to Mañjuśrīyaśas;
3. the Kālacakratantragarbha* (D 364/P 6), a short work in 47 anuṣṭubh stanzas dealing with the sixfold yoga; and
4. the Sekaprakriyā* (D 365/P 7), almost in its entirety an extract from the third and fifth chapters of the Laghukālacakratantra; it is accompanied by a commentary, the Sekaprakriyāvṛtti* (P 2072) of Dārikapā, only available in a Tibetan translation.

The Vimalaprabhā and the Commentaries on the Mañjuśrīnāmasaṃgīti

Puṇḍarīka's Vimalaprabhā explains the contents of most of the Laghukālacakratantra verses, sometimes even with digressions of some interest. Precious information about the early history of the Kālacakra system is given in the initial part of the text. More complex elaborations of this history can be read in Tibetan historiographies (see Newman, 1991). The first uddeśa of the work, the Parameṣṭadevatāsanmārganiyamoddeśa, which is a kind of manifesto of the early Kālacakra teachings, in turn, has been the subject of a commentary, unfortunately lost in the original Sanskrit (D 1349/P 2066).

One of the most important digressions of the Vimalaprabhā is section 5.3, a mahoddeśa entitled Paramākṣarajñānasiddhi (Accomplishment of the Knowledge of the Supreme-Unchanging [Moment]). Probably written as an independent composition when the Laghukālacakratantra had not yet been definitively established, this section was included later in the Vimalaprabhā as a commentary on Laghukālacakratantra 5.127 (trans. Gnoli, 1997a, 3). It is the only part of the Vimalaprabhā that is cited with its own title by Puṇḍarīka himself and by other authors (e.g. Nāropā on the Sekoddeśaṭīkā 145) as if it were an independent text. This leads us to think that even after the inclusion in the magnum opus, this work maintained an independent status.

Two further things deserve mention regarding the Vimalaprabhā: the first is the massive use of quotations (more than 200) from the Ādibuddha; the second is that, with a certain incisiveness, Puṇḍarīka follows the path of Vajrapāṇi – and to some extent of Vajragarbha – in trying to incorporate the Mañjuśrīnāmasaṃgīti into the scriptural sources of the Kālacakra tradition. In addition to devoting a commentary on this text, lost in the original Sanskrit (Nāmasaṃgītivimalaprabhā*; D 1398/P 2114), he cites a considerable number of its stanzas, especially in the Paramākṣarajñānasiddhi. Toward the end of the latter text (VP. vol. III, 100–102), Puṇḍarīka even goes so far as to say that the Mañjuśrīnāmasaṃgīti contains the essence of all the teachings of the Tathāgata, including the central Kālacakra doctrine of the supreme, unchanging pleasure (paramākṣarasukha), which is attained by mastery of tantric yoga, and which explains the transmutation of the ordinary psychophysical complex, subject to transmigration, into a body of knowledge (jñānadeha). Puṇḍarīka's (and before him, Vajrapāṇi's) attempt must have had some success, since references to the Mañjuśrīnāmasaṃgīti as an authoritative work are, in fact, present in all the literature of the Kālacakra system.

We have at least five further commentaries on the Mañjuśrīnāmasaṃgīti written from the Kālacakra perspective:

1. the Amṛtabindupradīpāloka* by Anupamarakṣita (D 1396/P 2112);
2. the Nāmasaṃgītivyākhyāna* by Mi'i dbang po grags pa (i.e. *Narendrakīrti; D 1397/P 2113);
3. the Nāmasaṃgītyanuśaṃsā* by Dus zhabs pa (i.e. *Kāla[cakra]pāda; D 1399/P 2115 [with attribution to a certain Grags pa, i.e. *Yaśas]);
4. the Nāmasaṃgītyabhisamaya* by Spyan ras gzigs (i.e. *Avalokiteśvara; D 1400/P 2116); and
5. the Amṛtakaṇikā by Raviśrījñāna (D 1965/P 2111). As far as we know, this commentary, in turn commented on by Vibhūticandra in his Amṛtakaṇikoddyotana, is the only one to have survived in Sanskrit.

The Sekoddeśa and Other Important Works

At present, neither a collection nor a complete translation of all the quotations of the Ādibuddha in Sanskrit texts is available. Numerous stanzas attributed to this work can be found in the Gūḍhapadā, a still unpublished commentary (preserved in a codex unicus) on the Mañjuśrīnāmasaṃgīti, strongly influenced by Kālacakra doctrines. Verses attributed to the Ādibuddha have close parallels (and even identical pādas) with other Buddhist texts, tantric and non-tantric, such as Yuktiṣaṣṭikā, Hevajratantra, Mañjuśrīnāmasaṃgīti, Saṃvarodayatantra, and Herukābhidhāna.

The longest and more important fragment of the Ādibuddha is the Sekoddeśa (Exposition of the Initiations), a short text of 174 verses, which is traditionally held to be part of the fifth chapter of the Ādibuddha. Unlike the other fragments, the Sekoddeśa should be considered an independent composition, as it has been transmitted via its own manuscripts, whereas all the other fragments of the Ādibuddha are in fact simply quotations within other works. The Sekoddeśa describes, in the form of a dialogue between Sucandra and the Bhagavān, the initiations (seka, abhiṣeka) of the Kālacakra – the seven lower and the four superior, their procedures, and their symbolism (vv. 1–23); the sixfold yoga (vv. 24–145); the relationship of cause and effect (vv. 146–155); the nature of paramākṣara (the supreme unchanging; vv. 156–160); the six supramundane beings (Vairocana, Amitābha, Ratnasambhava, Amoghasiddhi, Akṣobhya, and Vajrasattva; vv. 161–169); and the six families (aggregates, elements, senses of knowledge, objects of the senses, senses of action, and actions; vv. 170–174). The stanzas devoted to the sixfold yoga include some digressions, namely, the ones that concern yogic physiology, in particular the description of the position of the main channels (nāḍī), the substances that these convey (vv. 35–69), and the prognostics of death (ariṣṭa; vv. 70–79).

Three commentaries on the Sekoddeśa are preserved in the original Sanskrit: the Sekoddeśaṭippaṇī by Sādhuputra Śrīdharānanda (first half of the 11th cent.), the Sekoddeśaṭīkā (also known as the Paramārthasaṃgraha) by Nāropā, and the anonymous Sekoddeśapañjikā, a concise summary of the commentary by Nāropā. The published text of the Sekoddeśapañjikā is based on a single, incomplete Nepalese manuscript; a second, complete codex is preserved in the Tiantai monastery of Guoqing, but it is currently not accessible to scholars; a third one is kept in the Potala Palace in Tibet. Sādhuputra Śrīdharānanda's commentary does not show any influence of Nāropā's teachings; it is worth noting, though, that Sādhuputra Śrīdharānanda, like the unknown author of the Sekoddeśapañjikā, does not gloss those stanzas that contain references to sexual practices (esp. vv. 15–23, 78ff.; see Gnoli 1997b, 146). Two other commentaries on the Sekoddeśa survive only in their Tibetan translations, the Sekoddeśaṭippaṇī* (Dbang mdor bstan pa'i brjed byang) by Vijayendra (i.e. Rnam par rgyal ba dbang po; D 1389/P 2104) and the Sekoddeśaṭīkā (Dbang mdor bstan pa'i rgya cher 'grel pa) by *Kālacakrapāda (i.e. Dus 'khor shabs; D 1353/P 2070).

The remainder of the Kālacakra literature falls under the following categories:

1. manuals for the practice of visualization (sādhana) and other rituals (vidhi);
2. texts that describe and explain yoga exercises;
3. other treatises: stotras (hymns), commentaries, and independent works.

Among the texts of the first category (see D 1356ff./P 2073ff.), noteworthy are three short works attributed to Kālacakrapāda (the Kālacakrasupratiṣṭhopāyikāvidhi, Kālacakragaṇacakravidhi*, and Kālacakrahomopāyikāvidhi*) and two texts by Sādhuputra Śrīdharānanda (the Kālacakrasādhana* and Kālacakramaṇḍalopāyikāvidhi*). Furthermore, there are in original Sanskrit the Kālacakrabhagavatsādhanavidhi, mostly made up of quotations from the Vimalaprabhā and attributed to one Dharmākaraśānti, and the anonymous Kālacakrapūjāvidhi.

Among the treatises on yoga, notable are the two Ṣaḍaṅgayogas by Anupamarakṣita (D 1367/P 2083; D 1387/P 2102) with the commentaries by Raviśrījñāna (D 1368/P 2084; D 1388/P 2103), since they were rec-some digressions, namely, the ogic physiology, in particular position of the main channels that these convey (vv. 35–69), f death (arișța; vv. 70–79). es on the Sekoddeśa are pre-Sanskrit: the Sekoddeśaṭippaṇī arānanda (first half of the deśaṭīkā (also known as the ) by Nāropā, and the anonykā, a concise summary of the pā. The published text of the ased on a single, incomplete a second, complete codex is ai monastery of Guoqing, but ssible to scholars; a third one Palace in Tibet. Sādhuputra mentary does not show any teachings; it is worth noting, tra Śrīdharānanda, like the e Sekoddeśapañjikā, does not at contain references to sex-15–23, 78ff.; see Gnoli 1997b, mentaries on the Sekoddeśa Tibetan translations, the ang mdor bstan pa'i brjed (i.e. Rnam par rgyal ba dbang the Sekoddeśaṭīkā* (Dbang r'grel pa) by *Kālacakrapāda 1353/P 2070). e Kālacakra literature falls egories:

practice of visualization her rituals (vidhi);
e and explain yoga exercises;
otras (hymns), commentar-ent works. of the first category (see oteworthy are three short acakrapāda (the Kālacakra-* Kālacakragaṇacakravidhi*, yikāvidhi) and two texts by da (the Kālacakrasādhana* pāyikāvidhi). Furthermore, Sanskrit the Kālacakra- mostly made up of quo-alaprabhā and attributed nti, and the anonymous

n yoga, notable are the two amarakșita (D 1367/P 2083; mmentaries by Raviśrījñāna 2103), since they were rec-

---

ognized as the most authoritative, even by the later Kālacakra tradition both in India and in Tibet. Of the second work, longer and more detailed, the Sanskrit text of the commentary, the Guṇabharaṇī, is preserved in a codex unicus.

Significant among the commentaries and independent treatises influenced by Kālacakra doctrines are the Vajrapadasārasaṃgraha* by *Yaśobhadra (i.e. Snyan grags bzang po; perhaps another name for Nāropā; D 1186/P 2316), which is a commentary on the Hevajratantra, the Svadarśanamatoddeśa (P 4610) by *Narendrakīrti, and two astronomical works: the Kālacakrāvatāra of Abhayākaragupta and the anonymous Kālacakrānusāriganita.

Presumed Environment and Influence

The topics and the ways in which they are discussed in the Sanskrit texts of the tradition suggest that the early Kālacakra literature was addressed primarily to an audience of initiates, perhaps even of teachers or at least to people already acquainted not only with Mahāyāna Buddhism – its doctrines and its soteriology – but also with the most important Buddhist tantric works, such as Guhyasamājatantra, Hevajratantra, Cakraśaṃvaratantra, and Catuṣpīṭhatantra. The familiarity of Puṇḍarīka, and to a lesser extent of other masters, with the fundamental texts of Brahmanical culture (e.g. Ṛgveda, Aṣṭādhyāyī, Sāṃkhyakārikā, Manusmṛti, Mahābhārata, and Matsyapurāṇa) implies that, at least in some cases, the first Kālacakra authors were Brahman by caste and Buddhists by religious affiliation (see also Newman, 1998a, 315).

However, the reference to Sambhala, the reinterpretation in Buddhist terms of the myth of Kalkin, the use of the name Kālacakra itself, which we find in many Vaiṣṇava sources, the mentioning of Viṣṇu's avatāras, and their explanation in connection with the development of the embryo (LKCT 2.7–8) suggest that the early Kālacakra masters were active in a social context in which Vaiṣṇavism was quite widespread and popular.

Having flourished in India for a few centuries, the Kālacakra system had notable success also in Tibet, where it continued to thrive and inspire a considerable body of literature authored by masters from various Tibetan Buddhist traditions. The two main lineages are named after the two translators 'Bro dge slong Shes rab grags and Rwa chos rab, both working in the 11th century. Among the most prominent figures are Dol po pa Shes rab rgyal mtshan (1292–1361 CE) and Bu ston rin chen grub (1290–1364 CE; Newman 1991, 76–78; 86n26).

Bibliography

Manuscripts

Gūḍhapadā, Hodgson MS 34, Library of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland, London.
Guṇabharaṇī, Hodgson MS 68, Library of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland, London.
Kālacakrānusāriganita, MS 5–512, National Archives, Kathmandu.
Kālacakrāvatāra, MS G 4732, Asiatic Society of Bengal, Kolkata.
Sekoddeśapañjikā, MS 3–363, National Archives, Kathmandu.
Vimalaprabhā, MS G 10766, Asiatic Society of Bengal, Kolkata.

Primary Sources

Amṛtakaṇikā: Āryamañjuśrīnāmasaṅgīti with Amṛtakaṇikāṭippaṇī by Bhikṣu Raviśrījñāna and Amṛtakaṇikodyotanibandha of Vibhūticandra, ed. B. Lal, BIT 30, Varanasi, 1994.
Deb ther sngon po: The Blue Annals Completed in A.D. 1478 by 'Gos-Lotsawa Gzhon-nu-dpal (1392–1481): Reproduced by Lokesh Chandra from the Collection of Prof. R. Vira, ŚPS 212, New Delhi, 1974.
Guṇabharaṇī nāma ṣaḍaṅgayogaṭippaṇī, SOR 85, Rome, 2000.
Hevajratantrapiṇḍārthaṭīkā: Ṣaṭ-Sāhasrikā-Hevajraṭīkā, ed. M.J. Shendge, Delhi, 2004.
Hevajratantrapiṇḍārthaṭīkā: "The Ṣaṭsāhasrikā by Vajragarbha: A Commentary on the Condensed Meaning of the Hevajratantra: Critical Edition and Translation by F. Sferra," diss., Università degli Studi di Roma La Sapienza, 1999; a thoroughly revised edition is forthcoming in the Manuscripta Buddhica Series.
Kālacakrabhagavatsādhanavidhi, DJRBT 24, 1997, 127–174.
Kālacakrapūjāvidhi, DJRBT 25, 1998, 165–188.
Laghukālacakratantra: A Critical Edition of Śrīkālacakratantrarāja (Collated with the Tibetan version), ed. B. Banerjee, Calcutta, 1985.
Laghukālacakratantra: Śrīkālacakratantrarāja, ed. R. Vira & L. Chandra, in: Kālacakra-Tantra and Other Texts: Part 1, ŚPS 69, New Delhi, 1966, 53–378.
Laghutantraṭīkā: The Laghutantraṭīkā by Vajrapāṇi, ed. C. Cicuzza, SOR 86, Rome, 2001.
Ṣaḍaṅgayoga: The Ṣaḍaṅgayoga by Anupamarakṣita with Raviśrījñāna's Guṇabharaṇī nāma ṣaḍaṅgayogaṭippaṇī: Text and Annotated Translation by F. Sferra, SOR 85, Rome, 2000.
Sekoddeśa: "Sekoddeśaḥ [Edition of the Sanskrit Text]," in: R. Gnoli, ed., DJRBT 28, 1999, 143–166.
Sekoddeśa: Sekoddeśa: A Critical Edition of the Tibetan Translation by G. Orofino: With an Appendix by R. Gnoli "On the Sanskrit Text", SOR 72, Rome, 1994.
Sekoddeśapañjikā: "Sekoddeśapañjikā: The Results of a Joint Study on the Buddhist Tantric Texts," TDSBKN 16, 1994, 289–354.
Sekoddeśaṭīkā: The Paramārthasaṃgraha by Nāropā (Sekoddeśaṭīkā): Critical Edition of the Sanskrit Text by

F. Sferra and Critical Edition of the Tibetan Translation by S. Merzagora, SOR 99, Rome, 2006.

Sekoddeśaṭippaṇī, ed. R. Gnoli, RSO 70, 1997.

Vimalaprabhā: Vimalaprabhāṭīkā of Kalkin Śrīpuṇḍarīka on Śrīlaghukālacakratantrarāja by Śrīmañjuśrīyaśas: Critically Edited and Annotated with Notes, vol. I, ed J. Upādhyāya, BIT 11, Varanasi, 1986; vol. II, ed. V. Dwivedi & S.S. Bahulkar, RBTS 12, Varanasi, 1994; vol. III, ed. V. Dwivedi & S.S. Bahulkar, RBTS 13, Varanasi, 1994.

Secondary Literature

Andresen, J., "Kālacakra: Textual and Ritual Perspectives," diss., Harvard University, 1997.

Arnold, E.A., ed., As Long as Space Endures: Essays on the Kalachakra Tantra in Honor of H.H. the Dalai Lama, Ithaca, 2009.

Fenner, E.T., "Rasayana Siddhi: Medicine and Alchemy in the Buddhist Tantras," diss., University of Wisconsin, 1979.

Gnoli, R., La realizzazione della conoscenza del Supremo immoto (Paramākṣarajñānasiddhi), RSO Suppl. 70, Rome, 1997a.

Gnoli, R., "La Sekoddeśaṭippaṇī di Sādhuputra Śrīdharānanda: Il testo sanscrito," RSO 70, 1997b, 115–146.

Gnoli, R., & G. Orofino, trans., Nāropā: Iniziazione (Kālacakra), Milan, 1994.

Grönbold, G., "Heterodoxe Lehren und ihre Widerlegung im Kālacakra-Tantra," IIJ 35/4, 1992, 273–297.

Grönbold, G., The Yoga of Six Limbs: An Introduction to the History of Ṣaḍaṅgayoga, Santa Fe, 1996.

Hammar, U., Studies in the Kālacakra Tantra: A History of the Kālacakra Tantra in Tibet and a Study of the Concept of Ādibuddha, the Fourth Body of the Buddha and the Supreme Unchanging, Stockholm, 2005.

Hartzell, J.F., "Tantric Yoga: A Study of the Vedic Precursors, Historical Evolution, Literatures, Cultures, Doctrinal, and Practices of the 11th-century Kaśmīri Śaivite and Buddhist Unexcelled Tantric Yogas," diss., Columbia University, 1997.

Henning, E., Kālacakra and the Tibetan Calendar, New York, 2007.

Hoffmann, H.H.R., "Buddha's Preaching of the Kālacakra Tantra at the Stūpa of Dhānyakaṭaka," in: Cultural Department of the Embassy of the Federal Republic of Germany, New Delhi, ed., German Scholars on India: Contributions to Indian Studies, vol. I, CSS, Varanasi, 1973, 136–140.

Kilty, G., trans., Ornament of Stainless Light: An Exposition of the Kalachakra Tantra, Boston, 2004.

Newman, J.R., "Islam in the Kālacakra Tantra," JIABS 21/2, 1998a, 311–371.

Newman, J.R., "The Epoch of the Kālacakra Tantra," IIJ 41, 1998b, 319–349.

Newman, J.R., "Eschatology in the Wheel of Time Tantra," in: D.S. Lopez Jr., ed., Buddhism in Practice, Princeton, 1995, 284–289.

Newman, J.R., "Buddhist Siddhānta in the Kālacakra Tantra," WZKS 36, 1992, 227–234.

Newman, J.R., "A Brief History of the Kâlacakra," in: G.L. Sopa, R. Jackson & J. Newman, eds., The Wheel of Time: The Kalachakra In Context, Madison, 1985; repr. 1991, 51–90.

Newman, J.R., "Buddhist Sanskrit in the Kālacakra Tantra," JIABS 11, 1988, 123–140.

Newman, J.R., "The Outer Wheel of Time: Vajrayāna Buddhist Cosmology in the Kālacakra Tantra," diss., University of Wisconsin, 1987.

Roerich, G.N., trans., The Blue Annals: Parts 1 and 2, RASBMS 7, Calcutta, 1949–1953; repr. 1976.

Saccone, M.S., "The Wheel of Time (Kālacakra): A Survey and Bibliography of Previous Research and Forthcoming Works," in: Dramdul & F. Sferra, eds., From Mediterranean to Himalaya: A Festschrift to Commemorate the 120th Birthday of the Italian Tibetologist Giuseppe Tucci, Beijing, 2014, 503–551.

Sanderson, A., "The Śaiva Age: The Rise and Dominance of Śaivism during the Early Medieval Period," in: S. Einoo, ed., Genesis and Development of Tantrism, IOCSS 23, Tokyo, 2009, 41–349.

Sāṅkṛtyāyana, R., "Second Search of Sanskrit Palm-Leaf MSS. in Tibet," JB(O)RS 23/1, 1937, 1–57.

Sāṅkṛtyāyana, R., "Sanskrit Palm-Leaf MSS. in Tibet," JB(O)RS 21/1, 1935, 21–43.

Sferra, F., "The Elucidation of True Reality: The Kālacakra Commentary by Vajragarbha on the Tattvapaṭala of the Hevajratantra," in: E.A. Arnold, ed., As Long as Space Endures: Essays on the Kalachakra Tantra in Honor of H.H. the Dalai Lama, Ithaca, 2009a, 93–126.

Sferra, F., "The Laud of the Chosen Deity, the First Chapter of the Hevajratantrapiṇḍārthaṭīkā by Vajragarbha," in: S. Einoo, ed., Genesis and Development of Tantrism, IOCSS 23, Tokyo, 2009b, 435–468.

Sferra, F., "Constructing the Wheel of Time: Strategies for Establishing a Tradition," in: F. Squarcini, ed., Boundaries, Dynamics and Construction of Traditions in South Asia, Florence, 2005, 253–285.

Sferra, F., "Fragments of Puṇḍarīka's Paramārthasevā," in: K. Klaus & J.-U. Hartmann, eds., Indica et Tibetica. Festschrift für Michael Hahn zum 65. Geburtstag von Freunden und Schülern überreicht, Vienna, 2007a, 459–476.

Sferra, F., "Newly Discovered Stanzas of the Paramārthasevā by Puṇḍarīka," NNGMCP 5, 2007b, 9–12.

Sferra, F., "The Last Stanzas of the Paramārthasevā," TaS 1, 2008, 209–214.

Stril-Rever, S., Tantra de Kālacakra – Le livre du corps subtil, Paris, 2000.

Wallace, V.A., The Kālacakratantra: The Chapter on Sādhanā together with the Vimalaprabhā Commentary, New York, 2010.

Wallace, V.A., The Kālacakratantra: The Chapter on the Individual together with the Vimalaprabhā, New York, 2004.

Wallace, V.A., The Inner Kālacakratantra: A Buddhist Tantric View of the Individual, New York, 2001.

FRANCESCO SFERRA

The Nāmasaṃgīti (The Ch is a short Indian tantric 130 anuṣṭubh verses that e (nāmas) of the title. The tex Nāmasaṃgīti of Mañjuśrījñ Being Mañjuśrī"). Here Mañ sattva of wisdom familiar fro but the being (sattva) who jñānasattva, an entity unde of buddhahood. The connec and the Nāmasaṃgīti is refle title, Mañjuśrīnāmasaṃgīti.
of the Nāmasaṃgīti are not nary names or epithets. Rat stood as articulating or "na that gnosis can manifest, wh mind or in the world. Nāma were being written by the m and a composition date nea gested (Davidson, 1981, 5). W tifies the Nāmasaṃgīti as contents are sufficiently ge doctrine and practice, to allo pretation. As a result, the Nā ential text for some four hu India, until Buddhism's eclip and Tibet, the Nāmasaṃgīti influence. In Nepal the Sans ally, and Nāmasaṃgīti is also In Tibet the text, in Tibetan rized by monks from across t

Structure and Title

The Nāmasaṃgīti consists numbers follow Davidson, mantras, and a prose passag Vajradhara, accompanied Vajrapāṇi attendants, aski claim the Nāmasaṃgīti. Śā Vajradhara's request, to whi listing a group of mantra f otal verses (26–27) that incl and some mantra-style hom central part of the text, the e

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

a In Context, Madison, 1985; repr. 1991, st Sanskrit in the Kālacakra Tantra," o. ıter Wheel of Time: Vajrayāna Budhe Kālacakra Tantra," diss., University ne Blue Annals: Parts 1 and 2, RASBMS 3; repr. 1976.
heel of Time (Kālacakra): A Survey Previous Research and Forthcoming & F. Sferra, eds., From Mediterranean hrift to Commemorate the 120th Birth-tologist Giuseppe Tucci, Beijing, 2014, va Age: The Rise and Dominance of Early Medieval Period," in: S. Einoo, evelopment of Tantrism, IOCSS 23, nd Search of Sanskrit Palm-Leaf MSS.
1, 1937, 1–57. rit Palm-Leaf MSS. in Tibet," JB(O)RS
tion of True Reality: The Kālacakra agarbha on the Tattvapaṭala of the .A. Arnold, ed., As Long as Space the Kalachakra Tantra in Honor of Ithaca, 2009a, 93–126.
the Chosen Deity, the First Chapter
piṇḍārthaṭīkā by Vajragarbha," in: S. d Development of Tantrism, IOCSS 23, 8.
ng the Wheel of Time: Strate-a Tradition," in: F. Squarcini, ed., s and Construction of Traditions in 2005, 253–285.
f Puṇḍarīka's Paramārthasevā," in:
mann, eds., Indica et Tibetica. Fest-hn zum 65. Geburtstag von Freunden ht, Vienna, 2007a, 459–476. ered Stanzas of the Paramārthasevā CP 5, 2007b, 9–12.
nzas of the Paramārthasevā," TaS 1, Kālacakra – Le livre du corps subtil, akratantra: The Chapter on Sādhanā alaprabhā Commentary, New York, akratantra: The Chapter on the Indie Vimalaprabhā, New York, 2004.
Kālacakratantra: A Buddhist Tantric
New York, 2001.

FRANCESCO SFERRA

Mañjuśrīnāmasaṃgīti

The Nāmasaṃgīti (The Chanting of the Names) is a short Indian tantric scripture centered on 130 anuṣṭubh verses that enumerate the "names" (nāmas) of the title. The text describes itself as the Nāmasaṃgīti of Mañjuśrījñānasattva ("The Gnosis Being Mañjuśrī"). Here Mañjuśrī is not the bodhisattva of wisdom familiar from the Mahāyāna sūtras but the being (sattva) who is gnosis (jñāna), the jñānasattva, an entity underlying the very nature of buddhahood. The connection between Mañjuśrī and the Nāmasaṃgīti is reflected in the alternative title, Mañjuśrīnāmasaṃgīti. However, the "names" of the Nāmasaṃgīti are not for the most part ordinary names or epithets. Rather, they can be understood as articulating or "naming" the myriad ways that gnosis can manifest, whether in the individual mind or in the world. Nāmasaṃgīti commentaries were being written by the mid- to late 8th century, and a composition date near 700 CE has been suggested (Davidson, 1981, 5). While its colophon identifies the Nāmasaṃgīti as a mahāyogatantra, its contents are sufficiently general, in terms of both doctrine and practice, to allow a wide range of interpretation. As a result, the Nāmasaṃgīti was an influential text for some four hundred years or more in India, until Buddhism's eclipse there. In both Nepal and Tibet, the Nāmasaṃgīti continues to have some influence. In Nepal the Sanskrit text is recited ritually, and Nāmasaṃgīti is also worshipped as a deity. In Tibet the text, in Tibetan translation, is memorized by monks from across the tradition.

Structure and Title

The Nāmasaṃgīti consists of 167 verses (verse numbers follow Davidson, 1981), a short section of mantras, and a prose passage. The text opens with Vajradhara, accompanied by a host of wrathful Vajrapāṇi attendants, asking Śākyamuni to proclaim the Nāmasaṃgīti. Śākyamuni is pleased by Vajradhara's request, to which he accedes and, after listing a group of mantra families, utters two pivotal verses (26–27) that include a list of 12 syllables and some mantra-style homages. These initiate the central part of the text, the enumeration of "names" (26–157). Five verses of praise follow (157–162). Next is the prose passage, which praises the Nāmasaṃgīti and the benefits to be accrued by reciting and proclaiming it as well as by meditating on Mañjuśrī. The text concludes with five verses in which Vajradhara expresses his joy in what he has just heard (158–162).

Many Nāmasaṃgīti manuscripts (and all English translations) divide the text into 14 titled sections, 7 of which are taken up by the verses dealing with the "names." Although these divisions are attested early – for example in the late 8th-century commentary of Vilāsavajra (Tribe, 1994) – they are almost certainly commentarial in origin. This is suggested by the titles of the sections, most of which bear a problematic relation to their contents. Thus the first section on the "names" is titled Vajradhātumahāmaṇḍala (The Great Maṇḍala of Vajradhātu), despite containing no maṇḍala description, and the mantra section, the Mantravinyāsa (Placement of Mantras), contains no instructions. There is also a puzzling section transition that occurs mid-verse (66c).

The title that the text uses for itself, Nāmasaṃgīti, is found in the introduction (11), the prose section, and the colophon. This is also the title standardly employed in the Indian commentarial tradition. Today, the Nāmasaṃgīti is more commonly known as the Mañjuśrīnāmasaṃgīti (Davidson, 1981; Wayman, 1985; Berzin, 2009; Lal, 1994), a title that may have originated in India in later secondary Nāmasaṃgīti literature, although it is only attested in transcribed titles of Tibetan translations. This longer title almost certainly derives from the Nāmasaṃgīti itself since, as noted, the Nāmasaṃgīti describes itself as the Nāmasaṃgīti of Mañjuśrījñānasattva, an association made in the introduction (10) and repeated in the prose and the colophon. The compound name Mañjuśrīnāmasaṃgīti, likely a contraction of the phrase mañjuśrījñānasattvasya nāmasaṃgītiḥ, is ambiguous. It can be read, in accord with the Nāmasaṃgīti colophon, as "the name chanting of Mañjuśrī," or alternatively as "the chanting of Mañjuśrī's names." While the former leaves open the issue of whether it is Mañjuśrī's "names" that are being chanted or whether it is he who is doing the chanting (or both), the latter takes the

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

"names" to be Mañjuśrī's. Notably, the Nāmasaṃgīti itself never explicitly states this to be the case. Some manuscripts, also drawing on the Nāmasaṃgīti colophon, are given the title Paramārthanāmasaṃgīti (The Nāmasaṃgīti That Has Ultimate Meaning).

Nāmasaṃgīti Structure	Divisions in some Nāmasaṃgīti Manuscripts
A. Introduction (1–25)	1. Adhyeṣaṇā (1–16)
– Vajradhara's request	2. Prativacana (17–22)
– Śākyamuni's reply	3. Ṣaṭkulāvalokana (23–24)
– Mantra family overview	4. Māyājālābhisaṃbodhikrama (25–27)
– Introduction to the "names"	5. Vajradhātumahāmaṇḍala (28–41)
B. The "Names" (26–162)	6. Suviśuddhadharmadhātujñāna (42–66c)
– Opening verse and homage	7. Ādarśajñāna (66d–76)
– Enumeration of "names"	8. Pratyavekṣaṇājñāna (77–118)
– Five homage verses	9. Samatājñāna (119–142)
C. Prose	10. Kṛtyānuṣṭhānajñāna (143–157)
D. Mantras	11. Pañcatathāgatajñānastuti (158–162)
E. Concluding verses (163–167)	12. Anuśaṃsā (in 6 cakras [parts])
	13. Mantravinyāsa
	14. Upasaṃhāra (163–167)

Table 1: Structure and divisions of the Nāmasaṃgīti (verse numbers in parentheses).

Sources: Editions and Translations

Sanskrit editions of the Nāmasaṃgīti have been published by I.P. Minaev (1887), R. Vira (1962), D.D. Mukherji (1963), and R.M. Davidson (1981). However, I.P. Minaev's was used by neither R. Vira nor D.D. Mukherji, and D.D. Mukherji did not consult R. Vira's edition. Only I.P. Minaev had a manuscript with the complete prose section (he was able to supplement his readings of the prose with those from a manuscript of Vilāsavajra's commentary, the Nāmasaṃgītiṭīkā). I.P. Minaev's Sanskrit text is reprinted, excepting the prose section, by A. Wayman (1985). R.M. Davidson's edition is a critical collation of the three earlier editions and at points also employs the Tibetan Kanjur translation of the Nāmasaṃgīti as well as Tibetan translations of four early Nāmasaṃgīti commentaries. This edition is by far the most useful as well as the most readily available.

Rin chen bzang po (958–1051) is the first known translator of the Nāmasaṃgīti into Tibetan. Extensively revised in the late 13th century by Blo gros brtan pa, his translation was used by Bu ston (1290–1364) in the formation of the Kanjur. The existence of an earlier translation seems almost certain: one is listed in the Ldan dkar catalogue, a list that probably reached its present form in the early 9th century. There is also a translation in the Rnying ma rgyud 'bum, but whether it is the Ldan dkar translation is unclear. Although it differs from Rin chen bzang po's translation, there is significant overlap. If it is the earlier translation, then Rin chen bzang po leaned on it considerably for his own translation (Davidson, 1981, 13). Complicating the picture, there are also a number of manuscripts of a Tibetan translation in the Dunhuang collections that are closer to the Rnying ma rgyud 'bum version than that of the Kanjur (Dalton & van Schaik, 2006, 115). Neither the Rnying ma rgyud 'bum translation nor the Dunhuang manuscripts identify a translator. The Rnying ma rgyud 'bum translation has section divisions but no prose, while none of the Dunhuang manuscripts have section divisions, although some do have the prose. D.D. Mukherji's work (1963) contains the closest to an edition of the Tibetan. He provides what is probably Rin chen bzang po's unrevised text, with Kanjur version variants as footnotes. A. Wayman (1985) also supplies a Tibetan text, based on a Dharamsala publication that he believes is close to Rin chen bzang po's (unrevised) version.

The first Chinese translation appears to be that of the Indian monk Dānapāla, who was in China from 980 to 1017 (T. 1187). There is also a Mongolian translation, based on the Tibetan translation of Kanjur. This was in existence at least by 1592, a date specified in the colophon to the Mongolian text in a quadrilingual (Sanskrit, Tibetan, Chinese, and Mongolian) concertina xylograph used by R. Vira (1962, 9) for his Nāmasaṃgīti edition. English translations have been published by R.M. Davidson (1981), A. Wayman (1985), and A. Berzin (2009). R.M. Davidson's annotated translation accompanies his edition of the Sanskrit. A. Berzin's translation from the Tibetan is unannotated and (appears to be) from the Kanjur version. It omits the prose. A. Wayman employs both Sanskrit and Tibetan, tending to give preference to the Tibetan. All the translations use the sectional divisions and their titles.

Overview of Content

The Introduction (1–25)

The Nāmasaṃgīti does no dard scriptural evaṃ may heard"), but with atha ("n duction nonetheless maint tradition with Vajradhara's to proclaim the Nāmasaṃ also makes an explicit cla stating (13) that the Nāmas in the Māyājālatantra. (Th is part of a 16,000-verse M a 16,000-verse Māyājālata the extant Māyājāla [D 46 Nāmasaṃgīti.) While Vaj become distinct figures Nāmasaṃgīti the names ar Śākyamuni's interlocutor, a to as Vajradhara (1), is su Vajradhara (20) and Vajrap locutor, Vajradhara/Vajrap ful in appearance (2) while to as Vajrapānis, are fierce origins, Vajradhara/Vajrap Guhyakādhipa ("Lord of th

In requesting Śākyam Nāmasaṃgīti, Vajradhara tion, noted earlier, that it Mañjuśrījñānasattva (10– gnosis (jñāna) and its relati throughout the introductio is described as that of the (mañjuśrījñānakāya, 21), w is said to be the "gnosis bod "embodiment of gnosis" (j is presented, therefore, b embodiment. Notably, he i to as a bodhisattva.

The "Names" of the Nā Whose and What?

Since the Nāmasaṃgīti itse tify their subject, it is not fu
"names" of the Nāmasaṃ candidates are Mañjuśrīj ble a. The interpretation ai o au aṃ aḥ – I, the aw ment of gnosis, am in the the three times [past, pres cal here since the imme imply that the verse's sub "names." The verse is de mmentaries. This edition is as well as the most readily 958–1051) is the first known samgīti into Tibetan. Exten-te 13th century by Blo gros was used by Bu ston (1290– of the Kanjur. The existence seems almost certain: one r catalogue, a list that probt form in the early 9th cen-nslation in the Rnying ma r it is the Ldan dkar transgh it differs from Rin chen here is significant overlap. tion, then Rin chen bzang ably for his own translation plicating the picture, there uscripts of a Tibetan trans-collections that are closer 'bum version than that of n Schaik, 2006, 115). Neither m translation nor the Duntify a translator. The Rnying n has section divisions but he Dunhuang manuscripts lthough some do have the rk (1963) contains the closibetan. He provides what is g po's unrevised text, with as footnotes. A. Wayman Tibetan text, based on a that he believes is close to evised) version.

slation appears to be that apāla, who was in China ). There is also a Mongo-n the Tibetan translation xistence at least by 1592, a lophon to the Mongolian Sanskrit, Tibetan, Chinese, rtina xylograph used by Nāmasaṃgīti edition. Eng-n published by R.M. David-985), and A. Berzin (2009). d translation accompanies rit. A. Berzin's translation nnotated and (appears to rsion. It omits the prose.
th Sanskrit and Tibetan, ce to the Tibetan. All the ional divisions and their

Overview of Contents

The Introduction (1–25)

The Nāmasaṃgīti does not open with the standard scriptural evaṃ mayā śrutam ("thus have I heard"), but with atha ("now," "next"). The introduction nonetheless maintains the appearance of tradition with Vajradhara's request to Śākyamuni to proclaim the Nāmasaṃgīti. The introduction also makes an explicit claim to scriptural status, stating (13) that the Nāmasaṃgīti was proclaimed in the Māyājālatantra. (The colophon adds that it is part of a 16,000-verse Māyājālatantra. However, a 16,000-verse Māyājālatantra is unknown, and the extant Māyājāla [D 466] does not contain the Nāmasaṃgīti.) While Vajrapāṇi and Vajradhara become distinct figures in later texts, in the Nāmasaṃgīti the names are interchangeable. Thus Śākyamuni's interlocutor, although initially referred to as Vajradhara (1), is subsequently called both Vajradhara (20) and Vajrapāṇi (16, 19, 20). As interlocutor, Vajradhara/Vajrapāṇi is depicted as peaceful in appearance (2) while his entourage, referred to as Vajrapānis, are fierce (3–5). Evoking his yakṣa origins, Vajradhara/Vajrapāṇi is also referred to as Guhyakādhipa ("Lord of the Guhyakas"; 22).

In requesting Śākyamuni to promulgate the Nāmasaṃgīti, Vajradhara makes the association, noted earlier, that it is the Nāmasaṃgīti of Mañjuśrījñānasattva (10–11). The importance of gnosis (jñāna) and its relation to Mañjuśrī continues throughout the introduction. Thus the Nāmasaṃgīti is described as that of the "gnosis body Mañjuśrī" (mañjuśrījñānakāya, 21), while Mañjuśrījñānasattva is said to be the "gnosis body" (jñānakāya, 10) and the "embodiment of gnosis" (jñānamūrti, 10). Mañjuśrī is presented, therefore, both as gnosis and as its embodiment. Notably, he is not specifically referred to as a bodhisattva.

The "Names" of the Nāmasaṃgīti (26–157): Whose and What?

Since the Nāmasaṃgīti itself does not explicitly identify their subject, it is not fully clear who or what the "names" of the Nāmasaṃgīti name. The two main candidates are Mañjuśrījñānasattva and the syllable a. The interpretation of verse 26 (a ā i ī u ū e ai o au aṃ aḥ – I, the awakened one, the embodiment of gnosis, am in the heart of the buddhas of the three times [past, present, and future]), is critical here since the immediately following verses imply that the verse's subject is the subject of the "names." The verse is described as the verse "of the lord of speech" (girāṃ pateḥ; 25), an epithet applied earlier to Mañjuśrījñānasattva (gīṣpateḥ; 10), who can therefore be understood to be the "I" that is "in the heart of the buddhas." In this case, Mañjuśrījñānasattva is the subject of the "names." Alternatively, the syllables that open the verse (a ā i ī u ū e ai o au aṃ aḥ) can be read as indicating that the first syllable – a, being the origin or source of the verse – is the more fundamental emblem of jñāna and is, as a result, the subject of the "names." A further possibility is to identify the two, namely that Mañjuśrījñānasattva is the syllable a. In any case, what is "named," understood one way or another, is jñāna; the "names" are its expressions, in various ways and forms.

The Nāmasaṃgīti is not, therefore, a standard stotra or stuti (hymn of praise), extolling a particular deity's qualities via a series of names and epithets. The verses containing the "names" are for the most part a series of descriptive expressions in the nominative case. Some of these are actual names such as Kṣitigarbha (115) or epithets such as Sarvajña ("All-knowing"; 98). But by far the majority of them are not. The range of "names" is wide. They reference mainstream categories and identities such as the four truths (132), the five skandhas ("aggregates"; groups of changing physical and psychological factors that comprise the individual; 130), arhat and bhikṣu (52), and non-returner (anāgāmī) and pratyekabuddha (51). They reference not only tantric terms such as mantra (63) and mudrā (156) but also the Mahāyāna more generally (41) and its doctrines, for example, sambhogakāya (146). Also emphasized are qualities, particularly of sound and voice and of light and radiance. And there are metaphors and images, of beauty (125), power (122), and the fearful (76). The "names" exploit paradox: their subject is said to be both young and old (81) and both the father and son of the buddhas (60). Some "names" are doctrinally or philosophically problematic, for example, Svayambhū ("Self-existent"; 61) and Vidhātṛ ("Creator"; 64).

Despite the topic divisions present in many manuscripts, the content of the verses of "names" is not generally structured in any obvious way. Themes may persist for a number of verses, and there are runs of verses, half-verses, or pādas that start with the same word: thus mahā ("great"; 30–42), vajra ("thunderbolt/diamond"; 71–75b), daśa ("ten"; 43–45a), and sarva ("all"; 106–108). One reading of this Nāmasaṃgīti material is that there was an intentional blending of contrasting types of content to create a single fabric of verses that melded different traditions and ideas. Thus, tantric and nontantric elements are interwoven in a way that could promote a sense that they belong together quite naturally. For the most part, the "names" are free from technical terms that would ally the Nāmasaṃgīti to a specific philosophical stance. There are some Abhidharma terms and lists but nothing to strongly identify the Nāmasaṃgīti with a particular doctrinal school. Certainly the generalist, open-ended, and philosophically accommodating language of the Nāmasaṃgīti, its rhythmic and poetical character, along with its being a short, easily memorizable text, facilitated the broad acceptance that it appears to have rapidly engendered.

The Prose

The prose passage, enumerating the benefits of the Nāmasaṃgīti, is in the form of an address to Vajradhara/Vajrapāṇi, one presumes by Śākyamuni. It is somewhat smaller in size than the rest of the text and sometimes approximated as the equivalent of 150 verses. It falls naturally into six parts, titled "circles" (cakra) in the manuscripts, with the number of phrases (pada) in each cakra also stated. As with the manuscript sections, these prose division titles may be commentarial additions. In summary, the prose comprises descriptions of the following: why Śākyamuni taught the Nāmasaṃgīti (cakra 1), what the Nāmasaṃgīti is and how it both protects against negative entities and promotes well-being (cakras 2–3), benefits from reciting and teaching the Nāmasaṃgīti and from meditating on Mañjuśrī as the jñānakāya or the jñānasattva (cakras 4–5), and how the one who practices and preserves the Nāmasaṃgīti will gain buddhahood (cakra 6).

Much of the prose, in terms of both style and content, is familiar from the self-laudations found in Mahāyāna sūtras. And the descriptions of the results of meditating on Mañjuśrī – visions of buddhas and bodhisattvas, or seeing the form body (rūpakāya) of Mañjuśrījñānasattva – are familiar from those of the practice of the recollection of the Buddha (buddhānusmṛti). As with the "names", the bulk of the prose is not specifically tantric in nature. Nonetheless, the context of practice is explicitly portrayed as tantric: benefits accrue to those "practicing the observances of the way of mantras" (mantramukhacaryācārin), and attainment of the final goal is speedy (kṣipratara).

Tantric Elements

While the Nāmasaṃgīti is clearly a tantric text, it is striking how much of it is not tantric. Of the 130 verses containing the nāmas, only 33 contain tantric material. Despite 63 occurrences of the word vajra, the expression vajrayāna does not appear. What is found is mantranaya ("method of mantras"; 42, twice) and pāramitānaya ("method of perfections"; 43), expressions characteristic of texts generally predating the use of Vajrayāna as a term to identify tantric ideas and practices as part of a self-conscious and distinct tradition. Again, and in line with the nature of the nontantric Nāmasaṃgīti material, the tantric content of the Nāmasaṃgīti is fairly general. Thus "empowerment" (abhiṣeka), occurring just once, is referred to in a nontechnical way (84). The term maṇḍala, in a (potentially) tantric sense, occurs in the verses of "names" only once (33) and, with a tantric meaning, on just one other occasion elsewhere (prose cakra 4). Notably, there are no references to tantra classes (e.g. kriyatantra, caryātantra, or yogatantra), apart from the colophon identification of the Nāmasaṃgīti as a mahāyogatantra. The only occurrence of the word tantra in the Nāmasaṃgīti is in the general epithet "lord of all tantras" (sarvatantrādhipa, 114). The section of mantras, which is brief, occupying just over four lines in R.M. Davidson's edition, consists of two mantras with an interposed gloss on the first. Mañjuśrī is predominant here, referenced as the "womb of gnosis" (jñānagarbha) and the "gnosis body" (jñānakāya).

An emphasis in the Nāmasaṃgīti that is distinctive of texts that came to be called mahāyogatantras is the use and revaluation of negative emotional states (kleśa). Passion (rāga), hatred (dveṣa), delusion (moha), anger (krodha), and greed (lobha), each called great (mahā), are great festivals (mahāmaha) capable of positive outcomes (30–32ab). Thus, mahārāga (great passion) produces joy for beings, and mahādveṣa (great hatred) is the enemy of the kleśas. These descriptions are given a significant position early in the verses of the Nāmasaṃgīti.

Another feature of mahāyogatantras, the prominence of fierce or wrathful figures, is also present in the Nāmasaṃgīti and given some weight. Verses 64–75 are almost wholly dedicated to such figures along with depictions of their appearance and manner(s). Figures such as Vajrabhairava (66) and Yamāntaka (68) are named. It is unclear whether these figures are to be seen as fully awakened, but if it is correct to read the "names" as expressions (in some sense) of gnosis, then violent, wrathful expressions are notably present.

Tantric Contexts

Given the generality of the ta Nāmasaṃgīti, establishing d influences is not straightforwa to the fundamental yogatantra is suggested by a number of th of them are names of figures from principal maṇḍala, the Vajrad for example the deities Vajrara (111), and Vajradharma (112) (dvārapālas) Vajrāṅkuśa (66)
Also, the Tattvasaṃgraha's pra (ch. 1), which is essentially a lis he can manifest, may have prov the Nāmasaṃgīti's verses of "nam may be from the Mahāvairoca (see ch. 6), indicated by the N sis on the syllable a, as well Mahāvairocana (42) and Vair
The general program of the N sis can appear in a range of the Mahāvairocanābhisaṃbod statement (ch. 1) as interlocu jñajñāna) can be taught, or ex ent paths and by taking on a v

More generally, the Nā indebted to the Prajñāpāram dom) literature. Present is th Mañjuśrī and gnosis, as well as syllable a, which as an indica ness) through its function of r Prajñāpāramitā texts in the P
(The Perfection of Wisdom Nāmasaṃgīti calls the sylla syllable" (paramākṣara; 28).
texts that may parallel the tantric-influenced Adhyardh ramitānāmāṣṭaśatakā. The A Tibetan translation, has Mañ a as the "perfection of wisdo The Prajñāpāramitānāmāṣṭ are not names either. They ar prajñā, some of which, like th reference mainstream doctri passage on the benefits of its mantra, follows the main tex

A morphological conn Nāmasaṃgīti and the sam Māyājālatantra and the G been suggested, with the a consist of a meditation in the nāmas, only 33 contain ite 63 occurrences of the word vajrayāna does not appear. ntranaya ("method of man-pāramitānaya ("method of essions characteristic of texts ne use of Vajrayāna as a term as and practices as part of a tinct tradition. Again, and in the nontantric Nāmasaṃgīti content of the Nāmasaṃgīti "empowerment" (abhiṣeka), referred to in a nontechni-maṇḍala, in a (potentially) n the verses of "names" only tantric meaning, on just one here (prose cakra 4). Notaences to tantra classes (e.g. a, or yogatantra), apart from ation of the Nāmasaṃgīti as a only occurrence of the word ngīti is in the general epithet vatantrādhipa, 114). The sec-is brief, occupying just over vidson's edition, consists of nterposed gloss on the first.

ant here, referenced as the inagarbha) and the "gnosis

Nāmasaṃgīti that is distinco be called mahāyogatantras ation of negative emotional (rāga), hatred (dveṣa), deludha), and greed (lobha), each great festivals (mahāmaha) outcomes (30–32ab). Thus, on) produces joy for beings, hatred) is the enemy of the ons are given a significant rses of the Nāmasaṃgīti. ahāyogatantras, the promihful figures, is also present d given some weight. Verses ly dedicated to such figures of their appearance and h as Vajrabhairava (66) and med. It is unclear whether een as fully awakened, but e "names" as expressions (in en violent, wrathful expres-t.

Tantric Contexts

Given the generality of the tantric content of the Nāmasaṃgīti, establishing definitive sources or influences is not straightforward. An indebtedness to the fundamental yogatantra, the Tattvasaṃgraha is suggested by a number of the "names." Some nine of them are names of figures from the Tattvasaṃgraha's principal maṇḍala, the Vajradhātumahāmaṇḍala – for example the deities Vajraratna (107), Vajratīkṣṇa (111), and Vajradharma (112) and door guardians (dvārapālas) Vajrāṅkuśa (66) and Vajrāveśa (73). Also, the Tattvasaṃgraha's praise of Mahāvairocana (ch. 1), which is essentially a list of the ways in which he can manifest, may have provided a broad model for the Nāmasaṃgīti's verses of "names." A second influence may be from the Mahāvairocanābhisaṃbodhitantra (see ch. 6), indicated by the Nāmasaṃgīti's emphasis on the syllable a, as well as by the presence of Mahāvairocana (42) and Vairocana (62) as names. The general program of the Nāmasaṃgīti, that gnosis can appear in a range of ways, is paralleled in the Mahāvairocanābhisaṃbodhitantra by Vajrapāṇi's statement (ch. 1) as interlocutor that gnosis (sarvajñajñāna) can be taught, or express itself, via different paths and by taking on a wide range of forms.

More generally, the Nāmasaṃgīti is clearly indebted to the Prajñāpāramitā (Perfection of Wisdom) literature. Present is the association between Mañjuśrī and gnosis, as well as the importance of the syllable a, which as an indicator of śūnyatā (emptiness) through its function of negation culminates in Prajñāpāramitā texts in the Prajñāpāramitaikākṣarī (The Perfection of Wisdom in One Syllable). The Nāmasaṃgīti calls the syllable a "the supreme syllable" (paramākṣara; 28). Other Prajñāpāramitā texts that may parallel the Nāmasaṃgīti are the tantric-influenced Adhyardhaśatikā and Prajñāpāramitānāmāṣṭaśatakā. The Adhyardhaśatikā, in its Tibetan translation, has Mañjuśrī teach the syllable a as the "perfection of wisdom" (prajñāpāramitā). The Prajñāpāramitānāmāṣṭaśatakā's 108 "names" are not names either. They are attributes and signs of prajñā, some of which, like those of the Nāmasaṃgīti, reference mainstream doctrinal categories. A prose passage on the benefits of its recitation, as well as a mantra, follows the main text.

A morphological connection between the Nāmasaṃgīti and the samādhi chapters of the Māyājālatantra and the Guhyasamājatantra has been suggested, with the argument that they all consist of a meditation instruction preceded by a mantra (Davidson, 1981, 2–3). Yet, while the Guhyasamājatantra chapter (3), for example, does have this form and contains detailed visualization instructions, there are no instructions in the "names" verses of Nāmasaṃgīti. Moreover, the content of the Guhyasamājatantra is remote from that of the Nāmasaṃgīti. It has also been suggested that a factor in considering the Nāmasaṃgīti and its genesis is the historical emergence of a sixth buddha family (kula), one that would overarch and unify the five *kula*s ("families" or groups of deities) associated with five buddhas of the Tattvasaṃgraha (Vairocana, Akṣobhya, Ratnasambhava, Amitābha, and Amoghasiddhi). Again, while the Nāmasaṃgīti introduction does list six (or possibly seven) mantra families (23), and six mantras (25), this emphasis is not found in the remainder of the text, including the prose, and they are not linked to buddha families. The terms mantra and kula do appear together twice but each time in the context of a "triple family" (kulatraya; 65, 143) of mantras, an expression that is not further explained. Also, five buddhas (pañcabuddha, 59) are mentioned but not six, and not six families. Evidence that the Nāmasaṃgīti reflects a six buddha family framework in any explicit form is therefore weak. Such an interpretation is the work of early Nāmasaṃgīti exegetes.

Influence

From at least the mid-8th century onward, the Nāmasaṃgīti appears to have been an influential tantric text in India, as indicated by the large number of Nāmasaṃgīti-related texts that survive, largely in Tibetan translation. Some 129 works, ranging from substantial commentaries to shorter ritual texts and sādhanas, are found in the Derge edition of the Tanjur (D 1395–1400, 2090–2121, 2532–2622). The earliest commentaries, composed from a yogatantra perspective, include those by Mañjuśrīmitra (D 2532), Vilāsavajra (D 2533), and Vimalamitra (D 2092). Later commentators tended to place the Nāmasaṃgīti in a yoginītantra context, as for example does Advayavajra (D 2098). A number of authors, such as Raviśrījñāna (D 1395) and Dus [kyi 'khor lo] zhabs pa (*Kālacakrapāda; D 1399), more specifically linked the Nāmasaṃgīti to the Kālacakratantra. Other commentators include Candragomin, Ḍombiheruka, Mañjuśrīkīrti, and Smṛtijñānakīrti. Commentaries surviving in Sanskrit are Vilāsavajra's Nāmamantrārthāvalokinī (Tribe, 1994) and Raviśrījñāna's Amṛtakaṇikā (Lal, 1994) along with its subcommentary by Vibhūticandra, the Amṛtakaṇikoddyota. One other commentary that survives in Sanskrit in a single manuscript and that apparently has not been translated into Tibetan is the Gūḍhapadā, possibly composed by Advayavajra (Tribe, 1994, app. 7; Szántó, 2010).

The Nāmasaṃgīti's open-ended, technically nonspecific nature, allied with its brevity and liturgical appeal, is a likely factor in its success. In particular, its ability to accommodate a range of exegeses allowed the Nāmasaṃgīti to become detached from its original yogatantra moorings. Perhaps the most notable example of this is its adoption as a foundational text by Kālacakratantra exegetes. A range of Nāmasaṃgīti terms (in particular jñānakāya and ādibuddha [lit. Buddha from the beginning; the notion that there is just one primordial or primeval Buddha]) and verses were read as legitimating central Kālacakra doctrines. The Vimalaprabhā, a key Kālacakra commentary that was given scriptural status in Tibet, quotes 65 Nāmasaṃgīti verses and portrays the two texts as connected at a fundamental level (Wallace, 2001, 18–21).

The primary audience of the Nāmasaṃgīti is likely to have been monastics. With its focus on the figure of Mañjuśrī, it has been argued that the text would sit happily within the monastic culture of the Pala period (Harrington, 2002, 335–357). There is evidence suggestive of the Nāmasaṃgīti also having some popularity beyond the monastic context: its daily recitation is recommended for householder bodhisattvas by Advayavajra in his Kudṛṣṭinirghātana. Today, Nāmasaṃgīti recitation occurs in ritual contexts by Newar Buddhists in Nepal, where Nāmasaṃgīti is also worshipped as a deity. A shrine to a single-headed, 12-armed form was established in Kwā Bāhāḥ Monastery, Lalitpur, as recently as 1985 (Gellner, 1992, 175–178).

The Nāmasaṃgīti does not appear to have had any notable influence with East Asian Buddhists, even at the Mañjuśrī-centered Wutai-shan complex in China. In Tibet, however, the Nāmasaṃgīti has had a presence since Buddhism's inception there. Within all traditions of Tibetan Buddhism, it is still widely memorized and recited. The large number of Nāmasaṃgīti works translated into Tibetan has been noted. As for indigenous works, six Nāmasaṃgīti commentaries were earlier identified (Davidson, 1981, 14), three of which are Gelug and follow a Kālacakratantra perspective. (For a partial translation of that by Gde 'dun rgya mtsho Dalai Lama II [D 5549], see L. Harrington [2002, 383–492]; at least three further commentaries may be noted, those by Blo gros rgyal mtshan [1294–1376; TBRC Resource ID: W27552], Sga rab 'byams pa Kun dga' ye shes [1397–1470; TBRC Resource ID: W00EGS1016747], and Mkhan po Yon tan mgon po [1899–1959; TBRC Resource ID: W1KG1888], respectively from the Jonang, Sakya, and Nyingma traditions.)

With his interest in the Kālacakra tradition, Bu ston (1290–1364) also viewed the Nāmasaṃgīti as a Kālacakra text. In the compilation of the Kanjur, he placed it at the head of the tantras (D 360), followed by the Kālacakratantra itself. The high status of the Nāmasaṃgīti for the Kālacakra tradition continues today, exemplified perhaps by a Nāmasaṃgīti translation being placed at the head of a collection of articles on the Kālacakratantra in honor of the present Dalai Lama (Berzin, 2009).

Bibliography

Berzin, A., "A Concert of Names of Mañjuśrī," in: E. Arnold, ed., As Long as Space Endures: Essays on the Kālacakra Tantra in Honor of H.H. The Dalai Lama, Ithaca, 2009, 3–25.

Dalton, J.P., & S. van Schaik, Tibetan Tantric Manuscripts from Dunhuang: A Descriptive Catalogue of the Stein Collection at the British Library, Leiden, 2006.

Davidson, R.M., "The Litany of Names of Mañjuśrī," in: M. Strickmann, ed., Tantric and Taoist Studies in Honour of Professor R.A. Stein, vol. I, Brussels, 1981, 1–69; repr. in: D.S. Lopez Jr., ed., Religions of India in Practice, Princeton, 1995, 104–125.

Gellner, D., Monk, Householder and Tantric Priest: Newar Buddhism and Its Hierarchy of Ritual, Cambridge UK, 1992.

Harrington, L., "A View of Mañjuśrī: Wisdom and Its Crown Prince in Pāla-period India," diss., Columbia University, 2002.

Lal, B., Āryamañjuśrīnāmasaṁgīti with Aṁṛtakaṇikā-ṭippaṇī by Bhikṣu Raviśrījñāna and Amṛtakaṇikodyota-nibandha of Vibhū ticandra, Sarnath, 1994.

Minaev, I.P., "Nāmasaṃgīti," in: I.P. Minaev, Buddizm: Izsledovaniâ i Materialy, vol. II, Saint Petersburg, 1887, 137–159.

Mukherji, D.D., Āryamañjuśrīnāmasaṅgīti: Sanskrit and Tibetan Texts, Calcutta, 1963.

Szántó, P.D., "The Date of the Gūḍhapadā," 2010, http://tibetica.blogspot.com/2010_09_01_archive.html.

Tribe, A., "Mañjuśrī and 'The Chanting of Names' (Nāmasaṃgīti): Wisdom and Its Embodiment in an Indian Mahāyāna Buddhist Text," in: P. Connolly & S. Hamilton, eds., Indian Insights: Buddhism, Brahmanism and Bhakti: Papers from the Annual Spalding Symposium on Indian Religions, London, 1997, 109–136.

Tribe, A., "The Names of Wisdom: A Critical Edition and Annotated Translation of Chapters 1–5 of Vilāsavajra's Commentary on the Nāmasaṃgīti, with Introduction and Textual Notes," diss., Oxford University, 1994.

Vira, R., Mañjuśrī-Nāma-Saṅgīti i skrit and Chinese, and Sekodde lian, New Delhi, 1962; repr. in:
Kālacakra-Tantra and Other Te Wallace, V., The Inner Kālacakra
View of the Individual, New Yor ree further commentaries may Blo gros rgyal mtshan [1294– ID: W27552], Sga rab 'byams s [1397–1470; TBRC Resource , and Mkhan po Yon tan mgon C Resource ID: W1KG1888], Jonang, Sakya, and Nyingma in the Kālacakra tradition, Bu viewed the Nāmasaṃgīti as a compilation of the Kanjur, he of the tantras (D 360), followed ra itself. The high status of the Kālacakra tradition continues rhaps by a Nāmasaṃgīti trans-the head of a collection of arti-tantra in honor of the present 009).

Names of Mañjuśrī," in: E. Arnold, Endures: Essays on the Kālacakra
The Dalai Lama, Ithaca, 2009, 3–25. chaik, Tibetan Tantric Manuscripts criptive Catalogue of the Stein Collec-ry, Leiden, 2006.
itany of Names of Mañjuśrī," in:
antric and Taoist Studies in Honour vol. I, Brussels, 1981, 1–69; repr. in:
gions of India in Practice, Princeton, older and Tantric Priest: Newar Budy of Ritual, Cambridge UK, 1992.

f Mañjuśrī: Wisdom and Its Crown India," diss., Columbia University, asaṃgīti with Amṛtakaṇikā-ṭippaṇī and Amṛtakaṇikodyota-nibandha of h, 1994. īti," in: I.P. Minaev, Buddizm: Izsle-

l. II, Saint Petersburg, 1887, 137–159. añjuśrīnāmasaṅgīti: Sanskrit and , 1963. the Gūḍhapadā," 2010, http://tibet-_09_01_archive.html.
and 'The Chanting of Names' m and Its Embodiment in an Indian ext," in: P. Connolly & S. Hamilton, uddhism, Brahmanism and Bhakti: al Spalding Symposium on Indian
, 109–136.
f Wisdom: A Critical Edition and of Chapters 1–5 of Vilāsavajra's āmasaṃgīti, with Introduction and xford University, 1994.

Vira, R., Mañjuśrī-Nāma-Saṅgīti in Mongolian, Tibetan, Sanskrit and Chinese, and Sekoddeśa in Tibetan and Mongolian, New Delhi, 1962; repr. in: R. Vira & L. Chandra, eds., Kālacakra-Tantra and Other Texts, Part I, New Delhi, 1966.

Wallace, V., The Inner Kālacakratantra: A Buddhist Tantric View of the Individual, New York, 2001.

Wayman, A., Chanting the Names of Mañjuśrī: The Mañjuśrī-nāma-saṃgīti, Sanskrit and Tibetan Texts, Translated with Annotation and Introduction, Boston, 1985.

Web Site

Tibetan Buddhist Resource Center (TBRC): http://www.tbrc.org.

Anthony Tribe

Śamvara

The Samvara, Śamvara, or Cakrasaṃvara scriptural cycle constitutes the latest stage of the Buddhist yoginītantra literature in the early medieval Indian subcontinent. Many tantras belong to this scriptural tradition, such as Abhidhānottaratantra, Cakrasaṃvaratantra, Caturyoginīsampuṭatantra, Jñānodayatantra, Ḍākārṇavatantra, Yoginījālatantra, Yoginīsaṃcāratantra, Vajraḍākatantra, Vārāhīkalpatantra, Saṃvarodayatantra, Sampuṭodbhavatantra, and Herukābhyudayatantra. The earliest tantra among them is the Cakrasaṃvaratantra (also called Herukābhidhānatantra or Laghusaṃvaratantra), which was compiled probably around the 9th century CE in the eastern part of the Indian subcontinent. tantras belonging to this scriptural cycle have in common the following: instructions on the Heruka maṇḍala consisting of 62 deities and 24 holy sites that have various traditional Buddhist meanings, instructions on variant forms of that maṇḍala, or instructions in which components of the Heruka maṇḍala serve as core teaching elements. The main deities of this maṇḍala, are Lord Heruka (or his variant forms called Saṃvara, Cakrasaṃvara, etc.), his consort Vajravārāhī (or her variant forms), and the four ḍākinīs, named Ḍākinī, Lāmā, Khaṇḍarohā, and Rūpiṇī, respectively.

The Term Saṃvara or Śaṃvara

In Tibetan Buddhism and modern scholarship, the word saṃvara or śaṃvara (Tib. bde mchog) is often used to refer to the scriptural tradition beginning with the Cakrasaṃvaratantra (Tantra of the Saṃvara of the Circle). While this is not an error per se, in the early stages of the scriptural tradition in question, the word saṃvara used as the title of a scripture generally indicates solely the Sarvabuddhasamāyogaḍākinījālasaṃvaratantra (Tantra of the Saṃvara of the Network of Ḍākinīs Completely United with All Buddhas), Sarvabuddhasamāyogatantra for short, which does not belong to the scriptural tradition beginning with the Cakrasaṃvaratantra. The Sarvabuddhasamāyogatantra was composed in the 8th century CE, and it is the first scripture that regards Heruka as an important deity. There are some parallel passages between the Sarvabuddhasamayogatantra and Cakrasaṃvaratantra. These suggest that the Sarvabuddhasamāyogatantra played a certain role in the compilation of the Cakrasaṃvaratantra. However, the Sarvabuddhasamāyogatantra does not have instructions of the Heruka maṇḍala and its systems of meaning taught in the scriptural tradition of the Cakrasaṃvaratantra. The Sarvabuddhasamāyogatantra is rather a common origin of multiple scriptural cycles of the yoginītantra literature, such as the Hevajra, Cakrasaṃvara, and other scriptural cycles in which Heruka (or his variant forms) is identified as the highest deity. Indeed, in relatively late Buddhist texts composed in India such as Ariṣṭadhīmat's ritual manual on the Heruka maṇḍala, we can find examples of the usage of the term saṃvara, indicating that certain tantras belong to the scriptural tradition of the Cakrasaṃvaratantra. Below, the scriptural tradition or cycle in question is called the Cakrasaṃvara scriptural tradition or cycle, beginning with the Cakrasaṃvaratantra and excluding the Sarvabuddhasamāyogatantra.

The word saṃvara generally means "discipline," but it has other, specific meanings in yoginītantra literature, for example as repeatedly found in the phrase ḍākinījālasaṃvara, which can be translated "the saṃvara of the network of ḍākinīs." Here the term saṃvara is something related to the network (which is generally interpreted as a gathering) of ḍākinīs.

There are two old and important etymological explanations for the term saṃvara. The first initially appears in the Sarvabuddhasamāyogatantra, in which the word saṃvara or śaṃvara is a combination term of śam (bliss; Tib. sham) and vara (supreme; Tib. mchog), together meaning "the supreme bliss" (see D 366, vol. ka, ch. 1, 151b6-b7/P 8, vol. ka, ch. 1, 164b4-b5). The word in question is hardly ever śaṃvara in the extant Sanskrit manuscripts of the Cakrasaṃvara tradition. However, the explanation in the Sarvabuddhasamāyogatantra suggests a possibility that śaṃvara is the original and saṃvara its derivation. In texts of the Cakrasaṃvara tradition (and the Hevajra tradition as well), similar glosses of saṃvara (or śaṃvara) are found with the meaning "supreme bliss" (sukhavaram, paraṃ sukham).

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill een the Sarvabuddhasamayoga- ṃvaratantra. These suggest that māyogatantra played a certain ion of the Cakrasaṃvaratantra. abuddhasamāyogatantra does ns of the Heruka maṇḍala and aning taught in the scriptural krasaṃvaratantra. The Sarva- ntra is rather a common origin al cycles of the yoginītantra lite Hevajra, Cakrasaṃvara, and es in which Heruka (or his vari-ied as the highest deity. Indeed, ddhist texts composed in India t's ritual manual on the Heruka d examples of the usage of the ating that certain tantras belong tion of the Cakrasaṃvaratantra.

l tradition or cycle in question aṃvara scriptural tradition or h the Cakrasaṃvaratantra and uddhasamāyogatantra.
a generally means "discipline," cific meanings in yoginītantra ble as repeatedly found in the ṃvara, which can be translated network of ḍākinīs." Here the ething related to the network interpreted as a gathering) of l and important etymological term saṃvara. The first ini-Sarvabuddhasamāyogatantra, aṃvara or śaṃvara is a com-n (bliss; Tib. sham) and vara og), together meaning "the 366, vol. ka, ch. 1, 151b6-b7/P 8,

. The word in question is hardly xtant Sanskrit manuscripts of dition. However, the explanadhasamāyogatantra suggests a ra is the original and saṃvara of the Cakrasaṃvara tradition tion as well), similar glosses of ) are found with the meaning varam, paraṃ sukham).

The other etymological explanation regards the term saṃvara as derived from the verb saṃ + vṛ-, "to conceal," "to protect." According to Jayabhadra's Cakrasaṃvarapañjikā, the oldest, word-for-word commentary on the Cakrasaṃvaratantra, the word in question means "concealment" or "protection" (Sugiki, 2001). In contrast to the first, this second etymological explanation corresponds to the majority reading of the extant Sanskrit manuscripts of the Cakrasaṃvara tradition, which have saṃvara and not śaṃvara.

The Standard Form and Meanings of the Heruka Maṇḍala

Some tantras are grouped under the title "the Cakrasaṃvara scriptural cycle," as they have core teachings in common. All these tantras give instructions on the Heruka maṇḍala, whose standard version consists of 62 deities and 24 holy sites that have traditional Buddhist or Mahāyāna meanings, such as the ten levels (daśabhūmi), the ten perfections (daśapāramitā), and the 37 conditions that contribute to awakening (saptatriṃśadbodhipākṣikad harma). Some tantras teach the maṇḍala's archaic forms (e.g. the Cakrasaṃvaratantra), some teach its matured and standard form, some teach its variant forms, and some teach only some parts or components (e.g. the Saṃvarodayatantra, which teaches a Heruka maṇḍala consisting of 13 deities).

The standard version of the Heruka maṇḍala consists of five concentric circles, in order from the innermost to the outermost:

1. the great pleasure circle (mahāsukhacakra);
2. the mind circle (cittacakra);
3. the speech circle (vākcakra);
4. the body circle (kāyacakra); and
5. the vow circle (samayacakra).

The Great Pleasure Circle

The innermost circle is named the great pleasure circle (mahāsukhacakra). In it Lord Heruka (with four faces, three eyes on each face, and 12 arms) embraces his consort Vajravārāhī (with one face, three eyes, and two arms). Heruka and Vajravārāhī are surrounded by four ḍākinīs from the four cardinal directions. They are Ḍākinī (east), Lāmā (north), Khaṇḍarohā (west), and Rūpiṇī (south). The central pair and the four ḍākinīs represent the five aggregates (pañcaskandha), the five elements (pañcabhūta), and other fivefold concepts. Four skull-bone vases filled with immortal nectar (amṛta) are placed on the four intermediate directions.

The 24 holy sites (pīṭhādi; i.e. pīṭha etc.) are grouped into ten categories:

1. pīṭha (seat);
2. upapīṭha (near seat);
3. kṣetra (land);
4. upakṣetra (near land);
5. chandoha (probably derived from saṃdoha, milking);
6. upacchandoha (near milking);
7. melā (assembly);
8. upamelā (near assembly);
9. śmaśāna (graveyard); and
10. upaśmaśāna (near graveyard).

These ten categories of holy sites are identical with the ten levels (daśabhūmi), beginning with the level pramuditā (joyous) and ending with the level dharmameghā (cloud of teachings). The ḍākinīs residing at these ten groups of sites represent the ten perfections (daśapāramitā), beginning with dāna (charity) and ending with jñāna (gnosis).

The 24 pairs of ḍākinīs (female deities) and vīras (heros, i.e. male deities), which are assigned to the 24 sites, form three concentric circles named tricakra (three circles). Each circle consists of eight pairs of ḍākinīs and vīras. These circles are called mind circle (cittacakra), speech circle (vākcakra), and body circle (kāyacakra), in order from the innermost to the outermost circle. The mind circle is conceptualized as being located in the sky (ākāśa), the speech circle is on the ground (bhūrloka), and the body circle is underground (pātāla). Hence, the ḍākinīs residing in these three circles have the following aliases:

1. khecarī (a woman moving in the sky);
2. bhūcarī (a woman moving on the ground); and
3. pātālavāsinī (a woman living underground).

The three circles mentioned above are conceptualized within the body of a practitioner as well. This implies that one's body is complete with the potential of the ten levels and ten perfections. The 24 holy sites mentioned above are identified with the 24 body areas (sthāna), beginning with the head and ending with the knees. The 24 ḍākinīs are also equated with inner channels (nāḍī) running in the body. The 24 vīras appear in the body in the form of bodily components (dhātu), such as the fingernails, teeth, hair on the head and body, and so on. The body areas identified with the holy sites are located in the upper, middle, and lower parts of the body, which corresponds to the distribution of the external holy sites in the three spheres (i.e. sky, ground, and underground). One's body is seen as the microcosm in this system.

The Mind Circle, the Speech Circle, and the Body Circle

Three circles	Ten levels: Ten perfections	Pīṭhādi	Holy sites	Body parts	Ḍākinī (= Inner channels)	Vīra	Body parts and bodily substances (= Vīra)
Mind circle (sky goer)	Pramuditā: Dāna	Pīṭha	Pullīramalaya	head	Pracandā	Khaṇḍakapālin	fingernails, teeth
			Jālandhara	top of the head	Caṇḍākṣī	Mahākaṅkāla	hair on the head and body
			Oḍyāna	right ear	Prabhāvatī	Kaṅkāla	skin, dirt
			Arbuda	back of the head	Mahānāsā	Vikaṭadaṃṣṭrin	flesh
	Vimalā: Śīla	Upapīṭha	Godāvarī	left ear	Vīramatī	Surāvairin	muscle
			Rāmeśvara	brows	Kharvarī	Amitābha	bones
			Devīkoṭa	eyes	Laṅkeśvarī	Vajraprabha	liver
			Mālava	shoulders	Drumacchāyā	Vajradeha	heart
Speech circle (earth goer)	Prabhākarī: Kṣānti	Kṣetra	Kāmarūpa	armpits	Airāvatī	Ankurika	eyes
			Oḍra	breasts	Mahābhairavā	Vajrajaṭila	bile
	Arcismatī: Vīrya	Upakṣetra	Triśakuni	navel	Vāyuvegā	Mahāvira	lungs
			Kosala	tip of the nose	Surābhakṣī	Vajrahūṃkāra	intestines
	Abhimukhī: Dhyāna	Chandoha	Kaliṅga	mouth	Śyāmādevī	Subhadra	ribs
			Lampāka	throat	Subhadrā	Vajrabhadra	stomach
	Sudurjayā: Prajñā	Upacchadoha	Kāñcī	heart	Hayakarṇā	Mahābhairava	feces
			Himālaya	penis	Khagānanā	Virūpākṣa	middle-of-the hair parting
Body circle (those living underground)	Dūraṅgamā: Upāya	Melāpaka	Pretapurī	sex organ	Cakravegā	Mahābala	mucus
			Gṛhadevatā	anus	Khaṇḍarohā	Ratnavajra	pus
	Acalā: Praṇidhi	Upamelāpaka	Saurāṣṭra	thighs	Śauṇḍinī	Hayagrīva	blood
			Suvarṇadvīpa	shanks	Cakravarmiṇī	Ākāśagarbha	sweat
	Sādhumatī: Bala	Śmaśāna	Nagara	toes	Suvīrā	Śrīheruka/ Mārāri	fat
			Sindhu	soles	Mahābalā	Padmanarteśvara	tears
	Dharmameghā: Jñāna	Upaśmaśāna	Maru	big toes	Cakravartinī	Vairocana	phlegm
			Kulatā	knees	Mahāvīryā	Vajrasattva	snivel

The Vow Circle

The outermost circle is named the vow circle (samayacakra), which leads to the four maṇḍala gates. Eight *ḍākinī*s reside in this circle, of whom four are gatekeepers: Kākāsyā (east gate), Ulūkāsyā (north gate), Śvānāsyā (west gate), Śūkarāsyā (south gate), Yamadāḍhī (southeast), Yamadūtī (southwest), Yamadaṃṣṭrī (northwest), and Yamamathanī (northeast). These eight *ḍākinī*s represent the eight vows (samayas; see below) that a practitioner must observe according to the Cakrasaṃvaratantra – the likely reason why this circle is called the vow circle.

The central pair of Heruka and Vajravārāhī and the four *ḍākinī*s in the great pleasure circle, the 24 pairs of *ḍākinī*s and *vīra*s in the three circles, and the eight *ḍākinī*s in the vow circle (which amounts to 37 in total) represent the 37 conditions that contribute to awakening (Sugiki, 2007).

Textual History

There are many tantra belonging to the Cak
Some of the scriptures scriptures mention th root tantra, variously (100,000 verses), Heru verses), Abhidhānata Mahāyoginītantra (12, they are selections fro However, there is no s actual existence of suc

The Earliest tantra: T
The extant tantra that starting point of the C tion is the Herukābhi the legendary Herukā Cakrasaṃvaratantra,
date of compilation of topic. However, there that it was compiled (Gray, 2007; 2012; Sz Sugiki, 2010).

According to its (MS 13290 at the Orie tantra consist of 51 ch saṃvaranāmamahāy Mahāyoginītantras N
toward the end of the is a possibility that Ca title of this tantra. Evi its title from Herukā chapter 51 and the fact of Jayabhadra does n chapter 50 and chapt version of this tantra 49 and the first half Skt. ed. 50.18); in chap Herukābhidhāna. It in other texts, such the Ḍākārṇavatantr Cakrasaṃvaratantra
2009).

Most elements co
ing to the Cakrasaṃ the Cakrasaṃvarata
oughly organized. T not expound psych
the subtle body sys nels (nāḍī) and circl as one of the core p

nels)	Vīra	Body parts and bodily substances (= Vīra)
	Khaṇḍakapālin	fingernails, teeth
	Mahākaṅkāla	hair on the head and body
	Kaṅkāla	skin, dirt
	Vikaṭadaṃṣṭrin	flesh
	Surāvairin	muscle
	Amitābha	bones
	Vajraprabha	liver
ā	Vajradeha	heart
	Ankurika	eyes
ā	Vajrajaṭila	bile
	Mahāvira	lungs
	Vajrahūṃkāra	intestines
	Subhadra	ribs
	Vajrabhadra	stomach
	Mahābhairava	feces
	Virūpākṣa	middle-of-the-hair parting
	Mahābala	mucus
	Ratnavajra	pus
	Hayagrīva	blood
i	Ākāśagarbha	sweat
	Śrīheruka/ Mārāri	fat
	Padmanarteśvara	tears
	Vairocana	phlegm
	Vajrasattva	snivel

elow) that a practitioner must the Cakrasaṃvaratantra – the circle is called the vow circle. f Heruka and Vajravārāhī and he great pleasure circle, the d vīras in the three circles, and e vow circle (which amounts nt the 37 conditions that con-(Sugiki, 2007).

Textual History

There are many tantras that can be regarded as belonging to the Cakrasaṃvara scriptural cycle. Some of the scriptures and commentaries on those scriptures mention the existence of a legendary root tantra, variously titled the Khasamatantra (100,000 verses), Herukābhidhānatantra (100,000 verses), Abhidhānatantra (300,000 verses), or Mahāyoginītantra (12,000 verses), and insist that they are selections from such a large root tantra. However, there is no solid evidence that proves the actual existence of such a legendary root tantra.

The Earliest tantra: The Cakrasaṃvaratantra

The extant tantra that can be considered the actual starting point of the Cakrasaṃvara scriptural tradition is the Herukābhidhānatantra (different from the legendary Herukābhidhāna mentioned above), Cakrasaṃvaratantra, or Laghusaṃvaratantra. The date of compilation of this tantra is a controversial topic. However, there seems to be some consensus that it was compiled around the 9th century CE (Gray, 2007; 2012; Szántó, 2008; Sanderson, 2009; Sugiki, 2010).

According to its extant Sanskrit manuscript (MS 13290 at the Oriental Institute, Vadodara), this tantra consist of 51 chapters and is called Śrīcakrasaṃvaranāmamahāyoginītantrarāja (The King of Mahāyoginītantras Named Lord Cakrasaṃvara) toward the end of the final chapter. However, there is a possibility that Cakrasaṃvara is not the original title of this tantra. Evidence – such as the change of its title from Herukābhidhāna to Cakrasaṃvara in chapter 51 and the fact that the Cakrasaṃvarapañjikā of Jayabhadra does not mention the second half of chapter 50 and chapter 51 – suggests that an older version of this tantra contained only chapters 1 to 49 and the first half of chapter 50 (MS 13290 37a3; Skt. ed. 50.18); in chapters 1 to 50, this tantra is called Herukābhidhāna. It is also called Laghusaṃvara in other texts, such as its Tibetan translation and the Ḍākārṇavatantra. In this article, it is called Cakrasaṃvaratantra (Sugiki, 2001; 2010; Sanderson, 2009).

Most elements common to the tantras belonging to the Cakrasaṃvara tradition are present in the Cakrasaṃvaratantra, but they are not yet thoroughly organized. The Cakrasaṃvaratantra does not expound psychosomatic practices based on the subtle body system consisting of inner channels (nāḍī) and circles (cakra), which are regarded as one of the core practices in several tantras after the Cakrasaṃvaratantra. The effects of practices taught in the Cakrasaṃvaratantra are mostly mundane, as the following sentence shows: "He can attain immediately all the things that might occur in the three worlds" (MS 13290 8a7; Skt. ed. 9.1). The Cakrasaṃvaratantra seems to be a scripture for mundane purposes rather than for attaining liberation (see also below).

The Cakrasaṃvaratantra contains many passages that are the same as or similar to passages found in the Buddhist Sarvabuddhassamāyogatantra, in the Śaiva Vidyāpīṭhatantras (such as the Siddhayogeśvarīmata, Jayadrathayāmala, Brahmayāmala, and tantrasadbhāva), in the Śaiva Vīṇāśikhatantra, and in other Cakrasaṃvara scriptures (particularly the Abhidhānottaratantra and Vajraḍākatantra; Sanderson, 1995; 2001; 2009; Sugiki, 2001; 2008).

Scriptures after the Cakrasaṃvaratantra

The scriptures of the Cakrasaṃvara tradition composed after the Cakrasaṃvaratantra can be grouped into two:

1. the Abhidhānottaratantra (Tantra Posterior to the Abhidhāna), Caturyoginīsampuṭatantra (Tantra of the Union with the Four Yoginīs [i.e. Ḍākinīs]), Yoginīsaṃcāratantra (Tantra of the Passage of Yoginīs), Vajraḍākatantra (Tantra of the Lord Vajraḍāka), Sampuṭodbhavatantra (Tantra of the Born of the Union), and Herukābhyudayatantra (Tantra of the Arising of Heruka);
2. the Jñānodayatantra (Tantra of the Appearance of Gnosis), Ḍākārṇavatantra (Tantra of the Sea of Ḍākas), Yoginījālatantra (Tantra of the Net of Yoginīs), Vārāhīkalpatantra (Tantra of the Rituals of Vārāhī), and Saṃvarodayatantra (Tantra of the Appearance of the Supreme Bliss).

The scriptures of the first group were probably compiled around the 10th century CE. Dīpaṃkaraśrījñāna (11th cent.) translated the Abhidhānottaratantra into Tibetan and wrote a commentary on Lūyīpāda's Cakrasaṃvarābhisamaya, which is closely related to the Abhidhānottaratantra (esp. ch. 14) and Yoginīsaṃcāratantra (Sugiki, 2007, 15–21). The Caturyoginīsampuṭatantra was translated into Tibetan by Cings yon tan 'bar, who may be the same Cings yon tan 'bar who translated the Herukābhyudayatantra into Tibetan together with Advayavajra (10th–11th cents.). The Sampuṭodbhavatantra and the Vajraḍākatantra are mentioned in the Muktāvalī of Ratnākaraśānti (11th cent.; Skt. ed. 18–19).

Among these scriptures, the Sampuṭodbhavatantra contains many passages and ideas that appear in the Hevarjatantra and related works and can be said to belong to both the Hevajra and the Cakrasaṃvara scriptural cycle.

Most, if not all, scriptures of the second group can be analyzed to have been compiled after the scriptures of the first group. The Ḍākārṇavatantra mentions the Vajraḍākatantra, Herukābhyudayatantra, and Sampuṭodbhavatantra in section 4 of chapter 50, proving that the Ḍākārṇavatantra was composed after those scriptures of the first group. There are many parallel passages among the Saṃvarodayatantra, Ḍākārṇavatantra, Yoginījālatantra, and Vārāhīkalpatantra:

- instructions on the death signs in the Saṃvarodayatantra, Ḍākārṇavatantra, and Vārāhīkalpa-tantra;
- instructions on inner channels in the Ḍākārṇavatantra and Yoginījālatantra;
- instructions on the Vajravārāhī maṇḍala in the Ḍākārṇavatantra and Vārāhīkalpatantra; and
- instructions on the inner wheel of time in the Saṃvarodayatantra and Vārāhīkalpatantra;

Comparative studies of these parallel passages show a possibility that the Saṃvarodayatantra and Ḍākārṇavatantra were composed before the Yoginījālatantra and Vārāhīkalpatantra (see Sugiki, 2007). Furthermore, Tibetan translations of the Yoginījālatantra, Vārāhīkalpatantra, and Jñānodayatantra (which has one of the most developed teachings on the internal practice) are not found in the Kanjur, suggesting that they were compiled in a late stage of the textual history of the Cakrasaṃvara tradition (Sugiki, 2007).

Contents of the Cakrasaṃvaratantra

The Heruka Maṇḍala and Its Main Rituals

The opening paragraphs of chapter 1, the Maṇḍalāvatāra (Descent of the Maṇḍala), include a verse that describes the lord and his place of residence:

> He resides without cease in the secret, supreme, and blessed body of all. He is a being made of all ḍākinīs. He is an adamantine being (vajrasattva). He is the highest pleasure. He is indeed Svayambhū ("Self-existing"), Bhagavān ("Lord"), and a vīra. He is the supreme bliss of the network of ḍākinīs. (MS 13290 1b2; Skt. ed. 2–3)

This verse, or similar ones describing the lord and his place of residence, can also be found in the Sarvabuddhasamāyogatantra and some other scriptures belonging to the Cakrasaṃvara tradition, and it is interpreted in various ways by numerous commentators. Jayabhadra's Cakrasaṃvarapañjikā, the oldest commentary on this tantra, gives an interpretation (Skt. ed. 1.6–1.10) that Lord Heruka is forming a blissful maṇḍala, consisting of ḍākinīs and vīras, that represents the whole universe (i.e. the three worlds). At the end, chapter 1 lists places that are suitable for drawing the maṇḍala, namely mountain (giri), cave (gahvara), arbor (kuñja), bank of a great sea (mahodadhi), or graveyard that is perfect since time immemorial (ādisiddhaśmaśāna).

Chapter 2, the Cakrapūjā (Oblation to the Circle), explains how to draw and meditate on a maṇḍala, and how to make oblations to the maṇḍala. A qualified practitioner is defined as having right knowledge (samyagjñāna), having understood tantras (tantrajña), having learned the mantras of the glorious Heruka (śrīherukamantrajña), being free from anger (akrodha), being purified (śuci), being able (dakṣa), being familiar with yoga (yogajña), and having attained gnosis (jñānapāraga). Having created the maṇḍala, a practitioner starts making oblation to it. The practitioner prepares nine decorated vases; eight of the vases are put at the four gates of the maṇḍala, and the ninth vase is located at the center of the maṇḍala. Precious things such as gems and gold items are scattered onto the maṇḍala, and various articles such as perfumes, one hundred lamps, and so on are offered to it.

The topics of chapter 3, the Dakṣiṇābhiṣeka (Ritual Fee and Initiation), are the abhiṣeka (initiation ritual) and the dakṣiṇā (ritual fee) to a master as reward for officiating the initiation ritual. First, disciples who wish to be initiated give offerings to their master as often as they can. Then, having made offerings to the maṇḍala, the master covers the face of every disciple with a cloth as a blindfold, makes them hold a flower with their hands clasped in prayer, makes them stand in front of the maṇḍala, and lets them drop the flower from their hands onto the maṇḍala. Each disciple's lineage affiliation (kula) as an initiated practitioner is determined by the specific area of the maṇḍala where the flower has fallen. Subsequently, the text gives a very brief explanation on a sexual ritual in which a mudrā (female) plays a certain role. After that, having bowed to both the master and the maṇḍala, the initiates offer presents and finally dedicate themselves to the master, saying, "From today on, I am a servant. I dedicate myself to you." The ḍākinīs are thus pleased, and the initiates are ensured to attain perfection (siddhi).

Although chapters 2 and 3 deal with maṇḍala rituals, they do not give detailed explanations on the elements of the maṇḍala. The names of the 24 ḍākinīs are taught in chapter 4, the Vīrayoginyādvaya

(The Nonduality of Vī names of the 24 vīras a the Sarvavīraḍākinyālayag Maṇḍala, Which is the Ḍākinīs). The names of the chapter 41, the Caturviṃ (The Setting of the Ma 24 Letters).

Inner meanings of ho explained in chapter 50, bhūminirdeśa (The Fire and the Instruction on La On). The holy sites are gro and correspond to the the ḍākinīs are equated (daśapāramitā). Through practices centered on the state of Heruka.

The Cakrasaṃvaratant
and detailed explanation of the Heruka maṇḍala n three spheres, the 24 ḍākin sites, its ten categories, etc how they are organized in of deities and meanings.
mentions the eight ḍākinīs but it does not specify the Heruka maṇḍala. It is ha form of the Heruka maṇ Cakrasaṃvaratantra, tho that constitute its standar

Principal Mantras

Heruka and other deities their own mantra(s). T tal mantra (mūlamantra chapter 5, the Mūlamantr tion of Letters of the R the Mantroddhāra (Extr chapter 25, the Mūlaman Mantra to be Kept Secret

> Oṃ. Salute to the lord, > who has the appearance > of a kalpa, who wears the > looks violent and horribl > show the tusks, who is sh > arms, who holds up an a > spear and a khaṭvāṅga st > of the skin of a tiger, and > tiful like the great smoke > kara. Kuru kuru [or "Do, d > frighten. Shake, shake. H > Pheṃ pheṃ. Phaṭ phaṭ.
> Eat, eat. For [you who] cl ra's Cakrasaṃvarapañjikā, the n this tantra, gives an interpre-

o) that Lord Heruka is forming onsisting of ḍākinīs and vīras, whole universe (i.e. the three chapter 1 lists places that are he maṇḍala, namely mountain ), arbor (kuñja), bank of a great graveyard that is perfect since lisiddhaśmaśāna).

rapūjā (Oblation to the Circle), v and meditate on a maṇḍala, ations to the maṇḍala. A qualiefined as having right knowl-
, having understood tantras learned the mantras of the herukamantrajña), being free ), being purified (śuci), being familiar with yoga (yogajña), gnosis (jñānapāraga). Having , a practitioner starts making ractitioner prepares nine dec-f the vases are put at the four , and the ninth vase is located aṇḍala. Precious things such as re scattered onto the maṇḍala, uch as perfumes, one hundred offered to it.

apter 3, the Dakṣiṇābhiṣeka ation), are the abhiṣeka (initialakṣiṇā (ritual fee) to a master ting the initiation ritual. First, to be initiated give offerings ften as they can. Then, having e maṇḍala, the master covers iple with a cloth as a blindfold, ower with their hands clasped n stand in front of the maṇḍala, e flower from their hands onto sciple's lineage affiliation (kula) ioner is determined by the spe-lala where the flower has fallen.
xt gives a very brief explanation which a mudrā (female) plays hat, having bowed to both the lala, the initiates offer presents themselves to the master, say-am a servant. I dedicate myself are thus pleased, and the initittain perfection (siddhi).

s 2 and 3 deal with maṇḍala give detailed explanations on maṇḍala. The names of the 24 chapter 4, the Vīrayoginyādvaya

(The Nonduality of Vīras and Yoginīs). The names of the 24 vīras are given in chapter 48, the Sarvavīraḍākinyālayagopyamaṇḍala (The Secret Maṇḍala, Which is the Abode of All Vīras and Ḍākinīs). The names of the 24 holy sites are given in chapter 41, the Caturviṃśatyakṣaramaṇḍalanyāsa (The Setting of the Maṇḍala Consisting of the 24 Letters).

Inner meanings of holy sites and ḍākinīs are explained in chapter 50, the Vaśyahomapīṭhādibhūminirdeśa (The Fire Oblation of Bewitching and the Instruction on Lands Such as Pīṭha and So On). The holy sites are grouped into ten (see above) and correspond to the ten levels (daśabhūmi); the ḍākinīs are equated with the ten perfections (daśapāramitā). Through the external and internal practices centered on the maṇḍala, one attains the state of Heruka.

The Cakrasaṃvaratantra does not give a clear and detailed explanation of how these elements of the Heruka maṇḍala mentioned above (i.e. the three spheres, the 24 ḍākinīs, the 24 vīras, the 24 holy sites, its ten categories, etc.) are interconnected and how they are organized into one integrated system of deities and meanings. The Cakrasaṃvaratantra mentions the eight ḍākinīs beginning with Kākāsyā, but it does not specify their precise locations in the Heruka maṇḍala. It is hard to know exactly what form of the Heruka maṇḍala is described in the Cakrasaṃvaratantra, though most core elements that constitute its standard version are mentioned.

Principal Mantras

Heruka and other deities mentioned above have their own mantra(s). The root or fundamental mantra (mūlamantra) of Heruka is taught in chapter 5, the Mūlamantrasyākṣaroddhāra (Extraction of Letters of the Root Mantra), chapter 7, the Mantroddhāra (Extraction of Mantra), and chapter 25, the Mūlamantrasarvagopya (The Root Mantra to be Kept Secret Completely):

> Oṃ. Salute to the lord, who is the ruler of vīras; who has the appearance of the great fire at the end of a kalpa, who wears the crest of twisted hair, who looks violent and horrible with his mouth open to show the tusks, who is shining with one thousand arms, who holds up an axe and a rope and has a spear and a khaṭvāṅga staff, who wears a garment of the skin of a tiger, and who is marvelously beautiful like the great smoke-colored darkness. Kara kara. Kuru kuru [or "Do, do"]. Bind, bind. Frighten, frighten. Shake, shake. Hrauṃ hrauṃ. Hraḥ hraḥ. Pheṃ pheṃ. Phaṭ phaṭ. Burn, burn. Roast, roast. Eat, eat. For [you who] cling to the fat, blood, and entrails. Grasp, grasp. Or, threaten, threaten the snakes residing in the seven underworlds. Heap, heap. Hrīṃ hrīṃ. Jñoṃ jñoṃ. Kṣmāṃ kṣmāṃ. Hāṃ hāṃ. Hīṃ hīṃ. Hūṃ hūṃ. Kili kili. Sili sili. Cili cili. Dhili dhili. Hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ. (Skt. ed. 148–149)

In the texts composed after the Cakrasaṃvaratantra in general, the sequence of words from "kara kara" to "dhili dhili" of the above mantra is divided into 24 parts, and these 24 parts are used as the mantras of the 24 vīras. The 24 ḍākinīs' mantras are given in chapter 4 as "oṃ [the Ḍākiṇī's name] hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ."

Chapter 6, the Ṣaḍvīrakavacoddāra (Extraction of the Six Heroic Armors), chapter 8, the Viparītayoginīmantroddhāra (Extraction of the Mantras of Yoginīs in Reverse Order), chapter 30, the Murajabandhanamantroddhāra (Extraction of a Mantra on a Drum Design), and chapter 48 (see above) teach other important mantras of the related deities. However, some instructions are too brief to know the details of the mantras that are taught.

In the texts after the Cakrasaṃvaratantra, these mantras are generally arranged in the following way:

1. Heruka's heart mantra (hṛdayamantra);
2. Heruka's quasi-heart mantra (upahṛdaya);
3. Vajravārāhī's heart mantra;
4. Vajravārāhī's quasi-heart mantra;
5. the six armor mantras (kavaca) of vīras for protection;
6. the six armor mantras of ḍākinīs for protection; and
7. the mantra named trailokyavijaya (subjugation of the three worlds) for taming evil beings.

The Eight Vows and the Practice Observance

Chapter 26, Śiṣyaparīkṣāsaṃvara (Examination of Disciples and Precepts), which can be restored from a commentary, explains the eight vows (samaya) that a practitioner must observe and emphasizes the significance of these vows – they are a cause for perfection, are common to all tantras, and are only obtained by faith. However, the Cakrasaṃvaratantra's description of the contents of the vows is obscure. According to Jayabhadra's Cakrasaṃvarapañjikā, the eight vows can be summarized as follows:

1. to move on the left side of ḍākinīs, perform left-side practices (e.g. use their left hand in rituals), realize that nothing is superior to the yoga of Heruka, see one's teacher as the mother of yoga, and revere other practitioners;
2. not to practice systems of other schools;
3. to stop distinguishing one's self from others;
4. not to be interrupted;

5. to have a desire for goddesses;
6. to engage in sexual yoga;
7. to be free from attachment when practicing bodhicitta (awakening mind); and
8. not to be angry at the time of receiving the bodhicitta.

These eight vows are symbolically connected with the group of eight *ḍākinī*s, beginning with Kākāsyā.

Chapter 27, Caryāvratapūjābali (Practice Observance, Oblation, and Bali Offering), teaches the practice observance (caryāvrata), a framework of daily conduct of an initiated practitioner. A male initiated practitioner travels from one village to another to find *dūtī*s (appropriate female partners). After rising early in the morning, he meditates on the concept that he exists in the mind only and that he protects himself by means of the armor mantras. Having prepared thus, he starts traveling, reciting mantras all the way. He recognizes *dūtī*s and communicates with them by means of secret codes. The *dūtī*s are the agents of perfection for the male practitioner when he engages with them in sexual practices. At night he is naked. He eats caru, a kind of food used for oblations. Generally it is made of some cereal crop with milk and butter, but in this context, it is the fivefold ambrosia (made of the semen, blood, excrement, urine, and human flesh).

The 14 Truths

Chapter 51 (no title), the final chapter, teaches the 14 truths, representing the 14 core elements of the Cakrasaṃvara system:

1. garment (nivasana) such as a tiger skin;
2. symbolic ornaments such as the five seals (pañcamudrādi; necklace, diadem, armlet, earring, and the sacred thread, which symbolize the five tathāgatas);
3. a dūtī representing gnosis (prajñāṅga);
4. a peg (kīla) used or visualized to protect the ritual space;
5. a cage (pañjara) visualized to protect the ritual space;
6. the contemplation that cause and other components of our experiences are all empty (hetvādiśūnya);
7. the recitation of vowels and consonants (ālikālim uccārya);
8. the visualization of the nāda (sound) from which all phenomena originate;
9. the yoga of absorption (saṃhārayoga);
10. the meditation on the accumulation of the immortal nectars in the practitioner's body in order to experience bliss (amṛtāpyāyananivṛti);
11. the worship of the hand (hastapūjā), that is the installation, in meditation, in one's own hand, and the worship of, mantras or deities;
12. the initiation (abhiṣecana);
13. the meditational protection by means of the armor mantras (kavaca); and
14. the oblation by means of all the mantras (sarvamantreṇārcanam), that is worshipping deities by means of their own mantras and other related mantras.

The fruits of these practices are described as follows: the practitioner is thoroughly purified and attains the level of a Tathāgata in this life and future lives, born in the Tathāgata lineage. He becomes a king of dharma. He fulfills all his wishes on earth. He attains enjoyments of heavens and the state of the universal monarch (cakravartin). When he dies, Heruka and his retainer *ḍākinī*s and *vīra*s, who have various kinds of flowers, banners, and flags and are playing music, come to him and take him to the abode of the *khecarī*s, a kind of paradise.

Bibliography

Gray, D.B., The Cakrasamvara tantra (The Discourse of Śrī Heruka): Editions of the Sanskrit and Tibetan Texts, New York, 2012.

Gray, D.B., The Cakrasaṃvara tantra (The Discourse of Śrī Heruka): A Study and Annotated Translation, New York, 2007.

Sanderson, A., "The Śaiva Age: The Rise and Dominance of Śaivism during the Early Medieval Period," in: S. Einoo, ed., Genesis and Development of Tantrism, Tokyo, 2009, 41–349.

Sanderson, A., "History through Textual Criticism in the Study of Śaivism, the Pañcarātra and the Buddhist yoginītantras," in: F. Grimal, ed., Les Sources et le temps/Sources and Time: A Colloquium Pondicherry, 11–13 January 1997, Puducherry, 2001, 1–47.

Sanderson, A., "Vajrayāna: Origin and Function," in: Buddhism into the Year 2000, publ. Dhammakaya Foundation, Bangkok, 1995, 87–102.

Sugiki, T., "The Cakrasaṃvara tantra (The Discourse of Śrī Heruka): A Study and Annotated Translation," JIABS 3, 2010, 505–541.

Sugiki, T., "The Homa System of the Vajraḍākatantra: A Critical Edition and a Preliminary Analysis of Its Homa System," TS 1, 2008, 131–154.

Sugiki, T., Saṃvara-kei mikkyō-no shosō (Aspects of Saṃvara Esoteric Buddhism), Tokyo, 2007.

Sugiki, T., "Cakrasaṃvaratantra-no seiritsu-dankai-nitsuite – oyobi Jayabhadra-saku Śrīcakrasaṃvarapañjikā-kōtei-Bonpon" (On the Making of the Cakrasaṃvaratantra and a Critical Study of Jayabhadra's Śrīcakrasaṃvarapañjikā), CG 50, 2001, 91–141.

Szántó, P.-D., "The Cakrasaṃvara tantra (The Discourse of Śrī Heruka): A Study and Annotated Translation," JIABS 1, 2008, 215–219.

Tsunehiko Sugiki

Sarva

The Sarvabuddhasamāyog forth Śaṃvara) is a signifi between what later came t tra and the yoginītantra (Tanaka, 2010, 340); in sometimes referred to as (Tomabechi, 2007, 904; Sa with the Guhyasamājat between the type of esot large still operates withi and that of transgressive elation. The Śaṃvara w ducing significant Śaiva including the practice of communal worship, the ground, and the almost compositional style as o prose (Sanderson, 2009, existed in some form in th 1995, 179–182; Tomabechi
2009, 145–146).

Sources and Relat

Until very recently, acces ble only through its Tibe rgyas thams cad dang
'gro ma sgyu ma bde ba'i ma; D 366/P 8) and scatt tations and incorporatio the original Sanskrit. Ho although long overlook in Nepal in 1898; Lévi, 18 SL 48) kept at the Collè de l'Institut d'études in plete codex unicus of th the first nine of the text long chapter 9 being co extensive passage and t entirely, at least 90% of the original. Judging o cal and codicological fe most likely copied duri was a product of a scri Empire, or a Nepalese s

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 20
Also available online – www.brill

the hand (hastapūjā), that is , in meditation, in one's own vorship of, mantras or deities; bhiṣecana);
al protection by means of the (kavaca); and y means of all the mantras rcanam), that is worshipping ns of their own mantras and antras.

practices are described as folr is thoroughly purified and athāgata in this life and future āgata lineage. He becomes a ılfills all his wishes on earth.
s of heavens and the state of n (cakravartin). When he dies, er ḍākinīs and vīras, who have rs, banners, and flags and are to him and take him to the a kind of paradise.

ıvara tantra (The Discourse of Śrī
e Sanskrit and Tibetan Texts, New

ıvara tantra (The Discourse of Śrī notated Translation, New York, 2007.
Age: The Rise and Dominance of y Medieval Period," in: S. Einoo, ed., ıt of Tantrism, Tokyo, 2009, 41–349. hrough Textual Criticism in the e Pañcarātra and the Buddhist rimal, ed., Les Sources et le temps/ lloquium Pondicherry, 11–13 January 1–47. a: Origin and Function," in: Bud- o, publ. Dhammakaya Foundation,

ıvara tantra (The Discourse of Śrī Annotated Translation," JIABS 3, em of the Vajraḍākatantra: A Critiminary Analysis of Its Homa Sys-

.
kkyō-no shosō (Aspects of Saṃvara kyo, 2007.
antra-no seiritsu-dankai-nitsuite – u Śrīcakrasaṃvarapañjikā-kōtei-ng of the Cakrasaṃvaratantra and bhadra's Śrīcakrasaṃvarapañjikā), saṃvara tantra (The Discourse of d Annotated Translation," JIABS 1,

TSUNEHIKO SUGIKI

Sarvabuddhasamāyogaḍākinījālaśaṃvara

The Sarvabuddhasamāyogaḍākinījālaśaṃvara (henceforth Śaṃvara) is a significant transitional scripture between what later came to be viewed as the yogatantra and the yoginītantra (or yoganiruttara) classes (Tanaka, 2010, 340); in modern scholarship, it is sometimes referred to as the "proto- yoginītantra" (Tomabechi, 2007, 904; Sanderson, 2009, 147). Along with the Guhyasamājatantra, it bridges the gap between the type of esoteric Buddhism that by and large still operates within the realm of ritual purity and that of transgressive, antinomian esoteric revelation. The Śaṃvara was instrumental in introducing significant Śaiva elements into Buddhism, including the practice of enacting the pantheon in communal worship, the imagery of the cremation ground, and the almost the almost fully versified compositional style as opposed to mixed verse and prose (Sanderson, 2009, 148–156). The text already existed in some form in the early 8th century (Giebel, 1995, 179–182; Tomabechi, 2007, 904–905; Sanderson, 2009, 145–146).

Sources and Related Works

Until very recently, access to the Śaṃvara was possible only through its Tibetan translation (Dpal sangs rgyas thams cad dang mnyam par sbyor ba mkha' 'gro ma sgyu ma bde ba'i mchog ces bya ba'i rgyud bla ma; D 366/P 8) and scattered testimonia (both quotations and incorporations) of a few dozen verses in the original Sanskrit. However, it is now known that, although long overlooked (having been purchased in Nepal in 1898; Lévi, 1899, 85), one manuscript (Ms. SL 48) kept at the Collège de France, Bibliothèque de l'Institut d'études indiennes, is an almost complete codex unicus of the Śaṃvara. It contains only the first nine of the text's ten chapters. Despite the long chapter 9 being copied with the omission of an extensive passage and the short chapter 10 missing entirely, at least 90% of the text is now available in the original. Judging on the basis of paleographical and codicological features, the manuscript was most likely copied during the late 11th century and was a product of a scriptorium located in the Pala Empire, or a Nepalese scriptorium closely imitating the style of Pala scribes and manuscript production. An edition is in preparation (Griffiths, Sanderson & Szántó, forthcoming).

The circumstances behind the creation of the Tibetan translation are not clear. The text is transmitted in both the "old" (rnying ma) and the "new" (gsar ma) canons, that is to say the Nyingma Gyubum (Rnying ma rgyud 'bum) and the Kanjur (Bka' 'gyur), but only the former names the translators as the Indian Vajrahāsa and the Tibetan Rin chen mchog of the Sma clan. It is possible that there was a complete earlier translation made during the Tibetan Imperial Period, which was later revised. To date, only a part of chapter 5 has been identified as a translation of the Śaṃvara among the Dunhuang manuscripts (Tanaka, 2010, 330), which otherwise contain ample evidence that the Śaṃvara was well known at least after the collapse of the Tibetan Empire (Dalton & van Schaik, 2006, 196, 291). Furthermore, the Adhyardhaśatikāṭīkā* (D 2647/ P 3471), a treatise by Jñānamitra translated during the Imperial Period, also refers to the Śaṃvara and its etiological myth (Kanaoka, 1966; Davidson, 2002, 242–245). Thus Tibetan awareness of the text must date back still further.

The Śaṃvara was not transmitted to China, but the text did not remain entirely unknown there. In fact, the earliest known reference to the text is in a Chinese work, the Jingangding jing yujia shibahui zhigui (金剛頂經瑜伽十八會指歸; Introduction to the Yoga of the 18 Sections of the Vajraśekharatantra; T. 869 [XVIII] 286c9ff.), composed by Amoghavajra between 746 and 774 CE (Giebel, 1995, 179–182; Tomabechi, 2007, 904–905; Sanderson, 2009, 145–146; Tanaka, 2010, 330). The passage in question is a short description of the scripture, with a very clear reference to teachings contained in chapter 1 and, as shown by Tanaka (2010, 330–332, reiterating earlier publications in Japanese), chapter 9.

While no such classification seems to have gained currency in Indian exegesis, the Tibetan canon calls the Śaṃvara a "continuation tantra" (uttaratantra), which would suggest that the Śaṃvara we now have is not the "basic tantra" (mūlatantra), despite this being the way in which at least one 9th-century Indian author refers to it (Wedemeyer, 2007, 477).

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

There is, however, a supplementary scripture, the Sarvakalpasamuccaya (Rtog pa thams cad 'dus pa zhes bya ba Sangs rgyas thams cad dang mnyam par sbyor ba mkha' 'gro ma bde ba'i mchog gi rgyud phyi ma'i phyi ma; D 367/P 9), which the Tibetan tradition classifies as the "continuation to the continuation tantra" (uttarottaratantra). However, this supplementary scripture is referred to as the Śaṃvarottara by at least one Indian exegete, Ratnākaraśānti (Dwivedi & Rinpoche, 1992, 17).

The situation is made even more complex by the fact that the "old" canon preserves a short text simply called the Buddhasamāyoga*, which is arranged in this canon as if it were the lost basic tantra. Moreover, the five chapters of the Sarvakalpasamuccaya are numbered 18 to 22, implying a seven-chapter lost text between the ten-chapter Śaṃvara and itself.

The Sarvakalpasamuccaya is certainly an Indian work, the original Sanskrit of which appears to be lost, with the exception of a handful of quotations. Besides the translation of the scripture, the Tibetan canon preserves a translated commentary (Rtog pa thams cad 'dus pa zhes bya ba Sangs rgyas thams cad dang mnyam par sbyor ba mkha' 'gro ma sgyu ma bde ba'i mchog gi rgyud phyi ma'i phyi ma rnam par bshad pa; D 1662/P 2534) to this text by the exegete Ānandagarbha (perhaps late 8th or early 9th cent.). The Sarvakalpasamuccaya deals mostly with the encoding and decoding of mantras (mantroddhāra) of the Śaṃvara cycle. The encoding system taught here is an adaptation from the Śaiva Vīṇāśikhatantra, making this passage one of the earliest instances of tantric Śaiva-Buddhist intertextuality (Tomabechi, 2007; see also Woodward, 2009, 30–34).

There were several commentaries to the Śaṃvara, none of which are known to have survived in the original, although some remain accessible in Tibetan. The Sarvabuddhaṭīkā of Ānandagarbha is perhaps completely lost and known only from a reference in Mahāmatideva's unpublished Tattvaviśadākhyā nāma Ḍākinīvajrapañjarapañjikā (National Archives, Kathmandu 5–20, fol. 7r). The longest known commentary (Dpal sangs rgyas thams cad dang mnyam par sbyor ba mkha' 'gro ma sgyu ma bde mchog gi rgyud kyi don rnam par bshad pa; D 1659/P 2531), that of one Brgya byin sdong po (Sanskritized as *Indranāla), is very likely not a genuine translation but rather a work authored in Tibet. *Pramuditavajra's commentary (Dpal sangs rgyas thams cad dang mnyam par sbyor ba mkha' 'gro ma sgyu ma bde mchog gi 'grel pa Mnyam sbyor gyi rgyan; D 1660/P 2532) is not very early, since he refers to previous commentators, Ānandagarbha and *Praśāntamitra, and later (9th–10th cents.) scriptures, such as the Herukābhidhāna/Laghuśaṃvara, the Catuṣpīṭhatantra, and the Vajraḍākatantra. Śākyamitra's commentary (Dpal sangs rgyas thams cad dang mnyam par sbyor ba zhes bya ba'i rgyud kyi dka' 'grel; D 1661/P 2533) is recorded under the name of his master Indrabhūti. Parts of this work, a versified question-answer session between master and disciple, possibly dating to the 9th century, survive "scripturalized," as part of the Saṃpuṭatilaka (transmitted together with the Saṃpuṭodbhavatantra in Royal Asiatic Society Ms. Hodgson 37; Welcome Institute Library Ms. ε 2; Asiatic Society Calcutta G 3828), a text that may also contain materials from Ānandagarbha's lost commentary. *Praśāntamitra's commentary (Sangs rgyas thams cad dang mnyam par sbyor ba'i dka' 'grel; D 1663/P 2535) likely dates from the 9th century, since tradition identifies him as a disciple of Jñānapāda, and because he does not quote works that can be suspected to be later than the 10th century.

Among satellite texts, the Tanjur preserves eight ritual manuals (D 1664–1671/P 2536–2543) attributed to the siddha *Kukurarāja or *Kukurāja (on whom, see Kanaoka, 1966), a ritual manual concerning communal worship (D 1672/P 2544) attributed to (an) Indrabhūti (parts of which have been translated and discussed in Davidson, 2002, 318–320), five manuals by *Hūṃkāravajra (D 1674–1678/P 2546–2550) – possibly written in Tibet during the late Imperial Period – and several other, minor works. Satellite texts surviving in Sanskrit include an important, yet still unedited, meditation manual centered on the deity Heruka called Vajrajvālodayā Sādhanopayikā, by Ānandagarbha, which was not translated into Tibetan (for a partial edition and discussion, see Sanderson, 2009, 148–154; also see Isaacson, 2009, 112–113), two less detailed sādhanas of Heruka (ed. Bhattacharya, 1925–1928, 468–471), one by Kalyāṇagarbha and the other by an anonymous author, most likely Jñānapāda (Kikuya, 2000,1), and several minor works.

Precursors and Influence

The Śaṃvara is still deeply rooted in the traditions of the *yogatantra*s: this is evident from its liturgy (Sanderson, 2009, 145–146), its great concern with hand gestures and other ritual minutiae, and several dozens of verses that it incorporates from earlier texts. These include scriptures of the Paramādya cycle (Tomabechi, 2006, 103; 2007, 904, 918–921; Tanaka, 2010, 340), mo is now known as the Paramād* (D 488/P 120), the Vajrama

---

P 123), parallels with which hav and discussed by Tanaka argues for the borrowing to other way around, and th (D 502/P 134), an early and from which the Śaṃvara no which it also makes explici position of the text in light o awaits detailed study (Griffith forthcoming).

The influence of the Śaṃva studied. A whole host of yog verses from it, sometimes tures include the Herukābh (Sanderson, 2009, 154), whic it explicitly, the Vajraḍākat 105–106, 108–109), the Abhidh 2002, 105–106, 108–109), an tantra (Tomabechi, 2006, 352, 354, 361). Many signif and treatises quote the Ś out reference. The populari have reached its apogee in which it slowly faded away yoginītantras. Works from refer to the Śaṃvara or from it include the Nām Vilāsavajra (Tanaka, cited i Ātmasādhanāvatāra of Jñān the Sūtaka or Sūtakamelāpa the unattested title Car* Āryadeva (Tomabechi, 200
279–282, 288–289; Wedeme 374, 466–468, 477–479; San the Jñānasiddhi of (an) I 2006, 138, 164, 206; Sander Pradīpoddyotana of Candra 20), the Vajrasattvaniṣpā (Luo & Tomabechi, 2009, 13
of Nāgārjuna and Śākyam 38, 80, 132, 143, 160–162, 16 of Nāgabuddhi (Tanaka, 2 Tattvasiddhi of deutero-Ś
1993, 181–184; Tomabechi, 2

Language and Style

Excluding chapter colopho prose passages such as tho nd later (9th–10th cents.) scrip-Herukābhidhāna/Laghuśaṃvara, tra, and the Vajraḍākatantra. nentary (Dpal sangs rgyas thams ar sbyor ba zhes bya ba'i rgyud kyi 2533) is recorded under the name bhūti. Parts of this work, a versier session between master and ating to the 9th century, survive part of the Saṃpuṭatilaka (trans-th the Saṃpuṭodbhavatantra in ety Ms. Hodgson 37; Welcome ls. ε 2; Asiatic Society Calcutta may also contain materials from t commentary. *Praśāntamitra's s rgyas thams cad dang mnyam grel; D 1663/P 2535) likely dates y, since tradition identifies him apāda, and because he does not n be suspected to be later than exts, the Tanjur preserves eight 1664–1671/P 2536–2543) attrib-*Kukurarāja or *Kukurāja (on 1966), a ritual manual concern-hip (D 1672/P 2544) attributed parts of which have been trans-in Davidson, 2002, 318–320), Hūṃkāravajra (D 1674–1678/ssibly written in Tibet during iod – and several other, minor s surviving in Sanskrit include l unedited, meditation manual Heruka called Vajrajvālodayā nandagarbha, which was not n (for a partial edition and disn, 2009, 148–154; also see Isaac-wo less detailed sādhanas of arya, 1925–1928, 468–471), one d the other by an anonymous ānapāda (Kikuya, 2000,1), and nfluence

deeply rooted in the tradiras: this is evident from its 09, 145–146), its great concern d other ritual minutiae, and es that it incorporates from include scriptures of the nabechi, 2006, 103; 2007, 904,

918–921; Tanaka, 2010, 340), most notably the text that is now known as the Paramādyamantrakalpakhaṇḍa* (D 488/P 120), the Vajramaṇḍālaṃkāra (D 490/P 123), parallels with which have already been noticed and discussed by Tanaka (2007), although he argues for the borrowing to have happened the other way around, and the Trisamayarājakalpa (D 502/P 134), an early and influential kriyātantra from which the Śaṃvara not only borrows but to which it also makes explicit reference. The composition of the text in light of these precursors still awaits detailed study (Griffiths, Sanderson & Szántó, forthcoming).

The influence of the Śaṃvara is only slightly better studied. A whole host of yoginītantras incorporate verses from it, sometimes verbatim. These scriptures include the Herukābhidhāna/Laghuśaṃvara (Sanderson, 2009, 154), which also seems to refer to it explicitly, the Vajraḍākatantra (Sugiki, 2002, 85, 105–106, 108–109), the Abhidhānottaratantra (Sugiki, 2002, 105–106, 108–109), and the Saṃpuṭodbhavatantra (Tomabechi, 2006, 143–144; Szántó, 2013, 352, 354, 361). Many significant exegetical works and treatises quote the Śaṃvara with or without reference. The popularity of the text seems to have reached its apogee in the 9th century, after which it slowly faded away in favor of the newer yoginītantras. Works from the 9th century that refer to the Śaṃvara or incorporate passages from it include the Nāmamantrārthāvalokinī of Vilāsavajra (Tanaka, cited in Tribe, 1994, 406), the Ātmasādhanāvatāra of Jñānapāda (D 1860/P 2723), the Sūtaka or Sūtakamelāpaka (better known under the unattested title Caryāmelāpakapradīpa*) of Āryadeva (Tomabechi, 2006, 87–90, 160, 206, 212, 279–282, 288–289; Wedemeyer, 2007, 365–366, 373–374, 466–468, 477–479; Sanderson, 2009, 145, 154), the Jñānasiddhi of (an) Indrabhūti (Tomabechi, 2006, 138, 164, 206; Sanderson, 2009, 155–156), the Pradīpoddyotana of Candrakīrti (Chakravarti, 1984, 20), the Vajrasattvaniṣpādanasūtra of the same (Luo & Tomabechi, 2009, 13–15, 28), the Pañcakrama of Nāgārjuna and Śākyamitra (Tomabechi, 2006, 38, 80, 132, 143, 160–162, 164–165), the Viṃśatividhi of Nāgabuddhi (Tanaka, 2010, 648–649), and the Tattvasiddhi of deutero-Śāntarakṣita (Moriguchi, 1993, 181–184; Tomabechi, 2006, 160, 206).

Language and Style

Excluding chapter colophons and short, identifying prose passages such as those containing the names of hand gestures (mudrās), the text is entirely in verse. This is a significant feature for a text of this age, since it marks a clear break from earlier scriptures such as the Guhyasamājatantra or the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha, which are cast in mixed verse and prose. By far the most common meter is anuṣṭubh, other meters (e.g. mañjubhāṣiṇī, nardaṭaka, āryā, and some still unidentified) occurring only rarely. The chapters are of varying length: around 25 verses (chs. 1, 2, 3, 4, 8, and 10), around 70 verses (ch. 7), and around 100 verses (chs. 5 and 6); chapter 9 comprises more than half of the entire text; the total is approximately 1,000 verses.

The language is on the whole regular Sanskrit, although there are several features coinciding with those of the aiśa/ārṣa register, such as double saṃdhi (e.g. prāpyatehaiva janmani), hypermetrical lines that can be scanned through contraction (e.g. reading tathāgatasya pravacane as tathāg'tasya pravacane), hypometrical lines that can be resolved with an epenthetic vowel (e.g. reading parṣatsaṃniveśaḥ syāt as pariṣatsaṃniveśaḥ syāt), irregular stems (e.g. adhva for adhvan), and special declension endings (e.g. bhāvavān becomes bhāvāṃ; presumably balasā means balena). The Śaṃvara is probably the first Buddhist tantric text to employ Apabhramsha (at least seven passages, the first in ch. 6 and the rest in ch. 9). Cliché lines abound: some of these have become "hallmark" verses of the text and often are among those adopted by later scriptures. All chapters end with the line "thus spoke the blessed one, the glorious Vajrasattva."

The tone of the Śaṃvara is even more arcane than that of other scriptures of its kind. The text was clearly intended from the outset to be susceptible to multiple interpretations. A synopsis of contents can only be tentative, even with the help of commentaries, since only very rarely can we find exegetical consensus about the buildup of the text, the sequence of topics, the boundaries between them, and their intended purpose.

Synopsis of Contents

The text is referred to in a variety of ways, including the full title. The most often-used designation is Śaṃvara or Saṃvara (either consciously or through scribal dialect, with or without the honorific śrī-, sometimes followed by -tantra). This has caused some confusion in modern scholarship, as Śaṃvara was taken to be a reference to a related, but later, text – the Laghuśaṃvara/Herukābhidhāna (Szántó, 2008, 216–217; Tanaka, 2010, 329). We encounter less often the designations Sarvabuddhasamāyoga (Tomabechi, 2006, 143) and Mūlatantra (Wedemeyer, 2007, 477).

The unwieldy title Sarvabuddhasamāyogaḍākinījālaśaṃvara is often used as a refrain in the text, forming precisely one anuṣṭubh hemistich. The intended meaning of this title is uncertain; the text's exegetes have analyzed it in a variety of ways. The compound appears to be a fusion of two Vidyāpīṭha Śaiva scriptural titles, the Sarvavīrasamāyoga and the Yoginījālaśaṃvara (Sanderson, 2009, 156). Sarvabuddha means "all buddhas," but the compound may also allude to an older designation of Vairocana, the primordial buddha of the yogatantras. In its very first verse, the text also describes its supreme deity, Vajrasattva, as consisting of all buddhas. Samāyoga means "union," so the compound sarvabuddhasamāyoga could mean "the union of all buddhas," but for instance the Tibetan translation suggests that it was understood as "union with all buddhas." The word ḍākinī (usually translated as goddess, female spirit, and even witch) is interpreted in verse 7 of chapter 1, where it is derived from the verbal root ḍai-, "to go in the sky," as indicating the supernatural accomplishment of flying through space. However, the next verse interprets the word to mean the union of or with all buddhas, with the following verse giving an interpretation fusing the two above. One of the meanings of jāla is net, but references to the concept of illusion (māyā) in chapter 1 make it likely that trickery or magic was the intended meaning. The word śaṃvara is analyzed as supreme (vara) bliss (śaṃ). However, since in eastern India the palatal and dental sibilants are not reliably distinguished in writing, the word can also be read as saṃvara meaning covenant, vow, or binding, enveloping (for this probably intentional ambiguity, see Sanderson, 2009, 166–169). The wide range of possible meanings for each word and the multiple possibilities offered by the analysis of compounds allowed exegetes great freedom in their interpretations of this formula.

Chapter 1

The text starts unusually for a Buddhist scripture, inasmuch as it lacks the traditional etiological passage beginning with "Thus I have heard" (evaṃ mayā śrutam). Instead, it launches into a nearly theistic description of the chief deity, Vajrasattva. He is described as abiding eternally in everything, consisting of all buddhas, supreme bliss, self-born, the blessed one, the sole supreme deity, and neither passion nor dispassion, but nothing in the middle either. This is followed by an interpretation of the title. The text then returns to describing Vajrasattva, who is now both passion and dispassion, both desire and liberation, the three times, the three worlds, and so on. The method taught here is said to grant all-buddhahood (i.e. liberation) in a single lifetime. The worship of external deities such as cast images is spoken of disapprovingly, as a true seeker obtains liberation through the seeker's own person, in this very life.

Chapter 2

The next chapter continues much in the same vein, adding that buddhahood is reached through pleasure (sukha), and so there is no need for ascetic practices or restrictions in behavior, deeds, or diet. Instead, at all times one should maintain self-identification with the deity. Even men of small merit will thus reach accomplishment, and they incur no sin, whatever they do. The same applies to women as well. One should freely enjoy the sense objects and worship oneself.

Chapter 3

The idea of enjoying sensual pleasures is continued, here focusing on the enjoyment of women, for whom the practitioner will become irresistible. He will become able to fly in their company and will become known as a universal emperor.

Chapter 4

Chapter 4 continues with extolling the benefits of following the teachings of the scripture. All kinds of worldly and supernatural powers will be enjoyed by the practitioner, including taking the consorts of rival deities (Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Śiva, and Kāma) and bestowing them on devotees. He will become able to display the deeds of the Buddha.

Chapter 5

After some formulaic initial verses, chapter 5 introduces one of the most significant innovations of the Śaṃvara, namely the practice of communal worship (usually called gaṇacakra, but here gaṇamaṇḍala). The practitioner is enjoined to host this event on a regular basis (daily, monthly, or yearly, presumably according to means). The practice is essentially an enactment of the pantheon, or rather, one of the six clans of deities that the text teaches. Should the number of participants not reach the desired number of deities, the missing places are to be occupied by simulacra made of metal or wood. The text

---

stops abruptly from going in instead teaches six sets of ve tion" or "encouragement" (āś the six chief deities: Vajrasattv Padmanarteśvara, Vajrasūrya, technical term used here do meaning as in the context of a ritual assurance of the newl ciant. Rather, the sets of ver of praises, doctrinal matters, and myth (for an example, 155–156).

Chapter 6

This chapter returns to the to ship and teaches further det the ritual space, preparing th substances to be used (inclu other transgressive substanc songs and dances that are the mantras to be recited. S the same context, the rest c verses that are more charact ritual. The disciple is led bli maṇḍala, he is made to ca affinity with a clan of deities goddess is mentioned), the and he is sprinkled with wa the transgressive substance vows, and is instructed not ascetic practices but to enjo ing sin. The disciple then wo puts him into a state of poss efits of this practice are prai

Chapter 7

The chapter begins with places for practice and/c maṇḍala, with customizat clans. Various details for c are given: shape, size, and each of the six chief deities rite are discussed. The disci is granted, provided that fee. This is described in fu dearest should be offered, is then ransomed with an offerings include livestoc chariots. The disciple is th Elements of the drawn as the symbols to be use of the deities and the im Although texts such as t sion, but nothing in the middle wed by an interpretation of the eturns to describing Vajrasattva, ssion and dispassion, both desire three times, the three worlds, hod taught here is said to grant . liberation) in a single lifetime.

rnal deities such as cast images ovingly, as a true seeker obtains he seeker's own person, in this ntinues much in the same vein, ood is reached through pleasure e is no need for ascetic practices havior, deeds, or diet. Instead, uld maintain self-identification n men of small merit will thus ent, and they incur no sin, what-ame applies to women as well.

njoy the sense objects and worg sensual pleasures is continn the enjoyment of women, for er will become irresistible. He fly in their company and will universal emperor.

with extolling the benefits of ngs of the scripture. All kinds natural powers will be enjoyed ncluding taking the consorts of ā, Viṣṇu, Śiva, and Kāma) and devotees. He will become able of the Buddha.

initial verses, chapter 5 intro-t significant innovations of the practice of communal worship akra, but here gaṇamaṇḍala). njoined to host this event on a nonthly, or yearly, presumably . The practice is essentially an ntheon, or rather, one of the hat the text teaches. Should cipants not reach the desired missing places are to be occu-de of metal or wood. The text stops abruptly from going into further detail and instead teaches six sets of verses called "consolation" or "encouragement" (āśvāsa), one for each of the six chief deities: Vajrasattva, Vairocana, Heruka, Padmanarteśvara, Vajrasūrya, and Paramāśva. The technical term used here does not have the same meaning as in the context of initiation, where it is a ritual assurance of the newly initiated by the officiant. Rather, the sets of verses contain a mixture of praises, doctrinal matters, practical injunctions, and myth (for an example, see Sanderson, 2009, 155–156).

Chapter 6

This chapter returns to the topic of communal worship and teaches further details, such as setting up the ritual space, preparing the participants and the substances to be used (including human blood and other transgressive substances in a skull-bowl), the songs and dances that are to be performed, and the mantras to be recited. Seemingly discussed in the same context, the rest of the chapter contains verses that are more characteristic of the initiation ritual. The disciple is led blindfolded in front of the maṇḍala, he is made to cast a flower to establish affinity with a clan of deities (although here a single goddess is mentioned), the blindfold is removed, and he is sprinkled with water. He is made to taste the transgressive substances, is given pledges and vows, and is instructed not to torture himself with ascetic practices but to enjoy pleasure without fearing sin. The disciple then worships the officiant, who puts him into a state of possession (āveśa). The benefits of this practice are praised.

Chapter 7

The chapter begins with recommending various places for practice and/or for constructing the maṇḍala, with customizations for each of the six clans. Various details for constructing the maṇḍala are given: shape, size, and colors. After praises of each of the six chief deities, aspects of the initiation rite are discussed. The disciple requests entry, which is granted, provided that he has paid the requisite fee. This is described in further detail: whatever is dearest should be offered, including one's wife, who is then ransomed with an appropriate sum. Other offerings include livestock, jewelry, clothing, and chariots. The disciple is then given a tiara (makuṭa). Elements of the drawn maṇḍala are given, such as the symbols to be used for the physical shape of the deities and the implements that they hold. Although texts such as the Sarvakalpasamuccaya or Ānandagarbha's Vajrajvālodayā Sādhanopayikā describe the subsidiary retinue in detail, the Śaṃvara itself does not offer a clear-cut description or even a precise enumeration of any deities with the exception of the six principal ones.

Chapter 8

The initial verses describe various gestures displayed to honor the six chief deities and to overpower Brahmanical gods. After this, a verse claims that all gestures described in dramatic treatises (nṛtyaśāstra) are gestures pertaining to Vajrasattva. The rest of the chapter describes further gestures and their respective benefits.

Chapter 9

The penultimate chapter makes up more than half of the entire text with nearly six hundred verses. It is at the same time the worst transmitted portion of the manuscript, with a large passage altogether omitted. This is available in Tibetan, and at least one verse can be recovered from a quotation (Wedemeyer, 2007, 373–374).

According to the numerous topical colophons, the chapter deals primarily with mudrās. However, here the term does not simply mean hand gestures, although a large number of these are also taught. The semantic range of the word is much extended to include iconographical implements, bodily postures, the color of deities, modes and articles of worship, sounds, types of gazes and smiles, spells, songs (in both Sanskrit and Apabhramsha), doctrinal outlooks that the practitioner should adopt, scales and rhythmical patterns, secret sign language, secret code words, and much other miscellaneous material.

Chapter 10

The final chapter is not available in Sanskrit, but it can be reconstructed relatively easily. It is rather short and teaches nothing truly new, as most verses here are simply reiterations of clichés from previous passages. The last two verses represent the exception; these can be recovered from a quotation (Tanaka, 2010, 648–649).

The Pantheon

The Śaṃvara itself does not describe the iconography of its deities lucidly. What is clear is that there are six maṇḍalas headed by each of the six chief deities. When these are arranged in a super maṇḍala, it is presumably the chief deity of the respective practitioner who takes center stage; the affinity between the practitioner and one of the six deities is established during initiation. There is some evidence to suggest that the *maṇḍala*s were also worshipped separately (Tanaka, 2010, 339). Clearer descriptions of the precise number of the respective retinues (usually 20, but one family, that of Paramāśva, has 22), their mantras and iconographical description can be found in the Sarvakalpasamuccaya and various satellite texts. The pantheon has been shown to be an expanded version of that of the Paramādya (Tomabechi, 2007, 919–921; Tanaka, 2010, 337–340).

Compared to other tantric cycles, portrayal of the pantheon in paintings or statuary is relatively scarce. One very significant group of artifacts in this respect is a hoard of bronze statuettes from Surocolo (Java, Indonesia), which was identified by Keiji Matsunaga as remains of a three-dimensional maṇḍala of the Vajrasattva family (discussed in Tanaka, 2010, 339).

Bibliography

Bhattacharya, B., Sādhanamālā, 2 vols., Baroda, 1925–1928.

Chakravarti, C., Guhyasamājatantrapradīpodyotanaṭīkā-ṣaṭkoṭīvyākhyā (sic), Patna, 1984.

Dalton, J., & S. van Schaik, Tibetan Tantric Manuscripts from Dunhuang: A Descriptive Catalogue of the Stein Collection at the British Library, Leiden, 2006.

Davidson, R.M., Indian Esoteric Buddhism: A Social History of the Tantric Movement, New York, 2002.

Dwivedi, V., & S. Rinpoche, Mahāmāyātantram with Guṇavatī by Ratnākaraśānti, Sarnath, 1992.

Giebel, R., "The Chin-kang-ting ching yü-ch'ieh shih-pa-hui chih-kuei: An Annotated Translation," NBKK 18, 1995, 107–201.

Griffiths, A., A.G.J.S. Sanderson & P.-D. Szántó, The Sarvabuddhasamāyogaḍākinījālaśaṁvara, forthcoming.

Isaacson, H., "A Collection of Hevajrasādhanas and Related Works in Sanskrit," in: E. Steinkellner, D. Qing & H. Krasser, eds., Sanskrit Manuscripts in China, Beijing, 2009, 89–136.

Kanaoka, S., "Kukurāja," IBK 15/1, 1966, 8–17.

Kikuya Ryūta (菊谷竜太), "Guhyasamājatantra Jñānapādaryū no kenkyū" (Guhyasamājatantra Jñānapāda 流の研究; A Study in the Guhyasamājatantra Jñānapāda School), KDKK 4, 2000, 1.

Lévi, S., "Rapport de M. Sylvain Lévi, professeur au Collège de France, sur sa mission dans l'Inde et le Japon," CRAIBL, 1899, 71–92; repr. in: L. Renou, ed., Mémorial Sylvain Lévi, Paris, 1937, 257–270.

Luo, H., & T. Tomabechi, Candrakīrti's Vajrasattvaniṣpādanasūtra (Vajrasattvasādhana): Sanskrit and Tibetan Texts, Vienna, 2009.

Moriguchi Mitsutoshi (森口光俊), "Tattvasiddhināmaprakaraṇa I. – shoin kyōron –" (Tattvasiddhināmaprakaraṇa I. – 所引経論 –; Scriptures and Commentaries Cited in the Tattvasiddhināmaprakaraṇa I), IMK, Kyoto, 1993, 157–199.

Sanderson, A.G.J.S., "The Śaiva Age: The Rise and Dominance of Śaivism during the Early Medieval Period," in: S. Einoo, ed., Genesis and Development of Tantrism, Tokyo, 2009, 41–349.

Sugiki, T., "A Critical Study of the Vajraḍākamahātantrarāja (I): Chapter 1 and 42," JCS 65, 2002, 81–115.

Szántó, P.-D., "Before a Critical Edition of the Sampuṭa," in: C. Cüppers, R. Mayer & M. Walter, eds., Tibet after Empire: Culture, Society and Religion between 850–1000: Proceedings of the Seminar Held in Lumbini, Nepal, March 2011, Lumbini, 2013, 343–365.

Szántó, P.-D., "Review: David B. Gray, the Cakrasamvara Tantra (The Discourse of Śrī Heruka): A Study and Annotated Translation," TS 1, 2008, 215–219.

Tanaka Kimiaki (田中公明), Indo ni okeru Mandara no Seiritsu to Hatten (インドにおける曼荼羅の成立と発展; Genesis and Development of the Maṇḍala in India), Tokyo, 2010.

Tanaka Kimiaki (田中公明), "Kongojō shōgon tantora no seiritu to Indo mikkyōshijō ni okeru ichii" (『金剛場荘厳タントラ』の成立とインド密教史上における位置; The Date of Composition of the Śrīvajramaṇḍalālaṃkāra (sic) and Its Position in the History of Indian Tantric Buddhism), TBKK 152, 2007, 400–381.

Tomabechi, T., "The Extraction of mantra (mantroddhāra) in the Sarvabuddhasamāyogatantra," in: B. Kellner, H. Krasser, H. Lasic, M.T. Much & H. Tauscher, eds., Pramāṇakīrtiḥ: Papers Dedicated to Ernst Steinkellner on the Occasion of His 70th Birthday (Part 2), Vienna, 2007, 903–923.

Tomabechi, T., "Étude du Pañcakrama: Introduction et traduction annotée," diss., University of Lausanne, 2006.

Tribe, A.H.F., "The Names of Wisdom: A Critical Edition and Annotated Translation of Chapter 1–5 of Vilāsavajra's Commentary on the Nāmasaṃgīti, with Introduction and Textual Notes," diss., Oxford University, 1994.

Wedemeyer, C., Āryadeva's Lamp That Integrates the Practices (Caryāmelāpakapradīpa): The Gradual Path of Vajrayāna Buddhism according to the Esoteric Community Noble Tradition, New York, 2007.

Woodward, H., "Bianhong, Mastermind of Borobudur?," PW 3/11, 2009, 26–60.

Péter-Dániel Szántó
Arlo Griffiths

S

The Mahāyāna sūtra entitle saṃgraha (Compendium Tathāgatas) is said to have ta the second half of the 7th c Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi, in 2005, 44). Sarvatathāgatat tathāgatas) refers to tantric dha's awakening (see Horiu the scripture refers to itsel its contents are typically ta practices, rituals, and maṇḍ are highly systematized in tantric scriptures that appea its impacts on later tantric t (Inui, 2004; Kawasaki, 2005)
For instance, the scriptu of visualizing a buddha's w vajra through which one as a buddha. This tantric identification triggered the tantric practices and its ic the five buddha families (se impact on the later tantras With regard to these pio ture is considered a milesto dhist tantric literature. *
cent.) classifies this text as a the basis for the later tantri est yoga class (yoganiruttar In the Japanese Shin
this scripture has been t the Vairocanābhisaṃbodh have been referred to as " tures" (ryōbutaikyō [両 impact of the Vairocanā the course of time in Ind Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgr itself in the mainstream of

Sources

In Sanskrit this work is av palm-leaf manuscript of 1 served in the Kesar Library in post-Gupta or Siddham s

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

i, Candrakīrti's Vajrasattvaniṣpādana- dhana): Sanskrit and Tibetan Texts, (森口光俊), "Tattvasiddhināma-yōron –" (Tattvasiddhināmaprakaraṇa riptures and Commentaries Cited in naprakaraṇa I), IMK, Kyoto, 1993,

e Śaiva Age: The Rise and Dominance
Early Medieval Period," in: S. Einoo,
elopment of Tantrism, Tokyo, 2009,

udy of the Vajraḍākamahātantrarāja " JCS 65, 2002, 81–115.
Critical Edition of the Sampuṭa," in:
& M. Walter, eds., Tibet after Empire:
Religion between 850–1000: Proceed-
Held in Lumbini, Nepal, March 2011, 65.
David B. Gray, the Cakrasamvara e of Śrī Heruka): A Study and Anno-1, 2008, 215–219.
公明), Indo ni okeru Mandara no ンドにおける曼荼羅の成立と発 elopment of the Maṇḍala in India), 公明), "Kongojō shōgon tantora no shijō ni okeru ichii" (『金剛場荘厳 とインド密教史上における位置;

n of the Śrīvajramaṇḍalālaṃkāra (sic) History of Indian Tantric Buddhism), 81. raction of mantra (mantroddhāra) samāyogatantra," in: B. Kellner, M.T. Much & H. Tauscher, eds., Dedicated to Ernst Steinkellner on th Birthday (Part 2), Vienna, 2007,

Pañcakrama: Introduction et tra-, University of Lausanne, 2006. s of Wisdom: A Critical Edition and n of Chapter 1–5 of Vilāsavajra's āmasaṃgīti, with Introduction and
xford University, 1994.
a's Lamp That Integrates the Prac-pradīpa): The Gradual Path of ccording to the Esoteric Community ork, 2007. ng, Mastermind of Borobudur?",

PÉTER-DÁNIEL SZÁNTÓ
ARLO GRIFFITHS

Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha

The Mahāyāna sūtra entitled Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha (Compendium of the Reality of All Tathāgatas) is said to have taken its primary shape in the second half of the 7th century, slightly after the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi, in South India (Yoritomi, 2005, 44). Sarvatathāgatatattva (the reality of all tathāgatas) refers to tantric methods to attain a buddha's awakening (see Horiuchi, 1983, 23). Although the scripture refers to itself as a Mahāyāna sūtra, its contents are typically tantric and teach tantric practices, rituals, and *maṇḍala*s. Its tantric features are highly systematized in comparison with those tantric scriptures that appeared before this text, and its impacts on later tantric texts are clearly traceable (Inui, 2004; Kawasaki, 2005).

For instance, the scripture teaches the practice of visualizing a buddha's wisdom in the form of a vajra through which one then identifies oneself as a buddha. This tantric yoga technique of self-identification triggered the later developments of tantric practices and its iconographical system of the five buddha families (see below) and had a deep impact on the later *tantra*s (see below).

With regard to these pioneering roles, this scripture is considered a milestone in the history of Buddhist tantric literature. *Buddhaguhya (late 8th cent.) classifies this text as a yogatantra that acted as the basis for the later tantric scriptures of the highest yoga class (yoganiruttaratantra).

In the Japanese Shingon (真言) tradition, this scripture has been transmitted along with the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi, and together they have been referred to as "the pair of great scriptures" (ryōbutaikyō [両部大經]). While the impact of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi faded in the course of time in India, the tradition of the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha firmly established itself in the mainstream of Indic tantric traditions.

Sources

In Sanskrit this work is available in the form of a palm-leaf manuscript of 150 folios, currently preserved in the Kesar Library in Kathmandu, written in post-Gupta or Siddham script sometime between the 9th and the 10th century. Two facsimile editions have been published, and a recent apograph of the manuscript was also published as a facsimile edition (for these three facsimile editions, see Tsukamoto et al., 1989, 189). Horiuchi Kanjin (1974 and 1983) and I. Yamada (1979) published editions on the basis of the same palm-leaf manuscript.

A Tibetan translation of the text, entitled De bzhin gshegs pa thams cad kyi de kho na nyid bsdus pa (D 479/P 112), was produced by Rin chen bzang po (954–1055) and the Kashmiri Śraddhākaravarman in the 10th or 11th century. The translation corresponds well with the Sanskrit text.

There are three Chinese translations:

1. Jin'gangding yugazhong luechu niansong jing (金剛頂瑜伽中略出念誦經, The Sūtra Extracted from and Recited in the Vajra-Peak Yoga[tantra]; T. 866) by Vajrabodhi (Chn. Jin'gangzhi [金剛智]; 671–741 CE);
2. Jin'gangding yiqie rulai zhenshishe dasheng xianzheng dajiaowang jing (金剛頂一切如來真實攝大乘現證大教王經; The Vajra-Peak: The Compendium of the Reality of All Tathāgatas and the Realization of the Great Vehicle, Beings the Scripture of the Great King of Teachings; T. 865; trans. Giebel, 2006) by Amoghavajra (Chn. Bukong [不空]; 705–774 CE); and
3. Yiqie rulai zhenshishe dasheng xianzheng sanmei dajiaowang jing (一切如來真實攝大乘現證三昧大教王經; The Compendium of the Reality of All Tathāgatas and the Meditative Stabilization of Realization of the Great Vehicle, Beings the Scripture of the Great King of Teachings; T. 882) by Dānapāla (Chn. Shihu [施護];?–1017).

Among these three, the most full-fledged translation corresponding to the respective Sanskrit and Tibetan texts is that of Dānapāla, which was translated in 1015. The text of Amoghavajra's rendering, dated to 753/754, is an equivalent to chapters 1–5 of the Sanskrit text. Vajrabodhi's version of 723 is actually less a translation than a manual for tantric practice and an initiation ritual on the basis of the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha. Concerning their respective dates, Vajrabodhi's is the earliest among the three and thereby serves as a terminus ante quem for the scripture's existence – precisely

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill speaking, the terminus ante quem is 720, the year of Amoghavajra's arrival at Changan (長安; because he would have had the Sanskrit manuscript of the text in hand when he arrived).

Commentaries by Indian Authors

There are three Indic commentaries on the scripture available:

1. the Tantrārthāvatāra (D 2501/P 3324) of *Buddhaguhya (late 8th cent.);
2. the Kosalālaṃkāra (D 2503/P 3326) of Śākyamitra (8th–9th cents.); and
3. the Tattvālokakarī (D 2510/P 3333) of Ānandagarbha (8th–9th cents.).

While Śākyamitra and Ānandagarbha gloss the words of the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha one by one, *Buddhaguhya gives an overview and analyzes the entire contents of the scripture. The interpretational differences of the three pertain to, for instance, iconographic issues. Especially Ānandagarbha's iconographical interpretations can be traced in maṇḍala images of Buddhist monasteries in Western Tibet and Southeast Asia (Yoritomi, 2005, 58–59). Later in Tibet, Bu ston Rin chen grub (1290–1364) would call these three main commentators "yogatantra experts" (Inui, 2004, 5).

Furthermore, additional sādhanas and manuals of maṇḍala rituals connected with this scripture are found in the Tanjur. Among them, Ānandagarbha's Sarvavajrodaya (D 2516/P 3339) is important in view of its rich contents and due to the fact that Sanskrit fragments of the original are available. The Sarvavajrodaya is said to share striking features with Vajrabodhi's Chinese translation (Yoritomi, 2005, 58).

Title

The title Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha is rendered by Amoghavajra as Jin'gangding yiqie rulai zhenshishe dasheng xianzheng dajiaowang jing, in which "yiqie rulai zhenshishe" (一切如來真實攝) is equivalent to Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha and "dasheng xianzheng" (大乘現證) stands for Mahāyānābhisamaya (Realization of the Great Vehicle), the title of the first part (chs. 1–5) of the scripture; "jin'gangding" (金剛頂; Skt. vajraśekhara [vajra peak]) does not directly stem from the scripture itself, although the Japanese Shingon tradition uses this title and calls the scripture Kongōchōkyō (金剛頂經; Inui, 2004, 7–9).

What then is this Jin'gangding jing? According to Vajrabodhi, it is a set of tantric scriptures with the extent of 100,000 stanzas and consists of 18 different scriptures. This huge corpus is outlined in the Jin'gangding yugajing shibahui zhigui (金剛頂瑜伽經十八會指歸; Essential Points of the 18 Settings of the Vajra-Peak Yogatantra; abbreviated to Shibahui zhigui; T. 869; the translation is attributed in the text itself to Amoghavajra). The Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha is listed as the first of these 18 scriptures and thus referred to in the Shingon tradition as the Sho'e kongōchōkyō (初會金剛頂經; First Setting [hui (會)] of the Vajraśekhara]) or Shorter Vajraśekhara.

On the basis of the outline provided in the Shibahui zhigui, both the second and third settings of the Jin'gangding jing are identified as the Vajraśekharatantra (D 480/P 113), the fourth as the Trailokyavijayakalparāja (D 482/P 115), the fifth as the Durgatipariśodhana (D 483; 485/P 116; 117), the sixth to the eighth as the Śrīparamādya (D 488; 490/P 120; 123), the ninth as the Sarvabuddhasamāyogaḍākinījālaśaṃvara (D 366/P 8), the 13th as the Āryasarvatathāgatādhiṣṭhānahṛdayaguhyadhātukaraṇḍamudrānāmadhāraṇīmahāyānasūtra (D 883/P 141, 508), the 15th as the Guhyasamājatantra, and the 16th as the Sarvatathāgatacittajñānaguhyārthagarbhavyūhavajratantrasiddhiyogāgamasamājasarvavidyāsūtramahāyānābhisamayadharmaparyāyavyūhanāmasūtra (T. 887; D 452/P 87; Kawasaki, 2005, 19); the 10th to the 12th, the 17th, and the 18th are yet to be identified. The Shibahui zhigui bears witness that urtexts of these 18 scriptures had existed before the time of Amoghavajra.

Contents

According to the structural analysis of the entire text by Ānandagarbha and Śākyamitra, the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha consists of five parts: the preamble (nidāna), the main part (mūlatantra), the manuals of ritual and practice (uttaratantra), the supplemental manuals (uttarottaratantra), and the closing part (upasaṃhāra). The main part is further divided into four subparts (called mahākalparāja): chapters 1–5 (sarvatathāgatamahāyānābhisamaya), chapters 6–14 (sarvatathāgatavajrasamaya), chapters 15–18 (sarvatathāgatadharmasamaya), and chapters 19–22 (sarvatathāgatakarmasamaya). In Shingon tradition, the four subparts are called Kongōkaibon (金剛界品; The Text Part Thematizing the Vajradhātu; Skt. Vajradhātu), Gōzanzebon

(降三世品; The Text Pa
duer of the Triple Worl Henchōbukubon (遍調伏品 ing the Conqueror of the jagadvinaya), and Issai
The Text Part Thematizi
One; Skt. Sarvārthasidd scripture are concerned practices, with a few e ters 1 and 6, which teac Sarvārthasiddhi's awake quest of non-Buddhist entire text can be summa

Preamble

Vairocana abides in his heavenly realm. He is bodhisattvas, and his nu praised by all tathāgatas.

Chapters 1–5

All tathāgatas approach siddhi, who rests on the the Bodhi tree) and has b ascetic practice called āsph ing meditative stabilizatio sarvatathāgatatattva (real is the five-step visualizat awakening of buddhas see below). Sarvārthasi supreme awakening a Vajradhātu. He then re the palace on the peak receiving empowermen four buddhas (Akṣobhya, and Amoghasiddhi) and re maṇḍala from the lunar teen bodhisattvas, the eight offering deities, and thus visualizing 37 deitie the same maṇḍala in the

On request of all ta Vajradhara explains the the Vajradhātu maṇḍala ciated with the maṇḍal tiation, and the disciples obtained from initiation. on the four mudrās (the expressing maṇḍala deit seal; i.e. body gesture), seal; i.e. hand gestures p vows), dharmamudrā

Jin'gangding jing? According set of tantric scriptures with stanzas and consists of 18 dif-is huge corpus is outlined in gajing shibahui zhigui (金剛 ; Essential Points of the 18 ra-Peak Yogatantra; abbrevi-gui; T. 869; the translation is t itself to Amoghavajra). The saṃgraha is listed as the first and thus referred to in the Shinho'e kongōchōkyō (初會金剛頂 (會)] of the Vajraśekhara]) or
.

the outline provided in the h the second and third set-ding jing are identified as the D 480/P 113), the fourth as the rāja (D 482/P 115), the fifth as na (D 483; 485/P 116; 117), the as the Śrīparamādya (D 488; inth as the Sarvabuddhasamā-ra (D 366/P 8), the 13th as the dhiṣṭhānahṛdayaguhyadhātu-dhāraṇīmahāyānasūtra (D 883/s the Guhyasamājatantra, and atathāgatacittajñānaguhyārth antrasiddhiyogāgamasamājaānābhisamayadharmaparyāya-87; D 452/P 87; Kawasaki, 2005, h, the 17th, and the 18th are yet Shibahui zhigui bears witness 8 scriptures had existed before ajra.

uctural analysis of the entire a and Śākyamitra, the Sarva-raha consists of five parts: the the main part (mūlatantra), and practice (uttaratantra), the ls (uttarottaratantra), and the hāra). The main part is further parts (called mahākalparāja): thāgatamahāyānābhisamaya), tathāgatavajrasamaya), chaphāgatadharmasamaya), and arvatathāgatakarmasamaya).
, the four subparts are called 品; The Text Part Thematiz-Skt. Vajradhātu), Gōzanzebon

(降三世品; The Text Part Thematizing the Subduer of the Triple Worlds; Skt. Trailokyavijaya), Henchōbukubon (遍調伏品; The Text Part Thematizing the Conqueror of the Entire World; Skt. Sakalajagadvinaya), and Issaigijōjubon (一切義成就品; The Text Part Thematizing the All-Accomplishing One; Skt. Sarvārthasiddhi). Most parts of the scripture are concerned with describing maṇḍala practices, with a few exceptions such as chapters 1 and 6, which teach the dramatic scenes of Sarvārthasiddhi's awakening and Vajrapāṇi's conquest of non-Buddhist deities, respectively. The entire text can be summarized as follows.

Preamble

Vairocana abides in his palace in the Akaniṣṭha heavenly realm. He is surrounded by countless bodhisattvas, and his numerous manifestations are praised by all tathāgatas.

Chapters 1–5

All tathāgatas approach the bodhisattva Sarvārthasiddhi, who rests on the Bodhi throne (i.e. under the Bodhi tree) and has been devoting himself to an ascetic practice called āsphānakasamādhi (unfluctuating meditative stabilization). They instruct him on the sarvatathāgatatattva (reality of all tathāgatas), which is the five-step visualization to attain the supreme awakening of buddhas (pañcākārābhisaṃbodhi; see below). Sarvārthasiddhi quickly attains the supreme awakening and becomes a tathāgata, Vajradhātu. He then rests on the lion throne in the palace on the peak of Mount Sumeru. After receiving empowerment, he is surrounded by four buddhas (Akṣobhya, Ratnasaṃbhava, Amitābha, and Amoghasiddhi) and reveals the vajradhātu(mahā)maṇḍala from the lunar disc in his heart – the sixteen bodhisattvas, the four pāramitā deities, the eight offering deities, and the four gatekeepers. After thus visualizing 37 deities, he then makes manifest the same maṇḍala in the reality of this world.

On request of all tathāgatas, the bodhisattva Vajradhara explains the procedures of establishing the Vajradhātu maṇḍala – the performances associated with the maṇḍala ritual, the process of initiation, and the disciples' accomplishments (siddhi) obtained from initiation. He gives further instructions on the four mudrās (the four kinds of methods for expressing maṇḍala deities): mahāmudrā (the great seal; i.e. body gesture), samayamudrā (the pledge seal; i.e. hand gestures permitted to those who hold vows), dharmamudrā (the dharma seal; i.e. the mantra), and karmamudrā (the action seal; i.e. gestures that express the deities' actions), followed by miscellaneous instructions on ritual procedures.

This completes the explanation of the first maṇḍala, the vajradhātumahāmaṇḍala, and is simultaneously the basic structure of each of the following chapters. This pattern is repeated for the other 27 maṇḍalas in the following chapters.

This basic structure consists of four parts: visualization, initiation, the four mudrās (caturmudrā), and miscellaneous instructions. The visualization in turn consists of three processes: the preparatory visualization (ādiyoga), the visualization of producing the maṇḍala deities (maṇḍalarājāgrī), and the visualization of self-identification with the central deity of the maṇḍala (karmarājāgrī).

After these instructions on the mahāmaṇḍala (da mantuluo [大曼荼羅]) of Vajradhātu in the first chapter, chapters 2–5 teach the other five types of maṇḍalas of Vajradhātu: the guhyamaṇḍala/samayamaṇḍala, dharmamaṇḍala/sūkṣmamaṇḍala, karmamaṇḍala, caturmudrāmaṇḍala, and ekamudrāmaṇḍala, each of which again exhibits the same basic structure mentioned above (i.e. visualization, initiation, the four mudrās, and miscellaneous instructions). Since the names of this sixfold model are not consistently referred to in the scripture itself, I follow the names attested in the associated Chinese and Japanese commentarial traditions. The Sanskrit equivalents of these Chinese expressions are attested in the Sanskrit of the scripture itself.

In the mahāmaṇḍala, all 37 deities are depicted in human form (buddhas, bodhisattvas, etc.); in the samayamaṇḍala, they are represented as dhāraṇīs (in the form of female deities); in the dharmamaṇḍala, they are illustrated as meditating; and in the karmamaṇḍala, they are represented as offering deities. The caturmudrāmaṇḍala and ekamudrāmaṇḍala are abbreviated versions of the mahāmaṇḍala.

Chapters 1–5 thus teach the Vajradhātu maṇḍala in six different forms. This set of six is likewise associated with the sets of six in the other three kalpas – governed by Trailokyavijaya, Sakalajagadvinaya, and Sarvārthasiddhi – each of which is taught in chapters 6–14, 15–18, and 19–22, respectively. Furthermore, chapters 6–14 have four additional maṇḍalas, called ājñāmaṇḍala* (commanding maṇḍala; kyōchoku maṇḍala [教勅曼荼羅]) in the Shingon tradition: trilokacakramahāmaṇḍala, sarvavajrakulavajramaṇḍala, sarvavajrakuladharmasamayamaṇḍala, and sarvavajrakulakarmamaṇḍala.

Chapters 1–5	Chapters 6–14	Chapters 15–18	Chapters 19–22
mahāmaṇḍala	mahāmaṇḍala	mahāmaṇḍala	mahāmaṇḍala
samayamaṇḍala	samayamaṇḍala	samayamaṇḍala	samayamaṇḍala
dharmamaṇḍala	dharmamaṇḍala	dharmamaṇḍala	dharmamaṇḍala karmamaṇḍala	karmamaṇḍala	karmamaṇḍala	karmamaṇḍala
caturmudrāmaṇḍala	caturmudrāmaṇḍala	caturmudrāmaṇḍala	caturmudrāmaṇḍala
ekamudrāmaṇḍala	ekamudrāmaṇḍala	ekamudrāmaṇḍala	ekamudrāmaṇḍala
	Four ājñāmaṇḍalas

Chapters 6–14

Requested by all tathāgatas, Vajrapāṇi manifests himself in a wrathful appearance to subdue the non-Buddhist deities headed by Maheśvara. Vajrapāṇi, displaying his vajra weapon, commands Maheśvara to take refuge in the three jewels, but Maheśvara gets angry and does not follow his command. Vajrapāṇi receives the permission from the tathāgatas to recite a subduing mantra (huṃ/hūṃ). Upon its recitation, Maheśvara is subdued and dies. Vajrapāṇi thus frightens the other non-Buddhist deities, subjugates them to the Buddha's teaching, and resurrects Maheśvara with a mantra (vajrāyuḥ).

Next follows a description of the six kinds of maṇḍala, closely repeating what was taught in chapters 1–5 (from the mahāmaṇḍala up to the ekamudrāmaṇḍala), however replacing the maṇḍala deities with Trailokyavijaya and his various wrathful manifestations. To this are added the descriptions of four kinds of ājñāmaṇḍalas (chs. 11–14).

Chapters 15–18

Requested by all tathāgatas, Bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara teaches the six kinds of maṇḍala as mentioned above, replacing the maṇḍala deities with Avalokiteśvara and his various manifestations.

Chapters 19–22

Requested by all tathāgatas, Bodhisattva Ākāśagarbha teaches the same six maṇḍalas, replacing the maṇḍala members with Ākāśagarbha and his various manifestations.

Chapters 23–25

These chapters are called uttaratantra and explain the procedures for the rituals and practices taught in the main part (mūlatantra, i.e. chapters 1–22). Chapter 23 teaches those associated with the mahāmaṇḍala, chapter 24 those associated with the dhāraṇīmaṇḍala, and chapter 25 those associated with the dharmamaṇḍala and the karmamaṇḍala.

Chapter 26

This final chapter, called uttarottaratantra, explains the maṇḍalas of the five buddha families and miscellaneous rituals.

The Closing Part

Conforming to the the needs of the world, Vairocana displays his activity of awakening thisworldly beings and teaches the practice of the five-step visualization.

Visualization

The five-step visualization (pañcākārābhisaṃbodhi) as taught in chapter 1 has close parallels to the well-known scenes of Gautama Siddhārtha's awakening under the Bodhi tree. The name of the bodhisattva Sarvārthasiddhi paraphrases Siddhārtha, and the name of the ascetic meditation āsphānakasamādhi abandoned by Sarvārthasiddhi is the same as the one abandoned by Siddhārtha before his awakening. The present scripture thus paraphrases the scenes of awakening in the life of Siddhārtha. However, it replaces the method of awakening with the central practice of this scripture: the five-step visualization, which brought about Sarvārthasiddhi's/Siddhārtha's awakening. The five steps are the following:

1. one visualizes one's own mind as a lunar disk;
2. one confirms that the lunar disk is naturally luminous and is nothing but the resolve to become a buddha (bodhicitta);
3. on the lunar disk, one visualizes a vajra, which symbolizes a buddha's wisdom;
4. all buddhas enter the practitioner's body and mind via the vajra, and the practitioner's mind (the lunar disk) and buddha's wisdom (the vajra) unite; and
5. the practitioner confirms that he himself is nothing but Vairocana.

Two further visualizations follow after this preparatory visualization (ādiyoga): the visualization of producing the 37 (maṇḍalarājāgrī) and the of the practitioner and t maṇḍala (karmarājāgrī).

Maṇḍala

This scripture teaches 28 the 5 buddhas, who in tur 16 bodhisattvas, 4 perfect ing deities (pūjādevī), and number of the deities in Vajradhātu refers to Vairo vajra (i.e. buddha's wisdon ment (dhātu) and who is lo Vajradhātu maṇḍala. The ated with cardinal directi families, mudrās (hand ges

According to Bodhiva
the Vajraśekharatantra, colors of the five buddhas blue, yellow, red, and gre buddha's fivefold wisdom ādarśajñāna, samatājñāna kṛtyānuṣṭhānajñāna), wh ent functions of a buddh beginning with the aspec his compassion aspect (t been precisely stated in including the Mahāyānas
The five buddhas ride on horse, peacock, and Garu

The four buddhas (all rounded by 16 bodhisa

Five buddhas	Di
Vairocana (1)	ce
Akṣobhya (2)	ea
Ratnasaṃbhava (3)	so
Amitābha (4)	w
Amoghasiddhi (5)	nc

The 16 bodhisattvas

Vajra family
Vajrasattva (6)
Vajrarāja (7)
Vajrarāga (8)
Vajrasādhu (9)

Chapters 19–22
mahāmaṇḍala samayamaṇḍala dharmamaṇḍala karmamaṇḍala
a caturmudrāmaṇḍala ekamudrāmaṇḍala

lled uttarottaratantra, explains five buddha families and mise the needs of the world, his activity of awakening thiseaches the practice of the five-ation (pañcākārābhisaṃbodhi) has close parallels to the well-tama Siddhārtha's awakening

. The name of the bodhisattva aphrases Siddhārtha, and the meditation āsphānakasamādhi rthasiddhi is the same as the ddhārtha before his awakening.
e thus paraphrases the scenes life of Siddhārtha. However, it of awakening with the central ure: the five-step visualization, Sarvārthasiddhi's/Siddhārtha's steps are the following:
ne's own mind as a lunar disk; hat the lunar disk is naturally is nothing but the resolve to ha (bodhicitta);
k, one visualizes a vajra, which ddha's wisdom;
er the practitioner's body and ra, and the practitioner's mind ) and buddha's wisdom (the d r confirms that he himself is rocana.
lizations follow after this pren (ādiyoga): the visualiza-

---

tion of producing the 37 deities of the maṇḍala (maṇḍalarājāgrī) and the visualization of the unity of the practitioner and the central deity of the maṇḍala (karmarājāgrī).

Maṇḍala

This scripture teaches 28 maṇḍalas. Their core is the 5 buddhas, who in turn are surrounded by the 16 bodhisattvas, 4 perfections (pāramitā), 8 offering deities (pūjādevī), and the 4 gatekeepers – the number of the deities in total is accordingly 37. Vajradhātu refers to Vairocana, who possesses the vajra (i.e. buddha's wisdom) as his fundamental element (dhātu) and who is located at the center of the Vajradhātu maṇḍala. The five buddhas are associated with cardinal directions, samayas (symbols), families, mudrās (hand gestures), and mantras.

According to Bodhivajra, Amoghasiddhi, and the Vajraśekharatantra, among others, the body colors of the five buddhas are, in order, white, dark blue, yellow, red, and green; these five represent a buddha's fivefold wisdom (i.e. dharmadhātujñāna, ādarśajñāna, samatājñāna, pratyavekṣaṇajñāna, and kṛtyānuṣṭhānajñāna), which expresses five different functions of a buddha's intellectual activities, beginning with the aspect of his awakening up to his compassion aspect (the last four of which had been precisely stated in classical Yogācāra works, including the Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkāra [IX.67–76]). The five buddhas ride on five beings: lion, elephant, horse, peacock, and Garuḍa.

The four buddhas (all but Vairocana) are surrounded by 16 bodhisattvas (nos. 6–21), while Vairocana is surrounded by four pāramitā (perfection) deities (nos. 21–25). Vairocana worships the four buddhas through the internal four offering (pūjā) deities (nos. 26–29), while the four buddhas make offerings to Vairocana through the external four offering deities (nos. 30–33). The four gatekeepers protect the gates of the four directions of the maṇḍala (nos. 34–37).

The four pāramitā deities are Sattvavajrī (22), Ratnavajrī (23), Dharmavajrī (24), and Karmavajrī (25).

The eight offering deities are Vajralāsyā (26), Vajramālā (27), Vajragītā (28), Vajranṛtyā (29), Vajradhūpā (30), Vajrapuṣpā (31), Vajrālokā (32), and Vajragandhā (33).

The four gatekeepers are Vajrāṅkuśa (34), Vajrapāśa (35), Vajrasphoṭa (36), and Vajrāveśa (37).

Formation

This scripture reinterprets a buddha's awakening in terms of tantric visualization and utilizes the scenes of Śākyamuni Buddha's awakening as its motif. The stance of this reinterpretation is particularly similar to that of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi.

Inui Hitoshi (1998) summarizes previous studies on the Mahāyāna forerunners of this scripture. These include the Buddhāvataṃśaka, which teaches that Vairocana is a universal buddha, the Suvarṇaprabhāsottama and the Guanfo sanmei jing (觀佛三昧經; The Sūtra of Meditative Stabilization in which One Visualizes Buddhas; T. 643), which teach the primary iconographic form of the five buddhas, the sūtras that explicitly refer to Akṣobhya, such as the Akṣobhyavyūha and Mahāparinirvāṇamahāsūtra,

Five buddhas	Direction	Family	Symbol	Mudrā	Mantra
Vairocana (1)	center	Buddha	stūpa	jñānamuṣṭi	vaṃ
Akṣobhya (2)	east	Vajra	vajra	bhūmisparśa	hūṃ
Ratnasaṃbhava (3)	south	Ratna	maṇi	dāna	traḥ
Amitābha (4)	west	Dharma	padma	dhyāna	hrīḥ
Amoghasiddhi (5)	north	Karman	viśvavajra	abhayadāna	aḥ

The 16 bodhisattvas

Vajra family	Ratna family	Padma family	Karma family
Vajrasattva (6)	Vajraratna (10)	Vajradharma (14)	Vajrakarma (18)
Vajrarāja (7)	Vajratejas (11)	Vajratīkṣṇa (15)	Vajrarakṣa (19)
Vajrarāga (8)	Vajraketu (12)	Vajrahetu (16)	Vajrayakṣa (20)
Vajrasādhu (9)	Vajrahāsa (13)	Vajrabhāṣa (17)	Vajrasandhi (21)

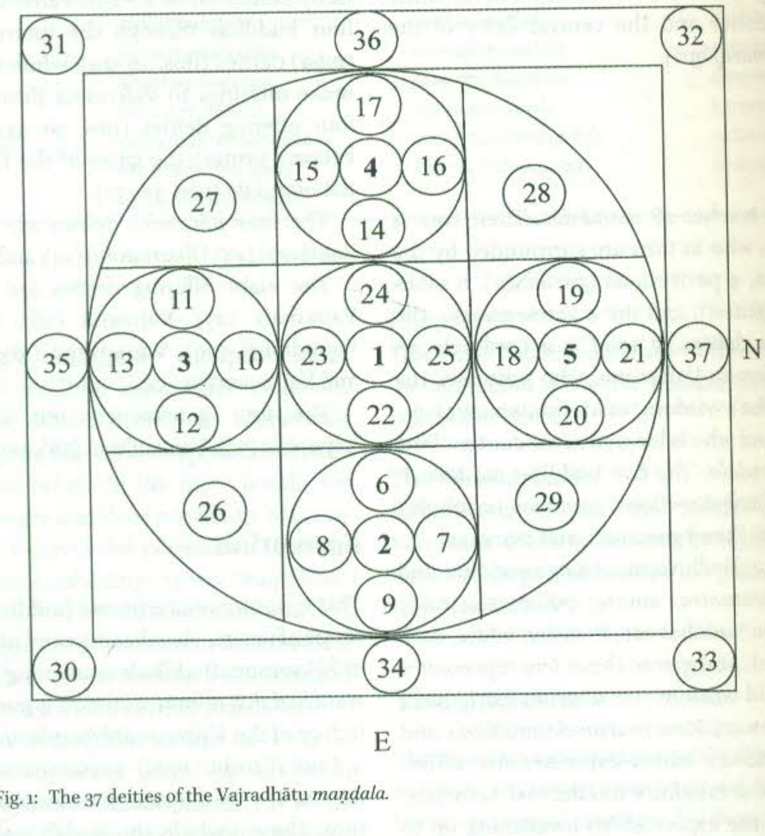

Fig. 1: The 37 deities of the Vajradhātu maṇḍala.

Fig. 2: The Vajradhātu maṇḍala in the Rnam thar sgo gsum chapel of the South Sakya Monastery (see Kano & Kawasaki, 2011).

---

the Tathāgataguhyaka, wh terizes Vajrapāṇi, the S chapter of the Saddharmap Avalokiteśvara's various ma kīrtinirdeśa, which mentio aprahasitapramuditendriya the primary form of the b this scripture), and the sūtr doctrine, which provide notions that are regarded scripture. It is also evide influenced by earlier tantri Vajrapāṇyabhiṣeka and th as well as by non-Budd Devīmāhātmya.

From an iconographica buddhas are said to have de statues of the Buddha, Aval (or alternatively the Bud Inui, 1998; Yoritomi, 2005;

Influence on Later I

Influences of this scripture opments are significant (T to yogatantra texts, for in tantra is regarded as a vy Tantra) on the Sarvatathāg
the Trailokyavijayamahāk the Sarvadurgatipariśodh P 121; T. 939) are classified b of chapters 6–14 of the Sarv
Moreover, the Adhyar [理趣經]) shares a num with this scripture, incl tive opening sentences. est yogatantra texts ( Māyājālatantra teaches t esoteric form with plural Guhyasamājatantra repl Vairocana with Akṣobhya and six arms.

Spread in South As

Several sources suggest t took shape in South Indi spread of its worship to stone statues of Vairocan at Udayagiri and Ratnag regions in which some c tery (see Kano & Kawasaki, 2011).

the Tathāgataguhyaka, which specifically characterizes Vajrapāṇi, the Samantamukhaparivarta chapter of the Saddharmapuṇḍarīka, which teaches Avalokiteśvara's various manifestations, the Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, which mentions the bodhisattva Nityaprahasitapramuditendriya (who is regarded as the primary form of the bodhisattva Vajrahāsa of this scripture), and the sūtras of the buddha-nature doctrine, which provide the basic philosophical notions that are regarded as a background of this scripture. It is also evident that this scripture is influenced by earlier tantric literature, including the Vajrapāṇyabhiṣeka and the Amoghapāśakalparāja, as well as by non-Buddhist texts such as the Devīmāhātmya.

From an iconographical point of view, the five buddhas are said to have developed from the triad of statues of the Buddha, Avalokiteśvara, and Vajrapāṇi (or alternatively the Buddha, Brahmā, and Indra; Inui, 1998; Yoritomi, 2005; Tanaka, 2010).

Influence on Later Developments

Influences of this scripture on the later tantric developments are significant (Tanaka, 2010). With regard to yogatantra texts, for instance, the Vajraśekharatantra is regarded as a vyākhyātantra (Explanatory Tantra) on the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha, whereas the Trailokyavijayamahākalparāja (D 482/P 115) and the Sarvadurgatipariśodhana (D 485/P 117; D 489/P 121; T. 939) are classified by Bu ston as vyākhyātantras of chapters 6–14 of the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha. Moreover, the Adhyardhaśatikā (or Rishukyō [理趣經]) shares a number of striking features with this scripture, including even their respective opening sentences. With regard to the highest yogatantra texts (yoganiruttaratantra), the Māyājālatantra teaches the five buddhas in a more esoteric form with plural heads and arms, and the Guhyasamājatantra replaces the central figure of Vairocana with Akṣobhya in a form with three heads and six arms.

Spread in South Asia

Several sources suggest that this scripture originally took shape in South India (Yoritomi, 2005, 44). The spread of its worship to eastern India is attested by stone statues of Vairocana of the Vajradhātu found at Udayagiri and Ratnagiri in Odisha as well as in regions in which some commentators of this scripture are known to have been active. Its spread up to Kashmir is known from its Tibetan translators (see above) and from what is called the Kashmiri style of Vajradhātu maṇḍalas depicted on murals of monasteries in Ladakh and West Tibet.

Spread in Tibet

Although the tradition of this scripture had been known in Tibet through both its commentaries and its initiation ritual during the Imperial Period in the late 8th to early 9th centuries, Rin chen bzang po's (954–1055) role in the transmission of this scripture is significant (Kawagoe, 1983). He translated the scripture itself as well as its commentaries in collaboration with his Kashmiri teacher Śraddhākaravarman. Tibetan Buddhist traditions in general have focused more on later tantric scriptures, such as the Guhyasamāja, Cakrasaṃvara, Hevajra, and Kālacakra, but they regard this scripture as one of the fundamental tantras – Bu ston's Rnal 'byor rgyud kyi rgya mtshor 'jug pa'i gru gzins, for instance, includes a detailed exposition of this scripture (Weinberger, 2003), and Tsong kha pa Blo bzang grags pa's (1357–1419) Sngags rim chen mo maintains that the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha is the root for all yogatantras (Yoritomi, 2005, 350).

The Vajradhātu maṇḍala has been found in several mural paintings in Tibet that date back to the 11th century CE, including those in Ladakh, Spiti, and Guge, as well as in the Rnam thar sgo gsum chapel of the South Sakya Monastery (see above), in the Gzhal yas khang palace in the Zha lu Monastery from the 14th century, and in the Dpal 'khor chos sde Temple at Gyantse of around the 15th century. Among these, those in Zha lu and Dpal 'khor chos sde preserve all the 28 maṇḍalas. The tradition of the initiation ritual based on this scripture continues to date in Tibetan Buddhism.

Spread in East Asia

China

Kūkai (空海; 774–835 CE) in his Himitsu mandalakyō fuhōden (秘密曼荼羅教付法傳; see Teihon Kōbōdaishi zenshū [定本弘法大師全集], vol. I) lists the eight propagators of tantric teaching: (1) Vairocana, (2) Vajrasattva, (3) Nāgārjuna (龍猛菩薩), (4) Longzhi pusa (龍智菩薩), (5) Vajrabodhi (金剛智), (6) Amoghavajra (不空), (7) Huiguo (恵果; 746–806 CE), and finally (8) Kūkai. Among them, Vajrabodhi transmitted the tradition of this scripture from India to China by translating practice and ritual manuals including the Jin'gangding yugazhong luechu niansong jing (金剛頂瑜伽中略出念誦經; T. 866) and the Jin'gangding yuga xiuxi piluzhena sanmadefa (金剛頂瑜伽修習毗盧遮那三摩地法; T. 876). Amoghavajra's partial translation corresponds to chapters 1–5 (Jin'gangjie pin [金剛界品]) of the Sanskrit text, while Dānapāla's translation includes the full text (T. 882).

Fig. 3: Tibetan sand maṇḍala of the Vajradhātu maṇḍala prepared for an initiation ritual performed by the Dalai Lama (Kōyasan University, 2012).

The spread of worship of this scripture into China is known from evidence such as a scroll manuscript containing a collection of drawings of the deities of the vajradhātumaṇḍala, entitled Wubu xinguan (五部心觀; Visualization of the Essence of the Five [Buddha] Families), and a square relics case covered with gold and unearthed from the Famen si (法門寺; Famen Temple) in Shanxi province (陜西), Fuhui county (扶回). The scroll manuscript contains drawings of the deities of the six *maṇḍala*s in chapters 1–5, transmitted to China by Śubhākarasiṃha (or Śubhakarasiṃha; Chn. Shanwuwei [善無畏]; 673–735). A copy of this manuscript was given to Enchin (圓珍; 814–891) by Faquan (法全; fl. 800–870) in 855 at the Qinglong Monastery (青龍寺) in Chang'an and was brought to Japan by Enchin, where it is preserved until today. The relics case is from the period of the Tang (唐) dynasty, and its four sides feature reliefs of the four buddhas and the 16 bodhisattvas, whereas its top side features those of Vairocana and the four pāramitā deities.

Japan

The Shōsōin monjo (正倉院文書), an old manuscript collection written between 736 and 756 CE and held at the Tōdaiji (東大寺), contains a copy of Bodhivajra's translation/manual (T. 866), and Senkei (仙憬) of the Saidaiji (西大寺) borrowed the manuscripts of the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha and of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi from the Tōdaiji in 772 as lecture materials (Ishida, 1966). It was Kūkai who systematically transmitted the tradition of this scripture from China Shingon tradition establish Amoghavajra's translation source of the Sarvatathāgat Kūkai brought a number the tantric tradition from scripts and maṇḍala drawi two brief commentaries, e the Sarvatathāgatatattvas kōbōdaishi zenshū, vol. IV including the Sokushinjōb Teihon kōbōdaishi zenshū, quotes passages from thi it as one of the most imp pairing it with the Vairo Kūkai, this scripture has re nificant tantric scriptures traditions of Shingon and T oped their own interpretat (圓仁; 794–864) in his com (金剛頂經疏) introduces of Yuanzheng (元政; 8th Vairocana of the Sarvat with Śākyamuni of the Sad

---

Bibliography

Giebel, R.W., Two Esoteric Sutr
Sutra/The Susiddhikara Sutr Horiuchi Kanjin (堀内寛仁), chōkyō no kenkyū: Bonbon k 剛頂経の研究 梵本校訂篇
1983.
Inui Hitoshi (乾仁志), et al., tr mikkyōbu 4 (新国訳大蔵経 Inui Hitoshi (乾仁志), "Sho'e aru daijōbukkyō: Nyoraizō sh tion ritual performed by r Śubhakarasiṃha; Chn. Shan-3–735). A copy of this manu-nchin (圓珍; 814–891) by Faquan 1 855 at the Qinglong Monastery n and was brought to Japan by preserved until today. The relics od of the Tang (唐) dynasty, and reliefs of the four buddhas and

, whereas its top side features nd the four pāramitā deities.

正倉院文書), an old manuscript etween 736 and 756 CE and held 寺), contains a copy of Bodhi-manual (T. 866), and Senkei i (西大寺) borrowed the manu-atathāgatatattvasaṃgraha and isaṃbodhi from the Tōdaiji in rials (Ishida, 1966). It was Kūkai transmitted the tradition of this scripture from China to Japan. The Japanese Shingon tradition established by him basically takes Amoghavajra's translation as the main scriptural source of the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha.

Kūkai brought a number of precious materials of the tantric tradition from China, including manuscripts and maṇḍala drawings, and also composed two brief commentaries, entitled kaidai (解題), on the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha (see Teihon kōbōdaishi zenshū, vol. IV). In his major works, including the Sokushinjōbutsugi (即身成佛義; see Teihon kōbōdaishi zenshū, vol. III), he repeatedly quotes passages from this scripture and regards it as one of the most important tantric scriptures, pairing it with the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi. After Kūkai, this scripture has remained one of most significant tantric scriptures in the esoteric Buddhist traditions of Shingon and Tendai, which have developed their own interpretations. For instance, Ennin (圓仁; 794–864) in his commentary Kongōchōkyōso (金剛頂經疏) introduces the doctrinal position of Yuanzheng (元政; 8th cent.), who identifies Vairocana of the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha with Śākyamuni of the Saddharmapuṇḍarīka.

Bibliography

Giebel, R.W., Two Esoteric Sutras: The Adamantine Pinnacle Sutra/The Susiddhikara Sutra, Berkeley, 2006.

Horiuchi Kanjin (堀内寛仁), Bonzōkan taishō sho'e kongōchōkyō no kenkyū: Bonbon kōteihen (梵蔵漢対照 初会金剛頂経の研究 梵本校訂篇), Koyasan, vol. I, 1974; vol. II, 1983.

Inui Hitoshi (乾仁志), et al., trans., Shin kokuyaku daizōkyō mikkyōbu 4 (新国訳大蔵経密教部 4), Tokyo, 2004.

Inui Hitoshi (乾仁志), "Sho'e kongōchōkyō no haikei ni aru daijōbukkyō: Nyoraizō shisō to no kankei o chūshin ni" (『初会金剛頂経』の背景にある大乗仏教: 如来蔵思想との関係を中心に), in: Matsunaga Yūkei (松長有慶), ed., Indo mikkyō no keisei to tenkai: Matsunaga Yūkei koki kinen ronshū (インド密教の形成と展開：松長有慶古稀記念論集), Kyoto, 1998, 39–57.

Ishida, Mosaku (石田茂作), Shakyō yori mitaru nara bukkyō no kenkyū (写経よりみたる奈良仏教の研究), Tokyo, 1966.

Kano Kazuo (加納和雄) & Kawasaki Kazuhiro (川崎一洋), "Sakya minamidera sangedatsumon dō no rekishi to hekiga mandara" (サキャ南寺・三解脱門堂の歴史と壁画曼荼羅), MBu 224, 2011, 5–29.

Kawagoe Eishin (川越英真), "Rin chen bzaṅ po no shōgai to sono katsudō" (Rin chen bzaṅ po の生涯とその活動), Bunka 文化 46/1–2, 1983, 44–73.

Kawasaki Kazuhiro (川崎一洋), "Shinjitsushōkyō: Kōkimikkyō no genryū" (『真実摂経』: 後期密教の源流, in: Matsunaga Yūkei (松長有慶), ed., Indomikkyō jō: Hōben futantra kei no mikkyō (インド後期密教〈上〉方便・父タントラ系の密教), Tokyo, 2005, 13–36.

Tanaka Kimiaki (田中公明), Indo ni okeru mandara no seiritsu to hatten (インドにおける曼荼羅の成立と発展), Tokyo, 2010.

Teihon Kōbōdaishi zenshū (定本弘法大師全集), publ. Kōyasan University, vols. I–XII, Wakayama, 1991–1997.

Tsukamoto Keishō (塚本啓祥), Matsunaga Yūkei (松長有慶) & Isoda Horofumi (磯田熙文), Bongo butten no kenkyū IV mikkyō kyōtenhen (梵語仏典の研究 IV 密教経典編), Kyoto, 1989.

Weinberger, S.N., "The Significance of Yoga Tantra and the Compendium of Principles (Tattvasaṅgraha Tantra) within Tantric Buddhism in India and Tibet," diss., University of Virginia, 2003.

Yamada, Isshi, Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha nāma mahāyānasūtra, ŚPS 262, New Delhi, 1979.

Yoritomi Motohiro (頼富本宏), Kongōchokyō nyūmon: Sokushinjōbutsu e no michi (『金剛頂経』入門—即身成仏への道), Tokyo, 2005.

KAZUO KANO

Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi

The Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi (Vairocana's Awakening), composed before 674 CE, is one of the earliest scriptures with the specific features of tantric Buddhism (specifically with regard to doctrine, meditative practice, ritual, and iconography), and bridges the gap between earlier and less developed tantric literatures (e.g. Dhyānottarapaṭala, Subāhuparipṛcchā, Susiddhikara, and Vajrapāṇyabhiṣeka) and full-fledged tantras (e.g. Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha). In the late 8th century CE, Buddhaguhya classified the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi as caryātantra (or ubhayatantra) and the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha as yogatantra. While the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi gradually faded in importance in South Asia after the tradition of the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha became predominant, the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi together with the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha have remained a set of fundamental scriptures in East Asia after the late 8th century CE, for this reason the two being referred to as a set in Japanese as ryōbu taikyō (両部大経), the two great scriptures.

Sources

The Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi is more fully titled Mahāvairocanābhisaṃbodhivikurvitādhiṣṭhānavaipulyasūtrendrarājanāmadharmaparyāya (Dharma Discourse Called "Mahāvairocana's Awakening and His Empowerment of Miracles," King of the Best of the Extensive Scriptures; see also, Ochi, 1998). Although it is often called Vairocanābhisaṃbodhitantra by later Indian commentators, the work does not call itself a tantra. It stresses, however, its continuity within the Mahāyāna tradition. The Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi in its original Sanskrit is not extant, though fragments are preserved (Sakurai, 1989, 181; Wedemeyer, 2007, 388–390, etc.). The full text of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi is known only in the form of Chinese and Tibetan translations.

The Chinese translation (T. 848; Da piluzhe'na chengfo shenbian jiachi jing [大毘盧遮那成佛神變加持經]) is credited to the Indian monk Śubhākarasiṃha (or Śubhakarasiṃha; Chn. Shanwuwei [善無畏]; 673–735 CE) and his Chinese disciple Yixing (一行; 683–727 CE) in Fuxian near Xi'an in 725 CE. But according to Yijing's (義浄; 635–713 CE) record of his travels (see Yamamoto, 2012, 88) and the scripture catalogue Kaiyuan shijiao lu (釋經錄; T. 2154, vol. LV, 572a) composed in 730 CE, the terminus ante quem of the text is 674 CE. Both of these sources relate the story of the Chinese monk Wuxing (無行), who died in India when he was setting out to return to China in 674 CE. The Sanskrit manuscripts that Wuxing collected, among them the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi, were brought back to China at the behest of the Chinese emperor.

The Tibetan translation (D 494/P 126; Rnam par snang mdzad chen po mngon par rdzogs par byang chub pa rnam par sprul pa byin gyis rlob pa shin tu rgyas pa mdo sde'i dbang po'i rgyal po zhes bya ba'i chos kyi rnam grangs) is credited to Śīlendrabodhi and Dpal brtsegs in the early 9th century CE. It is listed in the Lhan dkar ma and Phang thang ma catalogues, which were compiled during the Imperial Period (9th cent. CE).

The Chinese and Tibetan translations have a number of differences, probably due to differences in their respective Indian sources:

1. The Chinese translation includes the Uttaratantra (see below) and append it to the basic text of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi, the so-called Mūlatantra, while the Tibetan does not;
2. The Chinese translation has 31 chapters (excluding the Uttaratantra), while the Tibetan translation has 29 chapters; and
3. the order of chapters is different.

English translations of the Chinese text were published by C. Yamamoto (1990) and R. Giebel (2005), and the Tibetan text was translated into English by S. Hodge (2003). Japanese translations of Chinese and Tibetan texts and previous studies are concisely surveyed by Y. Matsunaga (2010).

Commentaries by Indian Authors

Four originally Sanskrit commentaries on the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi have come down to us: two by Śubhākarasiṃha (extant in Chinese translation) and two by Buddhaguhya (late 8th to early 9th cents. CE; extant in Tibetan translation).

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

Śubhākarasiṃha's comme Mūlatantra and the Uttara dictated by Śubhākarasiṃh ten down by his disciple Yixi 725 CE and 727 CE, respectiv Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi was Yixing died. It is preserved in draft version (Da piluzhe'na 盧遮那成佛經疏]; T. 1796)
by Zhiyan (智儼) and Wen chengfo shenbian jiachi jing 變加持經義釋]; see Matsuna draft version was carried fron Shingon patriarch Kūkai ( the revised version was tran monks Ennin (圓仁; 794– (圓珍; 814–891 CE). Śubhā tary on the Uttaratantra ent gongyang cidi fa shu (大毘 T. 1797) was dictated by Śu written down by, the Kor (不可思議; fl. 8th cent. CE).

Buddhaguhya's commer Vairocanābhisaṃbodhitantr snang mdzad mngon par r pa'i rgyud kyi bsdus pa'i don; opsis translated into Tibeta tury CE by Śīlendrabodhi an the Vairocanābhisambodhivi tantrabhāṣya (Rnam par sn byang chub pa rnam par spru rgyud chen po'i bshad pa; D 2 mentary translated in the ear The latter commentary (2) w nu dpal in 1461 and is foun (P 3490) but not in the Derg

Ritual Manuals by In

One of the earliest rit Vairocanābhisambodhi is t is originally an independen (pūjāvidhi) and, as mention the Vairocanābhisambodhi tion (T. 848). The Uttarata Tibetan (D 2664: almost sin sion), which is separate fro Vairocanābhisambodhi (D ship is attributed to Dpal bz manuals of the Vairocanābh ccording to Yijing's (義淨; 635– travels (see Yamamoto, 2012, e catalogue Kaiyuan shijiao lu LV, 572a) composed in 730 CE, m of the text is 674 CE. Both of the story of the Chinese monk died in India when he was set-China in 674 CE. The Sanskrit uxing collected, among them bodhi, were brought back to f the Chinese emperor. lation (D 494/P 126; Rnam par o mngon par rdzogs par byang rul pa byin gyis rlob pa shin tu bang po'i rgyal po zhes bya ba'i

s) is credited to Śīlendrabodhi the early 9th century CE. It is kar ma and Phang thang ma ere compiled during the Impe-CE).
Tibetan translations have a es, probably due to differences dian sources:
anslation includes the Uttara- elow) and append it to the he Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi, the tantra, while the Tibetan does nslation has 31 chapters (exclud-antra), while the Tibetan transhapters; and apters is different.

of the Chinese text were puboto (1990) and R. Giebel (2005), was translated into English by anese translations of Chinese d previous studies are concisely naga (2010).

by Indian Authors

nskrit commentaries on the dhi have come down to us: ṃha (extant in Chinese trans-Buddhaguhya (late 8th to early in Tibetan translation).

Śubhākarasiṃha's commentaries deal with the Mūlatantra and the Uttaratantra. The first was dictated by Śubhākarasiṃha himself and written down by his disciple Yixing, probably between 725 CE and 727 CE, respectively the years that the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi was translated and that Yixing died. It is preserved in two versions: Yixing's draft version (Da piluzhe'na chengfo jing su [大毘盧遮那成佛經疏]; T. 1796) and a revised version by Zhiyan (智儼) and Wengdu (溫古; Piluzhe'na chengfo shenbian jiachi jing yishi [毘盧遮那成佛神變加持經義釋]; see Matsunaga, 2010, 54). Yixing's draft version was carried from China to Japan by the Shingon patriarch Kūkai (空海; 774–835 CE), while the revised version was transmitted by the Tendai monks Ennin (圓仁; 794–864 CE) and Enchin (圓珍; 814–891 CE). Śubhākarasiṃha's commentary on the Uttaratantra entitled Da piluzhena jing gongyang cidi fa shu (大毘盧遮那經供養次第法疏; T. 1797) was dictated by Śubhākarasiṃha to, and written down by, the Korean monk Pulga Saŭi (不可思議; fl. 8th cent. CE).

Buddhaguhya's commentaries are (1) the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhitantrapiṇḍārtha (Rnam par snang mdzad mngon par rdzogs par byang chub pa'i rgyud kyi bsdus pa'i don; D 2662), a kind of synopsis translated into Tibetan in the early 9th century CE by Śīlendrabodhi and Dpal brtsegs, and (2) the Vairocanābhisambodhivikurvitādhiṣṭhānamahātantrabhāṣya (Rnam par snang mdzad mngon par byang chub pa rnam par sprul pa'i byin gyis brlabs kyi rgyud chen po'i bshad pa; D 2663), an extensive commentary translated in the early 9th century CE as well. The latter commentary (2) was later revised by Gzhon nu dpal in 1461 and is found in the Peking Tanjur (P 3490) but not in the Derge edition.

Ritual Manuals by Indian Authors

One of the earliest ritual manuals of the Vairocanābhisambodhi is the Uttaratantra, which is originally an independent Sanskrit ritual manual (pūjāvidhi) and, as mentioned above, appended to the Vairocanābhisambodhi in its Chinese translation (T. 848). The Uttaratantra is also available in Tibetan (D 2664: almost similar to the Chinese version), which is separate from the basic text of the Vairocanābhisambodhi (D 494) and whose authorship is attributed to Dpal bzang rab dga'. Other ritual manuals of the Vairocanābhisambodhi are:

1. the Da Piluzhe'na fo shuo yaolue niansong jing (大毘盧遮那佛說要略念誦經; T. 849) translated by Bodhivajra [菩提金剛]);
2. the Darijing chisong cidi yigui (大日經持誦次第儀軌; T. 860; trans. unknown);
3. the He da piluzhe'na chengfo shenbian jiachi jing ru lianhua taicang haihui beisheng mantuluo guangda niansong yigui gongyang fangbianhui (攝大毘盧遮那成佛神變加持經入蓮華胎藏海會悲生曼荼羅廣大念誦儀軌供養方便會; T. 850) translated by Śubhākarasiṃha;
4. the Da piluzhe'na jing guangda yigui (大毘盧遮那經廣大儀軌; T. 851) translated by Śubhākarasiṃha;
5. the Rnam par snang mdzad kyi sgrub pa'i thabs kyi cho ga (the Vairocanasādhanopāyikā* by Jayaprabha; D 2665; trans. unknown).

Contents

The Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi is for the most part a dialogue between Vairocana and Vajrapāṇi. Among its 31 (in Tibetan 29) chapters, the first focuses on philosophical/doctrinal aspects, while the following chapters deal with practices of meditation and worship.

Chapter 1: After a narrative representation of the setting of the discourse in which Vairocana is sitting on a lion-throne surrounded by 19 vajradharas ("the holders of vajra [thunderbolt, diamond, etc.]") and four bodhisattvas (Samantabhadra, Maitreya, Mañjuśrī, and Sarvāvaraṇaviṣkambhin), Vairocana teaches at the request of Vajrapāṇi that bodhicitta (the resolve to become a buddha) is the cause of the Buddha's wisdom or omniscient gnosis (sarvajñajñāna) with compassion as its bedrock. This notion is epitomized by the name of the maṇḍala of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi: the mahākaruṇāgarbhodbhavamaṇḍala* (dabei taicang sheng manchaluo [大悲胎藏生漫荼羅]; the maṇḍala arisen from the matrix of great compassion). It is partly for this reason that the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi is often regarded as a scripture focusing on compassion, in contrast to the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha, which is regarded as focusing on wisdom, these two being the standard pair of concepts central to Mahāyāna soteriology. Vairocana also teaches that bodhicitta is to be sought in one's own mind, not elsewhere. In reply to Vajrapāṇi, who asks how to generate bodhicitta, Vairocana explains that one generates bodhicitta by comprehending the various levels of philosophical/doctrinal understanding, including the mundane (laukika, i.e. non-Buddhist) ones and the supramundane (lokottara, i.e. Buddhist).

Chapter 2: Replying to Vajrapāṇi's request, Vairocana teaches a series of procedures for the performance of maṇḍala worship leading to omniscient wisdom.

Chapter 3: Vajrapāṇi asks Vairocana three questions: (1) how does one overcome obstacles in order to perform maṇḍala worship?; (2) how does one accomplish mantra recitation?; and (3) what is the result? Replying to (1), Vairocana explains the procedure for invoking Acala (a wrathful deity), who removes obstacles.

Chapter 4: Replying to (2), Vairocana imparts 121 kinds of mantras for various deities.

Chapters 5–7: Replying to (3), Vairocana explains the procedure for realizing mundane accomplishments (siddhi) and supramundane accomplishments – paralleling a passage in the Dhyānottarapaṭala (D 808), one of the scriptures that precedes the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi (Sakai, 1973). In chapter 6, Vairocana imparts one of the most central mantras in the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi, "namaḥ samantabuddhānāṃ āḥ vīra hūṃ khaṃ," which was uttered by all attending deities at the moment of the Buddha's awakening under the Bodhi tree, and describes the practice of mantranyāsa: the application of the mantra's seed syllables (i.e. a, va, ra, ha, and kha) to the practitioner's body, which transform the practitioner into Vairocana himself (see also below).

Chapter 8: Vairocana shows the maṇḍala of mahākaruṇāgarbhodbhava in which deities take the shape of seed syllables (bījas).

Chapter 9: Vairocana teaches more than 130 kinds of mudrās (ritual hand gestures) of deities.

Chapter 10: Vairocana gives instructions for the meditation on the circle (mālā) of 108 syllables/letters (akṣaras), beginning with the core seed syllables a, sa, and va (i.e. Buddha, padma, and vajra).

Chapter 11: Vairocana explains that the core syllable a is the fundamental cause for the rise of the universe and gives instructions for the meditation on the five cakras (meeting points of the subtle energy channels). He also describes the mahākaruṇāgarbhodbhava as a maṇḍala in which deities take the shape of symbolic icons (samayas) as well.

Chapter 12: Vairocana explains the procedure of initiation into the secret maṇḍala – that is, imaginally placing the seed syllable ra to the disciple's body, thereby purifying all obscurations.

Chapter 13: Vairocana describes the internal maṇḍala, which is to be realized in one's own mind. This maṇḍala consists of four buddhas (Ratnaketu, Saṃkusumitarāja, Dundubhighoṣa, and Amitābha) and four bodhisattvas (Samantabhadra, Maitreya, Mañjuśrī, and Sarvāvaraṇaviṣkambhin) sitting on a lotus flower with eight petals.

Chapter 14: Vairocana teaches the mudrās and mantras of each of the four buddhas and four bodhisattvas.

Chapter 15: Vairocana clarifies the six-month practice of keeping vows (vratas).

Chapter 16: Vairocana defines the characteristics of a master (ācārya), who should comprehend the seed syllable a as the quintessence of reality and as the origin of all other seed syllables.

Chapter 17: Vairocana illustrates the application (nyāsa) of 34 seed syllables on the practitioner's own body, through which he will attain awakening.

Chapter 18: Vairocana discloses the discipline of the bodhisattvas (śikṣāpada).

Chapter 19: Vairocana imparts the hundred seed syllables as originating from the seed syllable a.

Chapter 20: Vairocana describes the omnipresence of Śākyamuni's compassionate activities as resulting from the hundred seed syllables.

Chapter 21: Vairocana explains that the world emanating from the seed syllable a is in reality nothing but one's own mind immersed in emptiness.

Chapter 22: Vairocana clarifies the meanings of 32 seed syllables and equates them with the 32 aspects of Mahāpuruṣa ("The Great One," i.e. the Buddha).

Chapter 23: Vairocana discloses that the seed syllable a is Vairocana as well.

Chapter 24: Vairocana explains that the seed syllable a, the lord of mantras, is all pervasive and does not need any other support, like space, and that one will reach buddhahood by not conceptualizing it.

Chapter 25: Vairocana defines two sets of trisamaya (translated e.g. as "three vows"). The first set comprises (1) nonexistence of nature/phenomena, (2) disregard of conceptualization, and (3) compassion. The second set is (1) Buddha, (2) dharma, and (3) saṅgha.

Chapter 26: Vairocana defines the bodhisattva as one who seeks awakening, being free from all conceptualizations, and tathāgata as one who destroys ignorance by means of wisdom.

Chapter 27: Vairocana divides the homa (fire ritual) into two categories: (1) the external homa consisting of 44 non-Buddhist types and 12 Buddhist types, and (2) the internal homa that is to be performed within one's own mind.

Chapter 28: Vairocana concentration in which t with deities that have the symbolic icons, and huma of two kinds: with form an

Chapter 29: With resp centration, Vairocana tea should understand every emptiness.

Chapter 30: Vairocana
mantra-recitation practic

Chapter 31: Vairocana d prospective disciples. Ha the assembly, on their req mantra for the benefit of to the mantra, the assem indebtedness to Vairocan

Vairocana

Iconographically, statues him as a bodhisattva w crown (jaṭāmukuṭa), an monk shape). This is be dha who represents the i very moment of awaken dha) under the Bodhi tre in the Vairocanābhisaṃ (a vīra hūṃ khaṃ) is prais as Brahmā, for Śākyamu demons (mārā; Sakai, 197 scriptures, such as Mah refer to Śākyamuni by h Luminous One" (Ōtake, confirms a close relatio Vairocana.

Mantranyāsa

The Vairocanābhisaṃb
are taught in chapters 5, (Otsuka, 1993). Beside m a distinct practice is the tice of adornment of the lables (goji gonshin kan the Shingon tradition). sages are separately tau the Vairocanābhisaṃbo together as depicting a s this practice as a kind o of mantras on one's own places five seed syllables (the initial syllables of t airocana describes the internal to be realized in one's own mind. sists of four buddhas (Ratnaketu, Dundubhighoṣa, and Amitābha) ttvas (Samantabhadra, Maitreya, vāvaraṇaviṣkambhin) sitting on a eight petals.

irocana teaches the mudrās and of the four buddhas and four airocana clarifies the six-month g vows (vratas).

rocana defines the characteristics ya), who should comprehend the the quintessence of reality and as her seed syllables.
irocana illustrates the application syllables on the practitioner's own ich he will attain awakening. irocana discloses the discipline of (śikṣāpada). irocana imparts the hundred seed ating from the seed syllable a. airocana describes the omnipres-uni's compassionate activities as e hundred seed syllables. airocana explains that the world he seed syllable a is in reality nothmind immersed in emptiness. irocana clarifies the meanings of 32 d equates them with the 32 aspects
"The Great One," i.e. the Buddha). irocana discloses that the seed sylna as well.
airocana explains that the seed syl-f mantras, is all pervasive and does er support, like space, and that one ahood by not conceptualizing it.
Vairocana defines two sets of tri- ed e.g. as "three vows"). The first set nexistence of nature/phenomena, conceptualization, and (3) compas-set is (1) Buddha, (2) dharma, and airocana defines the bodhisattva as wakening, being free from all con-and tathāgata as one who destroys ans of wisdom.

Vairocana divides the homa (fire categories: (1) the external homa non-Buddhist types and 12 Buddhist he internal homa that is to be per-ne's own mind.

Chapter 28: Vairocana describes the meditative concentration in which the practitioner is equated with deities that have the shapes of seed syllables, symbolic icons, and human forms – each of which is of two kinds: with form and formless.

Chapter 29: With respect to the formless concentration, Vairocana teaches that the practitioner should understand everything as characterized by emptiness.

Chapter 30: Vairocana describes the variety of mantra-recitation practices.

Chapter 31: Vairocana defines the qualification of prospective disciples. Having been worshipped by the assembly, on their request, Vairocana imparts a mantra for the benefit of the world. Having listened to the mantra, the assembly expresses its profound indebtedness to Vairocana.

Vairocana

Iconographically, statues of Vairocana often depict him as a bodhisattva wearing twisted hair as a crown (jaṭāmukuṭa), and not as a buddha (i.e. a monk shape). This is because Vairocana is a buddha who represents the image of Śākyamuni at the very moment of awakening (i.e. becoming a buddha) under the Bodhi tree. This is explicitly stated in the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi. Vairocana's mantra (a vīra hūṃ khaṃ) is praise by mundane deities, such as Brahmā, for Śākyamuni who has just conquered demons (māra; Sakai, 1973, 84–86). Moreover, earlier scriptures, such as Mahāvastu, Buddhāvataṃsaka, refer to Śākyamuni by his epithet Vairocana, "The Luminous One" (Ōtake, 2013, 226–227); this also confirms a close relation between Śākyamuni and Vairocana.

Mantranyāsa

The Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi's mantra practices are taught in chapters 5, 6, 10, 16, 17, 19–24, and 28 (Otsuka, 1993). Beside mantra-recitation practices, a distinct practice is the mantranyāsa or the practice of adornment of the body by the five seed syllables (goji gonshin kan [五字嚴身觀] according to the Shingon tradition). Although the relevant passages are separately taught in different chapters of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi, when they are taken together as depicting a system, we can understand this practice as a kind of mantranyāsa (placement of mantras on one's own body parts), in which one places five seed syllables of Vairocana, a va ra ha kha (the initial syllables of the core mantra a vīra hūṃ khaṃ), on five parts of the one's own body, comprehends the syllables as being five elements and as having five shapes, and finally realizes himself as identical with Vairocana (see below).

Syllable	Element	Shape	Body part a	earth	square	lower body va	water	round	belly
ra	fire	triangle	heart
ha	wind	half-moon	between the eyebrows kha	space	jewel	top of head

This practice has been transmitted in East Asia as one of the most significant related to the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi, because it clearly teaches the identification of a practitioner with a buddha in this life/body (what is referred to especially in the Shingon school as sokushin jōbutsu [即身成仏]; "becoming a buddha in this very body"). This idea is distinguished from the traditional Mahāyāna doctrine in which one can reach awakening only after practice lasting three aeons (kalpas). Although the idea that one can become a buddha in this very life had already been taught in earlier tantric literature, such as in the Amoghapāśakalparāja and the Mañjuśriyamūlakalpa, the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi is the first text that clearly states a concrete method of practice to attain this end.

The practice in the Vajrapāṇyabhiṣeka is said to be the direct predecessor of the goji gonshin kan (D 496, 115b5–117a4; Sakai, 1973, 53–58), which, in turn, borrowed the mantra of Vairocana (a vīra hūṃ khaṃ) from the Trisamayarāja (D 502, 218b6; Sakai, 1973, 88).

Maṇḍala Worship and Initiation

Maṇḍala worship is extensively taught in chapter 2 and partially in chapters 8, 11, 12, and 13. The purpose of this worship is to make disciples take part in the buddha family by giving initiation, so that a disciple can experience the awakening of, and perform compassionate activities as a buddha. The maṇḍala worship of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi is more developed than that taught in earlier tantras, such as the Guhyatantra and the Vajrapāṇyabhiṣeka, although they share the same fivefold structure, as discussed below (Otsuka, 2013).

Maṇḍala worship in the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi, chapter 2, consists of the following five steps (Otsuka, 1993): (1) selecting appropriate disciples, place of worship, and time; (2) preparation of the maṇḍala; (3) worship of deities in the maṇḍala;

Fig. 1: Tibetan sand maṇḍala of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi. Photo by Kōyasan University (高野山大学).

(4) inviting disciples into the maṇḍala; and (5) initiation of disciples.

Before drawing the maṇḍala on the ground in step (2), the master (ācārya) builds the visual image of the maṇḍala in his mind, and for the meditation, he undertakes the nyāsa practices described above (esp. that of ch. 17), which enable the maṇḍala to be embodied in his own body.

Chapters 2, 8, and 11, respectively, teach the deities in the maṇḍala as having the shape of human beings (ch. 2), their seed syllables (bījamantra; ch. 8), and their symbol icons (ch. 11), which correspond to the body, speech, and mind maṇḍalas. The worship taught in the Uttaratantra of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi is mostly based on chapter 2.

Iconography

The way in which deities are arranged in the maṇḍala named mahākaruṇāgarbhodbhavamaṇḍala in the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi shows one of the most developed stages of the "triad construction" that consists of the Buddha, Avalokiteśvara (padma, "lotus"), and Vajrapāṇi (vajra). This construction had been one of the most common arrangements of deities in earlier Buddhist tantras but later was substituted by the fivefold system (adding ratna "jewel" and karman "activity") after the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha.

The maṇḍala transmitted in Tibet is depicted literally in accordance with the description of chapter 2, while that in East Asia is drastically rearranged by adding the central lotus to the maṇḍala of chapter 2 and deities not stated in the scripture itself (Yoritomi, 2000, 125–166).

Formation

A preliminary survey on the relation between forerunner scriptures and the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi is represented by S. Sakai (1973, 221):

Vajravidāraṇādhāraṇī (D 75
↓
Dhyānottarapaṭala (D 808)
↓
Trisamayarāja (D 502)

Other preceding scriptures in as the Guhyatantra (T. 897; D (T. 895; T. 896; D 805), and D 807), and non-tantric Mah as the Buddhāvataṃsaka and The Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi ( the importation of tantric Buddhism (though it insists back to the Buddha; Sanderso This tantra probably integrat of mantranyāsa (the self-tran by means of placement of body) from early Śaiva Tant Einoo, 2005).

Spread in South Asia

We cannot conclusively deter where the Vairocanābhisaṃb compiled but can only appro the basis of fragmental traces of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi assume that the area of the Va origin is near the traces of its

Most of the text's later Magadha and Odisha and where authors who comment Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi were where statues whose iconogr with the Vairocanābhisaṃbo From the first, we learn some the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi a we can presume the spread the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi cy of the Vairocanābhisaṃbod Nālandā from the circa 7th to a stone statue of Vairocana in ing a mantra inscription "ā s sponds to chapter 10 of the V (Yoritomi, 2000, 307). The Ch (無行; d. 674 CE), who carrie the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi, o (Yoritomi, 2000, 37); Śubhākar from Orissa studied at Nāla (740–795 CE) of Nālandā quot niversity (高野山大学).

nbodhi shows one of the most devel-e "triad construction" that consists valokiteśvara (padma, "lotus"), and ). This construction had been one mon arrangements of deities in ear-tras but later was substituted by the (adding ratna "jewel" and karman he Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha. transmitted in Tibet is depicted ordance with the description of that in East Asia is drastically rear-g the central lotus to the maṇḍala of ities not stated in the scripture itself 125–166).

urvey on the relation between fores and the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi is . Sakai (1973, 221):

Vajravidāraṇādhāraṇī (D 750)
↓
Dhyānottarapaṭala (D 808) → Vajrapāṇyabhiṣeka (D 496) → Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi
↓
Trisamayarāja (D 502)

Other preceding scriptures include early tantras, such as the Guhyatantra (T. 897; D 806), Subāhuparipṛcchā (T. 895; T. 896; D 805), and Susiddhikara (T. 893; D 807), and non-tantric Mahāyāna scriptures, such as the Buddhāvataṃsaka and Suvarṇaprabhāsottama. The Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi (ch. 3) implicitly admits the importation of tantric rituals from outside of Buddhism (though it insists on their origin as dating back to the Buddha; Sanderson, 2009, 128; D 177a1–3). This tantra probably integrates the idea of the ritual of mantranyāsa (the self-transformation into a deity by means of placement of mantras on one's own body) from early Śaiva Tantrism (see Davis, 1992; Einoo, 2005).

Spread in South Asia

We cannot conclusively determine the original place where the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi was composed or compiled but can only approximately assume it on the basis of fragmental traces that show the spread of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi (and this only if we can assume that the area of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi's origin is near the traces of its later existence).

Most of the text's later traces are found in Magadha and Odisha and comprise the areas where authors who comment, quote, or refer to the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi were active and the areas where statues whose iconographic features accord with the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi have been found. From the first, we learn something of the spread of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi and from the second, we can presume the spread of worship following the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi cycle. We see evidence of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi's transmission in Nālandā from the circa 7th to the 9th century CE in a stone statue of Vairocana in dhyānamudrā bearing a mantra inscription "ā sa hūṃ," which corresponds to chapter 10 of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi (Yoritomi, 2000, 307). The Chinese monk Wuxing (無行; d. 674 CE), who carried the manuscript of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi, once visited Nālandā (Yoritomi, 2000, 37); Śubhākarasiṃha (673–735 CE) from Orissa studied at Nālandā; and Kamalaśīla (740–795 CE) of Nālandā quotes passages from the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi in his works (Bhāvanākrama I; D 3815, 157b3–4).

During the circa 9th to 13th centuries, the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi is known to have circulated in Vikramaśīla, for it is cited in works including those of Atiśa (982–1054 CE; D 3930, 3959) and Abhayākaragupta (d. 1126; D 1198, 3140) and those attributed to Ratnākaraśānti (c. late 10th to early 11th cent.; D 1826) and Jñānaśrī[mitra?] (c. late 10th to early 11th cent.; D 3714). From the scholarly circle associated with Vikramaśīla, Atiśa's master Bodhibhadra (D 3924) and Muniśrībhadra of Jaggadala (13th cent.; D 1813) also quote the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi.

The Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi is also quoted by tantric masters who flourished in Magadha, including Vilāsavajra (8th cent. CE; D 2533), Buddhaguhya (the late 8th cent. CE; D 2662, 2663, 2670), Vimalamitra (8th–9th cents. CE; D 3818, 3938), Śākyamitra (8th–9th cents. CE; D 1834), Vitapāda (early 9th cent. CE; D 1873), Āryadeva (early 9th cent. CE; D 1803), Candrakīrti (c. 9th–10th cents.; D 1785, 1786), Bhavyakīrti (late 10th cent.; D 1793), Nāropāda (c. 11th cent.; D 1186, 1187), Jñānakīrti (early 11th cent.; D 3709, 3922), Kuladatta (c. 12th–13th cents.), Jagaddarpaṇa (D 3305), Raviśrījñāna (D 1395), Śāntarakṣita (D 3708), Jñānavajra (D 4019), Abhayākaragupta (c. 12–13th cent.; D 1198), though the places where they flourished are not necessarily limited to this area. A systematic study on references to or quotations from the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi in Indic works is yet to be done (among above-mentioned sources, D 3140, 1813, 2533, 1803, 3305, 1395, 3708 are extant in Sanskrit, too).

In addition to its presence in Magadha, we can also trace the spread of Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi worship during the Pala dynasty in Odisha from stone statues discovered there. The most striking is a Vairocana statue found at Lalitagiri with an inscription of the core mantra of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi, "namaḥ samantabuddhānāṃ āḥ vīra hūṃ khaṃ." There is also a Vairocana statue in dhyānamudrā and a triad statue (Vairocana, Vajrapāṇi, and Avalokiteśvara) at Ratnagiri, and two sets of statues of Vairocana with the eight bodhisattvas at both Ratnagiri and Udayagiri (Yoritomi, 2000, 50–55; Matsunaga, 2010, 15).

We do not known much about the text in other areas of South Asia. However, in Ellora (cave 12), there is a stone relief that may be of Vairocana and the eight bodhisattvas (Yoritomi, 2000, 43); Y. Matsunaga (2010, 16) refers to what may be a Vairocana statue from northwest India (its iconographic features correspond to those described in the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi). Another piece of evidence regarding the Indian tradition of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi is verse quotations in Sanskrit from this tantra in the Sang hyang kamahāyānan mantranaya composed in Java (Yoritomi, 2000, 332).

Although the tradition of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi became less dominant after the 8th century in India, being replaced by the highest yogatantras (yogānuttara), direct successors of the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha, we can trace its transmission until the final phase of Indian Buddhism around the 13th century (e.g. Abhayākaragupta quotes the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi in his Āmnāyamañjarī, D 1198, 34a6ff., 79b4ff., 109a2).

Spread in Tibet

Before the Tibetan translation of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi in the early 9th century, Buddhaguhya sent a letter (D 4194) together with Sanskrit manuscripts including a commentary on the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi addressed to the Tibetan king Khri Srong lde'u btsan (742–797 CE) in the late 8th century CE (Dietz, 1984, 79–84, 358–399).

While Buddhaguhya's tradition was predominant in the earlier diffusion of Tibetan Buddhism, the tradition of Ba ri lo tsā ba Rin chen grags (1040–1111) became more popular in the later diffusion. This tradition was transmitted to Bu ston Rin chen grub (1290–1364) via masters from the Mchims clan of Snar thang Monastery, and it was later transmitted to the La brang bkras shis dkyil Monastery, which possesses a Thangka of the maṇḍala of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi. The maṇḍala is also found in the Ngor Maṇḍala collection. Manuals of maṇḍala worship were composed by Bcom ldan ral gri (1227–1305) of Snar thang, Bu ston, Bo dong Phyogs las rnam rgyal (1378–1451), and Pan chen I and III (see Yoritomi, 2000, 326–329). These manuals witness the continuity of the tradition of the tantra in Tibet.

As in India, the worship of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi in Tibet has been rather minor compared with that of the highest yogatantra class, though this tendency contrasts to that in East Asia, where the worship of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi and Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha has been very popular.

Spread in East Asia

China

The Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi was transmitted to China through its Chinese translation in 725 CE. Faquan (法全; fl. 800–870 CE) received the teaching of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi from Farun (法潤; 768–840 CE?) and compiled two ritual manuals of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi: one at Xuanfa Monastery (玄法寺; T. 852), the other at Qinglong Monastery (青龍寺; T. 853), circa 847–859 CE.

Although many texts relevant to the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi and its religious objects, including statues and maṇḍalas, were lost due to repeated prohibitions of Buddhism in China (e.g. 842–846 CE and 955 CE), some escaped the destruction by being brought to Japan by Japanese monks, and it is noteworthy that especially copies of maṇḍalas are well preserved.

Japan

Although there are earlier manuscripts of the Chinese translation of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi in Japan (the earliest of which was copied in 730 CE according to the Shōsōin monjo [正倉院文書]; Matsunaga, 2010, 6), it was Kūkai (774–835 CE) who systematically transmitted the doctrine and worship of tantric Buddhism to Japan on the basis of the teachings of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi and Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha. According to tradition, he received the teaching of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi from Huiguao (恵果), composed his major works (the Sokushinjōbutsugi [即身成佛義], Jūjūshinron [十住心論], Hizōhōyaku [秘藏寶鑰], etc.) on the basis of the teachings of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi and Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha, and wrote seven commentaries on the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi entitled Dainichikyōkaidai (大日經開題) (see Teibon kōbōdaishi zenshū [定本弘法大師全集], vols. 2–4, Koyasan University, 1991–1997). The Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi has been intensively studied in Japan in both the Shingon and the Tendai schools, and more than 35 Japanese indigenous commentaries have come down to us (Matsunaga, 2010, 60–62). The practice of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi still survives in the Shingon tradition today, for instance in the worship of the Vairo ded in the monastic progr [四度加行]), or the tantri syllable a (ajikan [阿字観 215).

---

The teaching of the V been widely spread in Jap public level, being found, f of the tombstone gorintō cakra), which is an icono the goji gonshin kan of the

Bibliography

Davis, R.H., "Becoming a Śiva, Worship," in: T. Goudriaan, Early Tantrism: Studies in H 1992, 107–119.
Dietz, S., Die buddhistische Brie
baden, 1984.
Einoo, Shingo (永ノ尾信悟), Ceremonies Described in th & J. Takashima, eds., From 2005, 95–113.
Giebel, R., The Vairocanābhisa
Hodge, S., The Mahā-vairocan
Buddhaguhya's Commentary Matsunaga, Yūkei (松長有慶), (大日経住心品講讃), Tokyo
Ochi, Junji (越智淳仁), "Daini (大日経の神変加持思想)," Indo mikkyō no keisei to t 有慶), Kyoto, 1998, 139–179.

ighest yogatantra class, though rasts to that in East Asia, where the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi and vasaṃgraha has been very popular.

Asia

isaṃbodhi was transmitted to Chinese translation in 725 CE.
800–870 CE) received the teachābhisaṃbodhi from Farun (法潤; compiled two ritual manuals of aṃbodhi: one at Xuanfa Monas-2), the other at Qinglong Monas-3), circa 847–859 CE. ny texts relevant to the odhi and its religious objects, and maṇḍalas, were lost due to ions of Buddhism in China (e.g.
55 CE), some escaped the destrucght to Japan by Japanese monks, rthy that especially copies of preserved.

e earlier manuscripts of the Chi-of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi in t of which was copied in 730 CE hōsōin monjo [正倉院文書]; Mat-it was Kūkai (774–835 CE) who nsmitted the doctrine and worship sm to Japan on the basis of the airocanābhisaṃbodhi and Sarva- ṃgraha. According to tradition, he ing of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi 果), composed his major works tsugi [即身成佛義], Jūjūshinron hōyaku [秘藏寶鑰], etc.) on the ngs of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi atatattvasaṃgraha, and wrote ies on the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi ikyōkaidai (大日經開題) (see hi zenshū [定本弘法大師全集], an University, 1991–1997). The bodhi has been intensively studied e Shingon and the Tendai schools, Japanese indigenous commentar-n to us (Matsunaga, 2010, 60–62). e Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi still sur-on tradition today, for instance in the worship of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi embedded in the monastic program of practice (shidokegyō [四度加行]), or the tantric meditation on the seed syllable a (ajikan [阿字観]; see Yoritomi, 2000, 194–215).

---

The teaching of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi has been widely spread in Japanese culture down to the public level, being found, for instance, in the worship of the tombstone gorintō (五輪塔; tower of fivefold cakra), which is an iconographic representation of the goji gonshin kan of the Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi.

Bibliography

Davis, R.H., "Becoming a Śiva, and Acting as One, in Śaiva Worship," in: T. Goudriaan, ed., Ritual and Speculation in Early Tantrism: Studies in Honor of André Padoux, Albany, 1992, 107–119.

Dietz, S., Die buddhistische Briefliteratur Indien, AsF 84, Wiesbaden, 1984.

Einoo, Shingo (永ノ尾信悟), "Notes on the Installation Ceremonies Described in the Gṛhyapariśiṣṭas," in: S. Einoo & J. Takashima, eds., From Material to Deity, New Delhi, 2005, 95–113.

Giebel, R., The Vairocanābhisaṃbodhi Sutra, Berkeley, 2005.

Hodge, S., The Mahā-vairocana-abhisaṃbodhi Tantra: With Buddhaguhya's Commentary, London, 2003.

Matsunaga, Yūkei (松長有慶), Dainichikyō jūshinbon kōsan (大日経住心品講讃), Tokyo, 2010.

Ochi, Junji (越智淳仁), "Dainichikyō no jinpen kaji shisō (大日経の神変加持思想)," in: Yūkei Matsunaga, ed., Indo mikkyō no keisei to tenkai (インド密教の形松長有慶), Kyoto, 1998, 139–179.

Ōtake, Susumu (大竹晋), "Kegonkyō no sekaizō: toku ni shōmonjō to no kankei wo megutte (桂紹隆の世界像—特に声聞乗との関係をめぐって)," in: Shōryū Katsura et al., eds., Shirīzu Daijō Bukkyō 4: Chie sekai kotoba (シリーズ大乗仏教4, 智慧/世界/ことば), Tokyo, 2013, 213–234.

Otsuka, Nobuo (大塚伸夫), Indo shoki mikkyō seiritsu katei no kenkyū (インド初期密教成立過程の研究), Tokyo, 2013.

Otsuka, Nobuo, "Dainichikyō no mandaragyō (『大日経』の曼荼羅行)," MgK 25, 1993, 85–123.

Sakai, Shinten (酒井真典), Dainichikyō no seiritsu ni kansuru kenkyū (大日経の成立に関する研究), Koyasan, 1973.

Sakurai, Munenobu (桜井宗信), "Dainichikyō (大日経)," in: Keishō Tsukamoto, Yūkei Matsunaga & Hirofumi Isoda, eds., Bongo butten no kenkyū IV mikkyō kyōtenhen (梵語仏典の研究 IV 密教経典編), Kyoto, 1989, 179–186.

Sanderson, A., "The Śaiva Age: The Rise and Dominance of Śaivism during the Early Medieval Period," in: S. Einoo, ed., Genesis and Development of Tantrism, Tokyo, 2009, 17–350.

Wedemeyer, C., Āryadeva's Lamp that Integrates the Practices (Caryāmelāpakapradīpa): The Gradual Path of Vajrayāna Buddhism according to the Esoteric Community Noble Tradition, New York, 2007.

Yamamoto, Chikyō (山本智教), Mahāvairocana-Sūtra: Translated into English from Ta-p'I-lu-che-na ch'eng-fo shen-pien chia-ch'ih ching, the Chinese Version of Śubhakarasiṃha and I-hsing (AD 725), New Delhi, 1990.

Yamamoto, Shōichirō (山本匠一郎), "Dainichikyō no shiryō to kenkyūshi gaikan (『大日経』の資料と研究史概観)," Gendaimikkyō (現代密教) 23, 2012.73–102.

Yoritomi, Motohiro (頼富本宏), Dainichikyō nyūmon: Jihi no mandara sekai (『大日経』入門—慈悲のマンダラ世界), Tokyo, 2000.

KAZUO KANO

Rnying ma Tantras

Tibetan scholars conventionally divide their canonical tantric literature under two major rubrics: the old tantras (rnying ma) of the earlier spread of the doctrine (bstan pa snga dar) and the new tantras (gsar ma), of the later spread of the doctrine (bstan pa phyi dar). The terminology developed after many previously unknown translations of Indian texts began to enter Tibet from the late 10th century onward, becoming known as the new tantras: hence the tantric traditions that had appeared before became known as the old tantras.

This distinction applied only within the most esoteric types of tantras, mainly those that had begun to appear after the 8th century, and which accepted prominent use of charnel ground (kāpālika) symbolism. Doctrinally, they were associated with a radical non-dualism, that could, if not understood, be misconstrued as subversive of conventional morality. Doxographical classification in tantric Buddhism has never been uniform, so that precise definitions are difficult. Nevertheless, at slight risk of generalisation, one can say that the term old tantras nowadays implies texts from the three categories of mahāyoga, anuyoga, and atiyoga, indicating progressive gradations of subtlety and inwardness: mahāyoga focuses on deity meditation and visualisation; anuyoga on more inward yogas of subtle physical veins and wheels (nāḍī, cakra); and atiyoga (also known as rdzogs chen) on the highest formless meditations on the ultimate nature of reality. The term new tantras usually implies texts classified as rnal 'byor bla na med pa'i rgyud (equivalent to the Sanskrit terms yogottaratantras, yoginītantras, or yoganiruttaratantras; Sanderson, 2009, 146). The more exoteric tantras, which had appeared in India in earlier centuries, categorized by different authorities in various ways and under various rubrics, including kriyātantras, caryātantras, upāyatantras, ubhayatantras, and yogatantras, were, along with the Mahāyāna and, in Tibetan parlance, so-called Hīnayāna scriptures, mainly accepted as a shared common heritage of all Tibetan Buddhism.

Issues of Canonicity

The distinction between new tantras and old tantras is more than merely a chronological designation, since despite a considerable overlap of shared materials and approaches, the old and new tantric traditions can also reflect differences of ethos and doctrine. While the new tantras adopted a simple lexical approach to translation privileging text autonomy, the old tantras reflect the earliest efforts at transplanting tantric culture in a much broader sense from India to Tibet, thus privileging target audience needs, and involving a significant degree of adaptive localization to Tibetan culture and civilisation (Mayer, 1996, 1–153). As a consequence, although they were compiled largely from Indic materials and to Indic templates, there existed in many cases no exact Indian equivalent texts from which the old tantras had originally been translated. A related and more important factor was that the old tantras persisted in celebrating an original Indian tantric vision (Gray, 2010), of a canon that was in theory unclosable, since infinite quantities of tantras as yet unknown would always remain in the buddha fields, whence they could be transmitted to fortunate human siddhas (perfected masters) at any time. A moderate number of new tantric scriptures thus continue to appear within the old tantra tradition until the present day, amongst the revealed treasure literature (gter ma). By contrast, and especially after the decline of Buddhism in India, the new tantras eventually became associated with the conception of a canon that was in theory closable, in the sense that all the Buddha's teachings intended for Tibet had already been uttered, even if a small number might still remain to be collected.

As a result, the canonicity of the old tantras has sometimes been questioned by those who believe exclusively in a closable canon. Thus, very few old tantras were included in the original redaction of Kanjur (Bka' 'gyur), the 14th-century scriptural compilation which marked Tibet's first effective attempts at canonical closure. Partly inspired by the decline of Buddhism in India, and partly by the example of a state-regulated canon in China, at least according to tradition the Tibetan Kanjur was

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

nonicity

between new tantras and old than merely a chronological des-despite a considerable overlap rials and approaches, the old and itions can also reflect differences of ne. While the new tantras adopted approach to translation privileging the old tantras reflect the earliest planting tantric culture in a much om India to Tibet, thus privileging needs, and involving a significant ive localization to Tibetan culture (Mayer, 1996, 1–153). As a conse-h they were compiled largely from nd to Indic templates, there existed exact Indian equivalent texts from antras had originally been trans-nd more important factor was that persisted in celebrating an original ision (Gray, 2010), of a canon that closable, since infinite quantities of known would always remain in the hence they could be transmitted to siddhas (perfected masters) at any e number of new tantric scriptures appear within the old tantra tra-present day, amongst the revealed re (gter ma). By contrast, and espe-decline of Buddhism in India, the ntually became associated with the canon that was in theory closable, in ll the Buddha's teachings intended eady been uttered, even if a small ill remain to be collected.

e canonicity of the old tantras has questioned by those who believe closable canon. Thus, very few old cluded in the original redaction 'gyur), the 14th-century scriptural ich marked Tibet's first effective onical closure. Partly inspired by Buddhism in India, and partly by state-regulated canon in China, at o tradition the Tibetan Kanjur was initiated at Narthang (Snar thang) by a Bka' gdams pa follower of the new tantras, Jamyang ('Byams dbyangs), who was at the time serving in China at the court of the Yuan Emperor Renzong (仁宗) or Buyantu Khan (r. 1311–1320), and who sent funds back to Narthang together with requests urging that such a canon be made (Harrison, 1996, 74–76; see also Gzhon nu dpal, 1984–1985, 410–412). However, some slightly later Kanjurs, following the 14th-century Tshal pa redaction, did begin to accept a small segregated old tantras section, while a regional late 17th-century Kanjur from Tawang, connected with the fifth and sixth Dalai Lamas, includes many more old tantras amongst the main body of its collection (Samten, 1994).

There is little evidence for a closed canon of Vajrayāna texts in the great Indian centers of learning to which Tibetans had traditionally turned, such as the monastic universities of Nālandā or Vikramaśīla, or, for that matter, even of a closed Indian canon for Mahāyāna scriptures. On the contrary, the Indian siddhas' vision was more often one of unlimited tantric scriptures existing in the buddha fields, which could be progressively revealed to human siddhas on earth over the course of time. A model for a closed canon was of course supplied by the Tripiṭaka of mainstream texts. However, there is little evidence this model was applied by the early Indian missionaries to the tantric scriptures they brought to Tibet; for at that time, from the late 8th century to the 10th century, Indian Tantrism was still in its most productive phase, so that for the first two hundred years and more of tantric Buddhism in Tibet, numerous new tantric Buddhist scriptures were still being revealed in India, some of which, like the Hevajratantra and the Kālacakratantra, were to become highly influential in many parts of Asia.

In China, by contrast, a systematic control of the Buddhist canon modelled on secular precedents had first been attempted as early as the 6th century, and in subsequent centuries, the regulation of the Buddhist canon increasingly became a significant aspect of Chinese governance, supported by a growing bibliographical literature that sought to identify undesirable texts by virtue of their non-Indic origins or their excessively transgressive tantric content (Lancaster, 1989, 187; Tokuno, 1990).

A major difference between the old and new tantra traditions is thus that while the former remained conservatively attached to the original Indian model of an open, somewhat distributed, and only informally regulated tantric scriptural literature, the latter promoted the reforming, modernizing agenda of a single monolithic and highly regulated set of tantras to be included in a single canon alongside the sūtras and other non-tantric Buddhist scriptures which, while different from the Chinese model in its internal arrangement of texts, its rejection in most cases of multiple translations, and its inclusion of esoteric tantras, nevertheless resembled the Chinese canon in its basic rationale of regulation, normalization, and centralization, and in its adoption of the proven existence of an exact Indian equivalent, as the only valid criterion of orthodoxy.

While for these reasons excluded from the prestigious new Kanjur (the so-called Old Narthang), many old tantras continued to be preserved within their original collections, simply known as tantra collections (rgyud 'bum) or, after a while, old tantra collections (rnying ma'i rgyud 'bum). Some texts are preserved in more specialized collections, such as the Vairo Rgyud 'bum and the Rgyud bcu bdun, which have only atiyoga texts, or the Rnying ma Bka' ma, which was compiled slightly later and has a few tantric scriptures accompanied by many more commentaries. Other old tantras have never joined such collections, but have simply remained dispersed within various collections of revealed treasure literature (gter ma). It is not known when the first large collections of old tantras appeared, but it was probably quite early: there is, for example, mention of an 11th- or 12th-century collection of old tantras at the seat of the Zur family, a famous Rnying ma hereditary lineage (Mayer, 1996, 224). A collection in 30 volumes containing 335 texts (or 375 by another count) is also mentioned in the biography of the Rnying ma master Nam mkha' dpal (1171[?]–1237[?]), who is said to have compiled it on the occasion of the death of his father, the great codifier of the old tantras, Nyang ral nyi ma 'i 'od zer (1124–1192), although this collection seems to have also included a number of new tantras (Nyang ral, vol. I, 1977, 55–59). Over succeeding centuries, many further collections of old tantras were made, which varied in both size and contents. A notable development was the old tantra collection in 42 volumes organized by Ratna Gling pa in the 15th century, based on the Zur family collection mentioned above, which is said to be the basis of modern recensions and transmissions (Mayer, 1996, 225).

The surviving old tantra collections still vary in size and contents, between 929 texts in 46 volumes, in the probably 17th-century Bhutanese manuscript recension, and 448 texts in 26 volumes in the late 18th-century Sde dge xylograph. Excluding the unknown number of scriptures preserved only within gter ma collections, the total number of different texts within the extant old tantra collections per se has recently been estimated by the University of Virginia's online Tibetan and Himalayan Library as 1,133, of which 478 are classified as rdzogs chen, 45 as anuyoga, 568 as mahāyoga, and 42 as supplementary texts (kha skong). No other categories of texts are included within the old tantra collections other than these three most esoteric types of tantras, all of which are believed to record the utterances of or dialogues between enlightened buddhas. The modern study of the old tantra collections is not so advanced as that of the Kanjur, and their study is additionally hampered by the destruction since the 1950s by the Chinese of about 95% of old tantra collection witnesses (personal communication, E.G. Smith). While every Rnying ma monastery of substance once sought to own an old tantra collection, nowadays, only 13 witnesses are known to survive, all but two in Bhutan and Nepal. Collectively, they fall within six different doxographical redactions (see below, where they are listed within their groupings).

Being largely excluded from the Kanjur does not seem to have adversely affected the status or circulation of the old tantras. Their carefully honed adaptations to Tibetan culture garnered popularity, not only within the Rnying ma school, but across the other traditions too. Although notionally based upon the new tantras, the important Bka' brgyud traditions in particular have made copious use of the old tantras, to the extent that in some cases, they practice as much or even more old tantra than new tantra. The 'Khon clan hierarchs, hereditary heads of the Sa skya school which notionally upholds a new tantra orthodoxy, retain the old tantra cycle of Rdo rje Phur pa as their main meditational deity (yi dam), and the great Dge lugs monastery of Se ra, one of Tibet's major institutions and notionally based on the new tantras, also took the old tantra cycle of Rta mgrin yang gsang (Hayagrīva) as its main meditational deity (Dreyfus, 2003, 348n48). Several Dalai Lamas, notably the fifth, thirteenth, and fourteenth, have been active promoters of the old tantras, not least because the visionary old tantra usage of Tibetan national narratives has rendered them a key element in attempts at national reunification, throughout Tibetan history (Kapstein, 2000, 141–162). So while some might assume Tibet to have a notionally closed canon, the actual historical reality is more complex: the case was rather that of a dual system in which notionally closed and open tantric canons co-existed in parallel. If some advocates of the closed canon rejected the open canon as apocryphal, and if some advocates of the open canon likewise deprecated the closed canon as including texts inferior to their own (Ogyan Tanzin, 2013), and as having lost its revelatory vitality, it seems more probable that over the longer course of Tibetan history, an overall majority of lamas have de facto accepted in parallel the simultaneous validity of both open and closed canons.

Historical Origins

Tibetan historiography associates the old tantras with the great state-sponsored introduction of Buddhism that began in the late 7th century, when Emperor Khri Srong lde btsan invited many famous Buddhist teachers to Tibet, including some masters of Tantra. Yet the evidence from this period is by no means unambiguous. More exoteric tantric systems were indeed translated, and some of these were actively promoted, for example, the Mahāvairocanābhisaṃbodhitantra as a part of state ritual, and the Sarvadurgatipariśodhanatantra as a mortuary text to replace the traditional funerary rite. However, the more esoteric forms of tantric Buddhism (Vajrayāna) that made prominent use of charnel ground imagery, which were still relatively new and controversial even in India at that time, seem to have been controlled (Ishikawa, 1990, 4). The two surviving official catalogues of texts translated ('Phang thang ma and Ldan dkar ma/Lhan dkar ma) show little sign of the vast repertoire of highly esoteric mahāyogatantras, anuyogatantras, and atiyogatantras, which the later Rnying ma tradition takes as its most prestigious and important scriptures, and upon which it is founded (although we cannot say whether some such texts might have appeared in the third catalogue that is no longer extant, the Mchims phu ma; Hermann-Pfandt, 2002, 129–149; Halkias, 2004, 46–105). Likewise, esoteric Vajrayāna translational terms were not systematically included in the official lexicographic tracts prepared to facilitate and standardise translation. One of them, the Sgra sbyor bam po gnyis pa of 814 CE, specified that such tantras should be kept secret by order of the state because of their unsuitability for the spiritually immature, and then observed that the existing translations of such tantras had already caused damage through their concealed meanings not being understood, so that further translation should stop (Ishikawa, 1990, 4). It is noteworthy also that an important early historical source, the Ba), describes how th Padmasambhava, wa

---

emperor, but created and frightening displa so was sent back to I (Wangdu & Diemberg
the same text mentio banned of the type o masambhava was asso (Wangdu & Diemberge

It is unfortunate tha renders the early hist tratingly obscure. After Empire in the mid-9th across most of the re in a period known a (bsil ba'i dus), when th largely erased. It is the if kāpālika-style Vajrayā ing the empire, or if it w elite circles who had al at first restricted, and Scholars are still strugg history of the old tantra

Proto-Rnying ma

That Vajrayāna did beco is established by a partia of the "Time of Fragme sealed document store w in Dunhuang, a cave ten of the Silk Routes, until tury. The numerous la manuscripts amongst its from shortly before the call a flourishing protomany of the texts, named tantric doxographical the later Rnying ma scho

For example, the gre materials on the popular within later Rnying ma 2008), and the longest became quite promine tion complete and verb 12th-century codificatio Nyang ral nyi ma'i 'od z
'dus pa (see below).

Another influential is the 'Phags pa Thabs k

closed canon rejected the open hal, and if some advocates of the vise deprecated the closed canon s inferior to their own (Ogyan as having lost its revelatory vitale probable that over the longer history, an overall majority of to accepted in parallel the simulf both open and closed canons.

igins

raphy associates the old tantras tate-sponsored introduction of gan in the late 7th century, when ng lde btsan invited many famous to Tibet, including some mast the evidence from this period nambiguous. More exoteric tan-indeed translated, and some of ly promoted, for example, the isaṃbodhitantra as a part of state rvadurgatipariśodhanatantra as replace the traditional funerary more esoteric forms of tantric ana) that made prominent use of agery, which were still relatively rsial even in India at that time, controlled (Ishikawa, 1990, 4). official catalogues of texts trans-g ma and Ldan dkar ma/Lhan le sign of the vast repertoire of hāyogatantras, anuyogatantras, s, which the later Rnying ma s most prestigious and important n which it is founded (although ther some such texts might have ird catalogue that is no longer phu ma; Hermann-Pfandt, 2002, 004, 46–105). Likewise, esoteric ional terms were not system-the official lexicographic tracts te and standardise translation.
Sgra sbyor bam po gnyis pa of at such tantras should be kept e state because of their unsuitiritually immature, and then existing translations of such caused damage through their s not being understood, so that should stop (Ishikawa, 1990, 4). also that an important early historical source, the Dba' bzhed (Testament of Ba), describes how the great master of Vajrayāna, Padmasambhava, was invited to Tibet by the emperor, but created alarm through his inordinate and frightening displays of miraculous powers, and so was sent back to India after only a short time (Wangdu & Diemberger, 2000, 52–60). Elsewhere the same text mentions that the translation was banned of the type of teachings with which Padmasambhava was associated, the mahāyogatantras (Wangdu & Diemberger, 2000, 88),

It is unfortunate that a serious dearth of sources renders the early history of the old tantras frustratingly obscure. After the collapse of the Tibetan Empire in the mid-9th century, disorder prevailed across most of the region for nearly a 150 years, in a period known as the "Time of Fragments" (bsil ba'i dus), when the historical record became largely erased. It is therefore very hard to ascertain if kāpālika-style Vajrayāna was entirely banned during the empire, or if it was merely restricted to small elite circles who had already obtained it, or if it was at first restricted, and later allowed more widely. Scholars are still struggling to understand the early history of the old tantras.

Proto-Rnying ma texts at Dunhuang

That Vajrayāna did become successful quite early on is established by a partial glimpse into the latter part of the "Time of Fragments," offered by an ancient sealed document store which remained undisturbed in Dunhuang, a cave temple site at the Chinese side of the Silk Routes, until its recovery in the 20th century. The numerous largely 10th-century tantric manuscripts amongst its holdings reveal a snapshot from shortly before the phyi dar, of what one might call a flourishing proto-Rnying ma, already showing many of the texts, named personages, doctrines, and tantric doxographical categories, associated with the later Rnying ma school.

For example, the greater part of the Dunhuang materials on the popular phur pa rituals reappeared within later Rnying ma texts (Cantwell & Mayer, 2008), and the longest of them (IOL Tib J 331.III) became quite prominent, through its incorporation complete and verbatim into the definitive 12th-century codification of Rnying ma mahāyoga, Nyang ral nyi ma'i 'od zer's Bka' brgyad bde gshegs 'dus pa (see below).

Another influential survivor from Dunhuang is the 'Phags pa Thabs kyi zhags pa padma 'phreng gi don bsdus pa (henceforth Thabs zhags), which together with its commentary, comprises IOL Tib J 321 in the British Library (Cantwell & Mayer, 2012). This unique manuscript, intact in 85 folios, gives us our most fully comprehensive, detailed, and entirely unmodified view into proto-Rnying ma Tantrism before the phyi dar. The Thabs zhags has remained canonical for the Rnying ma, who consider it one of their 18 tantras of mahāyoga, a core grouping of highly prestigious texts, several of which are referred to amongst the Dunhuang finds (Almogi, 2014). As ever, the dating of tantric texts is difficult, but here we can take advantage of the Indological work of A. Sanderson. The Thabs zhags and others among the 18 tantras of mahāyoga share several historical indicators with the Sarvabuddhasamāyogaḍākinījālaśaṃvara, a version of which is also mentioned at Dunhuang, and which itself also became one of the 18 tantras of mahāyoga. A. Sanderson has established this text to be historically intermediate between the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha and the Guhyasamāja on the one hand, and the full-on yoginī or yoganiruttaratantras on the other hand. Thus Sanderson locates its production in India from the late 8th through 9th centuries (Sanderson, 2009, 145ff), in other words, broadly contemporaneous with Emperor Khri Srong lde btsan and his successors. So if tantric texts of this type did indeed enter Tibet at that time, they will still have been very new in India, and not yet universally accepted there.

The Thabs zhags still retains reasonably clear doctrinal connections with the earlier more exoteric yogatantras, of the type that had not been banned by the Tibetan emperor. It maintains two parallel pantheons: a maṇḍala (circle) of fifty peaceful deities which was an adaptation of the 37 deity maṇḍala of the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha basic to yogatantra, but here, the male and female figures are paired as consorts, and a number of further female deities are added to complete the set. Then there is a parallel more esoteric maṇḍala of terrifying charnel-ground deities, whose central form is the ferocious Śrī Heruka still familiar to modern Rnying ma, with 9 heads and 18 arms, surrounded by the still popular ten wrathful deities (Khro bo bcu), each accompanied by two zoocephalic female emanations. The central terrifying female is specified in the commentary as Ral gcig ma (Ekajaṭā), still to this day the main ma mo or wrathful female deity of the Rnying ma pantheon.

IOL Tib J 321 has a marginal note connecting the revelation of the Thabs zhags root scripture with Padmasambhava, the highly mythologised founder of Tibetan tantric Buddhism, here already presented as a uniquely great enlightened being. Another marginal note cites Śāntigarbha, an Indian yogatantra master whom later Rnying ma tradition describes as one of Padmasambhava's gurus, praising either Padmasambhava or his work. The concluding verse of the commentary is a praise of Padmasambhava as the "Lotus King" (padma rgyal po), which verse was later incorporated into the mainstream Padmasambhava hagiographical tradition (Cantwell & Mayer, 2012, 93).

The doctrinal ethos of the Thabs zhags is not at all dissimilar to that of later Rnying ma authors, such as Rong zom pa (11th cent.; exact dates unknown) and Klong chen pa (1308–1362), who cite it several times. One of its principal concerns is to interiorize ritual, as we can see, for example, in the empowerment rite of chapter 3. Usually, tantric empowerments are described as complex external ritual procedures engaging numerous material implements. But here, it is redefined as essentially an interiorized contemplative process, based upon the spiritual qualities naturally innate to the human mind.

Another preoccupation is to integrate the pragmatic rituals so typical of tantric literature, and ostensibly for worldly ends such as wealth and power, with doctrine. More than half of all the chapters of the Thabs zhags commentary (chs. 18–40) are dedicated specifically to the encoding of mainstream abstract Buddhist doctrines within a wide range of quotidian pragmatic rituals, so that the rehearsal of those doctrines was rendered inseparable from and integral to the performance of such rituals (Cantwell & Mayer, 2012, 78–82).

The Thabs zhags version of mahāyoga bears a close resemblance to the doctrine of the sameness of all dharmas (mnyam pa'i chos) of the Rgyud gsang ba'i snying po or Guhyagarbhatantra*, which is nowadays considered the most prestigious of all tantras by the Rnying ma school. Like the Rgyud gsang ba'i snying po, the Thabs zhags too, on numerous occasions, uses terminology built around the words mnyam pa or mnyam pa nyid or mnyam nyid ("even," "evenness," or "sameness"). Hence it is not surprising that later doxographers often paired the Thabs zhags with the Guhyagarbha*. This famous doctrine, which involves realising all phenomena of saṃsāra and nirvāṇa alike as primordially pure, is seen by some modern scholars (Karmay, 1988, 11) as one of the historical roots of the Rdzogs chen ("Great Perfection") mysticism of the Rnying ma pa.

Recent modern research into Dunhuang documents has now shown that despite all the traditional uncertainties about their origins, the old tantra traditions extant today do reflect at least some genuinely old traditions, including several that were already well developed by the time the Dunhuang caves were sealed in the 11th century; and moreover that a small but important core of old tantra texts did have close Indian counterparts, even if further redactions might have been made to them in Tibet.

There are in fact direct suggestions within some Dunhuang sources that early Tibetan tantric scriptures were deliberately redacted by Indian siddhas to suit Tibetan audiences. PT44 describes Padmasambhava redacting the full textual corpus of the Kīla ("Stake") deity that he had procured from the Indian monastic university of Nālandā into a new arrangement for transmission to his Tibetan and Nepalese disciples, now redacted to incorporate Himalayan protector deities that he himself had newly tamed (Cantwell & Mayer, 2008, 41–68). Likewise, IOL Tib J 321 seems to suggest Padmasambhava as the revealer of the Thabs zhags scripture (Cantwell & Mayer, 2012, 91–99). If so, this could be of interest because it is the earliest known text to introduce the distinctively old tantra form of the winged Heruka. References to such winged Herukas seem to be extremely infrequent in Indian sources, unless in rare hybridized forms with Garuḍa; yet the classic old tantra form of Heruka is both independently winged and quite ubiquitous. This seems significant because birds, wings, and avian symbolism in general, are fundamental to indigenous Tibetan religion, so that the highly accentuated presence of wings on the old tantric Herukas might have originated as a means of adaptive indigenization.

Some Differences between Old Tantras and New Tantras

It seems likely that most old tantras were produced in Tibet through the 9th and 10th centuries, by Tibetan masters quite possibly emulating their Indian siddha counterparts, who during that period produced many new tantras in India. We thus witness two Vajrayāna traditions proliferating at a similar time and under similar conditions of political instability, but largely independently: In the political chaos of postimperial Tibet, what were to become Tibet's old tantras were compiled in Tibetan, while in India, in the political chaos between the first and second Pala empires, what were to become Tibet's new tantras were compiled in Sanskrit.

A number of cultur characterize the new an Indian yoganiruttaratant incorporated numerous scriptures (Sanderson, 2 such direct verbatim rep ing has so far been discov tantras that were redact they show occasional ev of indigenous Tibetan the protective deities th ('go ba'i lha lnga; Mayer, 1 female deity known as g 2007, 27–28, 196–203). W tantras or yoginītantras cerned to invert the pecu of purity and pollution, t violent, sexual, and lin tantras tended to be les such inversions. Hence extreme, often connectin peaceful ones, and even of atiyoga, comprising o which were not necessar ritual notions of purity to the poetic descripti less ultimate truths abo comparable genre to at in India, and there are and several scholars ha with Chinese Chan Bu 2012). While the India yoginītantras introduce ing subtle physical vein these do not seem to h earliest old tantras, sinc at Dunhuang, although did subsequently absorb the old tantras conside of narrative within ritu predilection (Cantwell yoganiruttaratantras o intertextual amongst t Śaiva texts), they showe cal organization into a s but the most widely pr known as mahāyoga, organized into a symm cal fierce Heruka deiti six arms, four legs, and mainly by their hand in zation is certainly appar nyi ma'i 'od zer (1124–11

t their origins, the old tantra tray do reflect at least some genus, including several that were pped by the time the Dunhuang n the 11th century; and moreover portant core of old tantra texts an counterparts, even if further ave been made to them in Tibet. direct suggestions within some that early Tibetan tantric scriptely redacted by Indian siddhas liences. PT44 describes Padmag the full textual corpus of the that he had procured from the iversity of Nālandā into a new ansmission to his Tibetan and now redacted to incorporate or deities that he himself had well & Mayer, 2008, 41–68). Like-seems to suggest Padmasamber of the Thabs zhags scripture 2012, 91–99). If so, this could be it is the earliest known text to nctively old tantra form of the erences to such winged Herukas ly infrequent in Indian sources, lized forms with Garuḍa; yet the rm of Heruka is both indepen-quite ubiquitous. This seems sig-ds, wings, and avian symbolism lamental to indigenous Tibetan highly accentuated presence of ntric Herukas might have origi-adaptive indigenization.

ces between
d New Tantras

ost old tantras were produced in h and 10th centuries, by Tibetan sibly emulating their Indian s, who during that period pro-ntras in India. We thus witness itions proliferating at a similar lar conditions of political insta-ndependently: In the political ial Tibet, what were to become ere compiled in Tibetan, while ical chaos between the first and s, what were to become Tibet's mpiled in Sanskrit.

A number of cultural differences therefore characterize the new and old tantras. While the Indian yoganiruttaratantras or yoginītantras freely incorporated numerous verses directly from Śaiva scriptures (Sanderson, 2001, 41ff), less evidence of such direct verbatim reproduction of Śaiva wording has so far been discovered in the numerous old tantras that were redacted in Tibet. By contrast, they show occasional evidence of the absorption of indigenous Tibetan ritual categories, such as the protective deities that hover around the body ('go ba'i lha lnga; Mayer, 1996, 132) and a type of fierce female deity known as gze ma (Cantwell & Mayer, 2007, 27–28, 196–203). While many yoganiruttaratantras or yoginītantras became increasingly concerned to invert the peculiarly Indian ritual notions of purity and pollution, thus becoming increasingly violent, sexual, and linguistically crude, the old tantras tended to be less directly concerned with such inversions. Hence they could appear less extreme, often connecting wrathful maṇḍalas with peaceful ones, and even including the vast genre of atiyoga, comprising one third of all old tantras, which were not necessarily transgressive of Indian ritual notions of purity at all, but dedicated only to the poetic description of Buddhism's formless ultimate truths about the nature of mind. No comparable genre to atiyoga was ever developed in India, and there are no new tantra equivalents; and several scholars have discussed their affinity with Chinese Chan Buddhism (van Schaik, 2004, 2012). While the Indian yoganiruttaratantras or yoginītantras introduced new inner yogas involving subtle physical veins and wheels (nāḍī, cakra), these do not seem to have been prominent in the earliest old tantras, since there is little sign of them at Dunhuang, although the Rnying ma tradition did subsequently absorb the methods. By contrast, the old tantras considerably accentuated the use of narrative within ritual, an indigenous Tibetan predilection (Cantwell & Mayer, 2009). While the yoganiruttaratantras or yoginītantras were often intertextual amongst themselves (as well as with Śaiva texts), they showed little sign of iconographical organization into a single grand unified system; but the most widely practiced genre of old tantra, known as mahāyoga, did at some stage become organized into a symmetrical set of eight identical fierce Heruka deities, each with three heads, six arms, four legs, and two wings, differentiated mainly by their hand implements. Such systematization is certainly apparent by the time of Nyang ral nyi ma'i 'od zer (1124–1192), a great codifier of Rnying ma Tantrism, but might have had its roots in earlier times. Doctrinal features of mahāyoga were also standardized, for example, in the use across numerous of its sādhanas of the same sequence of three meditations (trisamādhi; ting 'dzin gsum) through which the deity is visualized.

Bibliography

Primary Sources

The extant editions of the old tantra collection (Rnying ma'i rgyud 'bum):
(a) Bhutanese recension in 46 volumes, with six extant manuscript witnesses:
(1) Mtshams brag: the Mtshams brag manuscript of the Rñiṅ ma rgyud 'bum (rgyud 'bum/mtshams brag dgon pa). 1982. Thimphu: National Library, Royal Government of Bhutan. 46 volumes. An electronic version made from the paper publication is available from the Tibetan Buddhist Resource Center (TBRC, at http://www.tbrc.org), under the title, rnying ma rgyud 'bum, mtshams brag dgon pa'i bris ma (W21521). It is also available online, linked to its detailed catalogue by THL, at http://www.thlib.org/encyclopedias/literary/canons/ngb/catalog.php#cat=tb.
More recent color images are available from the British Library Endangered Archives Research Project (EAP) 310/4/1/1–4/1/47, a digitization project by Karma Phuntsho, at http://eap.bl.uk/database/overview_project.a4d?projID=EAP310;r=20825.
(2) Sgang steng-a: the first of two Rnying ma'i rgyud 'bum manuscript editions preserved by Sgang steng Monastery, Bhutan. 46 volumes. Digital images were made by Karma Phuntsho as part of the British Library Endangered Archives Research Project EAP039, 2005, and preserved in the British Library, in the National Library and Archive of Bhutan, and at Gangtey Monastery, but their widespread distribution remains forbidden by the monastery.
(3) Sgang steng-b: the second of two Rnying ma'i rgyud 'bum manuscript editions preserved by Sgang steng Monastery, Bhutan. 46 volumes. Digital images of Sgang steng-b were made under an AHRC funded project at Oxford University in 2004 by Karma Phuntsho, Cathy Cantwell, and Rob Mayer, but their distribution remains forbidden by the monastery. A title catalogue of Sgang steng-b is available in Achard et al., 2006.
(4) Dgra med rtse: Rnying ma'i rgyud 'bum manuscript editions preserved by Dgra med rtse Monastery, Bhutan. 46 volumes. Digital images were made by Karma Phuntsho as part of the EAP, EAP105, and are available for free download at http://eap.bl.uk/database/results.a4d?projID=EAP105;r=41
(5) Dpa' sgar: Rnying ma'i rgyud 'bum manuscript editions preserved by Dpa 'sgar monastery, Bhutan. A full set of color digital images were made by Karma Phuntsho in January, 2012, jointly by CSMC, University of Hamburg in cooperation with the Bhutanese NGO Preservation of Bhutan's Written Heritage, just prior to the destruction of the monastery by fire in February, 2012 (Almogi, forthcoming), but have not been made available for distribution.

(6) Sangs rgyas gling: Rnying ma’i rgyud ’bum manuscript editions preserved by Sangs rgyas gling Temple, Tawang, Arunachal Pradesh. Digital images were made in 2013–2014 by Ngawang Tsepag and Rob Mayer, and are in process of being made available from the Bodleian Library, Oxford, and from the TBRC.

(b) South-Central Tibetan recension in 33 volumes, with two extant manuscript witnesses:

(7) Gting skyes: Rñiṅ ma rgyud ’bum reproduced from the manuscript preserved at Gting skyes Dgon pa byang Monastery in Tibet, under the direction of Dingo Khyentse Rimpoche, Thimbu, 1973. An electronic version is available from the TBRC, under the title Rnying ma rgyud ’bum, gting skyes (W21518). It is also available online, linked to its detailed catalogue by THL, at http://www.thlib.org/encyclopedias/literary/canons/ngb/catalog.php#cat=tk. A detailed print catalogue was published in Roman Wylie transcription with Japanese discussion (Kaneko, 1980).

(8) Rig ’dzin Tshe dbang nor bu: the Rig ’dzin Tshe dbang nor bu edition of the rNying ma’i rgyud ’bum. 29 volumes are held at the British Library, with the pressmark, Or.15217. Volume Ka is held at the Bodleian Library Oxford at the shelfmark, MS. Tib.a.24(R). Microfilm is available from the British Library, and the Bodleian Library for volume Ka. Title folios to volume Ga and volume A are held at the Victoria and Albert Museum, accession nos.: IM 318–1920 and IM 317–1920. A detailed electronic inventory was made by Cathy Cantwell, Michael Fischer, and Rob Mayer, originally on ngb.csac.anthropology.ac.uk, but currently in process of transfer to the University of Vienna’s Resources for Kanjur and Tenjur Studies https://www.istb.univie.ac.at/kanjur/xml3/xml/index.php.

(c) Tibetan-Nepalese borderlands recension in 37 volumes, with two extant manuscript witnesses (but many of its texts descend from the same exemplars or near ancestors as texts from the South-Central Tibetan Tradition, so that for text-critical purposes, one can sometimes more fruitfully regard it as a subbranch of the South-Central Tibetan tradition; see Cantwell & Mayer, 2007, 70–78; Almogi, forthcoming):

(9) Nubri: manuscript edition of the Rnying ma’i rgyud ’bum from the Nubri area, held by the National Archives, Kathmandu. Monochrome microfilm was made by the Nepal-German Manuscript Preservation Project in 1993, and can now be digitised to order: NGMPP Reel Nos. L 426/4–L 448/1.

(10) Kathmandu: manuscript edition of the Rnying ma’i rgyud ’bum from the Khumbu region, held by the National Archives, Kathmandu. Microfilm is available through the Nepal Research Centre of the Nepalese-German Manuscript Cataloguing Project. The short title is Rnying ma rgyud ’bum, ms. no.22, running no. 17, reel AT12/3–AT13/1.

(d) Sde dge xylograph in 26 volumes (a conflated single witness):

(11) Sde dge: the Sde dge edition of the Rnying ma’i rgyud ’bum. Twenty-six volumes, Ka-Ra, plus Dkar chag, volume A, Sde dge par khang chen mo. The original woodblocks survive and are still in use. Hence numerous prints are available around the world. A digital catalogue is available from THL at http://www.thlib.org/encyclopedias/literary/canons/ngb/catalog.php#cat=dg.

(e) Gdong dkar la manuscript, from Bhutan, in 28 volumes (single witness):

(12) Gdong dkar la: manuscript edition of the Rnying ma’i rgyud ’bum from Gdong dkar la Temple, Bhutan; said to be 17th century, and to have originated in East Tibet. Digital images were made by Karma Phuntsho and Orna Almogi as part of the EAP, EAP570, and are currently in process of being made available http://eap.bl.uk/database/results.a4d?projID=EAP570;r=41.

(f) Gzhi chen dgon manuscript, from Gzhi chen dgon in Gandze, in 33 volumes (possibly a composite collection):

(13) This dbu med manuscript has recently been discovered by the TBRC field team working in Khams. It has been digitized at their offices in Chengdu, and its title list is in process of compilation (personal communication, Jeff Wallman). There appear to be mixed folios from possibly more than one manuscript – without a uniform dkar chag (personal communication, Michael Sheehy). Details will eventually become available at TBRC Resource ID W2PD17382

Secondary Literature

Achard, J-L., C. Cantwell, M. Kowalewski & R. Mayer, "The sGang steng-b rNying ma’i rGyud ’bum manuscript from Bhutan," RET 11, 2006, 1–141.

Almogi, O., "The Spa sgar and Gdong dkar la Rnying ma rgyud ’bum Editions: Two Newly Discovered Sets from Bhutan," in: O. Czaja & G, Hazod, eds., Festschrift for Per Soerensen, forthcoming.

Almogi, O., "The Eighteen Mahāyoga Tantric Cycles: A Real Canon or the Mere Notion of One?," RET 30, 2014, 47–110.

Cantwell, C., & R. Mayer, A Noble Noose of Methods, the Lotus Garland Synopsis: A Mahāyoga Tantra and Its Commentary, Vienna, 2012.

Cantwell, C., & R. Mayer, "Enduring Myths: Smrang, Rabs and Ritual in the Dunhuang Texts on Padmasambhava," RET 15, 2008a, 289–312.

Cantwell, C., & R. Mayer, Early Tibetan Documents on Phur pa from Dunhuang, Vienna, 2008b.

Cantwell, C., & R. Mayer, The Kīlaya Nirvāṇa Tantra and the Vajra Wrath Tantra: Two Texts from the Ancient Tantra Collection, Vienna, 2007.

Dreyfus, G., The Sound of Two Hands Clapping: The Education of a Tibetan Buddhist Monk, Los Angeles, 2003.

Gray, D., "On the Very Idea of a Tantric Canon: Myth, Politics, and the Formation of the Bka’ ’gyur," JIATS, 2010.

Gzhon nu dpal, Deb ther sngon po, 2 vols., Chengdu, 1984–1985.

Halkias, G.T., "Tibetan Buddhism Registered: A Catalogue from the Imperial Court of ’Phang Thang," EB 36/1–2, 2004, 46–105.

Harrison, P., "A Brief History of the Tibetan Bka’ ’gyur," in: J. Cabezon & R. Jackson, eds., Tibetan Literature: Studies in Genre, Ithaca NY, 1996, 70–94.

Herrmann-Pfandt, A., Die lHan kar ma. Ein früher Katalog der ins Tibetische übersetzten buddhistischen Texte, Vienna, 2008.

Herrmann-Pfandt, A., "The Lh History of Tantric Buddhism eds., The Many Canons of T of the Ninth Seminar of the Tibetan Studies, Leiden 2000,

Ishikawa, M., A Critical Edition
pa: An Old and Basic Comm STi 18, Tokyo, 1990.

Kaneko, E., Ko-Tantora zenzh ラ全集解題目錄), Tokyo, 1

Kapstein, M., The Tibetan Assi
sion, Contestation and Mem

Karmay, S.G., The Great Perfec
tative Teaching of Tibetan B

Lancaster, L.R., "The Rock Cu Fang-Shan," in: T. Skorups BBSC 1, Tring, 1989.

Mayer, R., A Scripture of the Phur-pa bcu-gnyis, Oxford,

Nyang-ral Nyi-ma-’od-zer, M gśegs dus pai chos skor: A Collection of Texts from Ñaṅ-ral Ñi-ma-od-zer, vol.

Ogyan Tanzin, P., "The Six G lations according to R C. Cüppers, R. Mayer & M.

ks survive and are still in use. Hence available around the world. A digital e from THL at http://www.thlib.org/ry/canons/ngb/catalog.php#cat=dg. uscript, from Bhutan, in 28 volumes anuscript edition of the Rnying ma'i ong dkar la Temple, Bhutan; said to be have originated in East Tibet. Digital y Karma Phuntsho and Orna Almogi EAP570, and are currently in process ble http://eap.bl.uk/database/results.

;r=41.
uscript, from Gzhi chen dgon in Ganossibly a composite collection): uscript has recently been discovered eam working in Khams. It has been fices in Chengdu, and its title list is lation (personal communication, Jeff pear to be mixed folios from possibly uscript – without a uniform dkar chag cation, Michael Sheehy). Details will ailable at TBRC Resource ID W2PD17382

ture

ell, M. Kowalewski & R. Mayer, "The ng ma'i rGyud 'bum manuscript from 6, 1–141.
sgar and Gdong dkar la Rnying ma s: Two Newly Discovered Sets from a & G, Hazod, eds., Festschrift for Per ing.
een Mahāyoga Tantric Cycles: A Real Notion of One?," RET 30, 2014, 47–110. er, A Noble Noose of Methods, the Lotus Mahāyoga Tantra and Its Commen-yer, "Enduring Myths: Smrang, Rabs unhuang Texts on Padmasambhava," 12. er, Early Tibetan Documents on Phur pa

nna, 2008b.
er, The Kīlaya Nirvāṇa Tantra and the : Two Texts from the Ancient Tantra 007. of Two Hands Clapping: The Education
t Monk, Los Angeles, 2003.
dea of a Tantric Canon: Myth, Politics, of the Bka' 'gyur," JIATS, 2010.
r sngon po, 2 vols., Chengdu, 1984–1985.
Buddhism Registered: A Catalogue
ourt of 'Phang Thang," EB 36/1–2, 2004,

History of the Tibetan Bka' 'gyur," in: son, eds., Tibetan Literature: Studies in 96, 70–94.
ie lHan kar ma. Ein früher Katalog der ins en buddhistischen Texte, Vienna, 2008.

Herrmann-Pfandt, A., "The Lhan kar ma as a Source for the History of Tantric Buddhism," in: H. Eimer & D. Germano, eds., The Many Canons of Tibetan Buddhism: Proceedings of the Ninth Seminar of the International Association for Tibetan Studies, Leiden 2000, Leiden, 2002, 129–149.

Ishikawa, M., A Critical Edition of the sGra sbyor bam po gnyis pa: An Old and Basic Commentary on the Mahāvyutpatti, STi 18, Tokyo, 1990.

Kaneko, E., Ko-Tantora zenzhū kaidai mokuroku (古タントラ全集解題目錄), Tokyo, 1982.

Kapstein, M., The Tibetan Assimilation of Buddhism: Conversion, Contestation and Memory, New York, 2000.

Karmay, S.G., The Great Perfection: A Philosophical and Meditative Teaching of Tibetan Buddhism, Leiden, 1988.

Lancaster, L.R., "The Rock Cut Canon in China: Findings at Fang-Shan," in: T. Skorupski, ed., The Buddhist Heritage, BBSC 1, Tring, 1989.

Mayer, R., A Scripture of the Ancient Tantra Collection: The Phur-pa bcu-gnyis, Oxford, 1996.

Nyang-ral Nyi-ma-'od-zer, Mnga'-bdag, Bka brgyad Bde gśegs dus pai chos skor: A Reproduction of a Manuscript Collection of Texts from the Revelations of Mṅa-bdag Ñaṅ-ral Ñi-ma-od-zer, vol. I, Dalhousie, 1977.

Ogyan Tanzin, P., "The Six Greatnesses of the Early Translations according to Rong-zom Mahāpaṇḍita," in: C. Cüppers, R. Mayer & M. Walter, eds., Tibet after Empire: Culture, Society and Religion between 850–1000, Lumbini, 2013, 367–392.

Samten, J., "Notes on the bKa' 'gyur of O-rgyan-gling, The Family Temple of the Sixth Dalai Lama (1683–1706)," in: P. Kvaerne, ed., Tibetan Studies: Proceedings of the 6th Seminar of the International Association of Tibetan Studies, Fagernes 1992 Vol. I, Oslo, 1994, 393–402.

Sanderson, A., "The Śaiva Age: The Rise and Dominance of Śaivism during the Early Medieval Period," in: S. Einoo, ed., Genesis and Development of Tantrism, Tokyo, 2009, 41–349.

Sanderson, A., "History through Textual Criticism in the Study of Śaivism, the Pañcarātra and the Buddhist Yoginītantras," in: F. Grimal, ed., Les Sources et le temps: Sources and Time, PDI 91, Pondicherry, 2001, 1–47.

Schaik, S. van, "Dzogchen, Chan and the Question of Influence," RET 24, 2012, 5–20.

Schaik, S. van, "The Early Days of the Great Perfection," JIABS 27/2, 2004, 165–206.

Tokuno, K., "The Evaluation of Indigenous Scriptures in Chinese Buddhist Bibliographical Catalogues," in: R. Buswell, ed., Chinese Buddhist Apocrypha, Honolulu, 1990.

Wangdu, P., & H. Diemberger, dBa' bzhed: The Royal Narrative concerning the Bringing of the Buddha's Doctrine to Tibet, Vienna, 2000.

ROBERT MAYER

Gter ma

The Tibetan category of gter ma ("treasure") refers to sacred scriptures and ritual objects that are discovered through a visionary process leading to these objects' extraction from the ground, or, in more recent times, memory. By virtue of being concealed and then found, these items are like buried treasure, hence the moniker. Throughout its history, the gter ma mode of transmission provided an authoritative venue for Tibetan authors to write poetic and inspired ritual manuals, doctrinal treatises, and histories of religion, facilitating innovation and creativity, responding to needs among their disciples and patrons, and garnering fame and prestige.

The tradition of gter ma discovery developed over a period of several centuries and is unique to Tibetan religion. We do have a few examples in Indian Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna literature that indicate an idea of scripture in the form of "treasure" hidden below the ground for future revelation. We also find a few entries in the old Tibetan Sanskrit-Tibetan dictionary Mahāvyutpatti that provide several Sanskrit analogues for forms of the word gter ma, namely a kind of "water treasure" (jalanidhi, chu gter) in the ocean (Sakaki, 1916, § 4165); an item in a long list of terms (i.e. nidhānam, gter; Sakaki 1916, § 7304); and an epithet of the Buddha (āgamaḥ puṇyanidhānām, bsod nams kyi gter rnams kyi gzhi; Sakaki 1916, § 376). But we have no evidence of anything that approaches the tradition of text recovery or revelation that became such a mainstay of certain groups in Tibetan religious history. The distinctively Tibetan mode of producing authoritative revealed texts was employed mostly by those lineages of Tibetan Buddhism, that is, the Rnying ma ("Old School"), that attempted to trace their origins to the Tibetan imperial period of the Yarlung dynasty (ended 9th cent. CE) and by members of Bön traditions who sought to redress what they remembered as the repression of their religion in the 8th century following the introduction of Buddhism to the Tibetan royal court. Most modern scholars regard the full-blown gter ma tradition as a way for the Bönpos and Rnying ma Buddhist lineages to present scriptural revelations and make claims of historical priority in the face of the hegemony of other Buddhist groups in Tibet, which were gaining political ascendency and producing many religious scriptures newly translated from Indic languages during the phyi dar (later spread) of Buddhism in Tibet. The history and nature of gter ma text production in Bön have received less attention than in Buddhism, but important studies have been produced in that area as well (Achard, 2004; Cantwell & Mayer, 2013; Martin, 1994; 2001). This article will mostly address the Buddhist gter ma.

The Buddhist texts and objects produced under the rubric of gter ma reference themes and practices ascribed to the time of the Yarlung dynasty, primarily during the 7th to 9th centuries, when Buddhism was imported from South Asia, became established in Tibet, and is said to have supplanted Bön traditions. By the 12th century, revealed gter ma objects and texts, purportedly hidden during the dynastic period specifically for the future discoverer and unearthed by dint of visionary direction, were put forth in Buddhist communities primarily among Rnying ma groups. In its full-blown form, the tradition and the objects so revealed took on estimable religious significance, as well as serving to promote particular lineages, practices, and especially charismatic teachers. The tradition of revealing scriptures and sacred objects as gter ma discoveries has remained a popular modality of Tibetan religion down to the present, and is still producing new meditative procedures and narratives of the past today (Gayley, 2009; Hall, 2012; Germano, 1998). But while the gter ma literature is very voluminous, we have little knowledge of the exact practices by which these materials are produced.

Origins and Precedents

The idea of hidden *gter ma*s to be revealed at an appropriate time has notable Buddhist analogues to stories of scriptural revelation known from Mahāyāna texts, such as the recovery of the Prajñāpāramitā literature from under the sea by Nāgārjuna, or the visionary revelation of the teachings of Maitreya to Asaṅga. Attention should also be paid to the theoretical apparatus developed in Mahāyāna materials that legitimizes the word of

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

oducing many religious scrip-ed from Indic languages during spread) of Buddhism in Tibet. ire of gter ma text production in ess attention than in Buddhism, ies have been produced in that l, 2004; Cantwell & Mayer, 2013; This article will mostly address a.

ts and objects produced under reference themes and practices of the Yarlung dynasty, primar-9th centuries, when Buddhism South Asia, became established l to have supplanted Bön tradi-ntury, revealed gter ma objects dly hidden during the dynastic for the future discoverer and of visionary direction, were put communities primarily among In its full-blown form, the tradis so revealed took on estimable e, as well as serving to promote practices, and especially char-he tradition of revealing scripjects as gter ma discoveries has r modality of Tibetan religion , and is still producing new med-nd narratives of the past today 2012; Germano, 1998). But while re is very voluminous, we have f the exact practices by which produced.

ecedents

n gter mas to be revealed at ne has notable Buddhist ana-of scriptural revelation known xts, such as the recovery of the erature from under the sea by isionary revelation of the teach-Asaṅga. Attention should also oretical apparatus developed in ls that legitimizes the word of the Buddha (buddhavacana) not directly preached by a buddha but rather through a process of inspiration (Schopen, 1978, 166–172). Such precedents are referenced by the gter ma apologists themselves. Particularly analogous ideas may be recognized in a long passage in the Pratyutpannasamādhisūtra, which predicts that the sūtra itself will "go into a cave in the ground" until five hundred years later, when a few will propagate it again during degenerate times. Here we see presumptions common to the Tibetan gter ma tradition, namely that the future discoverer will be an incarnation of the original recipient of the sūtra's teaching, to whom the Buddha had entrusted the text for future discovery (Harrison, 1990, 96–108). There are also some references in Indic tantric materials to "treasures" (nidhi) whose location in the ground may be determined by means of mantra, ritual, and visualization (Giebel, 2001, 79–80). We further find similar ideas in M. Strickmann's analysis of the story of the concealment and subsequent rediscovery of the 5th-century Chinese tantric work Book of Consecration, its connection to more widespread Buddhist eschatology, and its affinity with the legitimation of apocryphal sūtras in China in general (Strickmann, 1990). However, none of these earlier works displays the distinctive features of the Tibetan tradition, which highlight the role of the gter ma's discovery by a historical individual and which often include detailed autobiographical accounts of the complex process of recovery or visionary revelation whereby the text was rediscovered and then transformed into a cycle of teachings that then came to be followed and preserved by a lineage of practitioners.

---

There also appear to be early roots of the idea of hiding and later revealing important materials in Tibet, quite apart from the gter ma tradition. Some treasure histories, like the Bka' thang sde lnga, describe an old practice of concealing royal treasuries in order to preserve them for future kings and generations, and provide minute details of their contents (O rgyan, 1986, 153–208) R. Davidson proposes that this practice is closely connected to the interment of the Yarlung dynasty kings in tombs inside of large tumuli, the remains of which still stand today, although most of their contents have long been plundered. R. Davidson also finds a parallel between the metaphor of the "vase body" in Rdzogs chen ("Great Perfection") gter ma meditative practices and the image of the royal tomb, since the early treasuries of the kings were considered to embody and preserve the royal soul or bla, and thus were crucial for the flourishing of the nation (Davidson, 2005, 220–224). Tibetan historiography also mentions efforts to protect politically or religiously sensitive materials by concealing them in the ground, in containers, or in temples, albeit with no connection to the gter ma tradition. At least by the time of the royal narrative Dba bzhed (11th cent. or older), we are told that Lha Tho tho ri gnyan btsan (5th cent.[?]), the first Tibetan king who received Buddhist scriptures, and then again the Buddhist conqueror king Srong btsan sgam po (7th cent.), kept these scriptures concealed in a casket and predicted that they would be rediscovered by their descendants (Wangdu & Diemberger, 2000, 24–27). Similarly, a statue of the Buddha is said to have been buried twice when it seemed to be in danger of destruction during the reign of King Khri Srong lde btsan (r. 755–797[?]). The same king reportedly retrieved important Buddhist works, concealed during the time of his father and grandfather, in order to study them (Obermiller, 1931–1932, part II, 186–187). Furthermore, texts related to the Chinese losers of the Samye debate in Tibet between Indian and Chinese versions of Buddhism are also said to have been concealed as gter ma in Samye Monastery (Wangdu & Diemberger, 2000, 87–88n330). In general, scholarly opinion has suggested that such concealments were for pragmatic reasons; perhaps Tibetans even hid sensitive tantric materials from India in temples in central Tibet, which were later rediscovered as well (Davidson, 2005, 215).

We also find Bönpo narratives of hiding gter ma, as early as the 12th-century Grags pa gling grags. For these Bönpo narratives, the gter ma mode of transmission explains the continuity of their traditions during imperial persecution, once by the prehistoric king Dri gum btsan po and then by the Buddhist king Khri Srong lde btsan (Karmay, 1972, 62–62, 93–97). A striking indication of the significance of the gter ma modality for Bön is the fact that the large majority of scriptures in the Bönpo canon (the Bönpo Bka' 'gyur) are deemed to be gter ma (Kvaerne, 1974; Martin et al., 2003).

Supernatural stories of works hidden so as to be discovered in the future by predetermined visionaries are in place in Tibetan Buddhist literature by the 11th century at the latest. One important early example is from the Snying thig ("Heart Sphere") tantras that are part of the corpus of "old tantras" (Dudjom, 1991, 294–343). This is the Rig pa rang shar tantra, said in its colophon to have been hidden by Nyang ban Ting 'dzin bzang po, a Rdzogs chen master from the Imperial Period, and revealed later by Ldang ma lhun rgyal ("Rig pa rang shar chen po'i rgyud," 1991, 100.698). Another putatively early assertion of a gter ma-like discovery regards the text Bka' chems ka khol ma, which says of itself that it was recovered by the Indian master Atiśa (982–1054) from a pillar in Lhasa in the mid-11th century and underscores its supposed prior association with the 6th–7th-century king Srong btsan sgam po's apotheosis as Avalokiteśvara (Smon lam, 1989; van der Kuijp, 1996, 47). The theme of spiritual connection between discoverer and prior concealer is further elaborated in the gter ma text Maṇi bka' 'bum, probably revealed in stages by discoverers Dngos grub and Nyang ral Nyi ma 'od zer (1124–1192) and containing stories of Srong btsan sgam po and a variety of teachings and practices related to Avalokiteśvara. Here the king hides his own teachings on the bodhisattva in various statues in the Lhasa Jokhang Temple for future recovery (Kapstein, 1992).

During the same century, Nyang ral Nyi ma 'od zer and his followers crafted a different story about gter ma that focused on the king Khri Srong lde btsan, Padmasambhava, and their consort Ye shes mtsho rgyal. Padmasambhava is the famed master of tantric Buddhism who, according to Tibetan historiography, came to Tibet from northwest India in the late 8th century to help the king suppress or convert local demons and establish the teachings of Buddhism instead. His historicity is not entirely established, although it is likely that someone with that name was teaching in Tibet during Khri srong lde btsan's reign. Despite a mixed picture of Padmasambhava in earlier sources, which have him mostly connected to the Mahāyoga tantra Vajrakīla and related scriptures, and only staying for a short time in Tibet (Wangdu & Diemberger, 2000, 52–59), Nyang ral produced a long hagiography that has Padmasambhava staying in Tibet for years, during which time he transmits many other kinds of tantric and Rdzogs chen teachings as well, and then conceals many of these as gter ma with the help of Ye shes mtsho rgyal (Nyang ral, 1989; Ye shes mtsho rgyal, 1993). In fact, recent research has shown that some of the early gter ma passages extolling Padmasambhava are already to be found in similar form in manuscripts retrieved from Dunhuang, thus pushing back the roots of the story that places Padmasambhava at the heart of the mature gter ma tradition at least into the 10th or 11th century (Cantwell & Mayer, 2012, 92–94). With the work of Nyang ral, the full transformation of the figure of Padmasambhava into the master of the entire Rnying ma dispensation and esoteric transmitter of a wide range of gter ma teachings to future discoverers was complete.

Nyang ral nyi ma 'od zer was one of the earliest Buddhist gter ma discoverers. He produced a robust cycle of teachings and meditative practices on the deities of the Mahāyoga class of Rnying ma tantras known as the Bka' brgyad (Dudjom, 1991, 275–283; Kong sprul, 1976a, vols. XXI–XXII) A century later, Gu ru Chos dbang (1212–1270) presented his own version of these teachings, also in gter ma format (Kong sprul, 1976a, vols. XXII–XXIII). In addition to these Mahāyoga-related *gter ma*s, the Snying thig *gter ma*s also appeared in this early period. These were connected instead to the Snying thig tantras and Rdzogs chen tradition of visionary practices, probably introduced to Tibet by the Indian master Vimalamitra in the 8th century and later patronized by the Tibetan Lce and Zhang clans (Germano, 1994; 2002, 241–248). The Snying thig *gter ma*s came to be codified in the 14th century by the great Rnying ma scholar Klong chen rab 'byams pa (1308–1364) in an important collection of gter ma cycles known as Snying tig ya bzhi (Klong chen, 1975). A prominent merger of the Rdzogs chen practices of the Snying thig tradition with the visualizations of Mahāyoga was produced by the 18th-century 'Jigs med gling pa (1729–1798), based on his own visions and meditative experiences of Klong chen pa (Gyatso, 1998). His Klong chen snying thig cycle remains one of the most popular gter ma cycles today ('Jigs med, 1973), along with the gter gsar (new treasure) revelations of Chos gyur gling pa (1829–1870), Bdud 'joms gling pa (1835–1904), and Bdud 'joms 'Jigs bral ye shes rdo rje (1904–1987). But there have been many other important gter ma cycles as well. Some of the highlights are the Byang gter (northern treasure) revelations of Rig 'dzin rgod ldem can (1337–1409), the work of Ratna Gling pa (1403–1479), who compiled one of the earliest collections of the Rnying ma rgyud 'bum (old tantras), the revelations of Rdo rje gling pa (1346–1405), and those of the prolific visionary of Bhutan, Pema gling pa (1450–1521; Aris, 1988). Gter bdag gling pa (1646–1714), a prominent master who founded Smin grol gling Monastery in central Tibet and a confidante and teacher of the powerful fifth Dalai Lama Ngag dbang blo bzang rgya mtsho (1617–1682), also produced gter ma cycles. In addition to Kong sprul Blo gros mtha' yas and 'Jam dbyangs mkhyen rtse dbang po, whose outstanding work of compilation and new revelation in the 19th century is discussed below, other leading figures in the gter ma movement in recent times have been

---

Bsod rgyal las rab gling pa ( the thirteenth Dalai Lama; tion 'Jigs med phun tshogs ' who established a very larg eastern Tibet (Germano, 1 brtse (c. 1910–1991), reincar mkhyen rtse dbang po and i pa; the female teacher Se rdo rje (1892–1940; Jacoby, female reincarnation Ta re mo (1938–2003; Gayley, 20 ers in the West such as Chög (Chos rgyam Drung pa; 19 Norbu (Nam mkha'i nor bu;

Historiography and Several of the key gter ma te with history than with doct least the two in equal meas case in the Kha chems ka bka' 'bum, and it is further e gter ma biography of Padn coverer O rgyan gling pa's narratives of the Imperial sde lnga, along with his ow sambhava, Padma bka' tha While recounting many o are addressed in more ma hensive Tibetan Buddhis as the histories called chos dharma) and other genre tories are composed in a also distinguished by the o the gter shad punctuation shad [|] that marks the en sentences. They begin with early kings and advance in around Padmasambhava, he was invited from Oḍḍiy to tame the unruly demon Buddhist philosopher Śānt in Tibet in the late 8th centu ral's rendition of his life, Pa trayed as able to foresee the of Tibet would need speci therefore formulated and t ings to specially appointed to implant in their minds a ory in the future when they the teachings at the right ti sation and esoteric transmitter of er ma teachings to future discover-na 'od zer was one of the earliest discoverers. He produced a robust and meditative practices on the āyoga class of Rnying ma tantras ' brgyad (Dudjom, 1991, 275–283;

, vols. XXI–XXII) A century later, g (1212–1270) presented his own eachings, also in gter ma format , vols. XXII–XXIII). In addition to elated gter mas, the Snying thig eared in this early period. These stead to the Snying thig tantras tradition of visionary practices, ed to Tibet by the Indian master 8th century and later patronized and Zhang clans (Germano, 1994; e Snying thig gter mas came to 14th century by the great Rnying hen rab 'byams pa (1308–1364) in ction of gter ma cycles known as (Klong chen, 1975). A prominent gs chen practices of the Snying the visualizations of Mahāyoga e 18th-century 'Jigs med gling pa on his own visions and meditaf Klong chen pa (Gyatso, 1998). ing thig cycle remains one of the ma cycles today ('Jigs med, 1973), gsar (new treasure) revelations pa (1829–1870), Bdud 'joms gling d Bdud 'joms 'Jigs bral ye shes ). But there have been many er ma cycles as well. Some of the Byang gter (northern treasure) dzin rgod ldem can (1337–1409), Gling pa (1403–1479), who comiest collections of the Rnying ma tras), the revelations of Rdo rje ), and those of the prolific vision-a gling pa (1450–1521; Aris, 1988).
(1646–1714), a prominent master grol gling Monastery in central ante and teacher of the power-a Ngag dbang blo bzang rgya also produced gter ma cycles. In rul Blo gros mtha' yas and 'Jam e dbang po, whose outstanding and new revelation in the 19th below, other leading figures in ent in recent times have been

Bsod rgyal las rab gling pa (1856–1926), a teacher to the thirteenth Dalai Lama; Bsod rgyal's reincarnation 'Jigs med phun tshogs 'byung gnas (1933–2004), who established a very large monastery in 1980 in eastern Tibet (Germano, 1998); Dil mgo mkhyen brtse (c. 1910–1991), reincarnation of 'Jam dbyangs mkhyen rtse dbang po and in turn of 'Jigs med gling pa; the female teacher Se ra mkha' 'gro Bde ba'i rdo rje (1892–1940; Jacoby, 2014); Se ra mkha' 'gro's female reincarnation Ta re lha mo nam mkha'i bu mo (1938–2003; Gayley, 2009); and popular teachers in the West such as Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche (Chos rgyam Drung pa; 1939–1987) and Namkha'i Norbu (Nam mkha'i nor bu; 1938-).

Historiography and Apologetics

Several of the key gter ma texts are concerned more with history than with doctrine and practice, or at least the two in equal measure. This is already the case in the Kha chems ka khol ma and the Maṇi bka' 'bum, and it is further evidenced by Nyang ral's gter ma biography of Padmasabhava and the discoverer O rgyan gling pa's (b. 1323) five books of narratives of the Imperial Period, the Bka' thang sde lnga, along with his own biography of Padmasambhava, Padma bka' thang (O rgyan, 1986; 1987). While recounting many of the same events that are addressed in more mainstream and comprehensive Tibetan Buddhist historiography, such as the histories called chos 'byung (coming of the dharma) and other genre labels, the gter ma histories are composed in a prophetic voice and are also distinguished by the orthographical device of the gter shad punctuation [༔] instead of the usual shad [।] that marks the ends of Tibetan clauses or sentences. They begin with the stories around the early kings and advance in particular the narrative around Padmasambhava, with details about how he was invited from Oḍḍiyāna in northwest India to tame the unruly demons of Tibet by the Indian Buddhist philosopher Śāntarakṣita, who was also in Tibet in the late 8th century. Starting with Nyang ral's rendition of his life, Padmasambhava was portrayed as able to foresee the future, when the people of Tibet would need special tantric teachings. He therefore formulated and transmitted those teachings to specially appointed disciples and proceeded to implant in their minds a key to be held in memory in the future when they would be able to reveal the teachings at the right time. His consort Ye shes mtsho rgyal then helped Padmasambhava to record the main gter ma teaching in writing, often condensed into code that could only be deciphered by the appointed discoverer, and then concealed the text where it would often lie for centuries (Gyatso, 1983; 1993). This story is also repeated frequently in summary in the historical sections to be found in many of the individual gter ma ritual cycles. Additionally there develops a hagiography around Ye she mtsho rgyal herself. She was a wife of Khri Srong lde btsan and then bestowed as an offering by the king on Padmasambhava (Gyatso, 2006). She became an enlightened master in her own right, as related in several gter ma versions of her life, most famously by the 17th-century visionary Stag sham nus ldan rdo rje (b. 1655).

An early sign of a self-consciousness among its adherents that gter ma is a tradition in its own right is the history and defense of the gter ma mode of textual production written by Gu ru Chos dbang (Gyatso, 1994). This work claimed that gter ma was a common mode of transmission even in Indian Buddhism, and that works like Vasubandhu's Abhidharmakośa are actually gter ma texts. It also characterized many kinds of objects and other things as gter ma, including hidden forests and water supplies. Another lengthy defense of gter ma as well as a brilliant theoretical exposition of its metaphysical grounds, the process of visionary inspiration, and its evocative semiotics was written by the third Rdo grub chen incarnation, 'Jigs med bstan pa nyi ma (1865–1926[?]), in the 19th century (Rdo grub chen, 1975; Thondup, 1997; Gyatso, 1986).

A further sure sign that gter ma came to be viewed as a consolidated tradition in its own right is the creation of biographical collections devoted to telling the life stories of the discoverers. While most of these collections may only have appeared in the last two centuries, they are based on earlier lists of prophesied discoverers found in the hagiographies of Padmasambhava, such as that by O rgyan gling pa. Fleshed-out biographies of the gter ma discoverers are included in an important five-volume study of the Rnying ma school, compiled in 1807–1809 by Guru Bkra shis (Guru, vol. II, n.d.). These biographies were picked up and expanded by the Gter rnam brgya rtsa composed by the great 19th-century polymath Kong sprul blo gros mtha' yas (1813–1899; Kong sprul, 1976b). This detailed study of more than one hundred gter ma discoverers fills most of the first large volume of the Rin chen gter mdzod, a massive collection, originally consisting in 63 large volumes of a wide range of gter ma cycles of teachings available to Kong sprul in the 19th century (Kong sprul, 1976a; Schwieger, 2010).

The surest sign that gter ma was cast as a tradition unto itself, the Rin chen gter mdzod stands as a veritable canon of gter ma literature, an authoritative corpus of sacred history, religious philosophy, and practice, all presented as revealed scripture. It was put together by Kong sprul with the help of his visionary colleague 'Jam dbyangs mkhyen brtse'i dbang po; both were leaders of the Ris med (nonsectarian) movement that flourished in 19th-century eastern Tibet, and sought out a wide range of esoteric Buddhist teaching traditions in Tibetan Buddhism, largely including all schools save the Dge lugs pas, who enjoyed political ascendency since the rise of the Dalai Lamas (Gardner, 2006). Cogently organized around type of practice, deity on which the practice focuses, and level of metaphysical assumptions about the status of the deity vis-à-vis the practitioner, the Rin chen gter mdzod provides a comprehensive survey of the approaches to guru yoga, deity yoga, and formless visionary practice as these were formulated by gter ma discoverers over the centuries. In particular, it provides a massive array of genre rubrics for kinds of rituals as these were practiced in Tibetan religion.

The Buddhist gter mas purport to have been authored originally by the Buddha in some form. This claim, plus the additional contentions that the material was later reformulated by Padmasambhava, concealed for specially prophesied discoverers in the future, and then indeed recovered by those individuals at the appointed time and place, was understandably controversial. Not only was its transmission story implausible, but it also invited the production of apocryphal literature with little quality control. Most of all, the claim that the root gter ma texts were originally preached by the Buddha meant that they would be classed as buddhavacana, rendering them on a par with the great classics in the Kanjur and threatening the supreme authority of the sūtras and tantras so carefully collected and translated during the early centuries of Tibetan Buddhism. Among the considered critiques of the entire notion of gter ma and the problem of apocrypha is a work by Sum pa mkhan po Ye shes dpal 'byor (1704–1787), whose argument includes matters of historical authenticity as evidenced by the lack of mention of the gter ma works in early catalogues of scriptural works from the Dynastic Period. This work was critiqued by Thu'u bkwan Chos kyi nyi ma (1737–1802), who argued against a blanket dismissal of this mode of textual transmission (Vostrikov, 1970, 56–57; Kapstein, 1989). But even prominent members of the Rnying ma school expressed their hesitations, for example the great 19th-century scholar 'Ju Mi pham (1846–1912; Mi pham, 1972).

Nevertheless, the gter ma tradition clearly made signal contributions to Tibetan religious culture. In addition to the defenses of the entire tradition as seen in the work of Guru Chos dbang and Rdo Grub chen, most cycles included special texts devoted to recounting the ultimate origin of the gter ma in question and to the process of discovery by the historical individual in Tibet. The former were often imaginative explorations of the metaphysics of the truth of the Buddha's teachings and the manner in which such exalted truths were rendered into communicable, linguistic form. The latter consisted in detailed autobiographical accounts of visionary states and much else and probably contributed to the explosion of autobiographical writing more generally in Tibetan literature, in contrast to its paucity in many other Buddhist contexts across Asia (Gyatso, 1993; 1998). Additionally, as the exploration into the visionary dimension of gter ma discovery gathered steam, the claim that a physical relic of a centuries-old manuscript was discovered on which the rest of the gter ma cycle was based was eschewed in some quarters. Instead, the entire process could transpire in spiritual realms, whereby the core of the gter ma cycle would simply be buried deep in the prophesied discoverer's memory, preserved in seminal form over many lifetimes, until it would reemerge on the surface of consciousness at the right time. This eliminated the material dimensions of gter ma discovery altogether, and prompted the articulation of the category of dgongs gter ("mental gter ma"), as opposed to the old idea of sa gter ("earth gter ma"). Such an approach to scriptural production opened the gates for even more creativity, and was the grounds on which 'Jam dbyangs mkhyen brtse'i dbang po contributed several entire cycles of gter ma texts to the Rin chen gter mdzod, attributing them, however, to early or obscure discoverers whose revelatory writings were no longer extant.

The gter ma mode of transmission also facilitated the ascription of works other than religious texts to a date earlier than that which, from a modern historical perspective, we would judge to be the date of its actual author. One outstanding example is the Tibetan medical classic Rgyud bzhi ("Four Treatises"), composed by the 12th-century G.yu thog Yon tan mgon po on the basis of an eclectic set of medical traditions available Rgyud bzhi was nonetheless cine buddha Bhaiṣajyaguru been composed originally into Tibetan in the Imperial as gter ma until its recover by G.yu thog Yon tan mgon contested by later Tibetan grounds of the nature of th climatic conditions describ 2015). This debate represent cal approach to the entire scripture.

---

Bibliography

Achard, J., Bon Po Hidden Treas
bDe chen gling pa's Collected Aris, M., Hidden Treasures and lingpa, 1450–1521, and the S Shimla, 1988.
Cantwell, C., & R. Mayer, "Nei
The Bon Ka ba Nag po in Rel in: B. Dotson, K. Iwao & T.
Texts, and Rituals in Early Tib 2013, 87–100.
Cantwell, C., & R. Mayer, Noble Garland Synopsis: A Mahāy
tary, Vienna, 2012.
Davidson, R., Tibetan Renaissa
Rebirth of Tibetan Culture, Ne Dowman, K., Sky Dancer: The Yeshe Tsogyel, London, 1984.
Dudjom Rinpoche, The Nyingm
Its Fundamentals and Histor Gardner, A., "The Twenty-five gious Geography, Revelati Nineteenth-Century Easter
Michigan, 2006.
Gayley, A.H., "Agency and the the Buddhist Revival in the Tare Lhamo (1938–2002) a (1944–)," diss., Harvard Univ Germano, D.F., "The Seven De
'gyur: The 'History' of rNyi & D.F. Germano, eds., The dhism: PIATS 2000: Tibeta Ninth Seminar of the Intern Studies, Leiden, 2000, 241–2 Germano, D.F., "Re-memberi Tibet: The Contemporary T
M. Goldstein & M. Kapstein rary Tibet: Religious Revival 1998, 53–94.
Germano, D.F., "Architecture a tric History of rDzogs Chen, blanket dismissal of this mode of ssion (Vostrikov, 1970, 56–57; Kap-even prominent members of the ol expressed their hesitations, for t 19th-century scholar 'Ju Mi pham am, 1972).

the gter ma tradition clearly made ons to Tibetan religious culture. In defenses of the entire tradition as of Guru Chos dbang and Rdo Grub es included special texts devoted ultimate origin of the gter ma in he process of discovery by the his-in Tibet. The former were often rations of the metaphysics of the ha's teachings and the manner in d truths were rendered into com-stic form. The latter consisted in graphical accounts of visionary else and probably contributed to autobiographical writing more tan literature, in contrast to its her Buddhist contexts across Asia ). Additionally, as the exploration dimension of gter ma discovery e claim that a physical relic of a uscript was discovered on which ma cycle was based was eschewed Instead, the entire process could ual realms, whereby the core of would simply be buried deep in scoverer's memory, preserved in many lifetimes, until it would surface of consciousness at the inated the material dimensions y altogether, and prompted the category of dgongs gter ("mental d to the old idea of sa gter ("earth approach to scriptural produces for even more creativity, and n which 'Jam dbyangs mkhyen tributed several entire cycles of Rin chen gter mdzod, attributto early or obscure discoverers itings were no longer extant.
e of transmission also facilitated rks other than religious texts to hat which, from a modern his-we would judge to be the date
. One outstanding example is classic Rgyud bzhi ("Four Trea-y the 12th-century G.yu thog n the basis of an eclectic set of medical traditions available in Tibet at that time. The Rgyud bzhi was nonetheless attributed to the medicine buddha Bhaiṣajyaguru and purported to have been composed originally in Sanskrit, translated into Tibetan in the Imperial Period, and then hidden as gter ma until its recovery several centuries later by G.yu thog Yon tan mgon po. This claim was hotly contested by later Tibetan medical scholars, on the grounds of the nature of the foods, medicines, and climatic conditions described in the work (Gyatso, 2015). This debate represents a distinctively empirical approach to the entire question of apocryphal scripture.

Bibliography

Achard, J., Bon Po Hidden Treasures: A Catalogue of gTer ston bDe chen gling pa's Collected Revelations, Leiden, 2004.

Aris, M., Hidden Treasures and Secret Lives: A Study of Pemalingpa, 1450–1521, and the Sixth Dalai Lama, 1683–1706, Shimla, 1988.

Cantwell, C., & R. Mayer, "Neither the Same Nor Different: The Bon Ka ba Nag po in Relation to Rnying ma Phur pa," in: B. Dotson, K. Iwao & T. Takeuchi, eds., Text, Scribes, Texts, and Rituals in Early Tibet and Dunhuang, Wiesbaden, 2013, 87–100.

Cantwell, C., & R. Mayer, Noble Noose of Methods: The Lotus Garland Synopsis: A Mahāyoga Tantra and Its Commentary, Vienna, 2012.

Davidson, R., Tibetan Renaissance: Tantric Buddhism in the Rebirth of Tibetan Culture, New York, 2005.

Dowman, K., Sky Dancer: The Secret Life and Songs of Lady Yeshe Tsogyel, London, 1984.

Dudjom Rinpoche, The Nyingma School of Tibetan Buddhism: Its Fundamentals and History, 2 vols., Boston, 1991.

Gardner, A., "The Twenty-five Great Sites of Khams: Religious Geography, Revelation, and Nonsectarianism in Nineteenth-Century Eastern Tibet," diss., University of Michigan, 2006.

Gayley, A.H., "Agency and the Rhetoric of Destiny: Narrating the Buddhist Revival in the Lives and Letters of Khandro Tare Lhamo (1938–2002) and Namtrul Jigme Phuntsok (1944–)," diss., Harvard University, 2009.

Germano, D.F., "The Seven Descents and the Nature of sNga' 'gyur: The 'History' of rNying ma Tantras," in: H. Eimer & D.F. Germano, eds., The Many Canons of Tibetan Buddhism: PIATS 2000: Tibetan Studies: Proceedings of the Ninth Seminar of the International Association for Tibetan Studies, Leiden, 2000, 241–248.

Germano, D.F., "Re-membering the Dismembered Body of Tibet: The Contemporary Ter Movement in the PRC," in: M. Goldstein & M. Kapstein, eds., Buddhism in Contemporary Tibet: Religious Revival and Cultural Identity, Berkeley, 1998, 53–94.

Germano, D.F., "Architecture and Absence in the Secret Tantric History of rDzogs Chen," JIABS 17/2, 1994, 203–335.

Giebel, R., Two Esoteric Sutras: The Adamantine Pinnacle Sutra: The Susiddhikara Sutra: Translated from the Chinese (Taishō Volume 18, Numbers 865, 893), Berkeley, 2001.

Guru bkra shis ngag dbang blo gros, Bstan pa'i snying po gsang chen snga 'gyur nges don zab mo'i chos kyi 'byung ba gsal bar byed pa'i legs bshad mkhas pa dga' byed ngo mtshar gtam gyi rol mtsho, 5 vols., n.l., n.d..

Gyatso, J., Being Human in a Buddhist World: An Intellectual History of Medicine in Early Modern Tibet, New York, 2015.

Gyatso, J., "A Partial Genealogy of the Lifestory of Yeshe Tsogyal," JIATS 2, 2006, 1–27.

Gyatso, J., Apparitions of the Self: The Secret Autobiographies of a Tibetan Visionary, Princeton, 1998.

Gyatso, J., "Guru Chos-dbang's gTer 'byung chen mo: An Early Survey of the Treasure Tradition and Its Strategies in Discussing Bon Treasure," in: P. Kværne, ed., Tibetan Studies: Proceedings of the Sixth International Association of Tibetan Studies Seminar, vol. I, Oslo, 1994, 275–287.

Gyatso, J., "The Logic of Legitimation in the Tibetan Treasure Tradition," HR 33/1, 1993, 97–134.

Gyatso, J., "Signs, Memory and History: A Tantric Buddhist Theory of Scriptural Transmission," JIABS 9/2, 1986, 7–35.

Hall, A.J., "Revelations of a Modern Mystic: The Life and Legacy of Kun Bzang Bde Chen Gling Pa 1928–2006," diss., University of Oxford, 2012.

Harrison, P., The Samādhi of Direct Encounter with the Buddhas of the Present: An Annotated English Translation of the Tibetan Version of the Pratyutpanna-Buddha-Saṃmukhāvasthita-Samādhi-Sūtra, Tokyo, 1990.

Jacoby, S., Love and Liberation: Autobiographical Writings of the Tibetan Buddhist Visionary Sera Khandro, New York, 2014.

'Jigs med gling pa, Klong chen snying thig, A 'dzom chos sgar Blocks, 3 vols., New Delhi, 1973.

Kapstein, M., "Remarks on the Maṇi-bka'-'bum and the Cult of Avalokiteśvara in Tibet," in: R. Davidson & S. Goodman, eds., Tibetan Buddhism: Reason and Revelation, Albany, 1992, 79–93.

Kapstein, M., "The Purificatory Gem and Its Cleansing: A Late Tibetan Polemical Discussion of Apocryphal Texts," HR 28/3, 1989, 217–244.

Karmay, S., The Treasury of Good Sayings: A Tibetan History of Bon, London, 1972.

Klong chen rab 'byams dri med 'od zer, Snying thig ya bzhi, 13 vols., Delhi, 1975.

Kong sprul Blo gros mtha' yas, ed., Rin chen gter mdzod chen mo, 111 vols., Paro, 1976a.

Kong sprul Blo gros mtha' yas, "Zab mo 'i gter dang gter ston grub thob ji ltar byon pa'i lo rgyus mdor bsdus bkod pa rin chen baiḍūrya'i phreng ba," in: Blo gros mtha' yas, ed., Rin chen gter mdzod chen mo Paro: Ngodrup & Sherap Drimay, vol. I, 1976b, 291–759.

Kuijp, L. van der, "Tibetan Historiography," in: J. Cabezon & R. Jackson, eds., Tibetan Literature: Studies in Genre, Ithaca, 1996, 39–56.

Kværne, P., "The Canon of the Tibetan Bon pos," IIJ 16/1, 1974, 18–56; 16/4, 1974, 96–144.

Martin, D., Unearthing Bon Treasures: Life and Contested Legacy of a Tibetan Scripture Revealer, with a General Bibliography of Bon, Leiden, 2001.

Martin, D., Mandala Cosmogony: Human Body Good Thought and the Revelation of the Secret Mother Tantras of Bon, Wiesbaden, 1994.

Martin, D., P. Kværne & Y. Nagano, eds., A Catalogue of the Bon Kanjur, Osaka, 2003.

Mi pham rgya mtsho, 'Jam mgon 'Ju, "Gang can pa spyi dang khyad par rnying ma pa rnams la gdams pa," in: Mi pham rgya mtsho, Gzan ston khas len sen gei na ro, n.l., 1972, 10b–16b.

Nyang ral nyi ma 'od zer, Slob dpon pad ma 'i rnam thar zangs gling ma (Par gzhi 1. ed.), Chengdu, 1989.

O rgyan gling pa, Padma bka' thang, Chengdu, 1987.

O rgyan gling pa, Bka' thang sde lnga, Beijing, 1986.

Obermiller, E., History of Buddhism = Chos ḥbyung Bu-ston Rin-chen-grub, 1290–1364, Heidelberg, 1931–1932.

Rdo grup chen 'Jigs med bstan pa nyi ma, "Las 'phro gter brgyud kyi rnam bshad nyung gsal ngo mtshar rgya mtsho," in: 'Jigs med bstan pa'i nyi ma, The Collected Works of rDo Grub Chen Jigs Med Bstan Pa Nyima, vol. IV, Gangtok, 1975, 377–447.

"Rig pa rang shar chen po'i rgyud," in: A. Barber, ed., The Tibetan Tripitaka Taipei Edition, vol. LVI, Taipei, 1991, 47.323–100.699.

Sakaki Ryōsaburō (榊亮三郎), Mahāvyutpatti, Kyoto, 1916.

Schopen, G.R., "The Bhaisajyaguru-Sutra and the Buddhism of Gilgit," diss., Australian National University, 1978.

Schweiger, P., "Collecting and Arranging the gTer ma Tradition: Kong sprul's Great Treasury of the Hidden Teachings," in: A. Chayet, C. Scherrer-Schaub, F. Robin & J. Achard, eds., Edition, éditions: l'écrit au Tibet, évolution et devenir, Munich, 2010.

Smon lam rgya mtsho, ed., Bka' chems ka khol ma, Lanzhou, 1989.

Strickmann, M., "The Consecration Sutra: A Buddhist Book of Spells," in: R. Buswell, Jr., ed., Chinese Buddhist Apochrypha, Honolulu, 1990, 75–118.

Thondup, T., Hidden Teachings of Tibet: An Explanation of the Terma Tradition of Tibetan Buddhism, Boston, 1997.

Vostrikov, A.I., Tibetan Historical Literature, Calcutta, 1970.

Wangdu, P., & H. Diemberger, Dba' bzhed: The Royal Narrative concerning the Bringing of the Buddha's Doctrine to Tibet: Translation and Facsimile Edition of the Tibetan Text, Vienna, 2000.

Ye shes mtsho rgyal, The Lotus-Born: The Life Story of Padmasambhava, Recorded by Yeshe Tsogyal, Boston, 1993.

JANET GYATSO

haisajyaguru-Sutra and the Buddhism tralian National University, 1978.
ting and Arranging the gTer ma Tradi-Great Treasury of the Hidden Teach-et, C. Scherrer-Schaub, F. Robin & ion, éditions: l'écrit au Tibet, évolution et 10.
, ed., Bka' chems ka khol ma, Lanzhou,

Consecration Sutra: A Buddhist Book well, Jr., ed., Chinese Buddhist Apochry-
, 75–118. eachings of Tibet: An Explanation of the Tibetan Buddhism, Boston, 1997.
Historical Literature, Calcutta, 1970. emberger, Dba' bzhed: The Royal Nar- e Bringing of the Buddha's Doctrine to nd Facsimile Edition of the Tibetan Text, he Lotus-Born: The Life Story of Padmad by Yeshe Tsogyal, Boston, 1993.

JANET GYATSO

Nonscriptural

Commentary

Commentary: Overview

The writing of commentaries has been and continues to be one of the fundamental literary activities of Buddhists everywhere. For more than two thousand years, going back to the earliest days of the tradition, commentaries have been used to learn and teach the words of the Buddha, to transmit their form and content faithfully, and to systematize and develop Buddhist doctrine.

A commentary can be defined as a sustained textual mediation of the meaning and form of a culturally significant root text, or more simply the "continuous explication of text" (Guthmüller, 2013), to distinguish it from the more localized and occasional type of explication represented by glosses. At the same time, the very word "commentary" indicates, for the Western European tradition, a gradual evolution from glosses into the new literary genre of commentary: Latin commentarium originally meant "collection of notes (commenta)" (OED, 2012, s.v.; the same relationship holds between the Indian terms vārttika and vṛtti). It took until the 5th century CE for such notes to develop into the first full-fledged commentary (Servius's commentary on Virgil), and by the 12th century, Latin commentaries had become the "most important form of scholarly literature" in Europe (Guthmüller, 2013). What we have is thus a development from paratext to an independent work that stands in a truly intertextual relationship with its root text, with which it may engage selectively and in a topical order of its own choice. Early Buddhist commentaries not only performed the same task of continuous explication as the Latin commenta but also served as a tool for the rational organization of the teachings of the Buddha collected in the early Buddhist canons. From the very beginning, this organization entailed differences of opinion and organizational principles among various authorities. In the course of time, Buddhist commentators gradually assumed a voice of their own and developed original doctrinal and philosophical systems, while keeping to the literary form of commentary. This strategy allowed them to assert continuity with their tradition, while the different layers of root text and commentary facilitated the use of complex argument structures (Slaje, 2007, 73–74; Ganeri, 2011, 114–115); in the history of Buddhist studies, however, it has led to a certain neglect of commentarial literature due to a mistaken assumption of lack of creativity (Kramer, 2013). In the Buddhist world as in the Latin world, the 5th century marks the consolidation of earlier exegetical material into comprehensive commentaries on which following generations of scholars built. In parallel with these "literary" commentaries, the production of "curricular" commentaries rooted in an instructional setting and based on either teachers' or students' notes continued to be a powerful force throughout the history of Buddhism (Ganeri, 2011, 113–114; Krasser, 2011). Some of these curricular commentaries were elaborated and crossed over into the literary tradition; others remained ephemeral, yet formed and continue to form the backbone of local Buddhist instruction (McDaniel, 2008, 191–204).

Principles and Classification

The main subgenres of Buddhist commentary are the following:

1. lexical and grammatical explanation of the language of their root texts;
2. scholastic, philosophical, and juridical elaboration of their root texts' content; and
3. narrative explanation of root texts that could develop a life of its own (as with the explanatory background narratives that have been added separately to the Pali and Chinese versions of the Dharmapada verse collection).

While any given commentary can be categorized as primarily belonging to one of these subgenres, commentaries often combine characteristics of more than one subgenre. A basic categorization of the services provided by Buddhist commentaries would consist of linguistic and factual explanation, textual criticism (discussing variant readings), and higher criticism. That is, commentaries attempt to explain terms, provide information on allusions, and so on; or they offer textual information (this may overlap with the first category, e.g. if a term is replaced); or a commentary may reflect on the meaning and message of a text or elucidate its underlying, salvifically relevant meaning, which often involves the collection, discussion, and refutation of different authoritative opinions.

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

The Buddhist traditions of India developed their own formulations of the principles and purposes of commentarial activity. The Catuṣpratisaraṇasūtra (Discourse on the Four Resorts), extant in several Sanskrit versions and in Chinese, lays down the following four "resorts" for the commentator: the teaching itself (dharma) should be followed, not the person of any particular teacher (puruṣa); the meaning (artha) of the teaching should be followed, not its specific formulation (vyañjana); teachings with clear meaning (nītārtha) should be followed rather than those whose meaning needs establishing (neyārtha); and direct knowledge (jñāna) should be followed rather than discursive knowledge (vijñāna; Lamotte, 1949; Davidson, 1990).

This early canonical set of four "resorts" partly overlaps with four kinds of "discrimination" that the Saṃdhinirmocanasūtra (Discourse Resolving Difficulties; c. 3rd cent. CE) presents as characteristic of the communicative abilities of a bodhisattva (and thus to be imitated by the ideal commentator): discrimination (pratisaṃvid) concerning the words of the teaching (dharma), the meaning of the teaching (artha), linguistic shape (nirukti), such as dialectal differences, and lucidity (pratibhāna; Nance, 2012, 59–60). The first two of these abilities are prerequisites for understanding the word of the Buddha, the other two for communicating it to any given audience. A special case of the latter is the translation of Buddhist scriptures into non-Indian languages, and some commentaries were composed to serve precisely this purpose (e.g. the Udānavargavivaraṇa; Explanation of the Chapters of Inspired Utterances; see below).

The twin exegetical concerns with dharma and artha have an echo in the modern scholarly distinction between Textpflege and Sinnpflege ("curation of text" and "curation of meaning"; comp. Freiberger, 2000, 24, adopting terminology from Assmann & Assmann, 1987). The third term in the modern classification of commentarial purposes – Zensur, the distinction between authentic and unauthentic texts and the establishment of a canon – likewise constitutes a traditional Buddhist concern, as reflected for instance in the Mahāpadeśasūtra (Great Discourse on Criteria [for Authenticity]; Lamotte, 1947; Davidson, 1990).

The specific methods employed by commentaries to accomplish these aims are enumerated in Vasubandhu's very influential reflection on interpretation, the Vyākhyāyukti (Principles of Exegesis; c. 5th cent.), as (1) establishment of the purpose of the commentary (prayojana), (2) statement of the overall meaning (piṇḍārtha), (3) explanation of the meanings of words (padārtha), (4) demonstration of connections with other Buddhist texts and elements of Buddhist doctrine (anusaṃdhi), and (5) refutation of objections (codyaparihāra), building on a similar list in the Vivaraṇasaṃgrahaṇī chapter of the Yogācārabhūmi (Nance, 2012, 105–120, 167–212). This Buddhist list of five terms resembles (and possibly inspired) a more general conception of the services of a classical Indian literary or scholastic commentary that persisted into modern times. One may compare for instance the enumeration of five exegetical services in a verse quoted in the 19th-century compendium Nyāyakośa (Treasury of Nyāya Philosophy; Jhaḷakîkar, 1893): padaccheda (word division), padārthokti (stating the meaning of words), vigraha (compound resolution), vākyayojanā (construal of sentences), ākṣepasamādhāna (answering of objections; Tubb & Boose, 2007, 3–5).

As Buddhist commentarial literature developed, a broad range of terminology came into use to distinguish (at least for us today not always clearly) between types and subtypes of commentaries. The earliest types of Buddhist commentary are called vibhaṅga and nirdeśa. The Sanskrit tradition of mainland India knows the terms bhāṣya (with which comp. Patañjali's grammatical commentary Mahābhāṣya [Great Commentary]; c. 2nd cent. BCE), vyākhyā, vṛtti, vivaraṇa, ṭīkā, and more. The Pali tradition of Sri Lanka and Southeast Asia developed a different set of terms: aṭṭhakathā, ṭīkā, atthayojanā, ganṭhipadavivaraṇa, and others. Looking beyond Buddhism, the various layers of Jaina commentarial literature present a similar mixture of pan-Indian and specific terminology: bhāsa, nijjutti, and cuṇṇi for Prakrit commentaries and vṛtti and ṭīkā for Sanskrit commentaries (Balbir, 2009, 48–53; for the terminology of Sanskrit philosophical literature, see also Ganeri, 2011, 103). This general situation is mirrored in European humanist and Renaissance commentaries: "very many terms applied to [them], not always displaying any clear distinction . . . (commentarius, interpretatio, enarratio, expositio, explicatio, adnotationes, glossae, scholia etc.)" (Guthmüller, 2013).

Over time, particularly important canonical texts attracted whole clusters of commentaries. These may be considered "commentarial complexes," because the multiple layers of commentaries and subcommentaries cross-each other. Moreover, s recognized, since sever together in teaching and of such complexes that arly attention are the Brahmajālasuttanta (D Net; Bodhi, 1978), the P the Doctrine; Carter & Heart Sūtra (Lopez, 198 (Discourse on the Rice uniquely elaborate case is the Pali aṭṭhakathā an planned enterprise com the Pali canon (Bond, 19

---

The Early Period

The earliest Buddhist tions of occasional (and below on the Suttanidd courses], commonly ca Chinese scripture com such glosses also provi gradual expansion of t means of synonym stri clichés. A case in point of the Aṣṭasāhasrikā of Understanding in E its earliest accessible v through the exemplar translation into the tra & Karashima, 2012; 201 text grew through such ical, explanatory expan

Another starting po commentary were the speaking, the word o since "the sūtra disco dha's insights and the the tradition presents tion, in the course of Buddha formulated th ways for different audi ferent commentarial a sionally, the Buddha d teaching to one of his textual product one st tary. The best-known e Saṃgītisūtra (Discour
when back pain preve

the Vyākhyāyukti (Principles cent.), as (1) establishment the commentary (prayojana), e overall meaning (piṇḍārtha), e meanings of words (padārtha), of connections with other elements of Buddhist doctrine (5) refutation of objections ilding on a similar list in the ī chapter of the Yogācārabhūmi o, 167–212). This Buddhist list bles (and possibly inspired) a ption of the services of a clas-or scholastic commentary that ern times. One may compare numeration of five exegetical uoted in the 19th-century coma (Treasury of Nyāya Philoso-): padaccheda (word division), the meaning of words), vigraha on), vākyayojanā (construal of amādhāna (answering of objec-, 2007, 3–5). mentarial literature developed, minology came into use to dis-r us today not always clearly) subtypes of commentaries. The ddhist commentary are called eśa. The Sanskrit tradition of ows the terms bhāṣya (with jali's grammatical commentary Commentary]; c. 2nd cent. BCE), ṇa, ṭīkā, and more. The Pali trand Southeast Asia developed a s: aṭṭhakathā, ṭīkā, atthayojanā,
, and others. Looking beyond us layers of Jaina commentarial similar mixture of pan-Indian ology: bhāsa, nijjutti, and cuṇṇi ntaries and vṛtti and ṭīkā for ries (Balbir, 2009, 48–53; for the krit philosophical literature, see ). This general situation is mirumanist and Renaissance com-ny terms applied to [them], not y clear distinction . . . (commen- enarratio, expositio, explicatio, , scholia etc.)" (Guthmüller, 2013).
ularly important canonical texts usters of commentaries. These d "commentarial complexes," le layers of commentaries and

---

subcommentaries cross-reference and shed light on each other. Moreover, such complexes are socially recognized, since several would typically be used together in teaching and scriptural study. Examples of such complexes that have received recent scholarly attention are the commentaries on the Pali Brahmajālasuttanta (Discourse on the Religious Net; Bodhi, 1978), the Pali Dhammapada (Word of the Doctrine; Carter & Palihawadana, 1987), the Heart Sūtra (Lopez, 1988), and the Śālistambasūtra (Discourse on the Rice Stalk; Schoening, 1995). A uniquely elaborate case of a commentarial complex is the Pali aṭṭhakathā and ṭīkā literature, a carefully planned enterprise commenting on the entirety of the Pali canon (Bond, 1982; Mori, 1984; see below).

The Early Period

The earliest Buddhist commentaries were collections of occasional (and originally oral) glosses (see below on the Suttaniddesa [Explanation of the Discourses], commonly called Niddesa) and the early Chinese scripture commentaries. In some cases, such glosses also provided the raw material for the gradual expansion of the root texts themselves by means of synonym strings and insertion of literary clichés. A case in point is the observable evolution of the Aṣṭasāhasrikā Prajñāpāramitā (Perfection of Understanding in Eight Thousand Lines) from its earliest accessible version in Gandhari language through the exemplar of Dharmarakṣa's Chinese translation into the transmitted Sanskrit text (Falk & Karashima, 2012; 2013), in the process of which the text grew through such, at times seemingly mechanical, explanatory expansions.

Another starting point for the Buddhist genre of commentary were the root texts – mythologically speaking, the word of the Buddha – themselves since "the sūtra discourses comment on the Buddha's insights and the path" (Mayer, 2004, 166). As the tradition presents the myth of scripture production, in the course of his long teaching career, the Buddha formulated the same insights in different ways for different audiences, in effect providing different commentarial angles on the same topic. Occasionally, the Buddha delegated the explication of his teaching to one of his closest disciples, moving the textual product one step closer to being a commentary. The best-known example is the recitation of the Saṃgītisūtra (Discourse on the Recital) by Śāriputra when back pain prevented the Buddha from teaching it himself (as described in the introduction of the discourse; D III 209 in the Pali version). Another example is the Bhaddekarattasuttanta (Discourse on an Excellent Single Night) – preserved in the Pali Majjhimanikāya (Middle-Length Collection, nos. 131–134) – the teaching of which the Buddha partially delegated to Ānanda and Mahākassapa. The text is divided into uddesa (exposition) and vibhaṅga (explication), using the technical terminology of early Buddhist exegesis (von Hinüber, 1996, 33). We may view these as (successful) attempts to canonize certain commentarial acts, attributed to the Buddha's closest disciples but possibly executed by later individuals or groups who will remain forever unknown.

Three non-Buddhist traditions also appear to have influenced the development of Buddhist commentarial genres. The Pali Khandhaka (Chapters [on Discipline]), the explanation of ritual rules for Buddhist monks and nuns, may have been modeled on the explanation of Brahmanical ritual rules in the pre-Buddhist brāhmaṇa ("Brahmanical") literature (von Hinüber, 1996, 17–18). The jātaka (stories of the previous births of the Buddha) genre – the embedding of canonical verses in a narrative framework explaining the verses – appears to be indebted to the ākhyāna (legend) type of literature, likewise going back to the early Vedic period (von Hinüber, 1996, 56–57). And finally, the Buddhist scholastic practice of an author writing prose commentaries on his own succinct technical treatises follows the procedure of Brahmanical sūtra literature in technical fields such as grammar (Schoening, 1995, 111–113; Ganeri, 2011, 112–116).

The earliest example of a vibhaṅga (explication) outside the collection of the Buddha's discourses is the Suttavibhaṅga commentary on the Prātimokṣasūtra (Binding Discourse), the fundamental rules of conduct for Buddhist monks and nuns, which is preserved in Pali and Sanskrit versions and in Chinese, Tocharian, and Tibetan translations. The second early Buddhist commentary type, nirdeśa (explanation), is characterized by its concern with synonyms for central doctrinal terms, collecting them into mnemonic building blocks or mapping among them. The two main examples of this genre are the Pali Suttaniddesa (Explanation of the Discourses) attributed to Śāriputra (see below) and the Gandhari verse commentaries that refer to themselves as a nirdeśa of sūtra (see below).

After the Pali Suttavibhaṅga and Suttaniddesa, which preserve very early material, the oldest preserved Buddhist commentaries are three Gandhari commentaries on early Buddhist verses and one on the Saṃgītisūtra. Moreover, in contrast to the Pali texts, which reach us after centuries of redaction and copying, the Gandhari commentaries were discovered in birchbark manuscripts from the 1st century CE and are thus very close to their autographs, and possibly even autographs themselves. These manuscripts owe their survival to the fact that they – together with dozens of other Buddhist texts on birchbark scrolls – were carefully deposited in clay pots and other vessels in the arid region that is now northern Pakistan and eastern Afghanistan (Baums, 2014a, 208–213). Their unique importance lies in providing firsthand unmediated evidence for the state and craft of Buddhist commentary writing in this very early period, while the loss of comparable early commentaries elsewhere testifies to the ephemeral nature of this type of text.

The verse commentaries contain selections of verses from the Dharmapada or Udāna (Inspired Utterances), the Arthavarga (Chapters on Meaning), the Pārāyaṇa (Going to the Far Shore), and other canonical sources. Each section is introduced by the first quarter of the verse in question, followed by the formula sutro tatra ṇideśo (Skt. sūtraṃ tatra nirdeśaḥ; "[thus] the canonical text; the explanation on it [is as follows]"), indicating a relationship with the exegetical tradition represented by the Pali Suttaniddesa, which is also borne out by some shared material.

The main service provided by the verse commentaries is, however, a procedure of "categorial reduction" (Baums, 2014b), whereby the parts of each verse are systematically equated with the members of sets of doctrinal categories, such as the three sources (nidāna) lust (rāga), hate (dveṣa), and delusion (moha) or the three categories (skandha) virtue (śīla), concentration (samādhi), and understanding (prajñā). A very similar procedure (employing a distinct but overlapping set of categories) is taught in the Nayasamuṭṭhāna (Operation of Guidelines) chapter of the Pali exegetical manual Peṭakopadesa (Instruction for the Piṭaka Master; Ñāṇamoli, 1964; Baums, 2014b, 35) and exemplified in the Hārasampāta (Combined Exegesis) chapter of the same work. This text thus seems to occupy a very important place in the history of Buddhist commentary. Linguistic features of the Pali Peṭakopadesa (including the peculiar form of its title) suggest that it was translated into Pali from a northwestern language such as Gandhari, a conjecture that is strengthened by the identification of An Shigao's 2nd-century Chinese translation Yinchirujing (陰持入經; Commentary on the Discourse on Aggregates, Elements, and Spheres; T. 603) as a version of the Suttatthasamuccaya (Summary of the Meaning of the Discourses) chapter of the Peṭakopadesa (Zacchetti, 2002a; see below). When one further takes into consideration the untraced quotations from an Indian exegetical manual called Pile (毘勒; Piṭaka [Master]) in the 5th-century Da zhidu lun (大智度論; Great Treatise on the Perfection of Understanding; T. 1509; Zacchetti, 2002b; see below), the following scenario seems likely: the method of categorial reduction and related exegetical procedures flourished in northwestern India, where we see them employed in the Gandhari commentary manuscripts and where they were probably set out in a number of manuals. The early Chinese translators took an interest in these methods, translating and quoting from some of the Piṭaka manuals, whereas the Theravāda tradition collected and translated them in the Pali Peṭakopadesa, reworked their content in the Nettippakaraṇa (Guidebook; Ñāṇamoli, 1962), and employed some of their methods in the aṭṭhakathās. This method of categorical reduction (or mapping) may have a historical echo in the short-lived early Chinese exegetical method of geyi (see below).

The Gandhari Saṃgītisūtra commentary employs the same method of categorial reduction as the Gandhari verse commentaries, with many of the same target doctrinal categories. It adds a second level of reduction by mapping each set of ten complete commentary sections to the Four Truths (satya) or the Three Courses (vartman) in special summary sections. Another prominent service, introducing most commentary sections of the Saṃgītisūtra commentary, is the etymological explanation of the root text's doctrinal terms. The order of root terms in the Gandhari commentary corresponds almost perfectly to that of the Chinese translation of the Saṃgītisūtra in the Chang ahan jing (長阿含經; Discourses of the Long Collection; T. 1), suggesting an affiliation with the Dharmaguptaka school (Salomon, 1999, 171–173).

A prominent feature of both the Gandhari verse commentaries and the Gandhari Saṃgītisūtra commentary is their systematic collection and presentation of alternative interpretations for the same part of the root text, sometimes simply introduced by the expression "alternatively," in other cases attributed to "some" or "others." No preference is usually expressed for any of these alternatives, other than possibly by the order in which they are presented.

This stands in contrast to ano scholastic treatises, such as a cussion of the Dhātuvibhaṅ the Explication of the Elem independent treatise on exis (British Library Fragment 28 of these point the way to Gandhara and Kashmir of p and other scholastic works i

We know very little abo mentarial traditions in t other than those preserved A body of commentaries in was reworked into the Pali quently lost, and the Pali co commentaries of the South (von Hinüber, 1996, 101–102,

Similarly, few Sanskrit early Buddhist canon hav the form of manuscript fra edge of commentarial activ incomplete. The remnants library discovered at Bam of a Dharmapada commen the Schøyen Collection), a fragments from the northe SHT, fragment 922; Sander, mentarial material on the U Inspired Utterances). It commentaries – like the ea taries on the same root tex purposes in the training o had memorized the verses vehicles for doctrinal expl commentary on the Udāna 8th-century Udānavargavi port the translation of the U Tibetan and now itself on translation (Balk, 1988).

Consolidation and H

As commentaries and su ated in Indian Buddhism, thetic treatments of Bud large-scale attempt at su the Abhidharma (scholas Buddhist schools, which u niques as the earlier com 1996, 68) and in many res a special kind of commen of the Buddha's teaching nslation Yinchiru jing (陰持入經;

he Discourse on Aggregates, eres; T. 603) as a version of the (Summary of the Meaning chapter of the Peṭakopadesa see below). When one further ation the untraced quotations egetical manual called Pile (毘 in the 5th-century Da zhidu lun Treatise on the Perfection of 09; Zacchetti, 2002b; see below), rio seems likely: the method of n and related exegetical procenorthwestern India, where we l in the Gandhari commentary here they were probably set out nuals. The early Chinese trans-est in these methods, translat-m some of the Piṭaka manuals, avāda tradition collected and he Pali Peṭakopadesa, reworked e Nettippakaraṇa (Guidebook; d employed some of their methhās. This method of categorical ing) may have a historical echo rly Chinese exegetical method

Saṃgītisūtra commentary method of categorial reduction rse commentaries, with many doctrinal categories. It adds a uction by mapping each set of mentary sections to the Four e Three Courses (vartman) in sections. Another prominent most commentary sections of mmentary, is the etymological root text's doctrinal terms. The in the Gandhari commentary perfectly to that of the Chinese aṃgītisūtra in the Chang ahan ourses of the Long Collection; T. liation with the Dharmaguptaka 99, 171–173). ure of both the Gandhari verse he Gandhari Saṃgītisūtra comematic collection and presentanterpretations for the same part metimes simply introduced by rnatively," in other cases attrib-thers." No preference is usually f these alternatives, other than er in which they are presented.

This stands in contrast to another group of Gandhari scholastic treatises, such as a commentary on or discussion of the Dhātuvibhaṅgasūtra (Discourse on the Explication of the Elements) and especially an independent treatise on existence in the three times (British Library Fragment 28; Cox, 2014, 43-46). Both of these point the way to the later flourishing in Gandhara and Kashmir of polemical commentaries and other scholastic works in Sanskrit (see below).

We know very little about early Buddhist commentarial traditions in the regional languages other than those preserved in Gandhari and Pali. A body of commentaries in Old Sinhalese language was reworked into the Pali aṭṭhakathās and subsequently lost, and the Pali commentaries refer to lost commentaries of the South Indian Andhaka school (von Hinüber, 1996, 101–102, 104–105).

Similarly, few Sanskrit commentaries on the early Buddhist canon have come down to us in the form of manuscript fragments, and our knowledge of commentarial activity in this area remains incomplete. The remnants of a Buddhist monastic library discovered at Bamiyan include fragments of a Dharmapada commentary (now preserved in the Schøyen Collection), and a number of Sanskrit fragments from the northern Silk Road (including SHT, fragment 922; Sander, 1981, 66) contain commentarial material on the Udānavarga (Chapters of Inspired Utterances). It is possible that these commentaries – like the earlier Gandhari commentaries on the same root texts – served pedagogical purposes in the training of Buddhist novices who had memorized the verses that now functioned as vehicles for doctrinal explication. A later Sanskrit commentary on the Udānavarga is Prajñāvarman's 8th-century Udānavargavivaraṇa, produced to support the translation of the Udānavarga root text into Tibetan and now itself only preserved in Tibetan translation (Balk, 1988).

Consolidation and Handbooks

As commentaries and subcommentaries proliferated in Indian Buddhism, the need arose for synthetic treatments of Buddhist doctrine. The first large-scale attempt at such systematization were the Abhidharma (scholastic) treatises of the early Buddhist schools, which use many of the same techniques as the earlier commentaries (von Hinüber, 1996, 68) and in many respects can be regarded as a special kind of commentary on the entire body of the Buddha's teaching rather than on individual texts, an understanding reflected by the title of the Theravāda Abhidharma work Vibhaṅga. We have the complete canonical Abhidharma collections of the Theravāda and Sarvāstivāda schools and individual works by other schools such as the Dharmaguptaka. Formally, the Sarvāstivāda canonical Abhidharma work Saṃgītiparyāya is a commentary on the Saṃgītisūtra (Willemen, Dessein & Cox, 1998, 67–68), and the Theravāda Kathāvatthu appears to have in turn presupposed its own explanatory commentary, now lost (von Hinüber, 1996, 72).

The Sarvāstivāda canonical Abhidharma treatises in turn attracted a very lively commentarial activity, the several layers and summaries of which provided the formal framework for the development of Sarvāstivāda thought. Fragments of the Prakaraṇabhāṣya (Commentary on [the Treatise on] Topics), an early commentary on the Prakaraṇapāda (Treatise on Topics), were found on the northern Silk Road (Sander, 1981, 65–66). In Kashmir, a tradition of writing scholastic compendia called vibhāṣā, all formally commentaries on the Jñānaprasthāna (System of Knowledge), flourished and reached its last and most comprehensive expression in the Mahāvibhāṣā (Great Commentary), allegedly compiled and redacted at a Buddhist council convened by the emperor Kaniṣka in the 2nd century CE; the Mahāvibhāṣā became the foundational text of the Vaibhāṣika school of Sarvāstivāda scholasticism (Willemen, Dessein & Cox, 1998, 116–121). At the same time in Gandhara, the development of Sarvāstivāda thought found expression in a series of systematic compendia including Dharmaśreṣṭhin's (or Dharmottara's) Abhidharmahṛdayaśāstra* (Treatise on the Heart of Scholasticism; T. 1550), Upaśānta's Abhidharmahṛdayaśāstra* (Treatise on the Heart of Scholasticism; T. 1551), and Dharmatrāta's Miśrakābhidharmahṛdayaśāstra* (Mixed Treatise on the Heart of Scholasticism; T. 1281; all three only preserved in Chinese translation). The literary form of the last of these – a verse root text arranged by topic and combined with an autocommentary – was adopted by Vasubandhu (5th cent. CE) in his Abhidharmakośabhāṣya, which presents orthodox Vaibhāṣika doctrine in the root text and subjects it to Sautrāntika criticism in the commentary. The Abhidharmakośabhāṣya became the most successful handbook of Indian Abhidharma and served in translation as the fundamental scholastic compendium throughout Tibet and East Asia, down to today, and was also translated into Tocharian and Uighur (Sander, 1981, 66). The main subcommentaries on the Abhidharmakośabhāṣya are Yaśomitra's Sphuṭārthābhidharmakośavyākhyā (Commentary on the Treasury of Scholasticism Having Clear Meaning; Wogihara, 1932–1936) and Sthiramati's Tattvārthābhidharmakośaṭīkā (Commentary on the Treasury of Scholasticism Having True Meaning; a Sanskrit manuscript of this text has recently been rediscovered in Tibet). Śamathadeva's Abhidharmakośopāyikā (Companion to the Treasury of Scholasticism; D 4094/P 5595; Honjō, 1984; for a complete annotated translation, see Honjō, 2014) collects the numerous canonical citations and allusions of the Abhidharmakośabhāṣya as an aid to the reader; Dignāga's Marmapradīpābhidharmakośavṛtti (Commentary on the Treasury of Scholasticism Illuminating the Core; only preserved in Tibetan translation; D 4095/P 5596) is a summary of the Abhidharmakośa, and the manual Abhidharmadīpa (Illuminator of Scholasticism) with the autocommentary Vibhāṣāprabhāvṛtti (Commentary Illuminating the [Great] Commentary; Jaini, 1977) appears to have been written in response to the Abhidharmakośabhāṣya.

According to the introductions of the Theravāda Abhidharma commentaries Atthasālinī (Rich in Meaning), Sammohavinodanī (Dispeller of Delusion), and Pañcappakaraṇaṭṭhakathā (Commentary on Five Works), the famous commentator Buddhaghosa initiated their production in the 4th or 5th century CE, which means that he did not write them himself (von Hinüber, 1996, 149–153). A certain Ānanda of Kalasapura and his pupil Dhammapāla produced sets of subcommentaries on the Abhidharma commentaries in the 5th and 6th centuries CE (or later; von Hinüber, 1996, 166–170). Theravāda Abhidharma commentaries continued to be written into the modern period (von Hinüber, 1996, 149n513).

With the rise of Mahāyāna Budhism sometime around the turn of the new millennium, and the corresponding production of Mahāyāna sūtras, came a new production of commentaries as well. A retrospective overview of Indian Mahāyāna commentaries can be gleaned from the Tibetan translation catalogues and extant translation corpus (Schoening, 1996). The Lhan kar ma catalog (early 9th cent. CE) lists 51 titles in its section on commentaries on Mahāyāna sūtras, and another 8 titles in its section on sūtra commentaries translated from Chinese. Approximately 30 of these commentaries are lost and only known from the catalogue. Taking these together with the 90 translations of Mahāyāna sūtra commentaries that are preserved in the Tanjur (Translation of Teachings), a total of approximately 120 Indian Mahāyāna sūtra commentaries are known to have been translated into Tibetan. There are 34 Mahāyāna sūtras in the Kanjur (Translation of the Word [of the Buddha]) that have corresponding commentaries in the Tanjur, including eight sūtras from the Prajñāpāramitā section and 25 other Mahāyāna sūtras. At least 20 commentaries in the Tanjur are subcommentaries on the Abhisamayālaṃkāra Prajñāpāramitopadeśaśāstra (Instructional Treatise on the Perfection of Understanding [Called] Ornament of Intuition; Schoening, 1996, 115–116), a systematizing verse summary of, probably, the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā Prajñāpāramitā (Perfection of Understanding in 25,000 Lines; Conze, 1978, provides a comprehensive overview of the Prajñāpāramitā commentarial literature in India and Tibet). Examples of other Mahāyāna sūtra commentaries influential either in East Asia or in Tibet are Vasubandhu's Daśabhūmikasūtropadeśa* (Instruction on [the Discourse on] the Ten Planes; T. 1522), or Daśabhūmikabhāṣya* (Commentary on [the Discourse on] the Ten Planes), Sthiramati's Akṣayamatinirdeśaṭīkā (Commentary on the Explanation of Akṣayamati; Braarvig, 1993), and Vīryaśrīdatta's Arthaviniścayasūtranibandhana (Treatise on the Discourse Discussing the Meaning; Samtani, 1971). It is nonetheless curious that relatively speaking, Mahāyāna sūtras were apparently infrequently commented on in India; in East Asia, however, we witness a positive efflorescence of sūtra commentaries, with especially importance given to doctrinally or ritually significant texts such as the Saddharmapuṇḍarīkasūtra (Lotus Discourse), Sukhāvatīvyūha (Larger Pure Land Discourse), Mahāvairocanasūtra (Great Discourse on Vairocana), and the like.

Eventually, these growing bodies of Buddhist commentaries and subcommentaries demanded a further synthesis in the form of comprehensive, systematic handbooks. The classical age for such handbooks were the 4th and 5th centuries CE, prominent examples being Buddhaghosa's Visuddhimagga (Path of Purity) for the Theravāda tradition, the Abhisamayālaṃkāra (Ornament of Intuition) for the Prajñāpāramitā literature, and Vasubandhu's Abhidharmakośabhāṣya (Commentary on the Treasury of Scholasticism) for Sarvāstivāda Abhidharma. Such handbooks could be designed to help in the production of a set of commentaries (as with the Visuddhimagga and the Pali aṭṭhakathās), or they could themselves give rise to a second wave of commentaries (as with the Abhidharmakośabhāṣya or Abhisamayālaṃkāra and their subcommentaries).

Philosophical Comme

In the case of the Indian B schools, commentaries likew mary literary form for the ba sion and the exposition of ar root-text reference for the unf philosophical discussion was N Mūlamadhyamakakārikā (Ro Way [Called Understanding]) less), attributed to Nāgārjuna into Chinese by Kumārajīva into Tibetan by Jñānagarbha and Buddhapālita's Mūlam Commentary on the Middle early commentaries on the M Bhāviveka (c. 500–570 CE) Prajñāpradīpa (Illuminator the Mūlamadhyamakakāri Buddhapālita, and in his Ma (Verses on the Heart of the autocommentary Tarkajvāl he defended the Madhyam an array of Buddhist an nents. Candrakīrti (c. 600– Prasannapadā (Clear-Wor nent commentary on the M and further engaged with the Śūnyatāsaptativṛtti (C [Verses] on Emptiness) a (Commentary on the 60 Pr writing a commentary on (Four Hundred [Verses]). philosopher Kamalaśīla (c. in the history of Tibetan Bu of gradual enlightenment yas (c. 792–794 CE), which the Indian form of Buddh composed influential com Śāntarakṣita's works Madh
ment of the Middle Way;
and Madhyamaka though (Summary of Truth; a com of Buddhist and non-Budd (For a detailed survey of In ture, see Seyfort Ruegg, 198

The points of departure fo activity were Mahāyāna sūtr philosophical treatises. Va on the one hand composed on the Daśabhūmikasūtra other the Madhyāntavibhā

Mahāyāna sūtra commentaries e been translated into Tibetan. yāna sūtras in the Kanjur (Trans-[of the Buddha]) that have corentaries in the Tanjur, including e Prajñāpāramitā section and 25 sūtras. At least 20 commentar-are subcommentaries on the ra Prajñāpāramitopadeśaśāstra tise on the Perfection of Under-Ornament of Intuition; Schoensystematizing verse summary of, aviṃśatisāhasrikā Prajñāpāramitā rstanding in 25,000 Lines; Conze, comprehensive overview of the mmentarial literature in India ples of other Mahāyāna sūtra uential either in East Asia or in dhu's Daśabhūmikasūtropadeśa* e Discourse on] the Ten Planes; hūmikabhāṣya (Commentary on ] the Ten Planes), Sthiramati's ṭikā (Commentary on the Explana-Braarvig, 1993), and Vīryaśrīdatta's ranibandhana (Treatise on the ing the Meaning; Samtani, 1971). curious that relatively speaking, were apparently infrequently India; in East Asia, however, we efflorescence of sūtra commentarimportance given to doctrinally ant texts such as the Saddharma- otus Discourse), Sukhāvatīvyūha Discourse), Mahāvairocanasūtra n Vairocana), and the like.

se growing bodies of Buddhist d subcommentaries demanded a n the form of comprehensive, sys-
s. The classical age for such hand-h and 5th centuries CE, prominent Buddhaghosa's Visuddhimagga for the Theravāda tradition, the ra (Ornament of Intuition) for tā literature, and Vasubandhu's hāṣya (Commentary on the Treasm) for Sarvāstivāda Abhidharma. could be designed to help in the et of commentaries (as with the nd the Pali aṭṭhakathās), or they give rise to a second wave of com-h the Abhidharmakośabhāṣya or ra and their subcommentaries).

Philosophical Commentaries

In the case of the Indian Buddhist philosophical schools, commentaries likewise served as the primary literary form for the back and forth of discussion and the exposition of arguments. The primary root-text reference for the unfolding of Madhyamaka philosophical discussion was Nāgārjuna's (Prajñānāma) Mūlamadhyamakakārikā (Root Verses on the Middle Way [Called Understanding]). The Akutobhayā (Fearless), attributed to Nāgārjuna himself and translated into Chinese by Kumārajīva in 409 CE (T. 1564) and into Tibetan by Jñānagarbha and Klu'i rgyal mtshan, and Buddhapālita's Mūlamadhyamakavṛtti (Root Commentary on the Middle Way) are two important early commentaries on the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā. Bhāviveka (c. 500–570 CE) used his commentary Prajñāpradīpa (Illuminator of Understanding) on the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā for a critique of Buddhapālita, and in his Madhyamakahṛdayakārikā (Verses on the Heart of the Middle Way) with the autocommentary Tarkajvālā (Flame of Reasoning), he defended the Madhyamaka standpoint against an array of Buddhist and non-Buddhist opponents. Candrakīrti (c. 600–650 CE) composed the Prasannapadā (Clear-Worded), another preeminent commentary on the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā, and further engaged with Nāgārjuna's thought in the Śūnyatāsaptativṛtti (Commentary on the 70 [Verses] on Emptiness) and the Yuktiṣaṣṭikāvṛtti (Commentary on the 60 Principles), in addition to writing a commentary on Āryadeva's Catuḥśataka (Four Hundred [Verses]). The later Madhyamaka philosopher Kamalaśīla (c. 740–795 CE) – famous in the history of Tibetan Buddhism as a proponent of gradual enlightenment in the debate of Bsam yas (c. 792–794 CE), which led to royal support of the Indian form of Buddhism over the Chinese – composed influential commentaries on his teacher Śāntarakṣita's works Madhyamakālaṃkāra (Ornament of the Middle Way; a synthesis of Yogācāra and Madhyamaka thought) and Tattvasaṃgraha (Summary of Truth; a comprehensive doxography of Buddhist and non-Buddhist schools of thought). (For a detailed survey of Indian Madhyamaka literature, see Seyfort Ruegg, 1981.)

The points of departure for Yogācāra commentarial activity were Mahāyāna sūtras as well as foundational philosophical treatises. Vasubandhu, for instance, on the one hand composed the Daśabhūmikabhāṣya on the Daśabhūmikasūtra (see above) and on the other the Madhyāntavibhāgabhāṣya (Commentary on the Distinction of the Middle and the Extremes) on the Madhyāntavibhāga (Distinction of the Middle and the Extremes) attributed to Maitreyanātha. He also wrote a commentary on his older brother Asaṅga's compendium Mahāyānasaṃgraha (Summary of Mahāyāna) and followed the expository strategy of root text with autocommentary in his Viṃśatikā (Twenty [Verses]). Similarly, the famous commentator Sthiramati (c. 510–570 CE) is alleged to have written a Mahāyāna sūtra commentary in the Akṣayamatinirdeśaṭīkā (see above) and commentaries and subcommentaries on his recent predecessors' work in the Abhidharmasamuccayabhāṣya (Commentary on the Summary of Scholasticism; engaging with Asaṅga) and Triṃśikāvijñaptibhāṣya (Commentary on the 30 [Verses] on Consciousness) and Madhyāntavibhāgaṭīkā (Commentary on the Distinction of the Middle and the Extremes; both responding to Vasubandhu). Here as so often in the history of Indian literature, it is possible that some commentaries by other authors have been retrospectively associated with Sthiramati's name.

In the logico-epistemological school of Buddhism, Dharmakīrti (7th cent. CE) employed the root-text/autocommentary strategy in his Pramāṇavārttikasvavṛtti (Autocommentary on the Commentary on the Means of Knowledge), the first part of his Pramāṇavārttika (Commentary on the Means of Knowledge) on Dignāga's Pramāṇasamuccaya (Compendium of the Means of Knowledge). The combined work attracted subcommentaries by Karṇakagomin (Pramāṇavārttikasvavṛttiṭīkā [Commentary on the Autocommentary on the Commentary on the Means of Knowledge]) and Prajñākaragupta (Pramāṇavārttikabhāṣya [Commentary on the Commentary on the Means of Knowledge] or Vārttikālaṃkāra [Ornament of the Commentary]).

Commentaries and Translation

On the borders of the Indian cultural sphere, Buddhists using non-Indian languages translated Indian commentarial works: the Chinese Saṃgītiparyāya (Stache-Rosen, 1968), the Tocharian Vinayavibhaṅga (Explication of the Discipline; Pinault, 2008, 61–88), and the numerous Tibetan Mahāyāna sūtra commentaries discussed above may serve as examples. But part and parcel of the general translation activity of Buddhist literature from Indian to non-Indian languages was the production of new commentarial material in the recipient languages. In its simplest form, these were glosses supplied by a translator or member of a translation team to elucidate difficult terms or justify translation choices; at the other end, these were accomplished literary compositions in their own right that would come to shape the new Buddhist idioms of the recipient languages.

There is little doubt that the genre of commentary went hand in hand with translation, as for instance in China when a foreign master elucidated a text in the course of expounding it for translation, this sometimes being a public event. This procedure on the one hand provides a good example of how commentarial glosses may have entered a text and on the other hand emphasizes the inevitable role of translation itself as commentary, since any rendering of words from one language into another involves decisions about meaning.

The earliest Chinese translation procedure as attested in colophons involved a master (usually Indian or Central Asian) providing both koushou (口授; oral translation) and koujie (口解; oral explanation; Zürcher, 1959, 31). Three products of this procedure from the 2nd and 3rd centuries CE are still extant: An Shigao's (安世高; fl. c. 150–170 CE) Ahan koujie shi'er yinyuan jing (阿含口解十二因緣經; Discourse on the Oral Explanation of the 12 Causal Links in the Canon; T. 1508) contains a separate collection of glosses (Zürcher, 1959, 31, 330n69) that constitutes a "record of oral explanations delivered by An Shigao to his students" (Zacchetti, 2004; Nattier, 2008, 63–64). The Yinchiru jing zhu (T. 1694) associated with Kang Senghui 康僧會 (fl. c. 220–240/260 or 250–280 CE) is based on a root text by An Shigao (T. 603; see above; Zürcher, 1959, 54; Nattier, 2008, 152). Similarly, the Anban shouyi jing zhu (安般守意經注; Commentary on the Discourse on Mindfulness in Breathing; T. 602) associated with Kang Senghui is based on a root text (the Ānāpānasmṛtisūtra* [Discourse on Mindfulness in Breathing]) in An Shigao style recently rediscovered in an ancient Chinese manuscript brought to Japan and preserved in the Kongōji temple in Osaka (Nattier, 2008, 60–61; Zacchetti, 2007) and contains a mix of text and explanation (Zürcher, 1959, 31, 53, 54, 330n68). With these three texts, one may compare the glosses inserted in chapter 1 of the Da mingdu jing (大明度經; Great Discourse on the Perfection of Understanding; T. 225) associated with Kang Senghui and Zhi Qian (支謙; fl. c. 220–250 CE), the root text of which consists of a mixture of scriptural quotations from meditation and Mahāyāna texts (Zürcher, 1959, 54, 338n162). A special exegetical procedure (reminiscent of the categorial mapping of the early Indian commentaries) is geyi (格義), the explanation of numerical lists in Indian Buddhist texts through comparable texts in the Chinese classics (Mair, 2010). This procedure was introduced in the late 3rd century by the Chinese teacher Zhu Faya (竺法雅) for those unfamiliar with the Indian literary list style, but it stayed ephemeral and was already denounced by Zhu Faya's disciple Dao'an (道安; 312–385 CE).

The next stage of development, in which the exegetical material has assumed the character of an independent commentarial text, is illustrated by Dao'an's Renben yusheng jing zhu (人本欲生經註; Commentary on the Great Discourse on Conditioned Arising; T. 1693), a commentary on An Shigao's Mahānidānasūtra* (Great Discourse on Causes; T. 14) translation (Zürcher, 1959, 186, 388n33), and by the anonymous Shi'er men chan jing 十二門禪經 (Discourse on the 12 Gates of Meditation) from the Kongōji manuscript, a commentary on An Shigao's Shi'er men jing (十二門經; Discourse on the 12 Gates; Zacchetti, 2003; Nattier, 2008, 65). (On Dao'an's commentarial style and exegetical theory, see Zürcher, 1959, 187, 191–192; and on the style of these zhu [註] commentaries in general, see Kanno, 2002; Mayer, 2004, 167–168).

A third style of early Chinese commentary, based on Indian precedents, is the addition of illustrative stories to early canonical verse texts, which we see in Zhi Qian's Arthapada (Word of Meaning; i.e. Arthavarga) translation Yizu jing (義足經; Discourse on the Word of Meaning; T. 198; Bapat, 1951; Nattier, 2008, 134) and in the Dharmapada version Faju piyu jing (法句譬喻經; Discourse on the Word of the Doctrine and Similes; T. 211) attributed to Faju (法炬) and Fali (法立; fl. 290–306 CE), which is based on a root text (T. 210; trans. 224 CE) by Weiqinan (維祇難) revised by Zhi Qian (fl. 222–252 CE; Zürcher, 1959, 47–4855).

Bibliography

Assmann, A., & J. Assmann, Kanon und Zensur, Munich, 1987.

Balbir, N., "Les lecteurs jaina śvetāmbara face à leur canon," in: G. Colas & G. Gerschheimer, eds., Écrire et transmettre en Inde classique, Paris, 2009, 43–62.

Balk, M., "Untersuchungen zum Udânavarga. Unter Berücksichtigung mittelindischer Parallelen und eines tibetischen Kommentars," diss., University of Bonn, 1988.

Bapat, P.V., Arthapada Sutra: Spoken by the Buddha: Translated by the Upāsaka Che-Kien under the Wu Dynasty (222–230 AD), Santiniketan, 1951.

Baums, S., "Gandhāran Scrolls: Manuscript Type," in: J.B.
J.-U. Sobisch, eds., Manuscript
Berlin, 2014a, 183–225.

Baums, S., "Truth and Scripture rial Reduction as Exegetical M and Beyond," in: T. Sen, ed., works of Material, Intellectu Singapore, 2014b, 19–38.

Bodhi, Bhikkhu, The Discourse Views: The Brahmajāla Sutta a sis, Kandy, 1978.

Bond, G.D., "The Word of the Bu
Interpretation in Theravada Bu

Braarvig, J., Akṣayamatinirdeśasū

Carter, J.R., & M. Palihawadana
English Translation with the P Translation of the Commentar with Notes: With Notes Trans and Critical Textual Comment

Conze, E., The Prajñāpāramitā L

Cox, C., "Gāndhārī Kharoṣṭhī Ma in: P. Harrison & J.-U. Hartma Digital Data: Recent Advanc Research: Papers Presented at Manuscripts: The State of th
2009, Vienna, 2014, 35–49.

Davidson, R.M., "An Introductio tural Authority in Indian Bud Chinese Buddhist Apocrypha,

Dietz, S., O. Qvarnström & P. Ski mentary(?) on a Hitherto Mahāsamājasūtra," in: J. Bra scripts, vol. III, Oslo, 2006, 195

Elverskog, J., Uygur Buddhist Lit

Emmerick, R.F., & P.O. Skjærvø, tanese and Tumshuqese," in: dia Iranica, vol. IV, London,

Falk, H., & S. Karashima, "A F
Manuscript from Gandhāra Split Collection 2)," SDKBKK

Falk, H., & S. Karashima, "A F
Manuscript from Gandhāra Split Collection 1)," ARIRIAB

Freiberger, O., Der Orden in der des Saṅgha im frühen Buddhi

Ganeri, J., The Lost Age of Reaso
India 1450–1700, Oxford, 2011.

Guthmüller, B., "Commentary, Tradition, vol. I, Leiden, 2006

Hinüber, O. von, A Handbook o

Honjō Yoshifumi (本庄良文 kenkyū (倶舎論註ウパーイ

Honjō Yoshifumi, Kusharon sh 阿含全表), Kyoto, 1984.

Jaini, P., Abhidharmadīpa wit
^{2}1977.

Jhaḷakîkar, B., Nyâyakośa or Dic of the Nyâya Philosophy, Bom

y Indian commentaries) is geyi ion of numerical lists in Indian ough comparable texts in the air, 2010). This procedure was ate 3rd century by the Chinese 法雅) for those unfamiliar with st style, but it stayed ephemeral nounced by Zhu Faya's disciple 85 CE).

of development, in which the has assumed the character of nmentarial text, is illustrated by sheng jing zhu (人本欲生經註; Great Discourse on Conditioned commentary on An Shigao's (Great Discourse on Causes; ürcher, 1959, 186, 388n33), and Shi'er men chan jing 十二門禪 e 12 Gates of Meditation) from script, a commentary on An jing (十二門經; Discourse on tti, 2003; Nattier, 2008, 65). (On rial style and exegetical theory, 87, 191–192; and on the style of nentaries in general, see Kanno, 67–168).

rly Chinese commentary, based nts, is the addition of illustra-canonical verse texts, which Arthapada (Word of Meaning; nslation Yizu jing (義足經; Dis-of Meaning; T. 198; Bapat, 1951; nd in the Dharmapada version 譬喻經; Discourse on the Word Similes; T. 211) attributed to Faju ; fl. 290–306 CE), which is based 10; trans. 224 CE) by Weiqinan hi Qian (fl. 222–252 CE; Zürcher, mann, Kanon und Zensur, Munich, jaina śvetāmbara face à leur canon," chheimer, eds., Écrire et transmettre

s, 2009, 43–62.

gen zum Udânavarga. Unter Berück-ischer Parallelen und eines tibetidiss., University of Bonn, 1988.

Sutra: Spoken by the Buddha: Trans-Che-Kien under the Wu Dynasty (222– , 1951.

Baums, S., "Gandhāran Scrolls: Rediscovering an Ancient Manuscript Type," in: J.B. Quenzer, D. Bondarev & J.-U. Sobisch, eds., Manuscript Cultures: Mapping the Field, Berlin, 2014a, 183–225.

Baums, S., "Truth and Scripture in Early Buddhism: Categorial Reduction as Exegetical Method in Ancient Gandhāra and Beyond," in: T. Sen, ed., Buddhism across Asia: Networks of Material, Intellectual and Cultural Exchange, Singapore, 2014b, 19–38.

Bodhi, Bhikkhu, The Discourse on the All-Embracing Net of Views: The Brahmajāla Sutta and Its Commentarial Exegesis, Kandy, 1978.

Bond, G.D., "The Word of the Buddha": The Tipiṭaka and Its Interpretation in Theravada Buddhism, Colombo, 1982.

Braarvig, J., Akṣayamatinirdeśasūtra, Oslo, 1993.

Carter, J.R., & M. Palihawadana, The Dhammapada: A New English Translation with the Pali Text and the First English Translation of the Commentary's Explanation of the Verses with Notes: With Notes Translated from Sinhala Sources and Critical Textual Comments, New York, 1987.

Conze, E., The Prajñāpāramitā Literature, Tokyo, ^{2}1978.

Cox, C., "Gāndhārī Kharoṣṭhī Manuscripts: Exegetical Texts," in: P. Harrison & J.-U. Hartmann, eds., From Birch Bark to Digital Data: Recent Advances in Buddhist Manuscript Research: Papers Presented at the Conference Indic Buddhist Manuscripts: The State of the Field, Stanford, June 15–19 2009, Vienna, 2014, 35–49.

Davidson, R.M., "An Introduction to the Standards of Scriptural Authority in Indian Buddhism," in: R.E. Buswell, ed., Chinese Buddhist Apocrypha, Honolulu, 1990, 291–325.

Dietz, S., O. Qvarnström & P. Skilling, "A Fragment of a Commentary(?) on a Hitherto Unknown Recension of the Mahāsamājasūtra," in: J. Braarvig, ed., Buddhist Manuscripts, vol. III, Oslo, 2006, 195–206.

Elverskog, J., Uygur Buddhist Literature, Turnhout, 1997.

Emmerick, R.F., & P.O. Skjærvø, "Buddhist Literature in Khotanese and Tumshuqese," in: E. Yarshater, ed., Encyclopædia Iranica, vol. IV, London, 1990, 499–505.

Falk, H., & S. Karashima, "A First-Century Prajñāpāramitā Manuscript from Gandhāra – Parivarta 5 (Texts from the Split Collection 2)," SDKBKKN 16, 2013, 97–169.

Falk, H., & S. Karashima, "A First-Century Prajñāpāramitā Manuscript from Gandhāra – Parivarta 1 (Texts from the Split Collection 1)," ARIRIAB 15, 2012, 19–61.

Freiberger, O., Der Orden in der Lehre. Zur religiösen Deutung des Saṅgha im frühen Buddhismus, Wiesbaden, 2000.

Ganeri, J., The Lost Age of Reason: Philosophy in Early Modern India 1450–1700, Oxford, 2011.

Guthmüller, B., "Commentary," Brill's New Pauly: Classical Tradition, vol. I, Leiden, 2006, 999–1002, 2013.

Hinüber, O. von, A Handbook of Pāli Literature, Berlin, 1996.

Honjō Yoshifumi (本庄良文), Kusharonchū Upāikā no kenkyū (倶舎論註ウパーイカーの研究), Tokyo, 2014.

Honjō Yoshifumi, Kusharon shoe agon zenpyō (倶舎論所依阿含全表), Kyoto, 1984.

Jaini, P., Abhidharmadīpa with Vibhāṣāprabhāvṛtti, Patna, ^{2}1977.

Jhaḷakîkar, B., Nyâyakośa or Dictionary of the Technical Terms of the Nyâya Philosophy, Bombay, 1893.

Kanno, H., "Chinese Buddhist Sutra Commentaries of the Early Period," ARIRIAB 6, 2002, 301–320.

Kramer, J., "Innovation and the Role of Intertextuality in the Pañcaskandhaka and Related Yogācāra Works," JIABS 36, 2013.

Krasser, H., "How to Teach a Buddhist Monk to Refute the Outsiders: Text-Critical Remarks on Some Works by Bhāviveka," JRBTRD 51, 2011, 49–76.

Lamotte, É.P.M., "La critique d'interprétation dans le bouddhisme," AIPHOS 9, 1949, 341–361; ET: "The Assessment of Textual Interpretation in Buddhism," in: D.S. Lopez Jr., ed., Buddhist Hermeneutics, Honolulu, 1988, 11–27.

Lamotte, É.P.M., "La critique d'authenticité dans le bouddhisme," in: India Antiqua: A Volume of Oriental Studies Presented by His Friends and Pupils to Jean Philippe Vogel, C.I.E. on the Occasion of the Fiftieth Anniversary of his Doctorate, publ. Kern Institute, Leiden, 1947, 213–222; ET: "The Assessment of Textual Authenticity in Buddhism," BSR 1, 1983–84, 4–15.

Lévi, S., "Note sur des manuscrits sanscrits provenant de Bamiyan (Afghanistan) et de Gilgit (Cachemire)," JA 220, 1932, 1–45.

Lopez, D.S., The Heart Sūtra Explained: Indian and Tibetan Commentaries, Albany, 1988.

Mair, V., "What is Geyi, after All?," in: A.K.L. Chan & Y.-K. Lo, eds., Philosophy and Religion in Early Medieval China, Albany, 2010, 227–264.

Mayer, A., "Commentarial Literature," in: R.E. Buswell, ed., Encyclopedia of Buddhism, vol. I, New York, 2004, 166–169.

McDaniel, J.T., Gathering Leaves and Lifting Words: Histories of Buddhist Monastic Education in Laos and Thailand, Seattle, 2008.

Mori, S. (森祖道), Pāribukkyō chūshaku bunken no kenkyū: attakatānojōzabuteki yōsō (パーリ仏教註釈文献の研究: アッタカターの上座部的様相), Tokyo, 1984.

Ñāṇamoli, Bhikkhu, The Piṭaka-Disclosure (Peṭakopadesa) according to Kaccāna Thera, London, 1964.

Ñāṇamoli, Bhikkhu, The Guide (Netti-ppakaraṇaṁ) according to Kaccāna Thera, London, 1962.

Nance, R.F., Speaking for Buddhas, New York, 2012.

Nattier, J., A Guide to the Earliest Chinese Buddhist Translations: Texts from the Eastern Han 東漢 and Three Kingdoms 三國 Periods, Tokyo, 2008.

Pinault, G.-J., Chrestomathie tokharienne: Textes et grammaire, Leuven, 2008.

Salomon, R., Ancient Buddhist Scrolls from Gandhāra: The British Library Kharoṣṭhī Fragments, Seattle, 1999.

Samtani, N.H., The Arthaviniścaya-sūtra and Its Commentary, Patna, 1971.

Sander, L., "Buddhist Literature in Central Asia," in: G.P. Malalasekera & J. Dhirasekera, eds., Encyclopaedia of Buddhism, vol. IV, Colombo, 1981, 52–75.

Schmidt, K.T., "Zur Erforschung der tocharischen Literatur. Stand und Aufgaben," in: B. Schlerath, ed., Tocharisch. Akten der Fachtagung der Indogermanischen Gesellschaft Berlin, September 1990, Reykjavik, 1994, 239–283.

Schoening, J.D., "Sūtra Commentaries in Tibetan Translation," in: J.I. Cabezón & R.R. Jackson, eds., Tibetan Literature: Studies in Genre, Ithaca NY, 1996, 111–124.

Schoening, J.D., The Śālistamba Sūtra and Its Indian Commentaries, Vienna, 1995.

Seyfort Ruegg, D., The Literature of the Madhyamaka School of Philosophy in India, Wiesbaden, 1981.

Silk, J.A., "Remarks on the Kāśyapaparivarta Commentary," in: M. Straube et al., eds., Pāsādikadānaṁ: Festschrift for Bhikkhu Pāsādika, Marburg, 2009, 381–397.

Simonsson, N., Indo-tibetische Studien. Die Methoden der tibetischen Übersetzer, untersucht im Hinblick auf die Bedeutung ihrer Übersetzungen für die Sanskritphilologie, Uppsala, 1957.

Slaje, W., "Der Sanskrit-Kommentar," in: M. Quisinsky & P. Walter, eds., Kommentarkulturen. Die Auslegung zentraler Texte der Weltreligionen: ein vergleichender Überblick, Cologne, 2007, 69–97.

Stache-Rosen, V., Dogmatische Begriffsreihen im älteren Buddhismus, vol. II: Das Saṅgītisūtra und sein Kommentar Saṅgītiparyāya, Berlin, 1968.

Tubb, G.A., & E.R. Boose, Scholastic Sanskrit: A Handbook for Students, New York, 2007.

Verhagen, P.C., A History of Grammatical Literature in Tibet, vol. I: Transmission of the Canonical Literature, Leiden, 1994.

Walter, M.N., Sogdians and Buddhism, Philadelphia, 2006.

Willemen, C., B. Dessein & C. Cox, Sarvāstivāda Buddhist Scholasticism, Leiden, 1998.

Wilson, J.B., "Tibetan Commentaries on the Indian Śāstras," in: J.I. Cabezón & R.R. Jackson, eds., Tibetan Literature: Studies in Genre, Ithaca NY, 1996, 125–137.

Wogihara, U., Sputârthā Abhidharmakośavyākhyā, Tokyo, 1932–1936.

Yakup, A., Prajñāpāramitā Literature in Old Uyghur, Turnhout, 2010.

Zacchetti, S., "Teaching Buddhism in Han China: A Study of the Ahan koujie shi'er yinyuan jing T 1508 Attributed to An Shigao," ARIRIAB 7, 2004, 197–224.

Zacchetti, S., "The Rediscovery of Three Early Buddhist Scriptures on Meditation: A Preliminary Analysis of the Fo shuo shi'er men jing, the Fo shuo jie shi'er men jing: Translated by An Shigao and Their Commentary Preserved in the Newly Found Kongō-ji Manuscript," ARIRIAB 6, 2003, 251–299.

Zacchetti, S., "An Early Chinese Translation Corresponding to Chapter 6 of the Peṭakopadesa: An Shigao's Yin chi ru jing T 603 and Its Indian Original: A Preliminary Survey," BSOAS 65, 2002a, 74–98.

Zacchetti, S., "Some Remarks on the 'Peṭaka Passages' in the Da zhidu lun and Their Relation to the Pāli Peṭakopadesa," ARIRIAB 5, 2002b, 67–85.

Zürcher, E., The Buddhist Conquest of China, Leiden, 1959.

Stefan Baums

A complete set of co taries on the Theravā original language (Pa tion begins with tex and ends in late su ing the 19th centu
are listed together wi
H. Smith (1948). Comm ally survive only as tr of important fragmen in Gandhari.

It is impossible to mentaries. However,
ogy, the oldest expla
"commentary" are pre of the Suttapiṭaka. F 134, in the Uparipaṇṇ contain almost the sa
the phrase bhaddek person, for whom (d (comp. Skt. ekarātra night"). The first disco delivered by the Bu
the other three, the Ā Mahākaccānapabhad
sakaṅgiyabhaddekara structure of the fo quite unusual. The with an uddesa (con vibhaṅga (explanation and the following nid tation of these verses

This terminology current in Indian e skrit term uddeśa ( in the Arthaśāstra sentence]) is contras ment; explained in th [detailed sentence, e corresponding to vib
and upadeśa (advice, vartitavyaṃ [one mu (Tantrayukti [On Met (Olivelle, 2013, 436). as well: *udde*sa, nidd 1129, § 5.3.2.3).

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden
Also available online – www.b

mmentaries on the Indian Śāstras," R. Jackson, eds., Tibetan Literature: a NY, 1996, 125–137. ā Abhidharmakośavyākhyā, Tokyo, itā Literature in Old Uyghur, Turn-

Buddhism in Han China: A Study of yinyuan jing T 1508 Attributed to An 04, 197–224.
overy of Three Early Buddhist Scrip-Preliminary Analysis of the Fo shuo shuo jie shi'er men jing: Translated eir Commentary Preserved in the
-ji Manuscript," ARIRIAB 6, 2003,

Chinese Translation Corresponding eṭakopadesa: An Shigao's Yin chi ru ian Original: A Preliminary Survey," 8. arks on the 'Peṭaka Passages' in the r Relation to the Pāli Peṭakopadesa," 85.
Conquest of China, Leiden, 1959.

STEFAN BAUMS

Early Scripture Commentary

A complete set of commentaries and subcommentaries on the Theravāda Tipiṭaka is preserved in the original language (Pali). This commentarial tradition begins with texts embedded in the Tipiṭaka and ends in late subcommentaries written during the 19th century. Theravāda commentaries are listed together with the basic text (Tipiṭaka) in H. Smith (1948). Commentaries of other schools usually survive only as translations, with the exception of important fragments of very early commentaries in Gandhari.

It is impossible to date the first Theravāda commentaries. However, in terms of a relative chronology, the oldest explanations that might be called "commentary" are preserved in the Majjhimanikāya of the Suttapiṭaka. Four *suttanta*s, numbered 131–134, in the Uparipaṇṇāsa (Additional Fifties) section contain almost the same text with titles containing the phrase bhaddekarattasutta, "discourse on a person, for whom (day and) night are auspicious" (comp. Skt. ekarātra, "[duration of] one day and night"). The first discourse, the Bhaddekarattasuttanta, delivered by the Buddha himself, is followed by the other three, the Ānandabhaddekarattasuttanta, Mahākaccānapabhaddekarattasuttanta, and Lomasakaṅgiyabhaddekarattasuttanta, respectively. The structure of the four *suttanta*s (discourses) is quite unusual. The Buddha begins his discourse with an uddesa (concise statement) followed by a vibhaṅga (explanation). The uddesa consists of verses, and the following niddesa is a line-by-line interpretation of these verses (von Hinüber, 1996, § 64).

This terminology concurs with the one widely current in Indian exegetical literature. The Sanskrit term uddeśa (concise statement; explained in the Arthaśāstra as samāsavākya [condensed sentence]) is contrasted to nirdeśa (detailed treatment; explained in the Arthaśāstra as vyāsavākyam [detailed sentence, explanation] and thus roughly corresponding to vibhaṅga in the Majjhimanikāya) and upadeśa (advice, instruction; explained as evaṃ vartitavyaṃ [one must behave thus]) in chapter 15 (Tantrayukti [On Method]) of Kauṭilya's Arthaśāstra (Olivelle, 2013, 436). This set of terms is used in Pali as well: uddesa, niddesa, and upadesa (Smith, 1949, 1129, § 5.3.2.3).

While the vibhaṅga in the *Bhaddekarattasuttanta*s is very similar to a commentary, the Suttavibhaṅga – the first part of the Vinayapiṭaka of the Theravādins – contains a genuine commentary on the monastic rules of the Pātimokkha, an "explanation of the sutta," with the word sutta as usual in the language of the Theravāda Tipiṭaka referring to the Pātimokkha only in contrast to suttanta, which is used for the texts of the Suttapiṭaka. Each individual rule of Pātimokkha is followed by a word-for-word explanation. A new and Theravāda(?) term not used by other Buddhist schools is coined for this particular commentary: padabhājanīya (word-for-word commentary) or sikkhāpadavibhaṅga (detailed explanation of a rule [in the Vinaya]), glossed in Samantapāsādikā 230.21 as atthaṃ vibhajanto (explaining the meaning in detail [Smith, 1949, 1128, § 5.3.2.1]).

A brief fragment of a commentary on the introductory formula to the recitation of the Pātimokkha is inserted into the text of the Uposathakkhandhaka (Section on the Uposatha), chapter 2 of the Mahāvagga in the Theravāda Vinaya (Vin I.103.12–104.20). This fragment is the original introduction to the Suttavibhaṅga (von Hinüber, 1996, § 26) to which it is also similar in structure and in the peculiar way in which it quotes words from the Pātimokkha. Not only the word is iti used as marker of a quotation, which is common to the Indian commentarial tradition (Tubb & Boose, 2007, 15, § 1.6.1), but also the word nāma is to non-Theravāda commentaries. Although the conditions for the distribution of iti and nāma have not yet been identified, the use of nāma could be a distinctive feature of the style of the lost "old aṭṭhakathā" form of commentary (von Hinüber, 1996, § 261; see also below). This paragraph from the Mahāvagga is also commented on in the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī (see below).

Only one commentary is incorporated into the Tipiṭaka as a separate text: the Niddesa (Detailed Explanation), which, at the same time, is one out of only two canonical texts attributed by the tradition to an individual author (the other being the Kathāvatthu attributed to Moggaliputta Tissa). In the introduction to the commentary on the Niddesa, the Saddhammapajotikā, Sāriputta is identified as the putative author of the Niddesa. Although the date of

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

Table 1

	Text	Commentary Author	Commentary Title	Handbook
I. Vinayapiṭaka (Rules for the Buddhist Order)		Anonymous	Samantapāsādikā
II. Suttapiṭaka (Discourses)	1. Dīghanikāya			Buddhaghosa: Visuddhimagga
	2. Majjhimanikāya	Buddhaghosa	Sumaṅgalavilāsinī
	3. Saṃyuttanikāya	Buddhaghosa	Papañcasūdanī
	4. Aṅguttaranikāya	Buddhaghosa	Sāratthappakāsiṇī
	5. Khuddakanikāya	Buddhaghosa	Manorathapūraṇī
	1. Khuddakapāṭha	Anonymous	Paramatthajotikā I
	2. Dhammapada	Anonymous	Dhammapadaṭṭhakathā
	3. Udāna	Dhammapāla	Paramatthadīpanī I
	4. Itivuttaka	Dhammapāla	Paramatthadīpanī II
	5. Suttanipāta	Anonymous	Paramatthajotikā II
	6. Vimānavatthu	Dhammapāla	Paramatthadīpanī III
	7. Petavatthu	Dhammapāla	Paramatthadīpanī IV
	8. Theragāthā	Dhammapāla	Paramatthadīpanī V
	9. Therīgāthā	Dhammapāla	Paramatthadīpanī VI
	10. Jātaka	Anonymous	Jātakatthavaṇṇanā
	11. Mahāniddesa	Upasena	Saddhammapajjotikā I
	12. Cullaniddesa	Upasena	Saddhammapajjotikā II
	13. Paṭisambhidāmagga	Mahānāma	Saddhammappakāsinī
	14. Apadāna	Anonymous	Visuddhajanavilāsinī
	15. Buddhavaṃsa	Anonymous	Madhuratthavilāsinī
	16. Cariyāpiṭaka	Dhammapāla	Paramatthadīpanī VII
III. Abhidhammapiṭaka (Things Referring to the Teaching)	1. Dhammasaṅgaṇi	Anonymous	Atthasālinī	Kassapa Coḷa: Mohavicchedanī
	2. Vibhaṅga	Anonymous	Sammohavinodanī
	3. Dhātukathā	Anonymous	Pañcappakaraṇaṭṭhakathā I
	4. Puggalapaññatti	Anonymous	Pañcappakaraṇaṭṭhakathā II
	5. Kaṭhāvatthu	Anonymous	Pañcappakaraṇaṭṭhakathā III
	6. Yamaka	Anonymous	Pañcappakaraṇaṭṭhakathā IV
	7. Paṭṭhāna	Anonymous	Pañcappakaraṇaṭṭhakathā V

Table 2

	Type of Subcommentary		Author	Title
Subcommentaries: ṭīkā	(a) mūlaṭīkā	basic subcommentary
		I. (Vin, Sp)	Sāriputta	Sāratthadīpanī
		III.1–7	Ānanda	Atthsālinīmūlaṭīkā, etc.
	(b) anuṭīkā	sub-subcommentary
		II.5 (Sn, Pj II; Pj II-ṭ? fragment, title uncertain)	Anonymous	* Paramatthajotikādīpanī
		III.1–7	Dhammapāla	Līnatthavaṇṇanā

III. Abhidhammapiṭaka (Things Referring to the Teaching)	1. Dhammasaṅgaṇi	Anonymous	Atthasālinī	Kassapa Coḷa: Mohavicchedanī
	2. Vibhaṅga	Anonymous	Sammohavinodanī
	3. Dhātukathā	Anonymous	Pañcappakaraṇaṭṭhakathā I
	4. Puggalapaññatti	Anonymous	Pañcappakaraṇaṭṭhakathā II
	5. Kathāvatthu	Anonymous	Pañcappakaraṇaṭṭhakathā III
	6. Yamaka	Anonymous	Pañcappakaraṇaṭṭhakathā IV
	7. Paṭṭhāna	Anonymous	Pañcappakaraṇaṭṭhakathā V

Table 2

	Type of Subcommentary		Author	Title
Subcommentaries: ṭīkā	(a) mūlaṭīkā	basic subcommentary
		I. (Vin, Sp)	Sāriputta	Sāratthadīpanī
		III.1–7	Ānanda	Atthsālinīmūlaṭīkā, etc.
	(b) anuṭīkā	sub-subcommentary
		II.5 (Sn, Pj II; Pj II-ṭ? fragment, title uncertain)	Anonymous	* Paramatthajotikādīpanī
		III.1–7	Dhammapāla	Līnatthavaṇṇanā
	(c) purāṇaṭīkā	old subcommentary
		II.1–4 (D/Sv; M/Ps; S/Spk; A/Mp):	Dhammapāla	Līnatthappakāsinī
		II.10 (Ja-a)	Dhammapāla	Līnatthappakāsinī
	(d) mahāṭīkā	great subcommentary
		Buddhaghosa Visuddhimagga	Dhammapāla	Visuddhimaggamahāṭīkā
	(e) navaṭīkā	new sub-subcommentary
		I. (Vin, Sp, Sp-ṭ)	Kassapa Coḷa	Vimativinodanī
		II. (D, Sv, Sv-pṭ)	Ñānābhivaṃsa Dhammasenāpati	Sādhujanavilāsinī
	(f) abhinavaṭīkā	very new sub-(sub)commentary
Special commentaries	atthayojanā	interpretation
		I. (Vin, Sp)	Ñāṇakitti	Samantapāsādikatthayojanā
		III.1	Ñāṇakitti	Atthsāliniatthayojanā
		III.2	Ñāṇakitti	Vibhaṅgaṭṭhakathatthayojanā
		III.3	Ñāṇakitti	Dhātukathātthayojanā
	gūḷhatthadīpanī	explication of the hidden meaning
		III.2 (Vibh)	Anonymous	Gūḷhatthadīpanī (Vibh-ṭ) ganṭhipada(vivaraṇa)	(explication) of difficult words
		I. (Sp) Vinayaganṭhipada	Vajirabuddhi	Vajirabuddhiṭīkā
		II.13 (Paṭis, Paṭis-a)		Paṭisambhidāmaggaganṭhipada

the Niddesa is difficult to determine, it may be as late as the 2nd century CE (von Hinüber, 1996, § 118). The text comments on various parts of the Suttanipāta: the Aṭṭhakavagga (Sn 766–975), the Pārāyaṇavagga (Sn 976–1149), and the Khaggavisāṇasuttanta (Sn 35–75).

In modern editions, the Niddesa is divided into the Mahāniddesa (Great Explanation) and the Cūḷaniddesa (Small Explanation), although both parts clearly form one unit, as clearly seen by the tradition: Sāriputtattherena kato Niddeso Mahāniddeso Cūḷaniddeso ti ca vuccati ("the Niddesa composed by the Elder Sāriputta is also called Mahāniddesa and Cūḷaniddesa"; Sāratthadīpanī, subcommentary on the Samantapāsādikā, 12th cent.); at the same time, this seems to be the earliest reference to the title Cūḷaniddesa; for, within the Saddhammapajotikā, only Niddesa and Mahāniddesa are mentioned, and the reference to Cūḷaniddesa in the commentary to the Dīghanikāya (Sv 394, 7; 5th cent.) is doubtful (only in the Burmese Chaṭṭhasaṅgāyana edition [modern correction?]; other editions: Mahāniddesa). In later texts and in the Burmese edition of the Niddesa commentary, the title Cūḷaniddesa is mentioned (not in the PTS edition).

The method applied in the Niddesa is mostly archaic and quite different from later commentaries. Individual words from the verses of the Suttanipāta are often explained by long lists of synonyms, which are frequently excerpted from canonical texts, in which they were originally used as mnemonic aides. They are applied in the Niddesa in quite a different function as explicative formulas. Moreover, the Niddesa sometimes quotes texts from the Tipiṭaka, which cannot be traced (von Hinüber, 1996, § 117).

While a large variety of terms is used in India for different forms of commentaries such as bhāṣya (critical commentary), (vi)vṛti ([simple] explanation), vyākhyā (explanation), and so forth, which are often difficult to define exactly, the Theravāda created a systematic terminology for commentaries on texts of the Tipiṭaka. Once the concept of niddesa was abandoned, the immediate commentaries on the Tipiṭaka were called aṭṭhakathā (exposition of the meaning). Various subcommentaries (ṭīkās) may be attached to the aṭṭhakathā: mūlaṭīkā (basic subcommentary), purāṇaṭīkā (old subcommentary), mahāṭīkā (great subcommentary), anuṭīkā ([sub-]subcommentary), navaṭīkā (new [sub-]-subcommentary), and abhinavaṭīkā (very new [sub-subcommentary). Little research has been done on a late class of commentaries called atthayojanā (interpretation), which only explain Vinayapiṭaka and Abhidhammapiṭaka texts. Virtually nothing is known about the unedited commentaries on the Abhidhammapiṭaka called gūḷhatthadīpanī (elucidation of the hidden meaning), which exist only in rare manuscripts (von Hinüber, 2007; 2013 no. 147).

Another group of commentaries is the ganthipadas ([explanations of] knotty [i.e. difficult] words; von Hinüber, 1996, § 203). Probably there was once a considerable number of ganthipadas written in Sinhalese, which are known from their quotations in Pali commentaries. Extant gāṇṭhipadas in Sinhala are the Dampiyā Aṭuvā Gäṭapadaya (Pali Dhammapadaṭṭhakathāganthipada) on the Dhammapada and the Jātaka Aṭuvā Gäṭapadaya (Pali Jātakaṭṭhakathāganthipada) on the jātaka commentaries. A ganthipada in Pali is the Paṭisambhidāmaggaṭṭhakathāganthipada published in Burma (von Hinüber, 1996, § 291).

Soon after the Niddesa and Paṭisambhidāmagga were included, the Tipiṭaka was closed. Consequently, the development of new ideas that found their way into texts of the Tipiṭakas of other schools could only be mentioned in the Theravāda commentaries. When, after a "dark period" of unknown duration (150–400 CE [?]) with no Pali text surviving (von Hinüber, 1996, § 206), the 5th century saw an impressive revival of Pali studies with a huge project undertaken in one of the prominent monasteries, the Mahāvihāra ("Great Monastery"), in Anuradhapura, the first capital of Sri Lanka. A comprehensive explanation of the major part of the Suttapiṭaka, supplemented by an accompanying handbook fixing the orthodox views of Theravāda, the Visuddhimagga (Path to Purification) was envisioned and completed under the leadership of the most learned monk Buddhaghosa, who may also have supervised the contemporary creation of the Vinayapiṭaka and Abhidhammapiṭaka commentaries.

The almost identical introductions to Buddhaghosa's commentaries on the four nikāyas (Dīghanikāya, Majjhimanikāya, Saṃyuttanikāya, and Aṅguttaranikāya) and the nigamanas (explicits) at their ends contain precious details particularly on the program and the background of his project (and that of the Mahāvihāra).

According to the nigamanas, Buddhaghosa composed his commentaries on the four nikāyas, or āgamas, as he says after being asked by various monks. The initiator of the Sumaṅgalavilāsinī, the aṭṭhakathā on the Dīghanikāya, was Dāṭhānāga, the saṃghathera (most senior monk) who lived in Sumaṅgalapariveṇa, a monastic residence of unknown location. This explains the name of the

---

commentary (The Graceful Sumaṅgala [Monastery]) or dates the virtues of the Bud von Hinüber, 1995/2009a, 12 PTS edition]). The initiator ([Commentary] Destroying Majjhimanikāya was Bhadant Buddhaghosa met at Mayūra India [?]). This commentar claim that it "destroys those a (Nigamana, v. 2). Bhadanta Jotip to compose the commentary the Sāratthappakāsinī ([Com Essential Meaning). Lastly, the commentary on the Aṅgu fulfilling commentary, was co of the same(?) Bhadanta Joti hosa met also in Kāñcīpura, in the Mahāvihāra. As the l completed in this grand proj the fact that it is the "(comme [i.e. Buddhaghosa's] wish to c (Nigamana, v. 6).

This important remark Manorathapūraṇī shows, to ductions, that Buddhaghosa four aṭṭhakathās, although ously attributes a large nu ies to Buddhaghosa, such Samantapāsādikā or even Ab mentaries (see below).

The introductory verses t mentaries are identical exc which briefly characterizes the beginning of each com sketches his program. He s of the nikāyas does not cont orthodoxy accepted by the lineage (theriyavaṃsa) resid His starting point is the ol lese sīhaḷabhāsā) that is su have been brought from In Sinhala by Mahinda, whe dhism in Sīhaḷadīpa (i.e. Cey by King Devānaṃpiyatissa by his father Aśoka. It was rewrite the Sīhaḷaṭṭhakathā
"in a language (bhāsā), whi principles of the tradition Sv 1.20*). At the same time, tured, and expanded this c written about seven hund hidhammapiṭaka texts. Virtually out the unedited commentaries apiṭaka called gūḷhatthadīpanī hidden meaning), which exist ripts (von Hinüber, 2007; 2013 ommentaries is the gaṇṭhipadas notty [i.e. difficult] words; von 3). Probably there was once a er of gaṇṭhipadas written in known from their quotations

s. Extant gāṇṭhipadas in Sinhala vā Gāṭapadaya (Pali Dhamma- pada) on the Dhammapada and apadaya (Pali Jātakaṭṭhakathā- aka commentaries. A gaṇṭhipada hidāmaggaṭṭhakathāgaṇṭhipada (von Hinüber, 1996, § 291).
ddesa and Paṭisambhidāmagga Tipiṭaka was closed. Conse-ment of new ideas that found f the Tipiṭakas of other schools ioned in the Theravāda comer a "dark period" of unknown [?]) with no Pali text surviving § 206), the 5th century saw an Pali studies with a huge project f the prominent monasteries, eat Monastery"), in Anuradhaof Sri Lanka. A comprehensive major part of the Suttapiṭaka, accompanying handbook fixing of Theravāda, the Visuddhi- ification) was envisioned and leadership of the most learned who may also have supervised eation of the Vinayapiṭaka and commentaries.
l introductions to Buddhaghosa's e four nikāyas (Dīghanikāya, ṃyuttanikāya, and Aṅguttara- manas (explicits) at their ends ails particularly on the program of his project (and that of the e nigamanas, Buddhaghosa entaries on the four nikāyas, s after being asked by various of the Sumaṅgalavilāsinī, the Dīghanikāya, was Dāṭhānāga, ost senior monk) who lived ṇa, a monastic residence of This explains the name of the

---

commentary (The Graceful [Commentary] of the Sumaṅgala [Monastery]) on a text that "elucidates the virtues of the Buddha" (Nigamana, v. 2; von Hinüber, 1995/2009a, 129/62 [text not in the PTS edition]). The initiator of the Papañcasūdanī ([Commentary] Destroying the Illusions) on the Majjhimanikāya was Bhadanta Buddhamitta, whom Buddhaghosa met at Mayūrarūpapaṭṭana (in South India [?]). This commentary owes its title to its claim that it "destroys those adhering to false views" (Nigamana, v. 2). Bhadanta Jotipāla asked Buddhaghosa to compose the commentary on the Saṃyuttanikāya, the Sāratthappakāsinī ([Commentary] Revealing the Essential Meaning). Lastly, the Manorathapūraṇī, the commentary on the Aṅguttaranikāya, the wish-fulfilling commentary, was composed at the request of the same(?) Bhadanta Jotipāla, whom Buddhaghosa met also in Kāñcīpura, and of Jīvaka who lived in the Mahāvihāra. As the last commentary to be completed in this grand project it owes its name to the fact that it is the "(commentary that) fulfilled my [i.e. Buddhaghosa's] wish to comment on all āgamas (Nigamana, v. 6).

This important remark at the end of the Manorathapūraṇī shows, together with the introductions, that Buddhaghosa composed only these four aṭṭhakathās, although the tradition erroneously attributes a large number of commentaries to Buddhaghosa, such as, for instance, the Samantapāsādikā or even Abhidhammapiṭaka commentaries (see below).

The introductory verses to all four nikāya commentaries are identical except for the fifth verse, which briefly characterizes the specific nikāya. At the beginning of each commentary, Buddhaghosa sketches his program. He states that his exegesis of the nikāyas does not contradict (avilomento) the orthodoxy accepted by the monks of the Theravāda lineage (theriyavaṃsa) residing in the Mahāvihāra. His starting point is the old aṭṭhakathā (in Sinhalese sīhaḷabhāsā) that is supposed by tradition to have been brought from India and translated into Sinhala by Mahinda, when he propagated Buddhism in Sīhaḷadīpa (i.e. Ceylon) after being invited by King Devānaṃpiyatissa (247–207 BCE) and sent by his father Aśoka. It was Buddhaghosa's task to rewrite the Sīhaḷaṭṭhakathā in Pali, or, as he says, "in a language (bhāsā), which is appropriate to the principles of the tradition" (tantinayānucchavika; Sv 1.20*). At the same time, he modernized, restructured, and expanded this commentary, which was written about seven hundred years earlier, if the tradition is taken literally, and certainly the extant commentaries are the result of a long development (von Hinüber, 1996, § 206).

Rare insights into the text of old aṭṭhakathā are possible when parallel canonical passages are explained in different ways in two separate commentaries or when nikāya commentaries seem to preserve old wordings of commentarial Vinaya material taken over from the old aṭṭhakathā, which also exists in an edited form in the Samantapāsādikā (von Hinüber, 1996, §§ 239–241). The structure of the old aṭṭhakathā is visible in rare remarks indicating a rearrangement of the old material in the new aṭṭhakathā (von Hinüber, 1996, § 215, §§ 241–243; see Endo, 2009). Minute quotations from the superseded Sīhaḷaṭṭhakathā were found by Helmer Smith in a late Dhammapada commentary, the Dhampiyāṭuvāgäṭapaya (von Hinüber, 1996, 101n362).

According to the overall structure of Buddhaghosa's project, the central text is the Visuddhimagga, which "stands in the middle of the four āgamas [nikāyas; Sv 2.6*]" in such a way that fundamental concepts of the Buddha's dhamma such as the four noble truths (catt āri aryas) and meditation (vipassanā, bhāvanā) are discussed in the Visuddhimagga in detail; this discussion is not repeated in the individual aṭṭhakathās. Therefore, it is imperative to use both – the commentary side by side with the Visuddhimagga – to fully understand the respective nikāya.

As the first of the four commentaries, the Sumaṅgalavilāsinī begins with a long introduction (Sv 2–25) that refers to the formation of the canonical texts at the First Buddhist Council and deals at length with content and division of the Tipiṭaka. The parts of the Tipiṭaka and the names of all four nikāyas are enumerated (and explained in the nigamanas to the individual commentaries). Their individual length is defined by the number of suttantas. The Khuddakanikāya is described in the Sumaṅgalavilāsinī as comprising all other texts including the complete Vinayapiṭaka and Abhidhammapiṭaka. At the beginning of the three below-mentioned nikāya commentaries only the relevant definitions are repeated.

After explaining the introduction (nidāna) to the first suttanta, three aṭṭhakathās define the four motives that may induce the Buddha to deliver a discourse (suttanikkhepa [laying down a sutta]):

1. attajjhāsaya (his own disposition [or intention]), which is the wish of the Buddha himself to act without being asked to do so,

2. parajjhāsaya (disposition of another person), when the Buddha recognizes the readiness of somebody to make some progress in understanding his teaching,
3. pucchāvasika (on account of a question), when the Buddha is asked to clarify a certain point, and;
4. aṭṭhuppattika (due to a cause or occasion) presenting itself (von Hinüber, 1996, § 230; forthcoming).

Only in the Sāratthappakāsinī are the suttanikkhepas placed at the beginning of the commentary on the second section, the Nidānavagga, which indicates that the special position of the first one, the Sagāthavagga of the Saṃyuttanikāya was recognized at the time of Buddhaghosa already.

The inner structure of any discourse is explained in detail in the Sumaṅgalavilāsinī by the three anusandhis (developments) that mark the transition from one section to the next:

1. pucchānusandhi (developing a question [posed to the Buddha]),
2. ajjhāsayānusandhi (development on account of the disposition [of another person]), when, for example, the Buddha recognizes that a monk is pondering a certain problem and avails himself to this opportunity to develop and explain this problem in a discourse; and
3. yathānusandhi (natural development), when the discourse begins with one topic but leads to another one, because it is either in correspondence with or in contradiction to the original topic (Sv 122.22–123.22; Smith, 1949, 1128, § 5.3.2.1).

Occasionally the structure of canonical texts is analyzed in an almost modern way, when possible additions supposed to have been made by the participants of the first council (dhammasaṅgāhaka [compiler of the teaching]) are discussed. It is, for instance, assumed and discussed by Dhammapāla in the introduction to his Paramatthadīpanī II on the Itivuttaka (It-a 32.25–32; see below) that the various introductions to discourses of different classes of texts, such as enaṃme sutaṃ ("thus have I heard") in suttantas, tena kho pana samayena ("at that time") in the Vinaya, or vuttaṃ h'etaṃ ("for it was said") or vuttaṃ hetaṃ ("this was said") in the Itivuttaka, were shaped and inserted by the participants of the first council (see Majjhimanikāya: Chabbisodhanasutta).

Two basic principles pervade all commentaries and result in a gradual abbreviation of the texts: (1) apubbapadavaṇṇanā (explaining [only] words not explained before) and (2) anuttānapadavaṇṇanā ([only] explaining doubtful words; von Hinüber, 1996, § 214).

The purpose of this carefully planned system of cross-referencing is to reach a high degree of consistency (and perhaps abbreviation of the texts) within this huge project comprising four nikāya commentaries, the Visuddhimagga, and the commentaries to the Vinayapiṭaka and Abhidhammapiṭaka but excluding those on the Khuddakanikāya. Consequently, it is impossible to draw any conclusions on chronology from these cross-references, because they were inserted simultaneously (von Hinüber, 1996, § 243).

Although tradition ascribes all these commentaries to Buddhaghosa as an author, he is connected to the Abhidhammapiṭaka commentaries in quite a different way. Thus, the introductory verses to the Atthasālinī, the first of the Abhidhammapiṭaka commentaries, which follow a pattern different from those at the beginning of the nikāya commentaries, name Buddhaghosa as the person at whose initiative this text was composed thereby excluding his authorship. Moreover, Buddhaghosa refers to the Visuddhimagga as composed "by me" in the introductory verses to all nikāya commentaries in contrast to the neutral "is said in the Visuddhimagga" in the Atthasālinī. Furthermore, inner evidence rules out the authorship of Buddhaghosa in spite of the fact that the "Buddhaghosa colophon" of the nikāya commentaries is added to the three parts of the Abhidhamma commentary (von Hinüber, 1996, § 312).

The commentaries to the seven texts of the Abhidhammapiṭaka form one subunit within the new aṭṭhakathā. Only the first two, on the Dhammasaṅgaṇi and on the Vibhaṅga, bear individual titles: Atthasālinī (Bur. Aṭṭhasālinī; [The Aṭṭhakathā] Rich in Meaning; Skt. arthaśālinī is different in meaning [wealthy]), explained as "origin of unconfused meanings" in the nigamana (anākulānaṃ atthānaṃ sambhavā; As 429.20*), and the Sammohavinodanī (Dispeller of Delusion). The remaining five commentaries are subsumed under the common title Pañcapakaraṇāṭṭhakathā (Commentary on the Five Treatises).

This set of seven commentaries is united by common introductory verses found only in the Atthasālinī, according to which the Abhidhamma texts were recited during the First Buddhist Council by Ānanda (Vedehamuni), thus contradicting the account found in the Vinayapiṭaka, where the Abhidhammapiṭaka is not mentioned. A long

---

historical introduction simi nikāya commentaries follo texts are described here in whether the Kathāvatthu canonical. Another lengthy missing nidāna (introductio texts (von Hinüber, 1996, § a mātikā (summary) instea § 131).

Besides the explanations Tipiṭaka, all Suttapiṭaka a commentaries contain long on various topics (see below tion only found in the Manor nation of the Etadaggavag of That [Class of Persons]) is of particular importanc §§ 235ff.).

The anonymous Samant respect pleasing (commenta forms also a part of this pro to Buddhaghosa, his author out. The form and content o are quite different from th Sumaṅgalavilāsinī and the the method followed in t ing views – also from non-Indian commentaries, whic in the introductory verses – troversies on the legal inter (von Hinüber, 1996, § 210, §
and Abhidhammapiṭaka co only orthodox explanations

Moreover, the Samanta with the intention to reac of the world." Therefore, Si language in favor of Pali to nition more easily (introdu the introductory verses, ge pretation are summarized i

> by whom it was said, w > learned by heart by wh > whom, where (a disco > (i.e. delivered). (Sp 3.17*f > 1962, 2)

At the beginning, the histo tion and the content of th again in great detail in a wa tion to the Sumaṅgalaviläs
The nigamana states th was composed with aston 20th and 21st years of rule o doubtful words; von Hinüber, is carefully planned system of o reach a high degree of consis-bbreviation of the texts) within mprising four nikāya commennagga, and the commentaries and Abhidhammapiṭaka but the Khuddakanikāya. Consesible to draw any conclusions these cross-references, because simultaneously (von Hinüber, n ascribes all these commentaras an author, he is connected piṭaka commentaries in quite a the introductory verses to the of the Abhidhammapiṭaka comllow a pattern different from ng of the nikāya commentaries, as the person at whose initia-mposed thereby excluding his er, Buddhaghosa refers to the omposed "by me" in the intro-nikāya commentaries in con-

"is said in the Visuddhimagga" Furthermore, inner evidence rship of Buddhaghosa in spite Buddhaghosa colophon" of the s is added to the three parts of mmentary (von Hinüber, 1996, es to the seven texts of the form one subunit within

ā. Only the first two, on the d on the Vibhaṅga, bear indi-sālinī (Bur. Aṭṭhasālinī; [The n Meaning; Skt. arthaśālinī is [wealthy]), explained as "orimeanings" in the nigamana aṃ sambhavā; As 429.20*), and nī (Dispeller of Delusion). The mentaries are subsumed under añcapakaraṇāṭṭhakathā (Com-Treatises).
n commentaries is united by ory verses found only in the ng to which the Abhidhamma uring the First Buddhist Counedehamuni), thus contradict-nd in the Vinayapiṭaka, where aka is not mentioned. A long

---

historical introduction similar to the one in the nikāya commentaries follows. The Abhidhamma texts are described here including a discussion of whether the Kathāvatthu should be regarded as canonical. Another lengthy paragraph concerns the missing nidāna (introduction) in the Abhidhamma texts (von Hinüber, 1996, § 315), which begin with a mātikā (summary) instead (von Hinüber, 1996, § 131).

Besides the explanations of the texts found in the Tipiṭaka, all Suttapiṭaka and Abhidhammapiṭaka commentaries contain long digressions (pakiṇṇakas) on various topics (see below). The hagiographic section only found in the Manorathapūraṇī in the explanation of the Etadaggavagga (Section on the Best of That [Class of Persons]) of the Aṅguttaranikāya is of particular importance (von Hinüber, 1996, §§ 235ff.).

The anonymous Samantapāsādikā, the "in every respect pleasing (commentary)" on the Vinayapiṭaka, forms also a part of this project. Though attributed to Buddhaghosa, his authorship can be safely ruled out. The form and content of the introductory verses are quite different from the beginning of both the Sumaṅgalavilāsinī and the Atthasālinī, and so is the method followed in this commentary; differing views – also from non-Mahāvihāra and South Indian commentaries, which are partly mentioned in the introductory verses – are discussed, and controversies on the legal interpretation are presented (von Hinüber, 1996, § 210, § 320), whereas the nikāya and Abhidhammapiṭaka commentaries usually offer only orthodox explanations.

Moreover, the Samantapāsādikā was composed with the intention to reach "monks of other parts of the world." Therefore, Sinhala was given up as a language in favor of Pali to gain international recognition more easily (introductory vv. 8–9). Following the introductory verses, general principles of interpretation are summarized in a verse:

> by whom it was said, when, for what reason, learned by heart by whom, handed down by whom, where (a discourse) was established (i.e. delivered). (Sp 3.17*ff.; trans. Jayawickrama, 1962, 2)

At the beginning, the history of the Buddhist tradition and the content of the Tipiṭaka are presented again in great detail in a way similar to the introduction to the Sumaṅgalavilāsinī.

The nigamana states that the Samantapāsādikā was composed with astonishing speed during the 20th and 21st years of rule of the otherwise unknown king Sirinivāsa (identical with King Mahānāma [409–431]?? in the Mahāmeghavanuyyāna supposed to be a part of the Mahāvihāra; von Hinüber, 1996, § 209).

At the beginning of the explanation of the first pārājika rule (Sp 230.21–233.35), the author(s) of the Samantapāsādikā describe(s) the method how to explain the Vinaya by taking four aspects into account.

1. the "text of the Vinayapiṭaka" (sutta; "sutta is the canonical text [pāḷi] of the complete Vinayapiṭaka").
2. the "conformity with the Vinaya (sutta)" (suttānuloma), which is specified as being the same as "the four great arguments (mahāpadesa)" (E. Lamotte; comp. von Hinüber, 1996, § 9), and refers to the rules of interpretation of the Vinayapiṭaka laid down in the Mahāvagga of the Vinayapiṭaka (Vin I.250.34–251.6): anything not taught explicitly in the Vinaya is allowed if it conforms with the rules of the Vinaya and forbidden if it does not.
3. the "opinion of the teachers" (ācariyavāda): the teachers are the participants of the First Buddhist Council (dhammasaṅgāhaka), whose views are "detached from the canonical text (i.e. going beyond the Vinaya)" (pāḷivinimmutta) but are part of the commentarial tradition (aṭṭhakathātanti).
4. "one's own opinion" (attano mati). This last is the weakest principle of interpretation, and any decision (vinicchaya) based on it is valid only if confirmed by the three stronger principles.

The Samantapāsādikā explains the Vinayapiṭaka in a very abstract and rigidly systematic way that is not always easy to grasp, and no complete translation of the Samantapāsādikā into a Western language was ever attempted (for the introduction [Sp 1–105], see Jayawickrama, 1962). The Chinese version of the Samantapāsādikā dated 489 CE (von Hinüber, 1996, § 207), which is available in English (Bapat & Hirakawa, 1970), contains a text widely differing from the Theravāda Samantapāsādikā. The exact interrelation of both texts needs further research (Pinte, 2010).

Numerous digressions (pakiṇṇakas) are inserted into the Samantapāsādikā. They sometimes contain important – but, because of difficult vocabulary, occasionally only partly comprehensible – material for cultural history. Some of these pakiṇṇakas are taken over from the old aṭṭhakathā (von Hinüber, 1996, § 218).

A second anonymous commentary on the Vinayapiṭaka, the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī ([Commentary] Which Overcomes the Doubts) covers only the Pātimokkha (von Hinüber, 1996, §§ 221–225; new edition by K.R. Norman and W. Pruitt, 2003 [PTS]). There is no evidence to support Buddhaghosa's authorship of this text as supposed by tradition.

The Samantapāsādikā and the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī are certainly not composed by the same person as demonstrated by marked differences in the terminology used in both texts. The Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī, which presupposes and refers to the Samantapāsādikā, is conceived as a practical handbook, much shorter than the Samantapāsādikā, abstains from the discussion of legal problems, and follows a much stricter pattern in explaining the individual rules of the Pātimokkha. The Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī also explains the introduction to the Pātimokkha preserved only in the Mahāvagga of the Vinayapiṭaka (see above), which shows that the Pātimokkha including this introduction existed as a separate text.

There are two subcommentaries to the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī: (1) the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīporāṇaṭīkā (Old Commentary on the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī) and (2) the Vinayatthamañjūsā (Receptacle of the Meaning of the Vinayapiṭaka) composed by Buddhanāga in the 12th century (von Hinüber, 1996, §§ 377ff.).

A later commentator of the Vinayapiṭaka is Vajirabuddhi (sometime after 600 CE [?]), who was on account of his intimate knowledge of parts of South India a native or long-time resident of that area. His commentary, though usually called Vajirabuddhiṭīkā (Commentary by Vajirabuddhi), is in the author's own understanding a gaṇṭhipada (see above). Vajirabuddhi discusses opinions of his predecessors and quotes a number of sources (von Hinüber, 1996, §§ 367–371; Kieffer-Pülz, 2012).

The different commentaries on the Khuddakanikāya were written sometime after Buddhaghosa's project was completed. Two anonymous commentaries without individual titles are the Dhammapadaṭṭhakathā (Commentary on the Dhammapada) and Jātakatthavaṇṇanā (Explanation of the Jātakas) on the verses, the only canonical part of the jātakas (von Hinüber, 1996, §§ 260–269). The jātaka commentary begins with the Nidānakathā (Introduction), which describes the former lives of the Buddha beginning with Sumedha's meeting with the former Buddha Dīpaṃkara, who predicts his future Buddhahood. The Nidānakathā ends with Anāthapiṇḍika's donation of the Jetavana, in which the first jātaka is subsequently told by the Buddha. The jātaka collection ends with the Vessantaraja, which describes the last rebirth of the Bodhisattva before he ascends to the Tusita heaven, to be reborn only one more time on earth in order to reach enlightenment.

Both the Dhammapadaṭṭhakathā and the Jātakatthavaṇṇanā differ from genuine commentaries in so far as they mainly connect stories to the verses. Consequently, both are important sources for the history of narrative literature. In the Dhammapadaṭṭhakathā, the individual verses are explained by a story told by the Buddha. In contrast, the canonical jātaka verses particularly in those sections (nipāta) that contain a large number of verses in each story, are incorporated into the story in the Jātakatthavaṇṇanā. The framework of the commentary on individual jātakas is strictly fixed. The origin of the story is told in the paccuppannavatthu (story of the present [i.e. the time of the Buddha]). The events described here are explained by the atītavatthu (story of the past [lives of the persons mentioned in the paccuppannavatthu]), into which the canonical text, the gāthās (verses) are embedded together with the veyyākaraṇa (explication). The veyyākaraṇa sometimes quotes from the earlier, lost Jātakaṭṭhakathā. At the end, the Buddha connects past and present in the samodhāna (combination) by explaining that the kamma accumulated in the past determined the actions of the person mentioned in the paccuppannavatthu. The origin and development of the Jātakatthavaṇṇanā can be traced better than that of any other commentary (von Hinüber, 1998).

A large number of texts of the Khuddakanikāya are explained by a second great commentator, Dhammapāla, who most likely was also a South Indian. The colophons state that he lived in the Badaratittha Monastery of unknown location. He is certainly later than Buddhaghosa, whose works he used as a model. Moreover, he is familiar with the Dhammapadaṭṭhakathā and the Jātakatthavaṇṇanā. Therefore, he might have lived sometime after 500 CE (von Hinüber, 1996, § 274, § 365, § 370).

Dhammapāla has written an even larger number of commentaries than Buddhaghosa is supposed to have. His Paramatthadīpanī (Explanation of the Highest Meaning) in seven parts and four units comments on Udāna, Itivuttaka, Vimānavatthu, Petavatthu, Theragāthā, Therīgāthā, and Cariyapiṭaka. This sequence of texts is different from the arrangement of the Khuddakanikāya used in the Mahāvihāra (von Hinüber, 1996, § 273). The style of Dhammapāla's commentaries is more sophisticated than that of the earlier aṭṭhakathā, clearly reflecting some progress in commentarial techniques.

The reason for Dhammapāla's selection of these texts from the Khuddakanikāya is unknown. Other parts of the Khuddakanikāya that are not cov-hammapadaṭṭhakathā and the ā differ from genuine commens they mainly connect stories to sequently, both are important story of narrative literature. In the akathā, the individual verses are ry told by the Buddha. In contrast, ka verses particularly in those sect contain a large number of verses incorporated into the story in the

ā. The framework of the com-idual jātakas is strictly fixed. The is told in the paccuppannavatthu nt [i.e. the time of the Buddha]). ibed here are explained by the of the past [lives of the persons paccuppannavatthu]), into which , the gāthās (verses) are embed-the veyyākaraṇa (explication).
ometimes quotes from the earlier, hā. At the end, the Buddha con-esent in the samodhāna (combi-ing that the kamma accumulated nined the actions of the person paccuppannavatthu. The origin of the Jātakatthavaṇṇanā can be that of any other commentary
).

of texts of the Khuddakanikāya a second great commentator, most likely was also a South hons state that he lived in the stery of unknown location. He is Buddhaghosa, whose works he oreover, he is familiar with the athā and the Jātakatthavaṇṇanā. ht have lived sometime after
r, 1996, § 274, § 365, § 370).

s written an even larger number han Buddhaghosa is supposed matthadīpanī (Explanation of
ing) in seven parts and four Udāna, Itivuttaka, Vimānavatthu, thā, Therīgāthā, and Cariyapiṭaka.
texts is different from the Khuddakanikāya used in the inüber, 1996, § 273). The style of mentaries is more sophisticated ier aṭṭhakathā, clearly reflecting mmentarial techniques.

hammapāla's selection of these dakanikāya is unknown. Other dakanikāya that are not covered by Dhammapāla such as the Khuddakapāṭha and the Suttanipāta are commented on by the Paramatthajotikā I and Paramatthajotikā II (Illuminator of the Highest Meaning; von Hinüber, 1996, §§ 255–259). Both commentaries are erroneously ascribed to Buddhaghosa, and both are certainly written by two different authors. The Paramatthajotikā II is a subcommentary on some parts of the Suttanipāta, because an older commentary, the Niddesa (see above), also survives, a situation unique in the Suttapiṭaka.

The Niddesa is commented on by Upasena, who wrote his Saddhammapajjotikā (Illuminator of the Right Law) in the Mahāvihāra. This commentary can be dated with some confidence to either 817 or 877 CE (von Hinüber, 1996, §§ 287–290).

The commentary to the Paṭisambhidāmagga, the Saddhammapakāsinī (Revealing the Right Law) composed by Mahānāma in the Mahāvihāra, was created three centuries before 499 or 559 CE (von Hinüber, 1996, §§ 291–297). Here, the author of a commentary is named for the first time in the Nigamana, which is also otherwise unusually rich in information. Mahānāma does not seem to know Dhammapāla. Consequently, he may be older, but hardly any relevant research has been done on the interrelation of the commentaries on the Khuddakanikāya.

The last texts of the Khuddakanikāya that were provided with a commentary are the Buddhavaṃsa and the Apadāna. The Madhuratthavilāsinī (Clarifier of the Sweet Meaning), which can be dated to perhaps the 8th century, explains the "Lineage of the Buddhas" (von Hinüber, 1996, §§ 298–301). The youngest Khuddakanikāya commentary is the Visuddhajanavilāsinī ([Commentary] Charming Pure People) on the Apadāna, composed perhaps in Southeast Asia at an uncertain late date (von Hinüber, 1996, §§ 302–303).

Besides his vast Paramatthadīpanī, Dhammapāla is credited with commentaries on the Visuddhimagga (e.g. the Visuddhimaggamahāṭīkā [Great Commentary on the Visuddhimagga] or Paramatthamañjūsā [Receptacle of the Highest Truth]) and with both a commentary (Nettiaṭṭhakathā [Commentary on the Netti(pakaraṇa)]) and a subcommentary (Līnatthavaṇṇanā Nettipurāṇaṭīkā [Old Commentary Explaining the Hidden Meaning of the Netti]) on the Nettippakaraṇā (von Hinüber, 1996, §§ 361ff.). Moreover, subcommentaries (purāṇaṭīkās: "old subcommentaries") to the commentaries (aṭṭhakathās) by Buddhaghosa on the four nikāyas perhaps also written by Dhammapāla and named Līnatthappakāsinī I–IV ([Commentary] Revealing the Hidden Meaning), including as Līnatthappakāsinī V a subcommentary to the Jātakatthavaṇṇanā, the Jātakaporāṇaṭīkā, which only exists in manuscript form (von Hinüber, 1996, § 358ff.). Dhammapāla's Līnatthappakāsinī IV on the Manorathapuraṇī was considered to be lost but was rediscovered in manuscript form by P. Pecenko (Pecenko, 2002).

The commentaries on Abhidhamma texts created within the Buddhaghosa project are further commented on by Ānanda Kalasapura, a town of unknown location, in his the Atthasālinīmūlaṭīkā, Vibhaṅgamūlaṭīkā, and Pañcappakaraṇamūlaṭīkā "basic commentaries" that are also called Līnatthajotikā ([Commentary] Illuminating the Hidden Meaning; von Hinüber, 1996, § 356). Dhammapāla, who is traditionally considered Ānanda's pupil, added an anuṭīkā (subcommentary), the Līnatthavaṇṇanā ([Commentary] Explaining the Hidden Meaning), to Ānanda's mūlaṭīkā.

During the 12th century, when King Parakkamabāhu I (1153–1186) reformed and united the saṅgha of Ceylon along the lines of the Mahāvihāra orthodoxy, Sāriputta composed among many other works (Pecenko, 1997) also a new set of subcommentaries, because the older explanations, particularly those offered in the ganṭhipadas written in old Sinhala Prakrit, were no longer fully comprehensible (von Hinüber, 1996, §§ 373–375). Only Sāriputta's Sāratthadīpanī (Elucidator of the Essential Meaning) on the Samantapāsādikā and his Sāratthamañjūsā IV (Receptacle of the Essential Meaning) on the Manorathapūraṇī are published, the latter to substitute the Līnatthapakāsinī IV – as erroneously considered to be lost as are the Līnatthapakāsinī I–III (Pecenko, 2009).

Kassapa Coḷa may be aiming at his perhaps slightly older contemporary Sāriputta when he criticizes his predecessors in his Vimativinodanī (Dispeller of Doubts). Kassapa writes in order to suppress wrong and confused views. He was most likely South Indian, and he refers to the Tamil poem Kuṇḍalakēci (von Hinüber, 1996, § 338).

The last set of commentaries covering only Vinaya and Abhidhamma texts were composed in about 1500 in northern Thailand by Ñāṇakitti (von Hinüber, 2000/2009, 123ff./406ff.), who wrote three Atthayojanās (Joining the Meaning [to the Text (?)]), on the Samantapāsādikā, Atthasālinī, and Vibhaṅga, respectively, and perhaps also on other parts of the Abhidhammapiṭaka (von Hinüber, 1996, §§ 379ff.).

The last commentary on the Tipiṭaka is the very late subcommentary, a navaṭīkā (new commentary), called the Sādhujanavilāsinī ([Commentary] Charming Virtuous Persons), covering only the first part of the Dīghanikāya, the Sīlakkhandhavagga. It is written by the Burmese Saṃgharāja Ñāṇābhivaṃsa in about 1800 (von Hinüber, 1996, § 382; Pecenko 2002, 70).

There are a number of handbooks on both the Vinaya and the Abhidhamma (von Hinüber, 1996, 323–354), among them Sāriputta's Pālimuttakavinayavinicchayasaṅgaha (Collection of Legal Decisions not Found in the Vinaya), largely a rearranged Samantapāsādikā (von Hinüber, 1996, § 334), or the very lucid Abhidhamma handbook called Mohavicchedanī ([Commentary] Destroying the Delusion), composed perhaps in about 1200 CE by the South Indian Kassapa Coḷa, who is most likely identical with the author of the Vimativinodanī (see above; von Hinüber, 1996, § 354). Most of these handbooks are commented on).

Furthermore, there are two older handbooks that systematically develop guidelines for explaining the teaching of the Buddha – the Peṭakopadesa (Instructions on the Piṭaka; also translated as Piṭaka Disclosure [Ñāṇamoli]) and the Nettipakaraṇa (Treatise That Contains Guidelines; also translated as The Guide [Ñāṇamoli]; von Hinüber, 1996, §§ 158–171). Both handbooks, which predate Buddhaghosa, enjoy paracanonical status and may be perhaps considered "intruders" into the Theravāda tradition from the outside (Zacchetti, 2002). Both are comparatively little studied. Moreover, it is difficult to trace any influence of these handbooks on the existing commentaries, although more research is needed into this direction and into the exact interrelation of the two texts.

All commentators work within the framework of the Indian commentarial tradition. This is evidenced by the fact that the terminology applied by the Theravāda commentators in their explanations largely follows general Indian usage – for instance, the word attha (Skt. artha; meaning) is used to mark a paraphrase or synonym explaining a word, in contrast to adhippāya (Skt. abhiprāya; intention) or bhāva (Skt. & Pali; intended idea; Tubb & Boose, 2007, 23f., § 1.13, § 1.13.2). Moreover, the term attha (expressed meaning) can be used as opposed to byañjana (wording; Smith, 1928, § 6.0.3 [l'esprit et la lettre]). This terminology is concisely but comprehensively described by H. Smith in one of the appendices to his edition of Aggavāmsa's Saddanīti: conspectus terminorum (Smith, 1949). Moreover, the commentators are well versed in the indigenous grammar, in Sanskrit (Pind, 1989), and in lexicography. They occasionally quote verses from unknown (lost?) dictionaries, which may be considerably older than all extant Sanskrit dictionaries (kośas), including the Amarakośa. Therefore the aṭṭhakathā is an important, but so far unused, source for the history of Indian lexicography (von Hinüber, 1998/2009b).

By far not all commentaries have been translated. Although the major part of Dhammapāla's commentaries on the Khuddakanikāya is available in English (von Hinüber, 1996, § 273; recent translations: Th-a: Pruitt, 1998; It-a: Masefield, 2008/2009), only a minute fraction of Buddhaghosa's work, with the exception of the Visuddhimagga, has been translated – for instance the commentary on the Mahāparinibbānasuttanta (An, 2003) as well as the Brahmajālasuttanta, the Sāmaññaphalasuttanta, and the Mahānidānasuttanta of the Dīghanikāya and the Mūlapariyāyasuttanta of the Majjhimanikāya, which are translated together with commentary and subcommentary (Bodhi, 1978; 1980; 1995). There are English versions of the two major Abhidhamma commentaries, Atthasālinī and Vibhaṅga. The outdated (and often incorrect) translation of the Atthasālinī was superseded recently by an improved one (Nyānaponika, 2005).

Research on Pali commentaries was for a long time a somewhat neglected field. However, progress was achieved by researches in Japan particularly by the work of Sodo Mori (1989; 2007) and Toshiichi Endo (2013), and the legal commentaries by P. Kieffer-Pülz (2013).

Bibliography

An, Y.-G., trans., The Buddha's Last Days: Buddhaghosa's Commentary on the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta, Oxford, 2003.

Bapat, Purushottam Vishvanath, & Akira Hirakawa, Shan-Chien-P'i-P'o-Sha: A Chinese Version by Saṅghabhadra of Samantapāsādikā, Commentary on Pāli Vinaya Translated into English for the First Time, BOS 10, Poona 1970.

Bodhi, Bhikkhu, trans., The Great Discourse on Causation: The Mahānidāna Sutta and Its Commentaries, Kandy, ²1995.

Bodhi, Bhikkhu, trans., The Discourse on the Fruits of Recluseship: The Sāmaññaphala Sutta and Its Commentaries, Kandy, 1989.

Bodhi, Bhikkhu, trans., The Discourse of the Root of Existence: The Mūlapariyāya Sutta and Its Commentaries, Kandy, 1980.

Bodhi, Bhikkhu, trans., The Discourse on the All-Embracing Net of Views: The Brahmajāla Sutta and Its Commentaries, Kandy, 1978.

Endo, Toshiichi, Studies in Pāli Commentarial Literature: Sources, Controversies and Insights, Hong Kong, 2013.

Endo, Toshiichi, "The Mahā-Aṭṭhakathā-s: Some Observations on the Date of Their Compilation," in: K.L. Dhammajoti & Y. Karunadasa, eds., Buddhist and Pali Studies in Honour

---

of The Venerable Professor Ka Kong, 2009, 169–181; repr. in Pāli Commentarial Literatur Insights, Hong Kong, 2013, 33 Hazra, K.L., Studies on Pali Com
Hinüber, O. von, "Building th Buddhaghosa and Dhamm ers, Redactors, Editors, and Authors and Editors in the Buddhism, forthcoming.
Hinüber, O. von, Die Pāli-Hand
bei Lampang in Nord-Thailan Hinüber, O. von, "The Nigamar and the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī," JP
H. Falk & W. Slaje, eds., Klein
62–66.
Hinüber, O. von, "Review of indischer Sanskrit Wörterbü 1996," OLZ 93, 1998, 97–100; eds., Kleine Schriften, Wiesba Hinüber, O. von, "Lān² Nā as a ing the Late 15th Century," JP
H. Falk & W. Slaje, eds., Klein
402–420.
Hinüber, O. von, "Buddhistische Indien – Die Erklärung des Thera & P. Walter, eds., Kommen zentraler Texte der Weltrel Überblick, Cologne, 2007, 99– Hinüber, O. von, Entstehung
Sammlung, AAWL 7, Stuttgar Hinüber, O. von, A Handbook
Berlin, 1996.
Jayawickrama, N.A., The Inceptio Nidāna Being a Translation an of Buddhaghosa's Samantapā tary, London 1962.
Kieffer-Pülz, P., Verlorene Ganṭ
Ordensrecht, 3 vols., VIK 1, Wi hich may be considerably older rit dictionaries (kośas), includ-Therefore the aṭṭhakathā is an unused, source for the history y (von Hinüber, 1998/2009b). mmentaries have been trans-major part of Dhammapāla's e Khuddakanikāya is available ber, 1996, § 273; recent transla-98; It-a: Masefield, 2008/2009), tion of Buddhaghosa's work, f the Visuddhimagga, has been ance the commentary on the ttanta (An, 2003) as well as nta, the Sāmaññaphalasuttanta, suttanta of the Dīghanikāya and ttanta of the Majjhimanikāya, d together with commentary (Bodhi, 1978; 1980; 1995). There of the two major Abhidhamma hasālinī and Vibhaṅga. The incorrect) translation of the rseded recently by an improved 005).

commentaries was for a long glected field. However, progress searches in Japan particularly Mori (1989; 2007) and Toshid the legal commentaries by P. ddha's Last Days: Buddhaghosa's Comparinibbāna Sutta, Oxford, 2003.

shvanath, & Akira Hirakawa, Shan- Chinese Version by Saṅghabhadra of mmentary on Pāli Vinaya Translated rst Time, BOS 10, Poona 1970.
The Great Discourse on Causation: The nd Its Commentaries, Kandy, ^{2}1995.
The Discourse on the Fruits of Recluse-phala Sutta and Its Commentaries,

The Discourse of the Root of Existence:
ta and Its Commentaries, Kandy, 1980.
, The Discourse on the All-Embracing hmajāla Sutta and Its Commentaries, ies in Pāli Commentarial Literature: s and Insights, Hong Kong, 2013.

Mahā-Aṭṭhakathā-s: Some Observaheir Compilation," in: K.L. Dhammajoti s., Buddhist and Pali Studies in Honour of The Venerable Professor Kakkapalliye Anuruddha, Hong Kong, 2009, 169–181; repr. in: Endo, Toshiichi, Studies in Pāli Commentarial Literature: Sources, Controversies and Insights, Hong Kong, 2013, 33–45.

Hazra, K.L., Studies on Pali Commentaries, Delhi, 1991.

Hinüber, O. von, "Building the Theravāda Commentaries: Buddhaghosa and Dhammapāla As Authors, Compilers, Redactors, Editors, and Critics," in: C. Cantwell, ed., Authors and Editors in the Literary Traditions of Asian Buddhism, forthcoming.

Hinüber, O. von, Die Pāli-Handschriften des Klosters Lai Hin bei Lampang in Nord-Thailand, VIK 2, Wiesbaden, 2013.

Hinüber, O. von, "The Nigamanas of the Sumaṅgalavilāsinī and the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī," JPTS 21, 1995, 129–133; repr. in: H. Falk & W. Slaje, eds., Kleine Schriften, Wiesbaden, 2009, 62–66.

Hinüber, O. von, "Review of C. Vogel's 'Zum Aufbau altindischer Sanskrit Wörterbücher der vorklassischen Zeit', 1996," OLZ 93, 1998, 97–100; repr. in: H. Falk & W. Slaje, eds., Kleine Schriften, Wiesbaden, 2009, 1023ff.

Hinüber, O. von, "Lān^2 Nā as a Centre of Pāli Literature during the Late 15th Century," JPTS 26, 2000, 119–137; repr. in: H. Falk & W. Slaje, eds., Kleine Schriften, Wiesbaden, 2009, 402–420.

Hinüber, O. von, "Buddhistische Kommentare aus dem alten Indien – Die Erklärung des Theravāda-Kanons," in: M. Quisinsky & P. Walter, eds., Kommentarkulturen. Die Auslegung zentraler Texte der Weltreligionen. Ein vergleichender Überblick, Cologne, 2007, 99–114.

Hinüber, O. von, Entstehung und Aufbau der Jātaka-Sammlung, AAWL 7, Stuttgart, 1998.

Hinüber, O. von, A Handbook of Pāli Literature, IPSAS 2, Berlin, 1996.

Jayawickrama, N.A., The Inception of Discipline and the Vinaya Nidāna Being a Translation and Edition of the Bāhiranidāna of Buddhaghosa's Samantapāsādikā: The Vinaya Commentary, London 1962.

Kieffer-Pülz, P., Verlorene Gaṇṭhipadas zum buddhistischen Ordensrecht, 3 vols., VIK 1, Wiesbaden, 2013.

Mori, Sodo, "Recent Japanese Studies in the Pāli Commentarial Literature: Since 1984," JPTS 29, 2007, 175–190.

Mori, Sodo, Studies of the Pali Commentaries: A Provisional Collection of Articles, Japan, 1989.

Nyānaponika, Bhikkhu, trans., Darlegung der Bedeutung (Atthasālinī). Der Kommentar zur Dhammasaṅgaṇi, ed. S. Bretfeld & R. Knopf, Oxford, 2005.

Olivelle, P., King, Governance, and Law in Ancient India: Kauṭilya's Arthaśāstra, Oxford, 2013.

Pecenko, P., "The History of the Nikāya Subcommentaries (Ṭīkās) in Pāli Bibliographical Sources," JPTS 30, 2009, 5–32.

Pecenko, P., "Līnatthapakāsinī and Sāratthamañjūsā: The Purāṇaṭīkās and the Ṭīkās on the Four Nikāyas," JPTS 27, 2002, 27, 61–113.

Pecenko, P., "Sāriputta and His Works," JPTS 23, 1997, 159–179.

Pind, O.H., "Buddhaghosa – His Works and Scholarly Background," BK 21, 1992, 135–156.

Pind, O.H., "Studies in the Pāli Grammarians I: Buddhaghosa's References to Grammar and Grammarians," JPTS 13, 1989, 33–82.

Pinte, G., "On the Origin of Taisho 1462, The Alleged Translation of the Pāli Samantapāsādikā," ZDMG 160, 2010, 435–449.

Ranjan, R., Exegetical Literature in Pāli: Origin and Development, Delhi, 2005.

Smith, H., "Saddanīti: La grammaire palie d'Aggavaṃsa: E. conspectus terminorum (Saññāmātikā)," SUKHVL 12/4, 1949, 1105–1148.

Smith, H., A Critical Pāli Dictionary: Epilegomena to Vol. I, Copenhagen, 1948.

Tubb, G.A., & E.R. Boose, Scholastic Sanskrit: A Handbook for Students, New York, 2007.

Zacchetti, S., "Some Remarks on the 'Peṭaka Passages' in the Da zhidu lun and Their Relation to the Pāli Peṭakopadesa," ARIRIAB 5, 2002, 67–85.

Oskar von Hinüber

Vinaya Commentarial Literature in Pali

In a narrow sense, Vinaya refers to the Vinayapiṭaka, the first part of the Buddhist canon. It contains Buddhist monastic law, the rules and regulations that govern the life of monastics as both individuals and a community. In a wider sense, Vinaya includes all texts and commentaries dealing with monastic law. This includes texts extracted from the Vinayapiṭaka and transmitted separately, as the list of rules for monks and nuns, the Pātimokkhasutta, or the formulas for legal procedures (*kammavācā*s); it also comprises mainly versified condensations of the Vinayapiṭaka and its commentary as well as digests, topically organized compendia consisting of quotations from these two. Aside from the kammavācā collections, all texts are commented on, and, as they share their subject, there are many cross-connections that allow a precise relative dating of the texts. Compilations (*rāsī*s) as well as manuals on special subjects serve as a kind of supplement to legal commentarial literature.

Chronologically, we usually distinguish several layers of such texts: early commentaries (before the 4th/5th cent. CE) are lost today except for quotations in later commentarial literature, some of them subsumed under the designation Sīhaḷaṭṭhakathā (see below). The next layer consists in the so-called *aṭṭhakathā*s (explanation of the meaning), written in Pali (c. 4th/5th cent. CE onward) and based on the earlier commentaries. This is followed by glossaries (*gaṇṭhipada*s; [commentaries explaining] difficult words) of the canonical and the aṭṭhakathā text. Written in Pali and vernaculars, most of them are lost, save for quotations in younger commentarial literature. The third stage is that of the subcommentaries (*ṭīkā*s) on substantive issues in the aṭṭhakathā. If a ṭīkā did not suffice, it might be replaced by a new commentary (navaṭīkā) and this again by a more recent one (abhinavaṭīkā). The earlier subcommentaries could be described as basic or old subcommentaries (mūlaṭīkā, porāṇaṭīkā or purāṇaṭīkā; see also von Hinüber, 2007). Still later, subcommentaries mainly concerned with "construing the meaning" (yojanā, atthayojanā) were produced. Little is known about them, and still less about the commentaries explaining the hidden meaning of a text (guḷhatthadīpanī, guḷhapakāsanī). The same holds true for the *vivaraṇa*s (expositions), *dīpanī*s (illuminators), and so on, mentioned in various works on Theravāda literature.

The Vinayapiṭaka and Its Commentaries

The Vinayapiṭaka consists of three parts: the Suttavibhaṅga with the Pātimokkhasutta as its core, the Khandhaka with the *kammavācā*s, and the younger Parivāra (von Hinüber, 1996a, § 12). The Suttavibhaṅga (Explanation of the [Pātimokkha-] sutta) is the oldest commentary of the Pali legal tradition. Its structure follows the succession of the Pātimokkhasutta rules embedded in it. For each rule, it offers an introductory story mentioning the incident that led to the prescription of the rule, a word analysis commenting on each word of the rule, a casuistry in which the severity of the infraction is determined, a list of exceptions, namely, cases in which an infraction does not result in an offence; and finally – for the first nine rules – supplements with additional cases (von Hinüber, 1996a, §§ 22–27). These various parts belong to different time levels. A comparison with the structure of other schools' *Vinayapiṭaka*s indicates that this commentary became fixed only after the Buddhist community had already divided into several branches. Since this commentary is included in the Vinayapiṭaka, it enjoys authoritative status, despite the fact that gross misunderstandings of the rules can be observed (Schlingloff, 1963, 536–551). As a separately transmitted text, the Pātimokkhasutta had an introduction different from that in the Suttavibhaṅga. This introduction as well as a commentary on it has survived in the Khandhaka section of the Vinayapiṭaka (von Hinüber, 1996a, § 26).

The Earlier Lost Vinayapiṭaka Commentaries

According to the great commentator Buddhaghosa, the early commentaries were brought from India to Sri Lanka by Mahinda in the 3rd century BCE,

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

---

translated into Sinhalese Pali by Buddhaghosa for mentaries. But whether th in the *aṭṭhakathā*s were i Mahinda is unascertainal 105f.). Seven early comme by name: Andhakaṭṭhakat Mahaṭṭhakathā, Mahāpa Saṅkhepaṭṭhakathā (von of which five are quoted in t Kurundī, the Mahāpaccarī are also subsumed under t which might refer to the Island and/or to the langu written. Mahāpaccarī and troversial for instance wi tion of the social status of of their being ordained (K the Mahāpaccarī seems to up standpoints of older (Kieffer-Pülz, 2007, 43). T menting on the entire tipi hensive. A commentary of Andhakaṭṭhakathā (1st cen ably written in Pali and co commentary even by so (Kieffer-Pülz, 1993; 2010). preserved from the Saṅkh

The Vinayaṭṭhakath

The first large Pali comme is the Vinayaṭṭhakathā (1, tapāsādikā (4th/5th cent. hosa by tradition but pr authors (von Hinüber, 19 encyclopedic commenta from a large number of well as opinions of indi cases, statements are only subcommentarial literatu gives minute examples fo influence of this commen tative by tradition, is trem by silent and open quo and subcommentarial lit it forms the base for th (Mūlasikkhā, Khuddasikk
source of Vinayapiṭaka Vinayasaṅkhepa) and (Sīmālaṅkārasaṅgaha), a on several times, last in th re in Pali

ṇas (expositions), dīpanīs (illumi-ı, mentioned in various works on ıre.

ṭaka and Its es

a consists of three parts: the h the Pātimokkhasutta as its core, with the kammavācās, and the (von Hinüber, 1996a, § 12). The xplanation of the [Pātimokkha-] st commentary of the Pali legal cture follows the succession of utta rules embedded in it. For s an introductory story mention-hat led to the prescription of the ysis commenting on each word suistry in which the severity of determined, a list of exceptions, hich an infraction does not result finally – for the first nine rules – additional cases (von Hinüber, . These various parts belong to els. A comparison with the strucols' Vinayapiṭakas indicates that became fixed only after the Bud-had already divided into several is commentary is included in the njoys authoritative status, despite s misunderstandings of the rules (Schlingloff, 1963, 536–551). As a itted text, the Pātimokkhasutta tion different from that in the is introduction as well as a com-survived in the Khandhaka sec-piṭaka (von Hinüber, 1996a, § 26).

ost Vinayapiṭaka
es

reat commentator Buddhaghosa, ntaries were brought from India Mahinda in the 3rd century BCE, translated into Sinhalese, and retranslated into Pali by Buddhaghosa for quotation in his commentaries. But whether the commentaries quoted in the aṭṭhakathās were in fact those brought by Mahinda is unascertainable (von Hinüber, 2007, 105f.). Seven early commentaries are known to us by name: Andhakaṭṭhakathā, Cūḷapaccarī, Kurundī, Mahaṭṭhakathā, Mahāpaccarī, Pannavāra, and Saṅkhepaṭṭhakathā (von Hinüber, 1996a, § 210), of which five are quoted in the Samantapāsādikā. The Kurundī, the Mahāpaccarī, and the Mahaṭṭhakathā are also subsumed under the term Sīhaḷaṭṭhakathā, which might refer to their origin on the Sinhala Island and/or to the language in which they were written. Mahāpaccarī and Kurundī are at times controversial for instance with respect to the evaluation of the social status of slaves and the possibility of their being ordained (Kieffer-Pülz, 2007, 28), and the Mahāpaccarī seems to at least partly have taken up standpoints of older forest monks' traditions (Kieffer-Pülz, 2007, 43). The Mahaṭṭhakathā commenting on the entire tipiṭaka is the most comprehensive. A commentary of South Indian origin is the Andhakaṭṭhakathā (1st cent. BCE–1st cent. CE) probably written in Pali and considered an authoritative commentary even by some Sri Lankan traditions (Kieffer-Pülz, 1993; 2010). Only a few quotations are preserved from the Saṅkhepaṭṭhakathā.

---

The Vinayaṭṭhakathā

The first large Pali commentary to the Vinayapiṭaka is the Vinayaṭṭhakathā (1,400 pages) called Samantapāsādikā (4th/5th cent. CE) ascribed to Buddhaghosa by tradition but probably written by several authors (von Hinüber, 1996a, §§ 208–220). It is an encyclopedic commentary assembling quotations from a large number of earlier commentaries as well as opinions of individual elders. In several cases, statements are only revealed as quotations in subcommentarial literature. The Samantapāsādikā gives minute examples for each and every case. The influence of this commentary, considered authoritative by tradition, is tremendous. This is reflected, by silent and open quotations in commentarial and subcommentarial literature, by the facts that it forms the base for the versified condensations (Mūlasikkhā, Khuddasikkhā, etc.), serves as a main source of Vinayapiṭaka digests (Vinayasaṅgaha, Vinayasaṅkhepa) and special manuals (Sīmālaṅkārasaṅgaha), and, finally, is commented on several times, last in the 19th century.

The Vinayapiṭaka Glossaries (Gaṇṭhipadas)

The Samantapāsādikā was soon supplemented by glossaries (gaṇṭhipadas) written in Pali and vernaculars. These glossaries disappeared except for quotations preserved in earlier subcommentaries. From two glossaries to the Samantapāsādikā, we have more than six hundred quotations, namely from Dhammasiri's Vinayagaṇṭhipada (c. 6th cent. CE), of Sri Lankan provenance, and from Vajirabuddhi's Anugaṇṭhipada (6th–10th cents. CE), probably of South Indian origin (Kieffer-Pülz, vol. I, 2013, 198ff., 210ff.). They exemplify that early gaṇṭhipadas were simple glossaries, whereas later ones came to include discussions of substantive issues. Unidentified Vinayagaṇṭhipadas quoted in inscriptions and in Sinhalese and Pali texts confirm the proposition of later subcommentators that there existed innumerable glossaries (Kieffer-Pülz, vol. I, 2013, 38f.). The glossaries were largely replaced by ṭīkās; however, the latter did not completely prevent some later production of glossaries.

The Vinayapiṭaka Subcommentaries (Ṭīkās)

The earliest Vinayapiṭaka subcommentary (ṭīkā), the anonymous and undated Vajirabuddhiṭīkā (approx. 600 pages), is characterized as a gaṇṭhipada commentary in the text itself (samantapāsādikāya gaṇṭhipadādhippāyappakāsanā; illuminator of the intention of difficult words in the Samantapāsādikā). The fact that it often discusses legal aspects may have led to its designation as ṭīkā (Vajirabuddhiṭīkā) from the 12th century onward. The earliest mention of a Vajirabuddhi as its author (13th cent.) may have resulted from the interpretation of the title Vajirabuddhiṭīkā as "the subcommentary by Vajirabuddhi." An origin in the 10th century is highly likely (Kieffer-Pülz, vol. I, 2013, 70ff.). If the identification of its author with the Sinhalese monk scholar Ratna(mati) were correct, then the date could even be narrowed down to the third quarter of the 10th century (Dimitrov, forthcoming). The commentary is a treasury of quotations from earlier sources of South Indian and Sri Lankan provenance and is notable for its scholastic style and translations of passages from Sanskrit texts (stanzas of Mātṛceṭa, Kumārila, etc.) of which several found their way into Sinhalese commentarial literature. Its author, unlike later authors, rarely takes a firm stand but aims at presenting various opinions to enable the reader to form his or her own opinion (Kieffer-Pülz, vol. I, 2013, 100ff., 124f.).

About two centuries later, after the unification of the three monastic orders in Sri Lanka in 1165 and before the origination of Buddhanāga's Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīabhinavaṭīkā (before c. 1186), Sāriputta of Poḷonnaruva (present-day Polonnaruwa) wrote a subcommentary to the Samantapāsādikā called Sāratthadīpanī or Līnasāratthadīpanī (approx. 1,563 pages). Sāriputta's name is not given in the text, but he is mentioned as the author of this commentary in his Sinhalese paraphrase to the Abhidhammatthasaṅgaha (Abhidh-s-sn 283.9,16–17) and in three commentaries of pupils of his (Vin-vn-ṭ I 2,1; Sacc-ṭ; see Cousins, forthcoming; Dāṭh 151, 2ff.). Sāriputta used several Sinhalese commentaries and at least two in Pali, namely one anonymous glossary and the Vajirabuddhiṭīkā, which he attributes to "someone specific" (kenaci). As he explains in his introductory stanzas, he felt the necessity to write a new commentary because earlier commentaries were difficult to understand, since they were written in Sinhalese, and because the attempt of the author of the Vajirabuddhiṭīkā to write in Pali resulted in a work of slightly mixed language (Kieffer-Pülz, vol. I, 2013, 63n103). Despite his partially sharp criticism of his predecessor, he also silently borrows from the latter's commentary. A conspicuous characteristic of the Sāratthadīpanī is its inclusion of large portions of text silently borrowed from other subcommentaries, especially from Dhammapāla's purāṇaṭīkās to the first four nikāyas, to the Visuddhimagga, and so on. Given that Sāriputta's other Pali works mainly consist of reused text (Kieffer-Pülz, forthcoming b), the Sāratthadīpanī may as well contain more reused text than hitherto known. In contrast to his predecessor, Sāriputta avoids giving many opinions and generally takes a firm stand, which he expresses by "[this is] our conviction" (amhākaṃ khantī).

The third subcommentary, the Vimativinodanīṭīkā (approx. 690 pages), is stated to be a work of Coḷiya Kassapa or Mahākassapa, author of the Mohavicchedanī, in the Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā (second third of the 13th cent. at the earliest) as well as in later historical works (Gv 60.32; Sās 33.24; Sās-dīp 1204). Following the Gandhavaṃsa, he wrote this commentary on his own accord (Gv 70.14–15). Mahākassapa may have been a native of Sri Lanka, venerated in the Chola (Pal. Coḷa; Tam. Cōḷa) region (according to Crosby & Skilton's [1999, 176] interpretation of a statement in the Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā). The Vimativinodanīṭīkā is to be dated after the Sāratthadīpanī (after 1165) and before the Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā. Despite Mahākassapa's statement in his introductory stanzas that there existed several (aneka) commentaries to the Vinayaṭṭhakathā – some very detailed, some difficult to access, some failed as to meaning and word, some incomplete, and others creating confusion (Vmv I 1.7ff.) – only the Sāratthadīpanī is quoted explicitly (37 times) and rejected frequently (Dhammaratana, 1997, 76ff.; Kieffer-Pülz, 2005, 165ff.; Gornall, 2014). The Vimativinodanīṭīkā is influential, the source for several later practices as, for instance, the method for the abolition of an unknown Buddhist monastic boundary by carrying out the necessary legal act at a place that must have been included within the monastic boundary, the adoption of a temporary name for ordination, and so on (Kieffer-Pülz, 1997, 239ff.). It, furthermore, contains information on South Indian practices and developments.

The fourth subcommentary, characterized as an atthayojanā commentary, is Ñāṇakitti's Samantapāsādikatthayojanā (1,267 pages in the Thai ed.) written in Lanna (northern Thailand) before 1492/1493 (date of the subsequently authored Pātimokkhagaṇṭhidīpanī) as proved by a reference from the latter to the Samantapāsādikatthayojanā. Ñāṇakitti, a grammarian, does not add to legal aspects but rather offers variant readings, etymologies, word explanations, grammatical analyses, meanings, and statements regarding the connections of words (sambandha) and the syntactical construction of sentences (yojanā). He uses a large number of sources, which he generally quotes by name (see also von Hinüber, 2000, 123–137).

A fifth commentary to the Vinayapiṭaka originated in Burma in 1869, namely, Jāgara's (1810–1874) Pācityādiyojanā (approx. 602 pages). It is characterized as an atthayojanā commentary beginning with the Pācittiya section (Pāc-y 1.5). Its author, like Ñāṇakitti, rarely deals with legal aspects but especially explains words, their connection, and the syntactical constructions.

Further commentaries are mentioned in literary historical works or exist as manuscripts. Among them the Vinayaguḷha(ṭṭha)pakāsanī (length: 7 bhāṇavāras [a section of a scripture consisting of 250 ganthas] and 6 ganthas [a gantha or gātha consisting of 32 syllables], which corresponds to 56,192 syllables) is possibly identical with the work mentioned in the Piṭakat samuiṅḥ (278). Random samples in manuscripts suggest that it comments on selected passages extracted from the Samantapāsādikā, presenting interpretations not found in othe taries, and originated after the is secondarily attributed to a Ñ one manuscript. Of the Vinay the Vinayasamuṭṭhānadīpanī both attributed to Chapaṭa (15th cent.; Bode, 1909, 18; the first might discuss hidde in the Vinayapiṭaka and Sam second possibly deals with th (samuṭṭhāna) of offences. No a Samantapāsādikāvivaraṇa Lankan ācariya mentioned (75.18).

---

The Pātimokkhasutta
Its Commentaries

The Pātimokkhasutta or Māti
the Bhikkhupātimokkha (Pā approx. 31 pages) and the (Pātimokkha for Nuns; appro transmitted as part of the Vin pendent texts with a sepa above). As already stated, th is the Suttavibhaṅga, which, itself, has become the first p
The independently transm was later commented on Sinhalese commentary (S which was lost but referred Pali aṭṭhakathā commentar CE, that is, in the Kaṅkhāv Pātimokkhavaṇṇanā (Kkh 37 (von Hinüber, 1996a, § 22 (approx. 274 pages), an an text, like the Samantapā Buddhaghosa (Kkh 375.10 (1996a, §§ 221, 224, 307) r him not only of the Samanta Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī. The two t written by the same author, respect to the names of the rules, the keywords used in ing of an offence, the menti constituting an infraction, in the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī, an 1992, 62ff.; 1996a, § 223f.). the younger text, as can be developed systems (von

ī is to be dated after the Sārattha- nd before the Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā. pa's statement in his introductory existed several (aneka) commenaṭṭhakathā – some very detailed, ccess, some failed as to meaning ncomplete, and others creating 1.7ff.) – only the Sāratthadīpanī ly (37 times) and rejected fre-ratana, 1997, 76ff.; Kieffer-Pülz, ll, 2014). The Vimativinodanīṭīkā source for several later practices e method for the abolition of an t monastic boundary by carry-ary legal act at a place that must d within the monastic boundary, temporary name for ordination, Pülz, 1997, 239ff.). It, furthermore, on on South Indian practices and ommentary, characterized as an entary, is Ñāṇakitti's Samanta- ā (1,267 pages in the Thai ed.) northern Thailand) before 1492/bsequently authored Pātimokkha- oved by a reference from the lat-apāsādikatthayojanā. Ñāṇakitti, es not add to legal aspects but nt readings, etymologies, word matical analyses, meanings, and ing the connections of words the syntactical construction of ). He uses a large number of generally quotes by name (see 000, 123–137).

tary to the Vinayapiṭaka origi-869, namely, Jāgara's (1810–1874) pprox. 602 pages). It is charac-yojanā commentary beginning ection (Pāc-y 1.5). Its author, like eals with legal aspects but espels, their connection, and the synns.
taries are mentioned in literary xist as manuscripts. Among them a)pakāsanī (length: 7 bhāṇavāras re consisting of 250 ganthas] and a or gātha consisting of 32 syllaonds to 56,192 syllables) is possie work mentioned in the Piṭakat ndom samples in manuscripts mments on selected passages Samantapāsādikā, presenting

---

interpretations not found in other searchable commentaries, and originated after the Vimativinodanīṭīkā; it is secondarily attributed to a Ñāṇakitti Mahāsāmi in one manuscript. Of the Vinayagūḷhatthadīpanī and the Vinayasamuṭṭhānadīpanī (Gv 64.19f.; 74.20ff.), both attributed to Chapaṭa Saddhammajotipāla (15th cent.; Bode, 1909, 18; Piṭakat samuiṅḥ 277), the first might discuss hidden meanings of words in the Vinayapiṭaka and Samantapāsādikā, and the second possibly deals with the system of the arising (samuṭṭhāna) of offences. Nothing is known about a Samantapāsādikāvivaraṇa by an unknown Sri Lankan ācariya mentioned in the Gandhavaṃsa (75.18).

The Pātimokkhasutta and Its Commentaries

The Pātimokkhasutta or Mātikā consists of two parts, the Bhikkhupātimokkha (Pātimokkha for Monks; approx. 31 pages) and the Bhikkhunīpātimokkha (Pātimokkha for Nuns; approx. 40 pages). Both were transmitted as part of the Vinayapiṭaka and as independent texts with a separate introduction (see above). As already stated, the earliest commentary is the Suttavibhaṅga, which, together with the text itself, has become the first part of the Vinayapiṭaka. The independently transmitted Pātimokkhasutta was later commented on in at least one early Sinhalese commentary (Sīhaḷamātikaṭṭhakathā), which was lost but referred to once, namely in the Pali aṭṭhakathā commentary of the 4th/5th century CE, that is, in the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī, also called the Pātimokkhavaṇṇanā (Kkh 375.11) or Mātikaṭṭhakathā (von Hinüber, 1996a, § 221). The Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī (approx. 274 pages), an anonymous and undated text, like the Samantapāsādikā is ascribed to Buddhaghosa (Kkh 375.10–11). O. von Hinüber (1996a, §§ 221, 224, 307) rejects the ascription to him not only of the Samantapāsādikā but also of the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī. The two texts certainly were not written by the same author, since they deviate with respect to the names of the chapters (vaggas) and rules, the keywords used in the system of the arising of an offence, the mention of the factors (aṅgas) constituting an infraction, which are solely named in the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī, and so on (von Hinüber, 1992, 62ff.; 1996a, § 223f.). The Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī is the younger text, as can be seen from not only more developed systems (von Hinüber, 1996a, § 224; Kieffer-Pülz, 2012, 21ff.) but also explicit references to the Samantapāsādikā and considerable silent borrowings (about 30% of Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī's first two chapters stem from Samantapāsādikā; Kieffer-Pülz, forthcoming b). It is a systematically structured, clear, and concise commentary following largely the same pattern for each rule: word analysis; classification of the rule according to 17 aspects (not all are necessarily given for each rule), namely:

1. provenance (nidāna);
2. individual (puggala);
3. subject matter (vatthu);
4. type of prescription (paññatti);
5. command (āṇatta);
6. sort of offence (āpatti);
7. non-offence (anāpatti);
8. failure (vipatti);
9. constitutent parts (aṅga);
10. sort of origin (samuṭṭhāna);
11. the variety according to activity (kiriyā),
12. awareness (saññā), and
13. thought (citta);
14. the diversity of faults (vajja) and
15. deeds (kamma);
16. the triad of intention (citta), namely, wholesome, unwholesome, and neutral; and
17. the triad of feelings (vedanā), that is, pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral.

Pātimokkhasutta Glossaries (Gaṇṭhipadas)

As is testified by several quotations from Mātikaṭṭhakathāgaṇṭhipadas – some of which are characterized as having been written in Sinhalese (sīhaḷagaṇṭhipada) – preserved in subcommentarial literature, the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī was supplemented by various glossaries (gaṇṭhipada) written in Sinhalese and Pali. The Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīpiṭapota, a Sinhalese glossary written around the mid-13th century, contains Sinhalese and Pali quotations from older glossaries, of which some have parallels in the so-called Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīpurāṇaṭīkā (10th–12th cents.). This earliest Pali subcommentary to the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī has no title that could tell us whether it was considered a gaṇṭhipada or a ṭīkā. But a gaṇṭhipada quotation in the Sāratthadīpanī with parallel in the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīpurāṇaṭīkā renders it possible that the latter was originally considered a gaṇṭhipada commentary (Kieffer-Pülz, vol. I, 2013, 26). Ñāṇakitti's gaṇṭhipada to the Bhikkhupātimokkha, the Pātimokkhagaṇṭhi(dīpanī) or Bhikkhupātimokkhagaṇṭhi(dīpanī) written in Lanna in 1492/1493 (von Hinüber, 2000, 127), shows that glossaries did not go out of fashion after the appearance of the *ṭīkā*s. The Pātimokkhagaṇṭhidīpanī was written after the Samantapāsādikatthayojanā to which it explicitly refers (Pāṭ-gp-dīp, Viññatti 1.14f.; 41.24f.: ayuttabhāvo samantapāsādikāya atthayojanāyaṃ mayā vutto [the unsuitability has been stated by me in the Samantapāsādikatthayojanā]) and from which it silently borrows text.

Pātimokkhasutta Subcommentaries (*Ṭīkā*s)

Two subcommentaries (*ṭīkā*s) to the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī have come down to us. The earlier is the already mentioned anonymous, undated, and untitled Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīpurāṇaṭīkā (approx. 117 pages). In its introductory stanza, it is described as "a work that illuminates the hidden meaning" (līnapadaṃ vikāsanako ārambho; Kkh-pṭ 1.6). As stated above, it possibly was considered a gaṇṭhipada commentary originally, since it shares four stanzas with the Sāratthadīpanī for which the latter names a gaṇṭhipada as the source. If that is correct, it must have originated before the Sāratthadīpanī. The terminus post quem is the date of the Vajirabuddhiṭīkā (c. 10th cent.), since the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīpurāṇaṭīkā often silently borrows text from it (Kieffer-Pülz, vol. I, 2013, 47f., 57f.). It also shows a great closeness to the Vajirabuddhiṭīkā regarding its sources, of which two are connected with South India, namely the Andhakaṭṭhakathā and Vajirabuddhi's Anugaṇṭhipada. The text, therefore, can safely be considered to have belonged to the same – South-Indian-affiliated – tradition as the Vajirabuddhiṭīkā.

A second ṭīkā is the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīabhinavaṭīkā, named Vinayatthamañjūsa Līnatthappakāsanī Mātikaṭṭhakathā (approx. 375 pages) by Buddhanāga, pupil of Sāriputta of Poḷonnaruva. He wrote this commentary on the request of Thera Sumedha, possibly identical with Sāriputta's teacher (von Hinüber, 1996a, § 378), after the above-mentioned unification of the three monastic orders in 1165, and after Sāriputta had become head of the saṅgha (mahāsāmi). It originated during Parakkamabāhu I's lifetime, because Buddhanāga speaks of this king as a still living person (Rohanadeera, 1985, 27f.). This narrows down the time window for the origin of the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīabhinavaṭīkā to between 1165 and 1186. Buddhanāga does not explicitly mention his teacher's Sāratthadīpanī, but he often silently borrows from it. He, furthermore, closely follows Sāriputta in his interpretation of the alcohol rule (Kieffer-Pülz, vol. I, 2013, 30n68). Buddhanāga does not explain why he wrote a new commentary to the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī. Since his commentary does not bear traces of silent borrowings from the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīpurāṇaṭīkā, nor similarities in structure or choice of words, it is probable that he did not know it. His commentary in any case is much more detailed than the earlier one. More detailed explanations regarding the content or examples are, however, mostly silently borrowed from the Samantapāsādikā or the Sāratthadīpanī.

As an important text for daily practice, the Pātimokkhasutta was commented on again in later years. The Gandhavaṃsa mentions an untraced Pātimokkhavivaraṇa written by an unknown Sinhalese monk on his own accord (Gv 75.17). Three commentaries originated in Burma between the 15th and the 18th century, none of which deals with legal aspects: the Pātimokkhavisodhanī attributed to Chapaṭa Saddhammajotipāla (15th cent.) in the Gandhavaṃsa (64.23–24) aiming at correcting (visodhana) words and syllables of the text of the Pātimokkhasutta as they appeared in Pātimokkhasutta manuscripts, the Pātimokkha(vi)lekhana attributed to Ñāṇavara (1705–1753; Bode, 1909, 67), also commenting on various readings of the Pātimokkhasutta, and finally, the Pātimokkhapadatthānuvaṇṇanā (18th cent.) by Vicittālaṅkāra from Ca-laṅḥ (modern Salin on the west bank of the Irrawaddy), accessible in a Burmese edition (Kieffer-Pülz & Peters, 2009, 275–292), aiming at explaining the meaning of words or words and meanings (padattha).

Vinayapiṭaka Condensations and Their Commentaries

The large extension of the Vinayapiṭaka and its commentary Samantapāsādikā led to the creation of condensations written from about the 5th/6th century onward, which became important in the monastic education of the following centuries. Two short texts, predominantly in verse, the Mūlasikkhā and the somewhat more detailed Khuddasikkhā, were intended for study by young monks at the beginning of their career (von Hinüber, 1996a, §§ 332f.). They serve as mnemonics. The anonymous taraṇīabhinavaṭīkā to between 1165 anāga does not explicitly mention ratthadīpanī, but he often silently

. He, furthermore, closely follows interpretation of the alcohol rule ol. I, 2013, 30n68). Buddhanāga n why he wrote a new commen-khāvitaraṇī. Since his commentary aces of silent borrowings from the purāṇaṭīkā, nor similarities in struc-f words, it is probable that he did commentary in any case is much an the earlier one. More detailed garding the content or examples ostly silently borrowed from the ā or the Sāratthadīpanī.

tant text for daily practice, the was commented on again in later dhavaṃsa mentions an untraced aṇa written by an unknown Sin-his own accord (Gv 75.17). Three riginated in Burma between the century, none of which deals with e Pātimokkhavisodhanī attributed hammajotipāla (15th cent.) in the 64.23–24) aiming at correcting ds and syllables of the text of the s they appeared in Pātimokkhasutta Pātimokkha(vi)lekhana attributed 5–1753; Bode, 1909, 67), also com-us readings of the Pātimokkhasutta, timokkhapadatthānuvaṇṇanā (18th ṅkāra from Ca-laṅḥ (modern Salin of the Irrawaddy), accessible in a (Kieffer-Pülz & Peters, 2009, 275– plaining the meaning of words or ngs (padattha).

a Condensations and ntaries

ion of the Vinayapiṭaka and its antapāsādikā led to the creation written from about the 5th/6th which became important in the n of the following centuries. Two minantly in verse, the Mūlasikkhā at more detailed Khuddasikkhā, r study by young monks at the r career (von Hinüber, 1996a, §§ as mnemonics. The anonymous

---

and undated Mūlasikkhā (about 8 pages) is ascribed to a Mahāsāmi (whether this is a name or a title is unclear) based on an unidentified Burmese tradition (von Hinüber, 1996a, § 332). The Khuddasikkhā (about 34 pages) was written by the Sinhalese monk Dhammasiri Thera, who is also responsible for a lost glossary (ganṭhipada) to the Samantapāsādikā. This Dhammasiri Thera was the leader of his own saṅgha, a pupil of the author of the Samantapāsādikā. As stated above, this author is identified with Buddhaghosa by tradition, which would make Dhammasiri a younger contemporary of the latter. However that maybe, Dhammasiri is to be dated sometime after the Samantapāsādikā (i.e. c. 5th/6th cent. CE). The Khuddasikkhā is about four times longer than the Mūlasikkhā and adds a number of details. Partly identical half verses, especially in the beginning, hint at a common source or a mutual dependence of both. The skeletal appearance of the Mūlasikkhā suggests that it originated slightly earlier than the Khuddasikkhā. Together with the Pātimokkhasutta and Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī, these two manuals were considered "sufficient Vinaya knowledge for those who could not study more" and "in modern times... are called the 'Four Smaller Vinayas'" in Burma (Bode, 1909, 6). They played a similar role in Sri Lanka, where they were recommended as the basis of Vinaya knowledge in monastic ordinances (katikāvata) by the kings (Blackburn, 1999, 285ff.). The other early Buddhist school in Sri Lanka before the 12th century, the Abhayagirivāsin, had its own Khuddasikkhā, a stanza of which is preserved in the Khuddasikkhāpurāṇaṭīkā (see below).

The next versified manuals are the Vinayavinicchaya (186 pages) and the Uttaravinicchaya (55 pages), written by the South Indian Buddhadatta after the Samantapāsādikā and before circa 600 CE (von Hinüber, 1996a, § 325–329). They are more detailed than the previous texts. The Vinayavinicchaya comprises material from all the Vinayapiṭaka volumes, except the Parivāra – the latter is dealt with in the Uttaravinicchaya – plus the Samantapāsādikā. The Vinayavinicchaya has many literal, and still more rough, parallels with the Khuddasikkhā (Kieffer-Pülz, vol. I, 2013, 195n473), which indicates a common source or a mutual dependence.

The condensations were in turn commented on in ganṭhipadas (Khuddasikkhāganṭhipada; see below) and ṭīkās. Three commentaries to the Khuddasikkhā are mentioned in secondary literature: one by Mahāyasa or Revata, one by the grammarian Moggallāna, and one by Saṅgharakkhita or Vācissara. The ascription of an old ṭīkā to Mahāyasa (de Zoysa, 1885, 8; Malalasekera, 1928, 77) stems from sources of the 17th–19th centuries (Gv 61.22f.; Sās 34.17; Sās-dīp 1208). The author is designated as a Burmese native (Jayawardhana, 1994, 188). The attribution of an old commentary to Revata, identified with the author of the Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā (Malalasekera, 1928, 77f., 109), may be based on the Piṭakat samuinḥ (293) but is rather caused by the wrong identification of the author of the Khuddasikkhāpurāṇaṭīkā with the alleged author of the Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā, who also wrote the Uttaravinicchayaṭīkā (see below). The ascription of a commentary to Moggallāna (Malalasekera, 1928, 76) is based on the wrong identification of Saṅgharakkhita with Moggallāna (Fryer, 1875, 91). Two commentaries are mentioned in the Pagan inscription dated 1442 CE and are available in editions. The older, anonymous and undated, is depicted as atthavinicchaya (ascertainment of meanings or matters; Khuddas-pṭ 59.10; approx. 142 pages). It is quoted as ṭīkā in the old Sinhalese paraphrase to the Khuddasikkhā, that is, the Kudusikasannaya (Kieffer-Pülz, vol. I, 2013, 5n3), and in Saṅgharakkhita's Khuddasikkhābhinavaṭīkā, and as Khuddasikkhāvaṇṇanā in the Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā, all three dating from the second third of the 13th century at the earliest (Kieffer-Pülz, forthcoming c). It has passages in common with the much shorter, old, anonymous, and undated Mūlasikkhāpurāṇaṭīkā (see below), especially in the beginning. It is not clear whether the author of the Khuddasikkhāpurāṇaṭīkā borrowed them from the Mūlasikkhāpurāṇaṭīkā or vice versa. The commentaries cannot have been written by the same author, since to nearly every rule the author of the Mūlasikkhāpurāṇaṭīkā adds passages silently borrowed from the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī, listing the constituent factors for an offence, whereas the author of the Khuddasikkhāpurāṇaṭīkā does not even mention these factors. The Khuddasikkhāpurāṇaṭīkā also has passages in common with Buddhanāga's Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīabhinavaṭīkā, which it most likely borrowed from the latter. If the dating of the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīabhinavaṭīkā to circa 1165–1185 is correct, the Khuddasikkhāpurāṇaṭīkā could be dated to between the last quarter of the 12th and the second quarter of the 13th century. The author of the Khuddasikkhāpurāṇaṭīkā obviously also had access to a Khuddasikkhā of the Abhayagirivāsin, since its author gives an Abhayagirivāsin version for a stanza (8.6) and various variant readings (41.14–15; 42.11; see also Cousins, 2012, 89).

The new commentary to the Khuddasikkhā bears the name Sumaṅgalappasādanī (approx. 170 pages) and was written by Saṅgharakkhita Thera, pupil of Sāriputta, Moggallāna, and Sīla, and head of the saṅgha (mahāsāmi) from between 1232 and 1236 onward. The name of the author is not mentioned in the text itself but only in a secondary colophon, which is appended to the Khuddasikkhābhinavaṭīkā by a pupil of the author. This secondary colophon is an adjusted copy of a colophon secondarily added to Saṅgharakkhita's Sambandhacintā (Kieffer-Pülz, forthcoming c). The Sumaṅgalappasādanī is ascribed to Vācissara (Gv 71.24–25) or to Saṅgharakkhita (Saddhammasaṃgaho 9.28–29; Sās-dīp 1209; Piṭ-sm 294) in literary historical works. If we do not consider these as two names of one person (as did the editors of the Mūlasikkhā commentaries; see below), then the ascription to Vācissara must be wrong. The Khuddasikkhābhinavaṭīkā is connected with several other works attributed to Saṅgharakkhita by intertextual links, namely, references to other texts with the statement that they were written by him, which prove that it stems from the same author's pen as the Vuttodaya, the Subodhālaṅkāra, the Subodhālaṅkārapurāṇaṭīkā called Mahāsāmi, the Sambandhacintā, the Yoga(vi)nicchaya, and the Moggallānapañcikāṭīkā. Thereby the Khuddasikkhābhinavaṭīkā was written after the Subodhālaṅkāra and the Yoga(vi)nicchaya and before the Moggallānapañcikāṭīkā. The latter originated after Saṅgharakkhita's appointment to the office of mahāsāmi (i.e. after 1232–1236; Kieffer-Pülz, forthcoming c). As a reason for writing a new commentary to the Khuddasikkhā, Saṅgharakkhita states that with the old ṭīkā, it was not possible to thoroughly understand the meaning everywhere (Khuddas-anṭ 237.7–8). Saṅgharakkhita takes over formulations from the old ṭīkā here and there but in general writes independently, adding grammatical analyses and explanations of words not explained before, and sometimes discusses statements of the old ṭīkā. Whether it originated after the Kudusikasannaya, which quotes from the old but not from the new ṭīkā, is unclear. The Khuddasikkhābhinavaṭīkā has common portions with the Mūlasikkhābhinavaṭīkā (see below).

Since the Mūlasikkhā as a manual for beginners was a widely disseminated text, the information of the Mūlasikkhābhinavaṭīkā's author that there existed innumerable commentaries (Mūlas-anṭ 1.8–9) is not surprising; at present only two are accessible in editions. The old subcommentary to the Mūlasikkhā, called Mūlasikkhatthavaṇṇanā (Mūlas-pṭ 1.12; approx. 35 pages), is anonymous and undated. Internal evidence from the Mūlasikkhāpurāṇaṭīkā (terminus post quem 1232–1236 CE[?]) make plain that its author was a Sinhalese monk, since he quotes from a seemingly lost Sinhalese text called Sāmaṇerasikkhā (Mūlas-pṭ 465.6f.).

The Mūlasikkhābhinavaṭīkā called Vinayavimaticchedanī or Vimaticchedanī (approx. 140 pages) is anonymous. It is attributed to the Burmese monk Samantaguṇasāgara from Vijayapura (Piṭ-sm 298; Āsabha & Kheminda, 1926; Braun & Peters, 1996, 421). The author informs us that he wrote a commentary (vaṇṇanā), because the innumerable commentaries to the Mūlasikkhā did not suffice to understand the text. The commentary contains variant readings, grammatical explanations, and quotations from various unidentified verse texts. Identified verses stem from the Vajirabuddhiṭīkā (c. 10th cent.), the old Mūlasikkhāṭīkā, or the Rūpasiddhi (first half of 12th cent.). Long portions have parallels in Saṅgharakkhita's Khuddasikkhābhinavaṭīkā, from which they were most probably borrowed.

For the Vinayavinicchaya, three ṭīkās are noted. One is ascribed to Vācissara in the Gandhavaṃsa (62.10) and wrongly linked with the title Yoga(vi)nicchaya in secondary literature (Malalasekera, 1928, 202; Jayawardhana, 1994, 183). The Yoga(vi)nicchaya is a lost grammatical text and simply listed before the Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā in the Gandhavaṃsa (Kieffer-Pülz, forthcoming c). Another ṭīkā is imputed to Revata (Sās-dīp 1207; de Zoysa, 1885, 15; Malalasekera, vol. II, 1937, 884), most likely based on the stanzas secondarily attached to the Uttaravinicchayaṭīkā. These additional stanzas – which contain a terminus ante quem for the origination of the Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā and Uttaravinicchayaṭīkā – inform us that the commentaries had been brought to Burma by Sīvali Thera (before 1245) and were transliterated or translated into Burmese script or language by Revata. Thus Revata was the transliterator or translator, but not the author, of a Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā. A third ṭīkā, entitled Vinayatthasārasandīpanī, is attributed to an otherwise unknown Sri Lankan monk named Mahā-Upatissa in the Piṭakat samuiṅḥ (299). It is this ṭīkā that is accessible to us in edited form, since in the subheadings, it is called Vinayatthasārasandīpanī (approx. 750 pages). It, furthermore, is quoted as Vinayasāratthasandīpanī in the Vinayālaṅkāraṭīkā (see below). The name of the author is not given in the text. In the introductory stanzas, he, however, mentions Sāriputta of Poḷonnaruva and the unification of the saṅgha by King Parakkamabāhu I, and he informs us that five pers this commentary, namely, Araññavāsika, Buddhamit Mahākassapa Coḷāvanipūj (upāsaka) Dhammakitti P chant (vāṇija) Bhāṇu (von Sumaṅgala is probably ide pupil who wrote ṭīkās to t and the Abhidhammatthas is the author of the Vima Mohavicchedanī. Buddham otherwise. A lay follower call tioned in the colophon to called Sāratthasālinī as with a residence for finis (Cousins, forthcoming). Si shares the whole introduc Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā (Kieffe it was most likely written b is confirmed by the list of author in the possibly seco Sāratthasālinī (Cousins, for lower Dhammakitti Paṇḍit role for the author, who mig the three works mentioned in the colophon to the Sa uted to Vācissara in the Ga works of Vācissara in the Ga gamation of works of Saṅgha These two persons cannot b the works listed, the Khudd the Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā c ten by the same author. D Khuddasikkhā and the Vina zas in common, their com any common passage or from among Sāriputta's pu Sumaṅgala as authors of th Regarding the necessity t tary, the author tells us th commentary to the Vinaya accomplish the goal for m parts of the world (Cousi certainly refers to the only Vinayavinicchaya comment attributed to Parakkamabā the author of the Vinaya quotes explicitly but also a source (Kieffer-Pülz, fort that Parakkamabāhu II w

---

, is anonymous and undated. Inter-the Mūlasikkhāpurāṇaṭīkā (termi- 2–1236 CE[?]) make plain that its alese monk, since he quotes from a halese text called Sāmaṇerasikkhā
).
khābhinavaṭīkā called Vinaya- Vimaticchedanī (approx. 140 pages) is attributed to the Burmese monk ara from Vijayapura (Piṭ-sm 298; da, 1926; Braun & Peters, 1996, 421). s us that he wrote a commentary se the innumerable commentarkhā did not suffice to understand mentary contains variant readings, lanations, and quotations from ied verse texts. Identified verses Vajirabuddhiṭīkā (c. 10th cent.), khāṭīkā, or the Rūpasiddhi (first ). Long portions have parallels in Khuddasikkhābhinavaṭīkā, from most probably borrowed.
vinicchaya, three ṭīkās are noted.
o Vācissara in the Gandhavaṃsa gly linked with the title Yoga(vi) dary literature (Malalasekera, 1928, a, 1994, 183). The Yoga(vi)nicchaya cal text and simply listed before the ṭīkā in the Gandhavaṃsa (Kieffer-g c). Another ṭīkā is imputed to 07; de Zoysa, 1885, 15; Malalasekera, ost likely based on the stanzas sec-to the Uttaravinicchayaṭīkā. These s – which contain a terminus ante nation of the Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā ayaṭīkā – inform us that the com-n brought to Burma by Sīvali Thera were transliterated or translated ipt or language by Revata. Thus ansliterator or translator, but not inayavinicchayaṭīkā. A third ṭīkā, asārasandīpanī, is attributed to an n Sri Lankan monk named Mahāṭakat samuiṅḥ (299). It is this ṭīkā to us in edited form, since in the s called Vinayatthasārasandīpanī es). It, furthermore, is quoted as ndīpanī in the Vinayālaṅkāraṭīkā name of the author is not given in troductory stanzas, he, however, ta of Poḷonnaruva and the unificaa by King Parakkamabāhu I, and he informs us that five persons asked him to write this commentary, namely, the elders Sumaṅgala Araññavāsika, Buddhamitta Coḷappadīpa, and Mahākassapa Coḷāvanipūjita; the lay follower (upāsaka) Dhammakitti Paṇḍita; and the merchant (vāṇija) Bhāṇu (von Hinüber, 1996a, § 330). Sumaṅgala is probably identical with Sāriputta's pupil who wrote ṭīkās to the Abhidhammāvatāra and the Abhidhammatthasaṅgaha; Mahākassapa is the author of the Vimativinodanīṭīkā and the Mohavicchedanī. Buddhamitta is not attested otherwise. A lay follower called Dhammakitti is mentioned in the colophon to the Saccasaṅkhepaṭīkā called Sāratthasālinī as providing the author with a residence for finishing his commentary (Cousins, forthcoming). Since the Sāratthasālinī shares the whole introductory section with the Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā (Kieffer-Pülz, forthcoming c), it was most likely written by the same author. This is confirmed by the list of works attributed to this author in the possibly secondary colophon to the Sāratthasālinī (Cousins, forthcoming). The lay follower Dhammakitti Paṇḍita played an important role for the author, who might be Vācissara. At least the three works mentioned, and others mentioned in the colophon to the Saratthasālinī, are attributed to Vācissara in the Gandhavaṃsa. The list of works of Vācissara in the Gandhavaṃsa is an amalgamation of works of Saṅgharakkhita and Vācissara. These two persons cannot be identical, since among the works listed, the Khuddasikkhābhinavaṭīkā and the Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā cannot have been written by the same author. Despite the fact that the Khuddasikkhā and the Vinayavinicchaya have stanzas in common, their commentaries do not share any common passage or wording. This excludes from among Sāriputta's pupils Saṅgharakkhita and Sumaṅgala as authors of the Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā. Regarding the necessity to write this commentary, the author tells us that an earlier Sinhalese commentary to the Vinayavinicchaya did not fully accomplish the goal for monks belonging to other parts of the world (Cousins, forthcoming). This certainly refers to the only early known Sinhalese Vinayavinicchaya commentary, the lost Nissandeha attributed to Parakkamabāhu II (1236–1271), which the author of the Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā not only quotes explicitly but also possibly uses silently as a source (Kieffer-Pülz, forthcoming c). We are told that Parakkamabāhu II was active as a literatus at the end of his reign, that is, in the late 13th century. But it cannot be excluded that he wrote the Nissandeha in his early years, while he received his education from the saṅgha (sometime before 1236), as that probably would be the time when he became acquainted with the Vinayavinicchaya. In that case, the Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā could have been written in the second third of the 13th century CE at the earliest, which would conform with the early transfer to Burma by Sīvalī Thera.

---

The Uttaravinicchayaṭīkā also called Uttaravinicchayavaṇṇanā is named Līnatthapakāsanī (approx. 92 pages) in the subheadings. Its author is not named, but he is identical with the author of the Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā as can be seen from an intertextual link in the beginning of the commentary (Utt-vn-ṭ II 401.17f.; "and insofar as it has been concisely shown by us in the commentary to the Vinayavinicchaya, we will not explain it here"). A longer passage with definitions of the currency kahāpaṇa (a coin or weight of different values) is quoted by Ñāṇakitti in his Samantapāsādikatthayojanā and in his Bhikkhupātimokkhagaṇṭhidīpanī, in which he gives the name Vācissara as the author. It is to be assumed that this a reference to the text from which the stanzas are borrowed, namely, to the Uttaravinicchayaṭīkā (Kieffer-Pülz, forthcoming a), not to an eventual source of the stanzas given there (von Hinüber, 2000, 132f.). The Uttaravinicchayaṭīkā in the beginning assembles several quotations from the Samantapāsādikā, the Sāratthadīpanī, and a Sinhalese Sāmaṇerasikkhā, but in general, it neither quotes much nor discusses substantive issues but merely gives explanations of words, of the connection of words (sambandha), and of the syntactical constructions (yojanā).

We have further commentaries on these condensations, which mostly are intended to elucidate words and grammatical constructions: an old and new Khuddasikkhāyojanā (c. 18th cent.) and a Khuddasikkhādīpanī by Burmese monastic scholars are mentioned in the Piṭakat samuiṅḥ (295–296); a Khuddasikkhāyojanā also exists in manuscript (Skilling & Pakdeekham, 2002, 18); and a Vinayavinicchayayojanā (1768) was written by a Burmese monk bearing the title Guṇābhisaddhamma Anantadhaja Mahādhammarājaguru who is probably identical with the monk Candovara mentioned in the Sāsanavaṃsa (128.13; see also Piṭakat samuiṅḥ 301; Skilling & Pakdeekham, 2002, 19).

The Vinayapiṭaka Digests (Saṅgahas) and Their Commentaries

From the 12th century onward, topically organized compendia comparable to Sanskrit digests (nibandhana) came into vogue. Sāriputta of Poḷonnaruva wrote a Vinaya compendium (Vinayasaṅgaha; approx. 537 pages), also called Pālimuttakavinayavinicchaya (Compendium of Vinaya Rulings Independent of the Canonical Text), intended for the benefit of monks who are practitioners of spiritual discipline (i.e. meditation; yogāvacarabhikkhu). This book consists of rearranged, reused text mainly from the Samantapāsādikā and the Vinayapiṭaka, but also from the Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī and Sumaṅgalavilāsinī. It is arranged in 34 chapters, dealing with topics of the monks' daily life and with issues affecting the community as a whole. Although it does not contain original text, it is an important document as it illuminates the topics considered important to monastics in 12th-century Sri Lanka and because it contains a number of otherwise not traced *kammavācā*s for the atonement of offences that are older than all the collections preserved in manuscript. It was an influential work as shown by its mention in the colophons of various of Sāriputta's pupils' works, by its being quoted in later texts, and by its being preserved in a large number of manuscripts. There seem to have existed other similar compendia as traces of the anonymous and undated Vinayasaṅkhepaṭṭhakathā (c. 12th–13th cents.) show, a text with 19 chapters largely borrowed from the Samantapāsādikā and enriched by portions from the subcommentaries (Kieffer-Pülz & Peters, 2002). A Vinayālaṅkārasaṅgaha attributed to a Vācissara preserved in manuscript (Jayawickrama, 1972, no. 67) might be another specimen of this type. In the Pagan inscription dated 1442, a greater and a lesser Vinayasaṅg(r)ahaṭṭhakathā are listed (Bode, 1909, 102). Both are also mentioned in Burmese secular law texts from the early 17th century (Lammerts, 2014, 188n22).

On Sāriputta's Vinayasaṅgaha, there exist two commentaries. The first is an autocommentary by Sāriputta called Anuttānatthadīpanī (Exposition of Unclear Meanings; approx. 185 pages; see also Crosby, 2006). Since the Vinayasaṅgaha is a collection of reused text, especially from the Samantapāsādikā, Sāriputta in writing his autocommentary could adopt text from his commentary to the Samantapāsādikā, that is, from the Sāratthadīpanī. Therefore, the Pālimuttakavinayavinicchayasaṅgahapurāṇaṭīkā largely is a rearranged Sāratthadīpanī (Kieffer-Pülz, 1992, 184n70). In cases in which Sāriputta in his Vinayasaṅgaha borrows text from a different aṭṭhakathā, he for his autocommentary takes over the explanations from the corresponding *ṭīkā*s. Thus, for his chapter on paritta (lit. protection), he borrows text from Buddhaghosa's Dīghanikāya commentary, the Sumaṅgalavilāsinī, and accordingly silently takes over the explanations from Dhammapāla's Sumaṅgalavilāsinīpurāṇaṭīkā for his commentary (Kieffer-Pülz, forthcoming b).

The second commentary to the Vinayasaṅgaha is Tipiṭakālaṅkāra Munindaghosa's (1578–1650/1651) Vinayālaṅkāraṭīkā (approx. 855 pages), completed between 1639 and 1651 in Burma (Lammerts, 2013). Tipiṭakālaṅkāra Munindaghosa used many of the earlier subcommentaries as well as a nissaya (a bilingual Pali-Burmese interphrasal commentary) and a gaṇṭhipada to the Khuddasikkhā and quotes them with their names. Sāriputta's Vinayasaṅgaha commentary he quotes as (Vinayasaṅgaha)porāṇaṭīkā. A commentary to the Vinayasaṅkhepa might be the Vinayasaṅkhepaṭīkā mentioned in the Piṭakat samuiṅḥ (303).

Compilations and Sīmā Manuals

While not strictly speaking commentarial literature, compilations (*rāsī*s) known since 18th-century Burma, nevertheless, have to be mentioned here, because they consist in literal excerpts from older commentarial literature. Two such compilations on Vinaya topics are known in manuscript, namely, Ñāṇinda's Vinayalakkhaṇarāsī (c. 19th cent.) and the anonymous and undated Vinayasaṅkheparāsī. The former assembles excerpts from nine Vinaya texts originally probably intended as representatives of these texts (Kieffer-Pülz & Peters, 2002, 117ff.; Kieffer-Pülz, forthcoming b). The latter contains excerpts from selected Vinayapiṭaka portions with added excerpts from the relevant subcommentaries (Mahāvagga plus extracts from various subcommentaries, Cūḷavagga; Peters, forthcoming, no. 1599). Such collections are of great value for the determination of the commentaries in use in a given region at a given time and for establishing texts, especially if they contain excerpts from otherwise untraced works (Kieffer-Pülz & Peters, 2002).

Another category of texts related to Vinaya commentarial literature is special manuals dealing with the Buddhist monastic boundaries (*sīmā*s).

Corresponding rules are gi and commented on in detail Since the Samantapāsādikā rules is still valid today, t excerpted and handed dow or books, often beautifully il the title Sīmākathā and co the relevant statements i In the 13th century, Vācis an earlier, lost prose text named Sīmālaṅkārasaṅgah autocommentary. The Sīm on the Samantapāsādikā tion from commentaries
South India. It was com Saddhammajotipāla (15th tary again served as a base f Another treatise, Sāgara (1587), written in Burm the Vimativinodanīṭīkā's s Sīmāvicāraṇa (1844) by Ki with various text portion Samantapāsādikā (Kieffertrue for three treatises deal 19th-century Sri Lanka – t (1858) by the Burmese h saṅgharāja Ñeyyadhamn Vimalasāra Thera's Sīmāla
Dhammālaṅkāra Thera's S
There exist several furthe so far unedited.

Bibliography

Primary Sources

Abhidhammatthasaṅgaha with Saṅgharāja, ed. T. Paññāmo Bhikkhupātimokkha sametā Ga Tissa, Alutgama, 1927.
"The Dāṭhāvaṃsa," JPTS, 1884,
"The Gandhavaṃsa," JPTS, 188
Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī by Bhadant
K.R. Norman & W. Pruitt, O Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīabhinavaṭīkā, i Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīpurāṇaṭīkā
Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīabhinavaṭīk
Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīpiṭapota, ed. K
Colombo, 1936.
Khuddasikkhīabhinavaṭīkā, in Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīpurāṇaṭīkā
Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīabhinavaṭīk

rranged Sāratthadīpanī (Kieffer-o). In cases in which Sāriputta in ha borrows text from a different or his autocommentary takes over s from the corresponding ṭīkās. apter on paritta (lit. protection), from Buddhaghosa's Dīghanikāya e Sumaṅgalavilāsinī, and accordkes over the explanations from umaṅgalavilāsinīpurāṇaṭīkā for his effer-Pülz, forthcoming b). mmentary to the Vinayasaṅgaha is Munindaghosa's (1578–1650/1651) ā (approx. 855 pages), completed d 1651 in Burma (Lammerts, 2013).
Munindaghosa used many of the entaries as well as a nissaya (a biline interphrasal commentary) and a e Khuddasikkhā and quotes them
. Sāriputta's Vinayasaṅgaha comes as (Vinayasaṅgaha)porāṇaṭīkā. o the Vinayasaṅkhepa might be epaṭīkā mentioned in the Piṭakat

s and Sīmā Manuals

y speaking commentarial literas (rāsīs) known since 18th-century ess, have to be mentioned here, sist in literal excerpts from older erature. Two such compilations re known in manuscript, namely, lakkhaṇarāsī (c. 19th cent.) and nd undated Vinayasaṅkheparāsī. nbles excerpts from nine Vinaya robably intended as representa-xts (Kieffer-Pülz & Peters, 2002, , forthcoming b). The latter conn selected Vinayapiṭaka portions rpts from the relevant subcom-agga plus extracts from various , Cūḷavagga; Peters, forthcoming, lections are of great value for the he commentaries in use in a given time and for establishing texts, contain excerpts from otherwise ieffer-Pülz & Peters, 2002).
ry of texts related to Vinaya com-re is special manuals dealing t monastic boundaries (sīmās).

Corresponding rules are given in the Vinayapiṭaka and commented on in detail in the Samantapāsādikā. Since the Samantapāsādikā's interpretation of these rules is still valid today, these rulings have been excerpted and handed down in separate manuscripts or books, often beautifully illustrated. They often bear the title Sīmākathā and consist in an excerpt from the relevant statements in the Samantapāsādikā. In the 13th century, Vācissara Thera – based on an earlier, lost prose text – wrote a verse manual, named Sīmālaṅkārasaṅgaha, and a hitherto untraced autocommentary. The Sīmālaṅkārasaṅgaha is based on the Samantapāsādikā, enriched by information from commentaries and actual practices in South India. It was commented on by Chapaṭa Saddhammajotipāla (15th cent.), whose commentary again served as a base for a Sinhalese paraphrase. Another treatise, Sāgarabuddhi's Sīmāvisodhanī (1587), written in Burma, discusses specifically the Vimativinodanīṭīkā's statements on sīmā. The Sīmāvicāraṇa (1844) by King Rāma IV of Siam deals with various text portions from Vinayapiṭaka and Samantapāsādikā (Kieffer-Pülz, 2011). This also holds true for three treatises dealing with a sīmā dispute in 19th-century Sri Lanka – the Sīmāvivādavinicchaya (1858) by the Burmese head of the saṅgha, the saṅgharāja Ñeyyadhamma (Kieffer-Pülz, 1998), Vimalasāra Thera's Sīmālakkhaṇadīpanī (1878), and Dhammālaṅkāra Thera's Sīmānayadappana (1884). There exist several further treatises in manuscript, so far unedited.

Bibliography

Primary Sources

Abhidhammatthasaṅgaha with the Purāṇasanne of Sāriputta Saṅgharāja, ed. T. Paññāmoli Tissa, Colombo, ^{5}1960.

Bhikkhupātimokkha sametā Gaṇṭhidīpanī, ed. P. Vimalaraṃsi Tissa, Alutgama, 1927.

"The Dāṭhāvaṃsa," JPTS, 1884, 109–151.

"The Gandhavaṃsa," JPTS, 1886, 54–80.

Kaṅkhāvitaraṇī by Bhadantācariya Buddhaghosa, eds. K.R. Norman & W. Pruitt, Oxford, 2003.

Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīabhinavaṭīkā, in: Buddhasāsana Samiti, ed., Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīpurāṇaṭīkā [and] Buddhanāga Thera's Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīabhinavaṭīkā, Rangoon, 1961, 118–489.

Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīpiṭapota, ed. Kalukondayāvē Paññāsekhara, Colombo, 1936.

Khuddasikkhīabhinavaṭīkā, in: Buddhasāsana Samiti, ed., Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīpurāṇaṭīkā [and] Buddhanāga Thera's Kaṅkhāvitaraṇīabhinavaṭīkā, Rangoon, 1961, 1–117.

Khuddasikkhā, in: "Khudda-Sikkhâ and Mûla-sikkhâ," JPTS, 1883, 88–121.

Khuddasikkhābhinavaṭīkā (Sumaṅgalappasādanī), in: Buddhasāsana Samiti, ed., Khuddasikkhā-Mūlasikkhā, Khuddasikkhā-Purāṇa-Abhinava-Ṭīkā, Mūlasikkhā-Ṭīkā, Rangoon, 1962, 237–441.

Khuddasikkhāpurāṇaṭīkā, in: Buddhasāsana Samiti, ed., Khuddasikkhā-Mūlasikkhā, Khuddasikkhā-Purāṇa-Abhinava-Ṭīkā, Mūlasikkhā-Ṭīkā, Rangoon, 1962, 59–235.

Khuddasikkhāyojanā, ms.

Mūlasikkhā, in: "Khudda-Sikkhâ and Mûla-sikkhâ," JPTS, 1883, 122–130.

Mūlasikkhābhinavaṭīkā (Vinayavimaticchedanī) in Mūlasikkhā-aṭṭhakathā, Mūlasikkhā-purāṇaṭīkā, Mūlasikkhābhinavaṭīkā, ed. Āsabha Thera & Kheminda Thera, Mandalay, BE2 1288 (= 1926 CE), 1–119.

Mūlasikkhāpurāṇaṭīkā, in: Buddhasāsana Samiti, ed., Khuddasikkhā-Mūlasikkhā, Khuddasikkhā-Purāṇa-Abhinava-ṭīkā, Mūlasikkhā-ṭīkā, Rangoon, 1962, 457–497.

Pācityādiyojanā, ed. Buddhasāsana Samiti, Rangoon, 1972.

Pālimuttakavinayavinicchaya(saṅgaha) (Vinayasaṅgahaṭṭhakathā), ed. Buddhasāsana Samiti, Rangoon, 1960.

Pālimuttakavinayavinicchaya(saṅgaha)navaṭīkā (Vinayālaṅkāraṭīkā), ed. Buddhasāsana Samiti, Rangoon, 1962.

Pālimuttakavinayavinicchayasaṅgaha(purāṇa)ṭīkā (Anuttānatthadīpanī or Vinayasaṅgahaporāṇaṭīkā), ed. K. Pannasara, Matara, 1908.

Pātimokkha, ed. W. Pruitt, trans. K.R. Norman, PTS, Oxford, 201.

Pātimokkhapadatthānuvaṇṇanā (Vicittalaṅkāra), ed. Ūḥ Phre, n.l., BE2 1270 (= 1908 CE).

Pātimokkha(vi)lekhana, ms.

Pātimokkhavisodhanī, ms.

Piṭakat tau samuiṅḥ, ed. Ūḥ Khaṅ Cuiḥ, Rangoon, 1959.

Piṭakat tau samuiṅḥ, trans. P. Nyunt, Bristol, 2012.

Samantapāsādikā (Vinayaṭṭhakatha), eds. J. Takakusu et al., 8 vols., PTS, London 1924–1947.

Samantapāsādikā nāma Vinayaṭṭhakathā Atthayojanā (Samantapāsādikatthayojanā), ed. Isuññāṇa Devasirindāvāsavāsin, 2 vols., Mahāmakuṭarājavidyālaya, Bangkok, BE3 2522 (= 1979 CE); BE3 2503 (= 1960 CE).

Sāratthadīpanī, ed. Buddhasāsana Samiti, 3 vols., Rangoon, 1960.

"Saddhamma Saṃgaho," JPTS, 1890, 21–90.

Sāsanavaṃsa, ed. M. Bode, London, 1897.

The Sásanavansa Dípo or the History of the Buddhist Church in Páli Verse by Vimalasāra Thera, Colombo, BE1 2424 (= 1880 CE).

Sīmālakkhaṇadīpanī (by Vimalasāra Thera), Colombo, BE1 2422 (= 1878 CE).

Sīmālaṅkārasaṅgaha (by Vācissara), ms.

Sīmālaṅkārasaṅgahaṭīkā (by Chapaṭa Saddhammajotipāla), ms.

Sīmānayadappana (by Dhammālaṅkāra Thera), Colombo, BE1 2428 (= 1884 CE).

Sīmāvicāraṇa (by King Rāma IV of Siam), ed. P. Kieffer-Pülz, Bangkok, 2011.

Sīmāvisodhanī (by Sāgara Thera), ms.

Sīmāvivādavinicchaya (by Ñeyyadhamma Saṅgharāja), JPTS, 1887, 17–34.

Uttaravinicchaya, in: Buddhadatta's Manuals, pt. 2: Vinayavinicchaya and Uttaravinicchaya, Summaries of the Vinaya Piṭaka, ed. A.P. Buddhadatta, PTS, London, 1927, 231ff.

Uttaravinicchayaṭīkā, in: Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā (Vinayatthasārasandīpanī), ed. Buddhasāsana Samiti, vol. II, Rangoon, 1977, 401–430.

Vajirabuddhiṭīkā, ed. Buddhasāsana Samiti, Rangoon, 1960.

Vinayagūḷhatthadīpanī, ms.

Vinayaguḷha(ṭṭha)pakāsanī, ms.

Vinayalakkhaṇarāsī (by Ñāṇakitti), ms.

Vinayapiṭaka, ed. H. Oldenberg, 5 vols., London, 1879–1883.

Vinayasaṅgaha, see Pālimuttakavinayavinicchayasaṅgaha.

Vinayasaṅkheparāsī, ms.

Vinayavinicchaya, in: Buddhadatta's Manuals, pt. 2: Vinayavinicchaya and Uttaravinicchaya, Summaries of the Vinaya Piṭaka, ed. A.P. Buddhadatta, PTS, London, 1927, 231ff.

Vinayavinicchayaṭīkā (Vinayatthasārasandīpanī), ed. Buddhasāsana Samiti, 2 vols., Rangoon, 1977.

Vimativinodanīṭīkā, ed. Buddhasāsana Samiti, 2 vols., Rangoon, 1960.

Vinayavinicchayayojanā, ms.

Secondary Literature

Blackburn, A.M., "Looking for the Vinaya Monastic Discipline in the Practical Canons of the Theravāda," JIABS 22, 1999, 281–309.

Bode, M.H., Pāli Literature of Burma, London, 1909.

Braun, H., & A. Peters, Burmese Manuscripts, Part 3: Catalogue Numbers 432–735, Stuttgart, 1996.

Cousins, L.S., "The Saccasaṅkhepa and Its Commentaries," forthcoming.

Cousins, L.S., "The Teachings of the Abhayagiri School," in: P. Skilling et al., eds., How Theravāda is Theravāda: Exploring Buddhist Identities, Chiang Mai, 2012, 67–127.

Crosby, K., "Sāriputta's Three Works on the Samantapāsādikā," JPTS 28, 2006, 49–59.

Crosby, K., & A. Skilton, "A Note on the Date of Mahākassapa, Author of the Mohavicchedanī," BÉI 17–18, 1999, 173–179.

Dhammaratana, "La Littérature bouddhique des Tīkās et la Vimativinodanī," in: Bhikkhu T. Dhammaratana & Bhikkhu Pāsādika, eds., Dharmadūta – Mélanges offerts au Vénérable Thích Huyên-Vi à l'occasion de son soixante-dixième anniversaire, Paris, 1997, 57–82.

Dimitrov, D., The Legacy of the Jewel Mind, forthcoming.

Fryer, G.E., "Páli Studies No. 1: On the Ceylon Grammarian Sangharakkhita Thera and His Treatise on Rhetoric," JAS 2, 1875, 91–125.

Gornall, A., "How Many Sounds Are in Pāli? Schism, Identity and Ritual in the Theravāda Saṅgha," JIPh 42/5, 2014, 511–550.

Hinüber, O. von, Kleine Schriften, Wiesbaden, 2009.

Hinüber, O. von, "Buddhistische Kommentare aus dem alten Indien. Die Erklärung des Theravāda-Kanons," in: M. Quisinsky, ed., Kommentarkulturen. Die Auslegung zentraler Texte der Weltreligionen; ein vergleichender Überblick, Cologne, 2007, 99–114.

Hinüber, O. von, "Lān² Nā as a Centre of Pāli Literature during the Late 15th Century," JPTS 26, 2000, 119–137, repr. 2009.

Hinüber, O. von, "A Handbook of Pāli Literature," IPSAS 2, Berlin, 1996a.

Hinüber, O. von, "Zu einer Göttinger Dissertation über das buddhistische Recht," WZKS 40, 1996b, 101–113, repr. 2009.

Hinüber, O. von, "The Arising of an Offence: āpattisamuṭṭhāna: A Note on the Structure and History of the Theravāda-Vinaya," JPTS 16, 1992, 55–69, repr. 2009.

Jayawardhana, S., Handbook of Pali Literature, Colombo, 1994.

Jayawickrama, N.A., "Pali Manuscripts in the John Rylands University Library of Manchester," BJRULM 55/1, 1972, 146–175.

Kieffer-Pülz, P., "'And There Is This Stanza in This Connection': The Usage of hoti/honti/bhavanti c' ettha in Pāli Commentarial Literature," JPTS, forthcoming a.

Kieffer-Pülz, P., "Reuse of Text in Pāli Legal Literature," paper presented at the IABS conference, University of Vienna, forthcoming b.

Kieffer-Pülz, P., Who is Who: "Lord of the Speech" (Vācissara) and "Protector of the Buddhist Community" (Saṅgharakkhita), forthcoming c.

Kieffer-Pülz, P., "The Compendium of the Figures of the Monastic Boundary: Vācissara's Sīmālaṅkārasaṅgaha: Edition and Translation," in: J.A. Carbine & E.W. Davis, eds., Sīmās: Histories, Practices, and Politics, forthcoming d.

Kieffer-Pülz, P., "[Review to:] P. Pecenko (Ed.), Aṅguttaranikāyaṭīkā Catutthā Līnatthapakāsinī," OLZ, forthcoming e.

Kieffer-Pülz, P., Verlorene Gaṇṭhipadas zum buddhistischen Ordensrecht. Untersuchungen zu den in der Vajirabuddhiṭīkā zitierten Kommentaren Dhammasiris und Vajirabuddhis, 3 vols., Wiesbaden, 2013.

Kieffer-Pülz, P., "The Law of Theft: Regulations in the Theravāda Vinaya and the Law Commentaries," JPTS 3, 2012, 1–56.

Kieffer-Pülz, P., "Zitate aus der Andhakaṭṭhakathā in den Subkommentaren," StII 27, 2010, 147–235.

Kieffer-Pülz, P., "Stretching the Vinaya Rules and Getting Away with It (11th I.B. Horner Lecture, 2005)," in: O. von Hinüber et al., eds., Festschrift in Honour of the 80th Birthday of K.R. Norman in 2005 and the 125th Anniversary in 2006 of the Founding of the Pali Text Society, Bristol, = JPTS 29, 2007, 1–49.

Kieffer-Pülz, P., "Die Klassifizierung des Alkoholverbots in der buddhistischen Rechtsliteratur der Theravādin," in: P. Schalk et al., eds., Im Dickicht der Gebote. Studien zur Dialektik von Norm und Praxis in der Buddhismusgeschichte Asiens, Uppsala, 2005, 153–223.

Kieffer-Pülz, P., "A Legal Judgement Regarding a Sīmā Controversy: Ñeyyadhamma's Sīmāvivādavinicchaya-kathā," in: C.P. Sinha, ed., Facets of Indian Culture: Gustav Roth Felicitation Volume, Patna, 1998, 210–218.

Kieffer-Pülz, P., "Nāgas Ordained and Sīmās Connected: The Importance of the Vimativinodanīṭīkā for Vinaya Studies," in: H. Bechert et al., eds., Untersuchungen zur buddhistischen Literatur, 2. Folge. Gustav Roth zum 80. Geburtstag gewidmet, Göttingen, 1997, 239–253.

ān² Nā as a Centre of Pāli Literature dur-Century," JPTS 26, 2000, 119–137, repr.

Handbook of Pāli Literature," IPSAS 2, u einer Göttinger Dissertation über das cht," WZKS 40, 1996b, 101–113, repr. 2009. e Arising of an Offence: āpattisamuṭṭhāna: tructure and History of the Theravāda-992, 55–69, repr. 2009.

Handbook of Pali Literature, Colombo,

"Pali Manuscripts in the John Rylands y of Manchester," BJRULM 55/1, 1972, nd There Is This Stanza in This Connecof hoti/honti/bhavanti c' ettha in Pāli erature," JPTS, forthcoming a. se of Text in Pāli Legal Literature," paper IABS conference, University of Vienna,

Vho is Who: "Lord of the Speech" "Protector of the Buddhist Community" forthcoming c. e Compendium of the Figures of the ary: Vācissara's Sīmālaṅkārasaṅgaha: ation," in: J.A. Carbine & E.W. Davis, eds., ractices, and Politics, forthcoming d. view to:] P. Pecenko (Ed.), Aṅguttarani-Līnatthapakāsinī," OLZ, forthcoming e. erlorene Gaṇṭhipadas zum buddhis-cht. Untersuchungen zu den in der itierten Kommentaren Dhammasiris und ols., Wiesbaden, 2013.
e Law of Theft: Regulations in the
and the Law Commentaries," JPTS 31, ate aus der Andhakaṭṭhakathā in den

," StII 27, 2010, 147–235. etching the Vinaya Rules and Getting
I.B. Horner Lecture, 2005)," in: O. von ., Festschrift in Honour of the 80th Birth- n in 2005 and the 125th Anniversary in ng of the Pali Text Society, Bristol, = JPTS

e Klassifizierung des Alkoholverbots chen Rechtsliteratur der Theravādin," ., eds., Im Dickicht der Gebote. Studien
Norm und Praxis in der Buddhismus-Uppsala, 2005, 153–223. egal Judgement Regarding a Sīmā Conamma's Sīmāvivādavinicchaya-kathā," Facets of Indian Culture: Gustav Roth
, Patna, 1998, 210–218. gas Ordained and Sīmās Connected: of the Vimativinodanīṭīkā for Vinaya chert et al., eds., Untersuchungen zur eratur, 2. Folge. Gustav Roth zum 80. et, Göttingen, 1997, 239–253.

Kieffer-Pülz, P., "Zitate aus der Andhaka-Aṭṭhakathā in der Samantapāsādikā," in: R. Grünendahl et al., eds., Studien zur Indologie und Buddhismuskunde, Festgabe des Seminars für Indologie und Buddhismuskunde für Professor Dr. Heinz Bechert, Bonn, 1993, 171–212.

Kieffer-Pülz, P., Die Sīmā. Vorschriften zur Regelung der buddhistischen Gemeindegrenze in älteren buddhistischen Texten, MIAKPh 8, Berlin, 1992.

Kieffer-Pülz, P., & A. Peters, "Die Pātimokkhapadattha-anuvaṇṇanā des Vicittālaṅkāra aus Ca-laṅḥ," in: M. Straube et al., eds., Pāsādikadānaṃ. Festschrift für Bhikkhu Pāsādika, Marburg, 2009, 275–292.

Kieffer-Pülz, P., & A. Peters, "The Vinayasaṅkhepaṭṭhakathā: An Unknown Vinaya Handbook?," in: Buddhist and Indian Studies in Honour of Professor Sodo Mori, publ. Publication Committee for Buddhist and Indian Studies, Tokyo, 2002, 117–127.

Lammerts, C., "Genres and Jurisdictions: Laws Governing Monastic Inheritance in Seventeenth-Century Burma," in: R.R. French & M.A. Nathan, eds., Buddhism and Law: An Introduction, Cambridge UK, 2014, 183–197.

Lammerts, C., "Taungbhila Sayadaw Tipiṭakālaṅkāra (1578–1650/1)," paper presented at the South Asia Conference, University of Wisconsin-Madison, 2013.

Malalasekera, G.P., Dictionary of Pāli Proper Names, vol. II, London, 1937.

Malalasekera, G.P., The Pāli Literature of Ceylon, Colombo, 1928.

Peters, A., Birmanische Handschriften, VOHD 23/9, Stuttgart, forthcoming.

Rohanadeera, M., "Mahāsāmi Saṅgha Rāja Institution in Sri Lanka: Its Origin, Development, Status, Duties and Functions," VJASL 13/1, 1985, 27–43.

Schlingloff, D., "Zur Interpretation des Prātimokṣasūtra," WZKS 31, 1963, 111–130.

Skilling, P., & S. Pakdeekham, Pāli Literature Transmitted in Central Siam, vol. I, Bangkok, 2002.

Zoysa, L. de, A Catalogue of Pāli, Sinhalese, and Sanskrit Manuscripts in the Temple Libraries of Ceylon, Colombo, 1885.

PETRA KIEFFER-PÜLZ

Monastic Organizational Guidelines

Monastic rulebooks, regulations, or codes exist wherever there are Buddhist monasteries. Rather than being commentaries to or explanations of the Vinaya or the pratimokṣa vows, these works mostly pertain to the physical space of the monastic compound and its inhabitants. Their rules are often perceived to be more provisional, more flexible, and more temporary than the rules or vows found in formal Vinaya literature. This makes these works valuable for a study of the historical development of Buddhist monasteries and their organization. Just as there are large differences among Buddhist monastic communities throughout Asia in terms of organization, layout, population, and so on, their regulations and rules also vary significantly. The commonality among these diverse monastic regulations is that they deal either with the conduct, organization, and management of the population of monks at a monastery or with a combination of the above. The authors of these texts are more often than not individuals with a certain level of authority, be it religious, political, or both. Therefore, such texts are frequently witness to the existing power relations at a given monastery at a certain time.

The intended audience of the texts can differ: certain monastic regulations meticulously prescribe the daily activities of monks (e.g. the Chanyuan qinggui [禪苑清規]; Yifa, 2002), whereas others appear to concern themselves only with the day-to-day management of the monastery. Yet other monastic regulations are combinations of both and appear to address the monastic community as a whole, while occasionally singling out a certain segment of the monk population.

Possibly the earliest references to the organization and management of monks and monasteries can be found in Buddhist canonical works (e.g. Silk, 2008). These often consist of mere allusions to monastic organization contained within narratives. Extant works that explicitly target monastic organization or the behavior of monks within the context of a monastic compound are of a later date, but there are indications that formal codes for local vihāras (taking this term in a broad sense) were in place at an early stage in the development of Buddhist monasticism. The Sanskrit term kriyākāra (Tib. khrims su bca' ba), translated as "local monastic ordinance" (Schopen, 2002), can be found in the Varṣāvastu section of the Mūlasarvāstivādavinaya (D 1, 'Dul ba, ka, 239a1) and in the Śīlapaṭala chapter of the Bodhisattvabhūmi (Schopen, 2002, 360–362). In both texts, the word kriyākāra clearly refers to the local practices of specific monastic communities. In other instances, it may also refer to secular rules (Schopen, 2002, 381n4). The word that refers to local monastic rules in the Pali Vinayapiṭaka, katikā (Vin i.153, 6), can also be found in some of the Pali jātakas (e.g. Jāt 540: vi.71, 31), where it appears to denote a type of oral contract between two individuals. The same word was also more generally used to refer to an agreement made by an assembly of people, which could consist of either laity or monastics (Ratnapala, 1971, 6).

Monastic Guidelines in South and Southeast Asia

In Sri Lanka, a number of monastic ordinances called katikāvatas or katikāvattas survive. Several of these were preserved as inscriptions and others in manuscripts. The katikāvatas are agreements on the rules of conduct for the monastic community, often laid down by the monastic leader with the most authority. The rules were decided on at an assembly of the saṅgha held specifically in order to reorganize the monastic community as a whole or a particular individual monastery. These reorganizations mostly happened with the support of the king; some katikāvatas thus bear the name of the king in question. The texts were written to establish stability within the community and to respond to contemporary practical issues faced by the saṅgha (Blackburn, 1999, 286–287).

Some make a distinction between katikāvatas for a specific monastery (vihāra katikāvatas) and those composed for the entire community of monks (sāsana katikāvatas; e.g. Rammandala, 1880). The former consist of rules mostly to do with the administration of a particular monastery, whereas the latter, which were promulgated by kings or local chieftains, contain a long historical introduction and focus more on the behavior of monks. An example of the sāsana katikāvatas is one

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

uidelines

(Schopen, 2002), can be found in the tion of the Mūlasarvāstivādavinaya
, 239a1) and in the Śīlapaṭala chapter tvabhūmi (Schopen, 2002, 360–362). the word kriyākāra clearly refers to ices of specific monastic communi-nstances, it may also refer to secular , 2002, 381n4). The word that refers to rules in the Pali Vinayapiṭaka, katikā an also be found in some of the Pali t 540: vi.71, 31), where it appears to f oral contract between two individuvord was also more generally used to eement made by an assembly of peo-ld consist of either laity or monastics 71, 6).

uidelines in South and sia a number of monastic ordinances tas or katikāvattas survive. Several preserved as inscriptions and others

. The katikāvatas are agreements on nduct for the monastic community, n by the monastic leader with the
. The rules were decided on at an e saṅgha held specifically in order to monastic community as a whole or dividual monastery. These reorgani-happened with the support of the ikāvatas thus bear the name of the n. The texts were written to establish the community and to respond to practical issues faced by the saṅgha 99, 286–287). a distinction between katikāvatas monastery (vihāra katikāvatas) and sed for the entire community of a katikāvatas; e.g. Rammandala, mer consist of rules mostly to do nistration of a particular monastery, atter, which were promulgated by chieftains, contain a long historical nd focus more on the behavior of mple of the sāsana katikāvatas is one written by Mahākaśyapa at the occasion of the sāsana reform by the Sinhalese king Parākramabāhu I (1123–1186), which came about by royal order and not by a monastic council. That it was accepted by the monastic community shows the authority of the king over monastic matters. The first katikāvata promulgated by the monastic community without any royal interference can be dated as late as 1853 (Wijetunga, 1970, 4–7).

The organizational structure of the Parākramabāhu I katikāvata has formed the basis for the organization of the saṅgha in Sri Lanka and other Southeast Asian Buddhist countries. Its contents deviate in some instances from the Vinayapiṭaka, and it even adds some new rules that directly contradicted the Vinayapiṭaka (Bechert, 1970, 765; for the text, see Wickremasinghe, 1928, 256–283). N. Ratnapala has provided translations and analyses for a number of the sāsana katikāvatas, the earliest of which dates back to the 12th century (Ratnapala, 1971, 6–13). No extensive study on the vihāra katikāvatas has yet been conducted.

In Sri Lanka, inscriptions on granite slabs estimated to date to the 9th century have been found near ruins of monasteries. These are not explicitly called katikāvatas or named otherwise but clearly contain regulations intended to guide monks and laypeople that lived within the monastic compound or areas belonging to it. The Abhayagiri Inscription – written in Sanskrit – is one such example. This reveals that from the early 9th century, rules were laid down both for monks and for lay staff of the monastery (Wickremasinghe, 1912, 1–9). Another such source is the Mihintale Slab Inscription written in Sinhalese in the early 11th century. This states that it bases itself on the rules of the Abhayagiri as well as on those of the Cetiyagiri Monastery. It furthermore details the ideal daily routine of monks and offers very particular information on how servants and monastic property should be managed (Wickremasinghe, 1912, 98–113). R.A.L.H. Gunawardana utilized the above-mentioned and other similar inscriptions for his superb book on the monasticism and economy in Sri Lanka, exactly because they contain a wealth of information on the economic and social role of Sinhalese monasteries from the 9th to the 13th century (Gunawardana, 1979). The Sinhalese monastic guidelines also contain information on the monastery's scholastic schedule and the education of monks more generally (e.g. Kitsudō, 1981, 309–325).

While there is no lack of locally produced Vinaya commentaries, handbooks, and manuals in other South and Southeast Asian countries where monastic Buddhism had a presence. (see e.g. von Hinüber, 1996, 154–159; Kieffer-Pülz & Peters, 2009, 275–292; Lammerts, 2014), organizational guidelines for individual monasteries or monastic communities as can be found in Sri Lanka, China, Japan, and Tibet do not appear to exist. The extant Pali, vernacular, and bilingual material from countries such as Burma, Thailand, and Cambodia that pertain to features of monastic organization such as ordination, property, administration, and judicial matters requires further attention from scholarship.

Tibet

In Tibet, texts that contain rules on life in the monastery are generally called bca'yig, although a plethora of names exists for texts that in some way deal with monastic organization of the monastery. One also finds works that are labeled bca' khrims, rtsa khrims, bka' khrims, bca' sgrig, sgrig yig, sgrig gzhi, khrims yig, tshogs gtam, and sgrig lam: all may contain rather similar information.

The earliest extant work containing instructions for a monastic organization stems from the late 12th century. This first bca'yig-like text contains prescriptions for aspects of monastic governance and consists of instructions given by Lama Zhang (i.e. Zhang Brtson 'grus Grags pa [1123–1193]), written down and preserved in his collected works (Tib. Gsung 'bum; Ellingson, 1989, 208). According to tradition, it was recorded as an oral testament directed to his successors at the monastery of 'Tshal gung thang. It is said to have been spoken when Lama Zhang was close to dying, thus either in or before 1193. Even though it contains some valuable information on monastic organization in the late 12th century, the monastic guidelines developed into a more established genre only by the 14th century.

Just like the terms kriyākāra and katikāvata, the word bca' yig, which previous scholars have connected only to monastic regulations, may also apply to non-monastic groups, such as lay people in retreat or tantric practitioners. Some rulebooks that bear this name even serve to guide lay communities and are more or less secular in nature.

Whereas the lion's share of texts containing monastic rules in Sri Lanka were issued for the entire monastic community and while East Asian texts consisted of rules mostly intended for one single school, the rulebooks in Tibet more often than not were written for one single monastery.

Monasteries with thousands of monks, which were almost cities in their own right, as well as small hermitages deep in the mountains, had such written rules. The traditional claim is that each monastery of some renown needed to possess at least one set of guidelines (personal communication, July 2012). Interestingly, the surviving bca' yig written for nunneries are far and few between: I have counted three so far (Jansen, 2015).

Monastic guidelines written for Tibetan monasteries can abound with local flavor and interesting details, a sign that they were written by someone invested in the monastery, often an abbot or an important incarnation stationed there. This literature can also be very generic, particularly when written by one less involved in the monastery. Just as in the Sinhalese context, in Tibet monastic rules were sometimes tools of the state. These particular bca' yig have the aim to restructure the monastery's religio-political alliances and often contain rules for monasteries that are both physically and "religiously" far removed from the author's effective power. Examples can be seen in the works of the fifth Dalai Lama (1617–1682), who wrote a bca' yig for a Bon monastery, and in those of the thirteenth Dalai Lama (1876–1933). The latter composed at least 38 monastic guidelines, almost all of which were intended for monasteries outside of central Tibet – that is to say, beyond the direct rule of the Tibetan government (Thub bstan Rgya mtsho, vol. IV, 1981–1982). These monasteries presumably already had monastic constitutions of their own, but issuing these constitutions was to a great extent a political act, a way to draw monasteries – mainly located in Kham and Amdo, regions that were not well-known for their allegiance to the central Tibetan government – into the political and religious sphere of the Dalai Lama.

The texts themselves often explicitly state their local and contemporary purpose. An example is the bca' yig written for all Sikkimese monasteries in 1909, in which it is said that it is a work "in accordance with all the monasteries' own rules, the local customs, [people's] dispositions, capacities and intentions" (Jansen, 2014; Schuh & Dagyab, 1978, 269–270). We can see that when structural changes took place in a particular monastery – for example, when it changed affiliation or had been rebuilt after destruction, or even when the education program was expanded – the bca' yig of that monastery was seen to be in need of revision or replacement. This is not unlike the notion prevalent among the authors of the katikāvata: some of these Sinhalese monastic codes state that they were renewed in accordance with the changing times (Ratnapala, 1971, 164).

East Asia

The translation of Vinayas into Chinese took place long after the introduction of monastic Buddhism to China. It is suggested that the earliest rules for monks in China were orally transmitted and were intended for the foreign monk population (Heirman, 2007, 168). In a letter, Dao'an (道安; 312–385) – translator of Buddhist scriptures and someone who is seen as the author of the earliest monastic rules – laments the fact that there was no complete text of the five hundred monastic rules at Xiangyang (襄陽), which he mentioned was most needed (Zürcher, 2007, 197). Dao'an's biography notes that the rules that he eventually developed, which pertained to daily life in the monastery, were followed by monks throughout the empire (Link, 1958, 35–6). There is no suggestion that Dao'an directly concerned himself with the administration or management of a monastery as such. Later on, the regulations that were formulated for Chan monasteries in China were said to be based on Dao'an's and Daoxuan's (道宣; 596–667) works (Yifa, 2005, 125). Traditionally, Baizhang's (白丈; 749–814) qinggui (清規; pure rules) are thought to form the foundation for later Chan monastic communities. Like those of Dao'an, Baizhang's rules were said to be written for general practice and not for particular circumstances; they concerned themselves with ritual while remaining largely silent on issues of administration. However, many scholars doubt that Baizhang's qinggui ever existed. The title is in any case apocryphal, for the term qinggui does not appear in a monastic context before the 12th century (Yifa, 2002, 28–35). The earliest extant text on monastic rules written by a Chan master is Shi guizhi (師規制; The Teacher's Regulations), written in 901 by Xuefeng (雪峰; 822–908). The work is short and is not directed to one single monastery. It not only appears to be in line with rules as laid out in the Vinayapiṭaka but also contains references to more Chinese local practices (Poceski, 2003, 33–56). The Tiantai monk Zunshi (遵式; 964–1032) revived the abandoned temple Tianzhusi (天竺寺) and wrote guidelines for his successors called the Tianzhusi shifang zhuchi yi (天竺寺十方住持義; Principles for the Ten Directions some of these Sinhalese monastic hey were renewed in accordance times (Ratnapala, 1971, 164).

Vinayas into Chinese took place oduction of monastic Buddhism gested that the earliest rules for ere orally transmitted and were eign monk population (Heirman, etter, Dao'an (道安; 312–385) – dhist scriptures and someone author of the earliest monastic fact that there was no complete dred monastic rules at Xiangyang mentioned was most needed). Dao'an's biography notes that ventually developed, which per- in the monastery, were followed out the empire (Link, 1958, 35, gestion that Dao'an directly con- h the administration or manage- y as such. Later on, the regulations ed for Chan monasteries in China sed on Dao'an's and Daoxuan's orks (Yifa, 2005, 125). Tradition- 丈; 749–814) qinggui (清規; pure to form the foundation for later mmunities. Like those of Dao'an, ere said to be written for general r particular circumstances; they ves with ritual while remaining ues of administration. However, bt that Baizhang's qinggui ever in any case apocryphal, for the not appear in a monastic con- century (Yifa, 2002, 28–35). The on monastic rules written by a i guizhi (師規制; The Teacher's en in 901 by Xuefeng (雪峰; 822– hort and is not directed to one t not only appears to be in line ut in the Vinayapiṭaka but also to more Chinese local practices 56). The Tiantai monk Zunshi evived the abandoned temple) and wrote guidelines for his he Tianzhusi shifang zhuchi yi ; Principles for the Ten Directions Abbacy of Tianzhu Monastery) in 1030 (Yifa, 2002, 35–37). Other non-Chan monastic guidelines are so far unknown.

Another very influential set of extant monastic guidelines for a Chan monastery is the Chanyuan qinggui (禪苑清規; Pure Rules for Chan Monasteries; Xuzangjing vol. LXIII, no. 1245). Written in 1103, it later became the standard for the rulebooks of all bigger Chan monasteries in China and represents an important milestone for Chinese Buddhist history because it was the first indigenous set of monastic rules that more or less equaled the status of the Vinayapiṭaka (Foulk, 2004, 275). These rules may be divided into five sections:

1. standards of behavior addressed to individual monks;
2. procedures for communal calendrical rites;
3. guidelines for the organization and operation of public monastery bureaucracies;
4. procedures for rituals of social interaction; and
5. rules pertaining to the relationship between public monasteries and the outside world, particularly civil authorities and lay benefactors (Foulk, 2004, 289).

The Chanyuan qinggui describes in detail the duties of monk officials responsible for economic matters, such as tax and rent collecting. These new roles were not seen in the administrative structure of the earlier Tang dynasty monasteries (Collcutt, 1983, 182). Initially this genre of monastic guidelines called qinggui were restricted to Chan monasteries, but by the Yuan dynasty, the practice of compiling codes with qinggui in the title had spread to other branches of Chinese Buddhism (Collcutt, 1983, 169).

Whereas the qinggui were intended for all public monasteries, there were also monastic guidelines written for individual monasteries, which appear quite similar to the Tibetan bca' yig. H. Welch found texts called Guiyue (規約) to contain the fullest information on the monastic system as actually followed. In the early to mid-20th century, his monk informants thought them to be more relevant on issues of monastic organization than the contents of the praṭimokṣa vows (Welch, 1967, vi). Such guidelines were usually divided into sections, of which each was dedicated to a certain department in the monastery. Although these texts claim to be based on Baizhang's works, they were flexible, for when the need arose, the abbot could add new rules (Welch, 1967, 105–107).

Not surprisingly, the genre of qinggui also spread to Japan. Dōgen (道元; 1200–1253) wrote regulations for Eihei Monastery later collected in the Eihei shingi (永平清規; Pure Rules for Ehei Monastery; T. 2584), which includes regulations and procedural instructions for a variety of monastic activities. This work consists of six parts written on separate occasions (Leighton & Okumura, 1996, 21–23). Dōgen is sometimes viewed as an innovator of Zen monastic Buddhism, but almost all the texts on monastic rules attributed to him are in fact commentaries on the Chanyuan qinggui and other works deriving from the Vinaya tradition. This makes Dōgen a transmitter rather than an innovator of monastic rules (Foulk, 2006, 140).

Generally speaking, the codes compiled in Japan are often shorter than their Chinese counterparts, and they do not entirely reproduce the issues addressed in the *qinggui*s: local and specifically Japanese concerns were also voiced in the shingi (Collcutt, 1983, 170). As in the case with China, aside from the shingi that were directed to all Zen monasteries, there were also regulations called kakun (家訓) for individual Zen monasteries or schools. The latter term suggests a connection to aristocratic and warrior house codes, which bore the same name (Collcutt, 1981, 152). The Rinsen kakun (臨川家訓), compiled in 1317, is an example of an individual monastery's code (Collcutt, 1981, 149–165). The articles in this text appear to be responses to particular problems. Although similar guidelines for Japanese monastic institutions affiliated to other traditions exist, Western-language scholarship so far has been limited to those of the Zen tradition.

Another way in which rules for monastic conduct and life in Japan were created was through external authorities, perhaps comparable to the way the Sinhalese sāsana katikāvata were promulgated. The Nara court issued regulations for monks and nuns in 701, called the Sōniryō (僧尼令), which consists of 27 articles (translated by Piggott, 1987, 267–273). Even though these regulations contain rather stringent measures, they appear not to have been strictly enforced (Augustine, 2005, 60–62). The Hōjō and the Ashikaga rulers issued many codes for individual Zen monasteries (Collcutt, 1981, 165–166). This practice was already current in China from the 5th century onward: the sengzhi (僧制; saṅgha regulations) were attempts by the secular authorities to regulate the monk community, in particular with the aim to control monk ordinations, thereby countering tax evasion (Foulk, 2004, 276, 290).

In Korea, monastic regulations written specifically for local monasteries appear to be rare. In the Sŏn (禪) monasteries, monks studied a basic handbook called the Ch'obalsim chagyŏng mun (初發心 自警文; Admonitions to Beginners), a collection of three works. This book serves to inform monks on basic monastic rules and the right way of behaving in a monastic environment (Buswell, 1992, 80). One work included in the collection, by Chinul (知訥; 1158–1210), is called Kye ch'osim hagin mun (誡初心學人文; Admonitions to Neophytes; trans. Buswell, 2012, 195–205). The Ch'obalsim chagyŏng mun does not seem to serve as a manual for monastic organization but functions more as a manual for individual monks. It is one of the most commonly read and studied works among Korean Sŏn monks (Buswell, 1992, 101).

The absence of guidelines for monastic governance may be explained by the intimate relationship between the monastic community and the state. In the Koryŏ dynasty (高麗; 918–1392), a saṅgha registry was instated that functioned as mediator between temples and state officials, modeled after that in China, albeit without the anti-Buddhist undertone. This system may have caused the Korean monkhood to lose its autonomy (Vermeersch, 2008, 183–237), which then accounts for the lack of monastic guidelines, which are often an expression of autonomy – be it political, religious, or both. However, similar information to that which we find in the monastic codes of other Buddhist countries is contained in prohibition orders (禁令; kŭmnyŏng) and chapters on law in the Koryŏsa (高麗史; History of Koryŏ), which were promulgated by the secular authorities. In these works, one can find rules on monastic behavior that occasionally correspond to the contents of the Vinayapiṭaka (Vermeersch, 2008, 161).

Relationship between the Monastic Rules and the Vinayapiṭaka

The question arises how the rules as laid down in the Vinayapiṭaka and those contained in the monastic codes relate to each other. Some see the monastic guidelines as additions to the existing Vinaya code (Seneviratna, 2000, 187) or clarifications and abridged versions thereof (Ellingson, 1989, 209). For some, the *bca' yig*s summarize > the details of the Vinaya into basic principles of communal life and government, and articulate soteriological concepts into specific guidelines for the conduct of religious communities. (Ellingson, 1989, 210)

For others, such works present the practical message of the Vinayapiṭaka in a more accessible way (Blackburn, 1999, 286), as the Vinaya texts themselves were often – not only conceptually but also often even physically – inaccessible. In China, the Vinayapiṭaka remained untranslated for centuries after the introduction of Buddhism, while in Sri Lanka, Vinaya texts were often not kept in the monasteries (Blackburn, 1999, 286); in Tibet those who wished to study the monastic discipline as an "academic subject" were required to be bhikṣus (Cabezón, 2004, 6), while the majority of the monk population never took bhikṣu ordination. Furthermore, in the monastic educational curriculum of the Dge lugs school, the Vinayapiṭaka was a topic only studied for the last four years of the academic training that could take up to two decades (Dreyfus, 2003, 114). And even then, the canonical Vinaya texts themselves were not treated: the main focus lay on Guṇaprabha's Vinayasūtra (Tib. 'Dul ba'i mdo rtsa ba [D 4117/P 5619]) and a commentary to this text by the 13th-century Bka' 'dams master Kun mkhyen Mtsho sna ba Shes rab Bzang po, used in all Tibetan Buddhist traditions. Despite the Vinayapiṭaka being an integral part of the monastic curriculum, extensive knowledge of the contents was not a requirement for one's scholastic progress (Dreyfus, 2003, 117). The number of studying monks in traditional Tibet was small; thus the vast majority of monks never studied the Vinayapiṭaka in any detail: all their awareness of monastic regulations and their vows came through bca' yig literature and oral instructions (see above).

It is thus plausible that, at least in Tibet, exactly because they usually addressed all monks that inhabited a monastery, the monastic guidelines were not mere appendices to Vinaya texts. Although such texts overtly address only the saṅgha, these types of works are witness to the fact that lay people – both monastery employees and lay devotees – were often part of the "jurisdiction" of the monastic institution. In Tibet, for example, hunting on monastic property was forbidden, and a bca' yig by the 13th Dalai Lama states that hunters who were caught were to be made to leave their weapons in the protectors' chapel and promise not to reoffend (Huber, 2004, 135).

In the case of Tibetan monastic Buddhism, a need was felt to supplement the general discipline with more specific documents that focused on "the practical aspects of daily life" (Cabezón, 1997, 337). Such documents have on the whole little to do with clarifying the Vinaya or the praṭimokṣa vows but contain practical instructions that seek to regulate monastic life. Monastic codes thus are neither necessarily clarifications or new stand ments to the Vinayapiṭaka guidelines. In this way, m life were regulated more by tions than by the Vinayapi

---

According to the Vinaya Council decreed that the Buddha's laws (Bechert, 19 the Vinaya, and in particu not and should not be mo much alive. Many conte monks insist that rules fo bearing on the rules conta because the monastic rule Vinayapiṭaka ones – that vows – are not (personal c It is perhaps for that rea Vinayapiṭaka rules and th ing – at least in theory – al The literature contai strictly speaking, never pr Vinayapiṭaka material. N these works do tend to sta dance with the contents they sometimes add that works have been consulte (Pure Rules), for example rary Chinese cultural valu influenced by the Vinaya literature (Yifa, 2005, 134) for these types of works t order to lend authority to rate well-known Vinayapi This is not to say that were never in contradicti Vinayapiṭaka. As mentio of the katikāvata someti canonical law and even (Bechert, 1970, 765). It is, of literature to display an ity of a contradiction b monastic rules. The autho Canglu Zongze (長蘆宗 been aware that he was v ent from or competing v solved this by pointing to ing that the rules that he at furthering the good of (Foulk, 2004, 285). Anoth monastic code for Drepu tery from 1682, in which wang Lobzang Gyatso (N mtsho; 1617–1682) wrote t

works present the practical mesapiṭaka in a more accessible way , 286), as the Vinaya texts them-– not only conceptually but also cally – inaccessible. In China, the mained untranslated for centu-roduction of Buddhism, while in texts were often not kept in the ckburn, 1999, 286); in Tibet those tudy the monastic discipline as ject" were required to be bhikṣus ), while the majority of the monk took bhikṣu ordination. Further-astic educational curriculum of ol, the Vinayapiṭaka was a topic e last four years of the academic take up to two decades (Dreyfus, n then, the canonical Vinaya texts ot treated: the main focus lay on yasūtra (Tib. 'Dul ba'i mdo rtsa ba d a commentary to this text by the dams master Kun mkhyen Mtsho ang po, used in all Tibetan Budespite the Vinayapiṭaka being an monastic curriculum, extensive contents was not a requirement progress (Dreyfus, 2003, 117). The g monks in traditional Tibet was majority of monks never studied any detail: all their awareness of ns and their vows came through nd oral instructions (see above). le that, at least in Tibet, exactly y addressed all monks that inhab-e monastic guidelines were not o Vinaya texts. Although such s only the saṅgha, these types of o the fact that lay people – both es and lay devotees – were often ion" of the monastic institution.
e, hunting on monastic property a bca' yig by the 13th Dalai Lama ho were caught were to be made ns in the protectors' chapel and end (Huber, 2004, 135). tan monastic Buddhism, a need ent the general discipline with ents that focused on "the prac-life" (Cabezón, 1997, 337). Such the whole little to do with clari-e pratimokṣa vows but contain s that seek to regulate monasles thus are neither necessarily clarifications or new standards, nor merely supplements to the Vinayapiṭaka, but rather handbooks or guidelines. In this way, many aspects of monastic life were regulated more by local monastic constitutions than by the Vinayapiṭaka (Dreyfus, 2003, 40).

---

According to the Vinayapiṭaka, the First Buddhist Council decreed that the saṅgha was not to alter Buddha's laws (Bechert, 1970, 772). The notion that the Vinaya, and in particular the monks' vows, cannot and should not be modified, appears to be very much alive. Many contemporary senior Tibetan monks insist that rules for the monastery have no bearing on the rules contained in the Vinayapiṭaka, because the monastic rules are flexible whereas the Vinayapiṭaka ones – that is to say, the pratimokṣa vows – are not (personal communication, July 2012). It is perhaps for that reason that one can see the Vinayapiṭaka rules and the monastic rules as existing – at least in theory – alongside each other.

The literature containing monastic rules is, strictly speaking, never presented as commentary to Vinayapiṭaka material. Nonetheless, the authors of these works do tend to state that they write in accordance with the contents of the Vinayapiṭaka, and they sometimes add that certain Vinayapiṭaka-like works have been consulted. While the Chan Qinggui (Pure Rules), for example, incorporated contemporary Chinese cultural values, they were also strongly influenced by the Vinayapiṭaka and other Vinaya literature (Yifa, 2005, 134). It is also not uncommon for these types of works to cite the Vinayapiṭaka in order to lend authority to their rules or to incorporate well-known Vinayapiṭaka strands into the text.

This is not to say that these monastic rulebooks were never in contradiction with rules found in the Vinayapiṭaka. As mentioned above, the contents of the katikāvata sometimes did deviate from the canonical law and even directly contradicted it (Bechert, 1970, 765). It is, however, rare for this type of literature to display an awareness of the possibility of a contradiction between Vinayapiṭaka and monastic rules. The author of the Chanyuan qinggui, Canglu Zongze (長蘆宗賾; d. 1107?), appears to have been aware that he was writing a set of rules different from or competing with the Vinayapiṭaka. He solved this by pointing to precedence and by claiming that the rules that he promulgated were aimed at furthering the good of the monastic community (Foulk, 2004, 285). Another notable exception is a monastic code for Drepung ('Bras spungs) Monastery from 1682, in which the fifth Dalai Lama Ngawang Lobzang Gyatso (Ngag dbang blo bzang rgya mtsho; 1617–1682) wrote the following:

> Because going on an alms-round in Tibet proper, during for example the autumn, is in accordance with the intent of the Vinaya, it does not need to be stopped. Except for people who collect offerings for the general good (spyi don) in China, Mongolia, and Khams, etc. one is not to go to ask for donations, on one's own accord, without it being an exception [on behalf of] the officials and the general good. (Ngag dbang blo bzang rgya mtsho, 1682, 313; Jansen, 2013, 130)

To what extent did monastic regulations silently "overrule" Vinayapiṭaka rules, rather than merely existing alongside them? Further, if this overruling were a regular occurrence, then which set of rules would hold final authority? Even though it is impossible to determine the way in which all Buddhist monasteries in all traditions amended the rules for purely practical reasons, it is important to keep in mind that the Buddhist monastery is an institution that was (and still is) ultimately pragmatic. The monastic guidelines are witness to this pragmatism. They show the efforts made by the authors to regulate the monastic community and to negotiate its position within society.

Concluding Remarks

The genre of monastic codes has three subgenres:

1. guidelines for multiple monasteries written by someone whose religious authority is acknowledged by those monasteries;
2. codes that are written for multiple or all monasteries of a particular region, encouraged or enforced by a political ruler; and
3. rulebooks for individual monasteries that contain references to specific situations and local practices.

Often it proves difficult or impossible to distinguish between the first two, an example being the Sikkim monastic guidelines, in which the author has religious as well as political authority (Jansen, 2014).

Throughout this article, the genre and usage of monastic guidelines have mostly been referred to in the past tense. This does not mean that monastic rulebooks have now become obsolete. As certain aspects of modernity occasionally clash with contemporary monastic life, there appears to be a need for additional rules. Rules for monastics in the tradition of Thich Nhat Hanh, a Vietnamese Zen master, have also been updated to conform to modern life (Nhat Hanh, 1997). Tibetan monasteries, both in Tibet and in exile, have experienced a dramatic shift in their economic and political position within society. As the monasteries have been reestablishing themselves in recent decades, the many new guidelines that are being compiled today are witness to the recalibrations of and negotiations that are – sometimes spatially and sometimes politically – far removed from the times before the 1950s. Monastic guidelines are thus compiled whenever and wherever the monastic community is seen to be in need of change. One can then say that these codes have been, are, and will be important indicators of the dynamic nature of Buddhist monasticism.

Bibliography

Augustine, J., Buddhist Hagiographies in Early Japan: Images of Compassion in the Gyōki Tradition, London, 2005.

Bechert, H., "Theravāda Buddhist Sangha: Some General Observations on Historical and Political Factors in Its Development," JAS 29/4, 1970, 761–778.

Blackburn, A., "Looking for the Vinaya: Monastic Discipline in the Practical Canons of the Theravada," JIABS 22/2, 1999, 281–309.

Bod rang skyong ljongs yig tshags khang, Bod sa gnas kyi lo rgyus dpe tshags bca' yig phyogs bsgrigs, Lhasa, 2001.

Buswell, R.E., "Admonitions to Neophytes," in: R.E. Buswell, ed. and trans., Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol. II: Chinul: Selected Works, Seoul, 2012, 195–205.

Buswell, R.E., The Zen Monastic Experience: Buddhist Practice in Contemporary Korea, Princeton, 1992.

Cabezón, J.I., "Monks," 2004, www.thlib.org.

Cabezón, J.I., "The Regulations of a Monastery," in: D.S. Lopez, ed., Religions of Tibet in Practice, Princeton, 1997, 335–351.

Collcutt, M. "The Early Ch'an Monastic Rule: Ch'ing Kuei and the Shaping of Ch'an Community Life," in: W. Lai & L.R. Lancaster, eds., Early Chan in China and Tibet, Berkeley, 1983, 165–184.

Collcutt, M., Five Mountains: The Rinzai Zen Monastic Institution in Medieval Japan, Cambridge MA, 1981.

Dreyfus, G., The Sound of Two Hands Clapping: The Education of a Tibetan Buddhist Monk, Berkeley, 2003.

Ellingson, T., "Tibetan Monastic Constitutions: The bCa' yig," in: L. Epstein & R.F. Sherburne, eds., Reflections on Tibetan Culture: Essays in Memory of Turrell V. Wylie, Lewiston, 1989, 205–229.

Foulk, T.G., "'Rules of Purity' in Japanese Zen," in: S. Heine & D.S. Wright, eds., Zen Classics: Formative Texts in the History of Zen Buddhism, Oxford, 2006, 137–169.

Foulk, T.G., " Chanyuan Qinggui and Other 'Rules of Purity' in Chinese Buddhism," in: S. Heine & D.S. Wright, eds., The Zen Canon: Understanding the Classic Texts, Oxford, 2004, 275–312.

Gunawardana, R.A.L.H., Robe and Plough: Monastic and Economic Interest in Early Medieval Sri Lanka, Tuscon, 1979.

Heirman, A., " Vinaya: From India to China," in: A. Heirman & S. Bumbacher, eds., The Spread of Buddhism, 2007, 167–202.

Hinüber, O. von, A Handbook of Pāli Literature, Berlin, 1996.

Huber, T., "Territorial Control by 'Sealing': A Religio-Political Practice in Tibet," ZS 33, 2004, 127–152.

Jansen, B., "The Monastery Rules: Monastic Organization in Pre-modern Tibet," diss., Leiden University, 2015.

Jansen, B., "The Monastic Guidelines (bCa' yig) by Sidkeong Tulku: Monasteries, Sex and Reform in Sikkim," JRAS, 2014, 597–622.

Jansen, B., "How to Tame a Wild Monastic Elephant: Drepung Monastery according to the Great Fifth," in: C. Ramble, P. Schwieger & A. Travers, eds., Tibetans Who Escaped the Historian's Net: Studies in the Social History of Tibetan Societies, Kathmandu, 2013, 111–139.

Kieffer-Pülz, P., & A. Peters, "Die Pātimokkhapadattha-anuvaṇṇanā des Vicittālaṅkāra aus Ca-laṅḥ," in: M. Straube, R. Steiner, J. Soni et al., eds., Pāsādikadānam. Festschrift für Bhikkhu Pāsādika, Marburg, 2009, 275–292.

Kitsudō Masahiro (橘堂正弘), "Daṁbadeṇi Katikāvata no biku no kyōiku" [Daṁbadeṇi Katikāvata の比丘の教育], in: Sasaki Kyōgo (佐々木教悟), ed., Kairitsu Shisō no Kenkyū (戒律思想の研究), Kyoto, 1981, 309–325.

Leighton, D., & S. Okumura, Dōgen's Pure Standards for the Zen Community: A Translation of the Eihei Shingi, Albany, 1996.

Link, A., "Biography of Shih Tao-an," TP 46, 1958, 1–48.

Ngag dbang blo bzang rgya mtsho, "Chos sde chen po dpal ldan 'bras dkar spungs pa'i dgon gyi bca' yig tshul 'chal sa srung 'dul ba'i lcags kyo kun gsal me long," in: Tshe ring dpal 'byor et al., eds., Bod kyi snga rabs khrims srol yig cha bdams bsgrigs (1682), Lhasa, 1989, 275–323.

Piggott, J., "Todaiji and the Nara Imperium," diss., Stanford University, 1987.

Poceski, M., "Xuefeng's Code and the Chan School's Participation in the Development of Monastic Regulations," AM 16/2, 2003, 33–56.

Rammandala (Rammaṇḍala), M., "Daṃbadeṇi Katikāvata hā Sāsana Tatvaya," Sāhityaya, 1880, 90–96.

Ratnapala, N., The Katikavatas: Laws of the Buddhist Order of Ceylon from the 12th Century to the 18th Century, Munich, 1971.

Schopen, G., "Counting the Buddha and the Local Spirits in: A Monastic Ritual of Inclusion for the Rain Retreat," JIP 30/4, 2002, 359–388.

Schuh, D., & L.S. Dagyab, Urkunden, Erlasse und Sendschreiben aus dem Besitz Sikkimesischer Adelshäuser und des Klosters Phodang, Sankt Augustin, 1978.

Seneviratna, A., "The Buddhist Monastic Law in Ancient Sri Lanka," The Jurist 60, 2000, 162–203.

Silk, J.A., Managing Monks: Administrators and Administrative Roles in Indian Buddhist Monasticism, New York, 2008.

Thich Nhat Hanh, Stepping into Freedom: An Introduction to Buddhist Monastic Training, Berkeley, 1997.

Thub bstan rgya mtsho, "Bca' yig skor (chi)," in: Thub bstan rgya mtsho, Gsung 'bum/_thub bstan rgya mtsho, vol. IV, New Delhi, 1981–1982, 9–276.

Vermeersch, S., The Power of the Buddhas: The Politics of Buddhism during the Koryŏ Dynasty (918–1392), Cambridge MA, 2008.

Vidvatanange (Vidvatāṇangē), D.
Nam Vū Saṅgha Sammata vyava

Welch, H., The Practice of Chinese B
bridge MA, 1967.

Wickremasinghe, D.M., ed., Epigrap and Other Inscriptions of Ceylon,

Wickremasinghe, D.M., ed., Epig
Lithic and Other Inscriptions of C

Wijetunga, W.M.K., "Sārōvāda Dīp 19th Century," JASL 3/1, 1970, 1–1

Yifa, "From the Chinese Vinaya to nuity and Adaptation," in: W. E Visions of Buddhist Vinaya, Hon

Yifa, The Origins of Buddhist Mon
Annotated Translation and Stud Honolulu, 2002.

: From India to China," in: A. Heirman &
, The Spread of Buddhism, 2007, 167–202.
andbook of Pāli Literature, Berlin, 1996.
Control by 'Sealing': A Religio-Political ZS 33, 2004, 127–152. astery Rules: Monastic Organization in ' diss., Leiden University, 2015.
astic Guidelines (bCa' yig) by Sidkeong s, Sex and Reform in Sikkim," JRAS, me a Wild Monastic Elephant: Drepung ng to the Great Fifth," in: C. Ramble, . Travers, eds., Tibetans Who Escaped Studies in the Social History of Tibetan du, 2013, 111–139.

A. Peters, "Die Pātimokkhapadattha-Vicittālaṅkāra aus Ca-laṅḥ," in: ner, J. Soni et al., eds., Pāsādikadānaṃ.
chu Pāsādika, Marburg, 2009, 275–292.
堂正弘), "Daṁbadeṇi Katikāvata no aṁbadeṇi Katikāvata の比丘の教育], (佐々木教悟), ed., Kairitsu Shisō no の研究), Kyoto, 1981, 309–325. umura, Dōgen's Pure Standards for the Translation of the Eihei Shingi, Albany,

f Shih Tao-an," TP 46, 1958, 1–48. g rgya mtsho, "Chos sde chen po dpal ngs pa'i dgon gyi bca' yig tshul 'chal sa s kyo kun gsal me long," in: Tshe ring
., Bod kyi snga rabs khrims srol yig cha ), Lhasa, 1989, 275–323. d the Nara Imperium," diss., Stanford s Code and the Chan School's Partici-opment of Monastic Regulations," AM ṇḍala), M., "Daṃbadeṇi Katikāvata hā hityaya, 1880, 90–96. ikavatas: Laws of the Buddhist Order of Century to the 18th Century, Munich, g the Buddha and the Local Spirits in:

of Inclusion for the Rain Retreat," JIP ab, Urkunden, Erlasse und Sendschrei-: Sikkimesischer Adelshäuser und des ankt Augustin, 1978.

Buddhist Monastic Law in Ancient Sri
, 2000, 162–203.
nks: Administrators and Administrative hist Monasticism, New York, 2008. pping into Freedom: An Introduction to Training, Berkeley, 1997.
o, "Bca' yig skor (chi)," in: Thub bstan 'bum/_thub bstan rgya mtsho, vol. IV, 2, 9–276.
wer of the Buddhas: The Politics of Bud-Koryŏ Dynasty (918–1392), Cambridge

Vidvatanange (Vidvatāṇangē), D.B.J., Katikāvat Sangarā: Nam Vū Saṅgha Sammata vyavasthā, Colombo, 1971.

Welch, H., The Practice of Chinese Buddhism: 1900–1950, Cambridge MA, 1967.

Wickremasinghe, D.M., ed., Epigraphia Zeylanica: Being Lithic and Other Inscriptions of Ceylon, vol. II, London, 1928.

Wickremasinghe, D.M., ed., Epigraphia Zeylanica: Being Lithic and Other Inscriptions of Ceylon, vol. I, London, 1912.

Wijetunga, W.M.K., "Sārōvāda Dīpaniya: A Katikāvata of the 19th Century," JASL 3/1, 1970, 1–14.

Yifa, "From the Chinese Vinaya to Chan Regulations: Continuity and Adaptation," in: W. Bodiford, ed., Going Forth: Visions of Buddhist Vinaya, Honolulu, 2005, 124–136.

Yifa, The Origins of Buddhist Monastic Codes in China: An Annotated Translation and Study of the Chanyuan Qinggui, Honolulu, 2002.

Zhang Brtson 'grus Grags pa, Dpal ldan tshal pa bka' brgyud kyi bstan pa'i mnga' bdag zhang g.yu brag pa brtson 'grus grags pa'i gsung 'bum rin po che, Kathmandu, 2004.

Zhanru (湛如), Chanyuan qinggui yanjiu (禪苑清規研究), Beijing, 2014.

Zürcher, E., The Buddhist Conquest of China: The Spread and Adaptation of Buddhism in Early Medieval China, Leiden, 1959.

Berthe Jansen

Sūtra Commentaries in Chinese until the Tang Period

The fervent composition of commentaries on Buddhist *sūtra*s could well be said to be one of the characteristic features of East Asian Buddhism. Translation of Buddhist scriptures into Chinese began around the second half of the 2nd century CE. When the Chinese began to study Buddhist teachings in their own language, they responded to buddhavacana (words of the Buddha) with various forms of exegetical activity: the earliest surviving commentaries from China date most likely to, or shortly after, the time of An Shigao (安世高; fl. c. 148–180 CE). By that time, China had a long-standing tradition of composing commentaries on its own literary and philosophical texts, a tradition that scholars speculate may have provided a stimulus to early Chinese Buddhist exegetes (see Mou, 1960). Among the Buddhist writings as a whole, the Chinese considered *sūtra*s, as opposed, for instance, to śāstra literature, as the most legitimate basis for investigating the Buddha's teachings, and it was the sūtras that received most of the commentarial attention. Generally speaking, when Chinese Buddhists sought to express their own position on a given doctrinal problem, they did not necessarily author independent tracts. Instead, they frequently resorted to the medium of sūtra commentary. At the same time, we must not overlook the fact that such collections as the Hongming ji (弘明集; Collection for the Propagation and Clarification [of Buddhism]; T. 2102) and Guang hongming ji (廣弘明集; Expanded Collection for the Propagation and Clarification [of Buddhism]; T. 2103) preserve quite a few independent tracts, and according to the catalogue section of the Chu sanzang ji ji (出三藏記集; Compilation of Notices on the Production of the Tripiṭaka; T. 2145), many more treatises were compiled by the early 6th century that no longer survive.

The first section of this entry focuses on Chinese sūtra commentaries in the earliest period, from their emergence in the second half of the 2nd century to roughly the beginning of the 5th century. The next section traces the emergence of new forms and strategies of commentary from the 5th to the early 7th century: since these strategies functioned as models for commentaries of later periods up until today, this section is the most detailed and extensive one. Finally, in the third section, the entry offers a cursory overview of commentarial developments in later periods of Chinese Buddhist history (from the Tang onward) as well as of the commentarial traditions of Korea and Japan.

The Earliest Period: Commentaries from the 2nd to the 5th Century

It has long been accepted that the earliest type of sūtra commentary in China was the "interlinear" type (zhu [注/註]), the oldest surviving examples of which date to the 3rd and 4th centuries. The second main type, the "exposition of the meaning" or "expository" (yishu [義疏]) style, emerged during the the Northern and Southern Dynasties, roughly from the 5th century onward (with ZZ 577 [Miaofa lianhua jing shu; 妙法蓮華經疏; Expository Commentary on the Lotus Sūtra] by Daosheng [道生], the important early 5th-cent. theorist and exegete, as a representative early example; see below). In an attempt to delineate the differences between these two types, Kogachi Ryūichi (2001) used commentaries to Confucian texts as his reference point. He defined the interlinear commentary as a form that reproduces entire passages from the original scripture; explanations are then appended to the quoted passages in such a way that the basic sūtra text is accorded priority, and the interlinear commentary itself does not stand independent of the subject scripture. By contrast, the expository style does not reproduce the entire text of the sūtra but includes only selected passages (duly abridged and edited by the author) to which comments are then added, resulting in a composition that must be regarded as the work of the compiler himself.

The transition from the interlinear to the expository format in Chinese Buddhist history may to some extent reflect the influence of a parallel move from the interlinear to the expository style in the exegetical literatures on the Confucian classics.

Other factors behind the transition may have been strictly pragmatic. As indicated above, the interlinear style of commentary entailed reproduction of original sūtra passages in their entirety, followed by

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

---

suitable segmenting and ex diately beneath the respect rying out these operation great length would have investment of resources. In later commentaries of the many examples in which become shorter as one proc the target text. When we f translations continued to this period, each presenti mentators, we may surmis interlinear to the expositor a practical convenience, or

In addition to such prag from interlinear to exposit its philosophic backdrop. mentaries were usually superficial matters, such a vidual terms or problems o mentaries tended to take u of the text as a whole, as we Wang Bi's (王弼; 226–249 C ment of the Chinese class respectively. Both Wang Bi a the theoretical exegetical p meaning and forgetting th [得意忘言]), which encour dinal purport of the text ov matters.

Early catalogues inform interlinear commentaries t instance, according to the C (支謙; late 2nd-mid–3rd ce linear commentary to the translation Liaoben shen
T. 708; T. 2145 [LV] 45b20– preserved. Likewise, the m 僧會; ?–280 CE) of Sogdian linear commentaries on the T. 532; also known as Sih Daoshu jing [道樹經]) and 經; T. 322; T. 2145 [LV] 97a1 tary has not been preserved a few brief lines remain in th Fayuan zhulin (法苑珠林) b Daoshi (道世; T. 2122 [LIII]

Three interlinear comm period are still extant in One is the two-fascicle an to the Yinchiru jing (陰持 Shigao's translation of a

the Tang Period

e third section, the entry offers a of commentarial developments in inese Buddhist history (from the vell as of the commentarial tradil Japan.

Period: Commentaries to the 5th Century

accepted that the earliest type of y in China was the "interlinear" ]), the oldest surviving examples he 3rd and 4th centuries. The sec-e "exposition of the meaning" or u [義疏]) style, emerged during and Southern Dynasties, roughly ury onward (with ZZ 577 [Miaofa 妙法蓮華經疏; Expository Comotus Sūtra] by Daosheng [道生], rly 5th-cent. theorist and exegete, e early example; see below). In an ate the differences between these hi Ryūichi (2001) used commenn texts as his reference point. He linear commentary as a form that passages from the original scrips are then appended to the quoted a way that the basic sūtra text is
, and the interlinear commentary tand independent of the subject trast, the expository style does not tire text of the sūtra but includes ssages (duly abridged and edited which comments are then added, position that must be regarded as ompiler himself.

from the interlinear to the exposi-inese Buddhist history may to some influence of a parallel move from the expository style in the exegetithe Confucian classics.

ehind the transition may have been
c. As indicated above, the interlinmentary entailed reproduction of ssages in their entirety, followed by suitable segmenting and explanations placed immediately beneath the respective sections. Clearly, carrying out these operations on a text of unusually great length would have required a considerable investment of resources. Indeed, even in the case of later commentaries of the expository style, we find many examples in which the explanations tend to become shorter as one proceeds to the latter parts of the target text. When we further consider that new translations continued to be produced throughout this period, each presenting a new task for commentators, we may surmise that the move from the interlinear to the expository form presented itself as a practical convenience, or even a necessity.

---

In addition to such pragmatic concerns, the shift from interlinear to expository may be seen against its philosophic backdrop. Whereas interlinear commentaries were usually restricted to relatively superficial matters, such as the meanings of individual terms or problems of syntax, expository commentaries tended to take up the underlying themes of the text as a whole, as we can see, for instance, in Wang Bi's (王弼; 226–249 CE) and Daosheng's treatment of the Chinese classics and Buddhist sūtras respectively. Both Wang Bi and Daosheng prioritized the theoretical exegetical principle of "grasping the meaning and forgetting the words" (deyi wangyan [得意忘言]), which encouraged privileging the cardinal purport of the text over more specific textual matters.

Early catalogues inform us of numerous early interlinear commentaries that no longer survive. For instance, according to the Chu sanzang jiji, Zhi Qian (支謙; late 2nd-mid-3rd cent.) composed an interlinear commentary to the anonymous Han-period translation Liaoben shengsi jing (了本生死經; T. 708; T. 2145 [LV] 45b20–22), which has not been preserved. Likewise, the monk Kang Senghui (康僧會; ?-280 CE) of Sogdian descent authored interlinear commentaries on the Sihemo jing (私呵末經; T. 532; also known as Sihemei jing [私呵昧] and Daoshu jing [道樹經]) and on the Fajing jing (法鏡經; T. 322; T. 2145 [LV] 97a15): the former commentary has not been preserved, while of the latter only a few brief lines remain in the 7th-century anthology Fayuan zhulin (法苑珠林) by the Chang'an scholar Daoshi (道世; T. 2122 [LIII] 1000a1–2).

Three interlinear commentaries from the early period are still extant in their complete form. One is the two-fascicle anonymous commentary to the Yinchiru jing (陰持入經; T. 603), being An Shigao's translation of a text corresponding to chapter 6 of the Pali treatise known as Peṭakopadesa (Zacchetti, 2002). The commentary is published under the title Yinchiru jing zhu (陰持入經注; T. 1694). In it we find some 15 citations credited to a "master" ("the master says"; shi yun [師云]) who has been variously identified as An Shigao, Kang Senghui, or even Zhi Qian (for a detailed discussion of this vexed problem, see Zacchetti, 2010, 154–156). In addition, we find in the Yinchiru jing zhu three instances of the phrase "one interpretation states" (yi shuo yun [一說云] or yi shuo yan [一說言]), which suggests that alternative interpretations were in circulation at the time of the text's composition. Citations from some 13 different sūtras appear in the commentary, as do three citations of gāthās ("a gāthā states"; ji yue [偈曰]): one from the Fajing jing, one from the Sihemei jing, and one from an as of yet unidentified source. We also find two citations simply from "a sūtra" ("a sūtra says"; jing yue [經曰]); here too the sources have not been determined. Finally, we see three citations introduced with the phrase "the Anban explanation states" (Anban jie yue [安般解曰]; for the Anban, see below). Evidence in the preface, also anonymous, as well as features of the text itself, suggests that this commentary was compiled during the 3rd century, in the Wu (吳) Kingdom Buddhist community revolving around the layman Chen Hui (陳慧) and Kang Senghui (Zacchetti, 2010; for a Japanese translation, see Ui, 1971); for an interpretation of its doctrinal orientation, see Lai, 1986).

Second is the interlinear commentary embedded in the text of the Da mingdu jing (大明度經; T. 225). The Da mingdu jing, a translation of the Aṣṭasāhasrikā Prajñāpāramitā, comprises a total of six fascicles; the authorship of the first fascicle is unknown, while the remaining five (chs. 2–30) are reliably attributed to Zhi Qian (Nattier, 2008). The commentary is supplied only for the first fascicle, coinciding with chapter 1, Xing pin (行品). We do not know the identity of the commentator, although in view of the similarities between this work and the Yinchiru jing zhu, it has been suggested that both emerged from the same milieu, that is, the Wu Kingdom "school" of Kang Senghui (Nattier, 2008, 305). The commentary contains some 20 quotations introduced by "the master says" (shi yun [師云]): here too, as in the Yinchiru jing zhu, the "master" is not identified. In addition, there appear citations from the Faju jing (法句經; T. 210) as well as from the anonymous Liaoben shengsi jing (了本生死經; T. 708), from the Dunzhenduoluo suowen rulai sanmei jing (伅真陀羅所問如來三昧經; T. 624), from the Huiyin sanmei jing (慧印三昧經; T. 632), and from a text referred to simply as Anban (安般, cf. T. 602; Zacchetti, 2008).

The third complete surviving interlinear commentary is the Ren ben yu sheng jing zhu (人本欲生經註; T. 1693) composed by the prominent early exegete, bibliographer, and organizer of the monastic saṅgha Dao'an (道安; 314–385 CE) on An Shigao's translation Ren ben yu sheng jing (人本欲生經; T. 14). This text also includes Dao'an's preface, the Ren ben yu sheng jing xu (人本欲生經序). The commentary cites three texts: Yin chi ru jing, Faju jing, and the Qichu sanguan jing (七處三觀經; T. 150A). In addition, we find in it text-critical remarks regarding the syntax or style of the translation, for example the expression "the sentence order is reversed" (judao [句倒]) appears six times (T. 1693 [XXXIII] 1b2; 1c19; 2b8; 3a29; 4a10–11; 5c5), statements that reflect a concern with orthography, for instance "[the character] xian should be jian" (xian dang wei jian [現當為見, T. 1693 [XXXIII] 1b2, 2b1), and comments that identify words that Dao'an saw as added or deleted in the process of transmission. Of particular interest are remarks comparing the Indian scriptural style with the Chinese: "Indian language is straightforward, having no qualms about elaborating in extensive detail" (T. 1693 [XXXIII] 4a23–24). This is the only surviving commentary by Dao'an, who is said to have written numerous other commentaries of the interlinear type, including on Daodi jing (道地經; T. 607; i.e. An Shigao's translation of Saṅgharakṣa's Yogācārabhūmi), Yinchiru jing, Shi'ermen jing (十二門經), and Anban shouyi jing (安般守意經, see T. 2145 [LV] 39b16–40a8).

The three interlinear commentaries introduced above had been viewed by modern scholars as the oldest extant exegetical works in the Chinese Buddhist tradition. However, recent scholarship has identified a number of other commentaries that may reflect an even earlier period of commentarial activity in China.

One of these is the Anban shouyi jing (安般守意經; T. 602) itself. This text had long been considered a composite work in which An Shigao's translation of an Indian text is mixed together indiscriminately with commentarial material produced in the 3rd-century "school" of Kang Senghui (see e.g. Zürcher, 2007, 53). Given that An Shigao's translations hold immense value for the study of the Buddhism and of the Chinese language of the Later Han period, much scholarship on the Anban shouyi jing had consisted in efforts to disentangle An Shigao's text from the later interpretive material.

This understanding of the Anban shouyi jing has recently been challenged in view of the 1999 manuscript discoveries in the Kongō-ji (金剛寺) temple in Japan. The manuscript includes, among others, a text under an identical title, Anban shouyi jing (ms. K-ABSYJ). Detailed comparison of this text with that of the Anban shouyi jing (T. 602) has led S. Zacchetti (2008) to conclude that the latter is not, as previously assumed, a Han translation with interwoven commentary but rather in its entirety a commentary on a separate text, that is, on a version of the Anban shouyi jing similar to that represented in the Kongō-ji manuscript. Moreover, in view of the stylistic features and exegetical technique in the Anban shouyi jing (T. 602), as well as of four commentarial glosses appended at the end of the Kongō-ji manuscript, S. Zacchetti argues that while the Anban shouyi jing commentary was written down in the 3rd-century "school" of Kang Senghui, it should be seen as reflecting an oral exegetical tradition going back, at least in part, to An Shigao himself.

The second component of the Kongō-ji manuscript consists of three closely related anonymous texts: the long-lost Foshuo shi'ermen jing (佛說十二門經), Foshuo jie shi'ermen jing (佛說解十二門經), and a commentary on the topic of the "12 gates" (shi'er men [十二門]) central to the preceding two works. In-depth analysis of this commentary, which bears no title, has led S. Zacchetti (2003) to posit that it is likely one of the earliest Chinese exegetical works and to tentatively point to An Shigao as the author.

The Kongō-ji discoveries have also allowed a reappraisal of a previously known but largely ignored text, the Ahan koujie shi'er yinyuan jing (阿含口解十二因緣經; T. 1508). This text too is in all likelihood, as suggested by the word koujie (口解; "oral explanation") in its title, not a sūtra translation but an exegetical composition produced in China, one that – like the Anban shouyi jing and the shi'er men commentary – seems to reflect an oral commentarial practice traceable to An Shigao (Zacchetti, 2004). The text shows stylistic similarities to the shi'er men commentary, although a more detailed comparison of these is necessary.

In conclusion, while it had previously been accepted that the earliest Chinese exegetic works are the interlinear commentaries from the 3rd century, only three of which survive in complete form, the texts just discussed may be tentatively said to represent an even earlier phase in the development of Chinese Buddhist exegesis. This phase appears to be represented by the Ahan koujie shi'er yinyuan jing, the shi'er men commentary, (T. 602), and some passages in (Zacchetti, 2003, 294, 294n184 were written down in or short Shigao (the Ahan koujie shi'er men commentary), others la (the Anban shouyi jing [T. 60 the Yin chi ru jing zhu), but a tally oral tradition dating bac community of his followers.

they do not target specific w interlinear commentaries d freer approach to the basic t rial. They also make frequen bered lists of technical terms oral explication. In addition concessions to native Chin aesthetic values: crude in for in content, they appear to be of Buddhist insiders, not at and making new converts.

Finally, a note is in or exegetical styles that seem currency especially in the 4 ries. First is the chao (抄; "ext digest is produced from a bas Zhi Dun (支遁) in the Da xia 小品對比要抄), by Dao'an in jing chao (摩訶鉢羅波羅蜜
(慧遠) in the Dazhidu lu Zürcher, 2007, 410n97). Seco of reading sūtras synopticall their different existing trans 99–100). This is exemplifie guang Guangzan luejie (合 Zhi Mindu's (支敏度; c. 300 ji (合首楞嚴經記) and He 詰經). Unfortunately, none but we do have the prefaces

Expository Commen
the 5th to the 7th Ce

Two Early Examples
In the early 5th century, so to show a tendency to analy sūtras into discrete sectio Jin'gang banruoboluomi jing 注; ZZ 454; Interlinear Com banruoboluomi jing), attrib 384–414 CE) but more likel nding of the Anban shouyi jing has allenged in view of the 1999 manus in the Kongō-ji (金剛寺) temple anuscript includes, among others, identical title, Anban shouyi jing Detailed comparison of this text Anban shouyi jing (T. 602) has led

3) to conclude that the latter is not, umed, a Han translation with interary but rather in its entirety a com-arate text, that is, on a version of the y similar to that represented in the ript. Moreover, in view of the stylis-xegetical technique in the Anban 2), as well as of four commentarial l at the end of the Kongō-ji manu-tti argues that while the Anban nentary was written down in the ool" of Kang Senghui, it should be an oral exegetical tradition going art, to An Shigao himself.

mponent of the Kongō-ji manu-three closely related anonymous st Foshuo shi'ermen jing (佛說十 jie shi'ermen jing (佛說解十二門 ntary on the topic of the "12 gates" 門]) central to the preceding two nalysis of this commentary, which s led S. Zacchetti (2003) to posit of the earliest Chinese exegetical atively point to An Shigao as the scoveries have also allowed a reapously known but largely ignored ujie shi'er yinyuan jing (阿含口解 08). This text too is in all likelid by the word koujie (口解; "oral s title, not a sūtra translation but position produced in China, one an shouyi jing and the shi'er men ms to reflect an oral commentar-le to An Shigao (Zacchetti, 2004). listic similarities to the shi'er men ough a more detailed comparison y.

while it had previously been earliest Chinese exegetic works commentaries from the 3rd cen-which survive in complete form, ussed may be tentatively said to earlier phase in the development st exegesis. This phase appears to he Ahan koujie shi'er yinyuan jing,

---

the shi'er men commentary, the Anban shouyi jing (T. 602), and some passages in the Yin chi ru jing zhu (Zacchetti, 2003, 294, 294n184). Some of these works were written down in or shortly after the time of An Shigao (the Ahan koujie shi'er yinyuan jing, the shi'er men commentary), others later, in the 3rd century (the Anban shouyi jing [T. 602]; relevant passages of the Yin chi ru jing zhu), but all reflect a fundamentally oral tradition dating back to An Shigao and the community of his followers. Being oral in nature, they do not target specific words or phrases as the interlinear commentaries do but instead offer a freer approach to the basic text and to cited material. They also make frequent use of mātṛkās, numbered lists of technical terms, as a prop or script for oral explication. In addition, they make few if any concessions to native Chinese philosophical and aesthetic values: crude in form and highly technical in content, they appear to be aimed at a small group of Buddhist insiders, not at spreading the religion and making new converts.

Finally, a note is in order about two quasi-exegetical styles that seem to have enjoyed some currency especially in the 4th and early 5th centuries. First is the chao (抄; "extract") format, wherein a digest is produced from a basic text. This was used by Zhi Dun (支遁) in the Da xiao pin duibi yao chao (大小品對比要抄), by Dao'an in the Moheboluoboluomi jing chao (摩訶鉢羅波羅蜜經抄), and by Huiyuan (慧遠) in the Dazhidu lun chao (大智論抄; see Zürcher, 2007, 410n97). Second is the he (合) strategy of reading sūtras synoptically, that is, by comparing their different existing translations (Zürcher, 2007, 99–100). This is exemplified by Dao'an's He Fangguang Guangzan luejie (合放光光讚略解), and by Zhi Mindu's (支敏度; c. 300 CE) He Shoulengyan jing ji (合首楞嚴經記) and He Weimojie jing ji (合維摩詰經). Unfortunately, none of these works survives, but we do have the prefaces to all of them.

Expository Commentaries from the 5th to the 7th Century

Two Early Examples

In the early 5th century, some commentaries began to show a tendency to analytically divide their basic sūtras into discrete sections. One such text is the Jin'gang banruoboluomi jing zhu (金剛般若波羅蜜經注; ZZ 454; Interlinear Commentary on the Jin'gang banruoboluomi jing), attributed to Sengzhao (僧肇; 384–414 CE) but more likely a work of the poet and statesman Xie Lingyun (謝靈運; 385–433 CE; see Ui, 1933; Ukai, 1992a; 1992b; Mayer, 1999). One distinctive feature of this text is its frequent use of the term "principle" (li [理]), a term that appears in Daosheng's commentaries as well. In terms of literary form, the text resembles Daosheng's writings. Further, we find in it various exegetical terms of art that often appear in later commentaries, such as "recounting firmly" (shu cheng [述成]), "concluding firmly" (jie cheng [結成]), or "establishing correspondence between doctrine and simile" (he pi [合譬]). The commentary begins with a section akin to a sūtra preface, although one not introduced as such, which includes an attempt to identify the "fundamental principle" of the text (i.e. the middle way or wisdom of emptiness), to explain its title, to parse the body of the sūtra into three sections (fenke [分科], i.e. emptiness of objects, emptiness of wisdom, and emptiness of the bodhisattva), and to position the sūtra within a four-stage history of the Prajñāpāramitā dispensation. All these features, while noteworthy here given the text's early date, are present in it in only a rudimentary form; they later became hallmarks of the expository style of commentary.

Another unique case, which we may call a hybrid, is the Zhu Weimojie jing (注維摩詰經; T. 1775; Interlinear Commentary to the Weimojie suoshuo jing [維摩詰所說經; T. 475]), traditionally considered a work of Sengzhao but compiled likely in the first half of the 6th century (Hanazuka, 1982; for studies of the Zhu Weimojie jing, see Usuda, 1977a; Kimura, 1987; for translations, see Carré, 2004; Institute for Comprehensive Studies of Buddhism of Taishō University, 2000). Like the main interlinear commentaries described previously, the Zhu Weimojie jing does not attempt to parse the text into three big sections. Instead, it reproduces the text of the Weimojie suoshuo jing in its entirety, incorporating into it the comments of Kumārajīva, Sengzhao, and Daosheng. Such reproduction of the complete text of the sūtra is representative of the interlinear format. In the case of the Weimojie suoshuo jing, the question has been asked whether its constituent commentaries, prior to their amalgamation into a single work, were interlinear or expository. We have good reason to believe that Sengzhao's commentary was interlinear, while Daosheng's was expository. A recent discovery of Sengzhao's commentary on the Weimojie suoshuo jing edited independently shows it to have been of the interlinear type before its incorporation into the Weimojie suoshuo jing (Usuda, 1977b; Kudara, 2002). As for Daosheng's contribution, Kudō Masaya (2000b) has surmised that, in contrast to Sengzhao's, it might have been an expository work. Daosheng's Miaofa lianhua jing shu, the only one among his writings to survive in extenso, is an expository text. Moreover, regarding Daosheng's commentary to the Mahāyāna Mahāparinirvāṇamahāsūtra (Daban niepan jing) included in the Daban niepan jing jijie (大般涅槃經集解; T. 1763), in view of the sheer size of the basic sūtra (the southern edition of the Daban niepan jing runs 36 fasc.) and of the fact that Daosheng's comments addressing specific passages are very few, we can infer that Daosheng's commentary on the Daban niepan jing also followed the expository format. All this leads us to surmise that Daosheng favored the expository style and that his commentary to the Weimojie suoshuo jing belonged to this genre.

Other early exegetes also commented on one version or other of the Weimojie jing. Sengrui's (僧叡; fl. early 5th cent.) Pimoluojiedi jing yishu xu (毘摩羅詰堤經義疏序; Preface to the Expository Commentary on the Pimoluojiedi jing), preserved in fascicle 8 of the Chu sanzang ji ji (T. 2145 [LV] 58c11–59a18), suggests that Sengrui authored an expository commentary on this scripture. Although no such work survives, some ten comments from Sengrui are cited in Daoye's (道液 or 道掖) 8th-century Jingming jing jijie guanzhong shu (淨名經集解關中疏; T. 2777), which modifies the Zhu Weimojie jing by abridging some comments by Kumārajīva and Sengzhao and adding some by Sengrui and Zhiyi (智顗; 538–597 CE). Similarly, Kumārajīva's disciple Daorong (道融; dates unknown) seems to have composed an expository commentary on the Weimojie suoshuo jing (see T. 2059 [L] 363c27–29). An anonymous interlinear commentary on the Weimojie jing has been preserved in a manuscript from Dunhuang (P 3006). Shi Guopu (1998) conjectures that this work should be attributed to Dao'an (for a critique of Shi's position, see Nattier, 2008, 140n78).

Prefaces (xu [序]), such as Sengzhao's preface to the Weimojie suoshuo jing attached to the Zhu Weimojie jing, discuss on the whole such matters as the central concept of sūtra, the sūtra's title, and the particulars of its translation. Later, roughly from the 6th century onward (as shown in Tao, 2007), these topical foci develop into the so-called "profound-meaning" (xuanyi [玄義]) or "profound-treatise" (xuanlun [玄論]) commentarial literature typical of figures such as Jizang (吉藏; 549–623 CE) and Zhiyi.

Daosheng's Miaofa lianhua jing shu: The Oldest Surviving Expository Commentary

Surviving commentaries by Daosheng include those to Kumārajīva's translation of the Lotus Sūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing [妙法蓮華經; T. 262; hereafter Fahua jing]), Kumārajīva's Vimalakīrtinirdeśa (Weimojie suoshuo jing [維摩詰所説經; T. 475]) and the Dabanniepan jing (大般涅槃經; T. 375, the southern version of Dharmakṣema's translation of the Mahāyāna Mahāparinirvāṇamahāsūtra). Of these, his commentaries to the Weimojie suoshuo jing and the Dabanniepan jing do not exist as independent works but have been amalgamated with commentaries by other authors. For example, in the collection of commentaries on the Dabanniepan jing, the Dabanniepan jing jijie (大般 涅槃經集解; T. 1763; see below), Daosheng's annotations are not mentioned at all for some 13 of the sūtra's 25 chapters. One possible reason for this is that, faced with the daunting task of combining meaningfully commentaries from as many as 18 authors, the compilers opted for an editorial policy that privileged the commentary of Sengliang (僧亮; fl. mid-6th cent.; for a partial translation of Sengliang's preface to the Dabanniepan jing jijie, see Lai, 1982, 104) and that did not accord Daosheng a central role.

As we noted above, Sengrui and Daorong are said to have composed expository commentaries to the Weimojie suoshuo jing, hence we cannot take Daosheng's Miaofa lianhua jing shu (妙法蓮花經疏; ZZ 577; for a study and translation of this commentary, see Kim, 1990) as the oldest representative of this genre; it is however the oldest extant complete work of this type. For this reason, and since this text exerted a major influence on sūtra commentaries of later periods, it deserves a closer look.

Daosheng's Miaofa lianhua jing shu does not include an independent preface, but prior to embarking on the passage-by-passage exegesis of the sūtra, it does offer a brief discussion of the circumstances of the commentary's production and the meaning of the sūtra's title, both features not unlike those found in a preface. This introductory section identifies the "thematic thrust" (zong [宗]; for a discussion of this key hermeneutic concept, see Tao, 2007, 56ff.) of the Fahua jing as the "great vehicle" (dasheng [大乘]) and classifies the doctrinal content of the sūtra according to the four "turnings" of the wheel of dharma (sizhong falun [四種法輪]; ZZ 577, 1b19): (1) dharma wheel of purity (shanjing falun [善淨 iaofa lianhua jing shu: rviving Expository mentaries by Daosheng include ajīva's translation of the Lotus Sūtra a jing [妙法蓮華經; T. 262; here-]), Kumārajīva's Vimalakīrtinirdeśa huo jing [維摩詰所說經; T. 475]) iepan jing (大般涅槃經; T. 375, the n of Dharmakṣema's translation a Mahāparinirvāṇamahāsūtra). Of entaries to the Weimojie suoshuo anniepan jing do not exist as indebut have been amalgamated with y other authors. For example, in the mmentaries on the Dabanniepan iepan jing jijie (大般 涅槃經集解; w), Daosheng's annotations are not for some 13 of the sūtra's 25 chap-e reason for this is that, faced with k of combining meaningfully com-as many as 18 authors, the compileditorial policy that privileged the Sengliang (僧亮; fl. mid-6th cent.; lation of Sengliang's preface to the jijie, see Lai, 1982, 104) and that did eng a central role.

above, Sengrui and Daorong are mposed expository commentaries uoshuo jing, hence we cannot take fa lianhua jing shu (妙法蓮花經疏; y and translation of this commen-
o) as the oldest representative of wever the oldest extant complete For this reason, and since this text nfluence on sūtra commentaries of eserves a closer look.

iaofa lianhua jing shu does not ndent preface, but prior to embark-e-by-passage exegesis of the sūtra, ef discussion of the circumstances ry's production and the meaning e, both features not unlike those
. This introductory section identi-thrust" (zong [宗]; for a discussion eutic concept, see Tao, 2007, 56ff.) as the "great vehicle" (dasheng ifies the doctrinal content of the the four "turnings" of the wheel g falun [四種法輪]; ZZ 577, 1b19): of purity (shanjing falun [善淨 法輪]), (2) dharma wheel of skill-in-means (fangbian falun [方便法輪]), (3) dharma wheel of the real (zhenshi falun [真實法輪]), and (4) dharma wheel without remainder (wuyu falun [無餘法輪]). When Daosheng wrote his text in the early 5th century, Chinese exegetes were showing increasing concern with determining the relationship among different sūtras by defining the unique "thematic thrust" of each – a practice akin to what would become "classification of doctrine" (panjiao [判教]; Ōchō, 1937). Here, however, we will focus on Daosheng's own exegetical method, as evidenced by the section of his commentary that provides passage-by-passage exegesis of the basic sūtra.

(1) Before Daosheng engages the content of each chapter, he discusses the placement and significance of the chapter within the sūtra as a whole and offers an explanation of the chapter title. This feature is encountered widely in sūtra commentaries of later periods, such as those by Jizang, where it is referred to as the "reason of [the sūtra's] origin" (laiyi [來意]).

(2) Daosheng broadly divides the text of the Fahua jing into three sections: (1) "assimilating the three causal paths to the one cause" (sanyin wei yiyin [三因為一因]; ZZ 577, 13b19), (2) "assimilating the three results [of the three paths] to the one result" (sanguo wei yiguo [三果為一果]; ZZ 577, 14a9), and (3) "assimilating the three persons [i.e. followers of the three paths] to the one person" (sanren wei yi ren [三人為一人]; ZZ 577, 16b18). This division differs from the threefold parsing of a given sūtra into the sections of "preface" (xu [序]), "main discourse" (zhengshuo [正說]), and "dissemination" (liutong [流通]) that becomes standard in later periods. However, Daosheng does use the terms "preface" and "dissemination" when discussing the placement of individual chapters within the work as a whole. He also uses the expression "exposition of principle" (lishuo [理說]; ZZ 577, 10c2 and elsewhere; referring to the sūtra's doctrine of one causal path and one result) in a way that resembles the idea of "main discourse."

So-called analytic parsing (fenke [分科] or kepan [科判]) entails more than just this sort of generic division of a sūtra's content. For instance, in Daosheng's commentary, we find complex, multilayered divisions imposed on the section extending from the Xu pin (序品) chapter through the Xinjie pin (信解品) chapter. Multiple layers of division can be seen especially in the prose and verse sections on the "burning house" (the famous Lotus Sūtra parable of the Buddha as the father who lures his children out of a burning house with promises of wonderful toy carts awaiting them outside) in the Piyu pin (譬喻品) chapter; indeed this section of the commentary is the analytically most developed. The complexity of Daosheng's analytic parsing notwithstanding, if we compare it to the exceedingly dense analytic division in the commentaries of later figures such as Fayun (法雲; 467–529 CE) and Jizang, it amounts to little more than a general sectioning. Nonetheless, without doubt Daosheng's "analytic parsing" stands in this regard as a forerunner to the commentaries of later periods.

(3) Daosheng reproduces only those sūtra passages for which he supplies explanations. In this respect, his technique differs from that of commentators such as Fayun. While Fayun provides direct commentary only on select sections of the sūtra, introducing them with such shorthand expressions as "from here on" (cixia [此下]) or "from [words such and such] on" (yixia [已下]), he ends up applying analytic parsing to the entirety of the sūtra's contents.

In instances in which the passage in question is comparatively short, Daosheng reproduces the entire text; where it is longer, he presents it in abridged form using such expressions as "[the passage] from A to B" (A zhi [至] B). This approach continues to be used in commentaries of later periods.

Moreover, even though Daosheng presents the sūtra text whenever he introduces an analytic division, he does not reproduce the broader context of the section under discussion. Hence his manner of presenting the sūtra text can be characterized as incomplete.

(4) Daosheng explains names of individuals transliterated into Chinese using such expressions as "in Song it is" (Song yun [宋云]) or "in Song we say" (Song yan [宋言]). "Song" refers to the Liu Song dynasty (劉宋; 420–479 CE), under which Daosheng wrote most of his work. This format occasionally turns up in the Zhu Weimojie jing as well.

(5) Daosheng never cites other texts in order to legitimate his own interpretations (Ōchō, 1952), and only in two places does he introduce alternative readings by using the expression "another interpretation states" (yi yi yun [一義云]). By contrast, reference to and critique of various external sources, a strategy designed to advance the orthodoxy of one's own position, are used frequently in later commentaries.

(6) In general, sūtras alternate expository prose and rhymed verse. Commenting on the Fahua jing, Daosheng posits four justifications for the presence of verse in it. The verses (1) are preached for audiences in a time after the promulgation of the prose passages, (2) are for persons who have not yet understood the prose, (3) are preached in order to elaborate on the contents of the prose, and (4) are a natural expression of the elation inspired by the sūtra.

Daosheng's comments to the verses are actually quite brief; their central concern is to establish strict correspondence between the verses and the prose as parsed in his own framework of analytic division. That correspondence is expressed by the formula "A sets B to verse" (A song [頌] B), in other words, verse passage A is a versified rehearsal of prose passage B. This technique continues to be used in later commentaries.

Daosheng's basic interpretive perspective is predicated on his belief in the profound conceptual significance of the concrete phenomenal content of the sūtra (e.g. the emitting of radiant light, the quaking of the earth, and the manifestation of the jeweled stūpa), as well as of the similes (Ōchō, 1975). Recovering that deep significance from the surface level of text is the main task of the commentator: the words of the sūtra are like a weir or trap used to catch a fish or hare, and as soon as the meaning has been grasped, the words can, and should, be discarded.

Finally, a comment is necessary on the rhetorical structures that Daosheng uses to establish internal coherence in his interpretation of the sūtra. The first such structure concerns the transcendent nature of the enlightened sage (shengren [聖人]), the Buddha. The Buddha undertakes manifold activities, such as the preaching of the divergent teachings of the three vehicles (vehicle of the *śrāvaka*s, vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, and vehicle of the bodhisattvas) or entry into nirvāṇa, merely to accord responsively with the individual circumstances of ordinary humans (fanfu [凡夫]); in his own being, the Buddha exists in a manner that transcends such ordinary activities. Second, Daosheng adopts the concept of "stimulus and response" (ganying [感應]) for the purpose of explaining such parables as that of the burning house or the prodigal son. In this model, the salvific impetus (ji [機]) represents the constructive aspect of the sentient being that moves (gan [感]) the buddhas and bodhisattvas to manifest a response (ying [應]) and subsequently receives the response. Both of these rhetorical structures exerted a major impact on later sūtra commentaries. We should finally note Daosheng's frequent use of the concept of principle (li [理]), a term that Daosheng employs most often in connection with the idea of the one vehicle. This concept is also in evidence in later sūtra commentaries.

The Dabanniepan jing jijie and Fayun's Fahua yiji

The Dabanniepan jing jijie (大般涅槃經集解; Assembled Explanations of the Niepan jing; T. 1763) and Fayun's Fahua yiji (法華義記; Notes on the Meaning of the Fahua jing; T. 1715) stand out not only among the few extant commentaries from the Liang period (梁; 502–557 CE) but also in the tradition of East Asian Buddhist commentary as a whole.

(1) The Dabanniepan jing jijie, in 71 fascicles, is a compendium of commentaries to the southern edition of the Mahāyāna Dabanniepan jing (T. 375) compiled from individual commentaries by some 18 monks ranging in time from Daosheng (late 4th–early 5th cents.), through the Liu Song, to the Southern Qi (南齊; 479–502 CE) and Liang periods. Problems of the text's compiler and of its transmission history are explored by Kanno Hiroshi (1986), who argues that, despite the common attribution to Baoliang (寶亮; 444–509 CE) of the Lingwei Monastery (靈味寺), the text was likely compiled by Falang (法朗; dates unknown) of the Jianyuan Monastery (建元寺). Falang is the same person as Huilang (慧朗), of whom we have a record in the Dabanniepan jing jijie.

The first fascicle of the Dabanniepan jing jijie comprises various prefaces to the sūtra, including the Dabanniepan jing yishu xu (大般涅槃經義疏序; Preface to the Expository Commentary on the Niepan jing) that Emperor Wu of the Liang composed (or had Fayun compose) for Baoliang, as well as prefaces by ten other dharma masters, including Daosheng, Sengliang, Sengzong (僧宗; 438–496 CE), and Baoliang himself. The prefaces are parsed by the Dabanniepan jing ji ji's compiler into eight topical categories:

1. explaining the title (shiming [釋名]);
2. determining the substance (of the sūtra; bianti [辨體]);
3. on original being (shu benyou [敘本有]);
4. on the transcendence of names (tan jueming [談絕名]);
5. explanation of the word "mahā" (in the title; shi da zi [釋大字]);
6. explication of the word "sūtra" (in the title; jie jing zi [解經字]);
7. revealing the doctrinal meaning (he jiaoyi [覈教意]); and en in connection with the idea of 'his concept is also in evidence in entaries.

an jing jijie and Fayun's jing jijie (大般涅槃經集解; Assems of the Niepan jing; T. 1763) and (法華義記; Notes on the Meaning T. 1715) stand out not only among nmentaries from the Liang period but also in the tradition of East mmentary as a whole.

pan jing jijie, in 71 fascicles, is a commentaries to the southern āyāna Dabanniepan jing (T. 375) dividual commentaries by some g in time from Daosheng (late s.), through the Liu Song, to the ; 479–502 CE) and Liang periods.
xt's compiler and of its transmisplored by Kanno Hiroshi (1986), espite the common attribution to 4–509 CE) of the Lingwei Monas-ext was likely compiled by Falang own) of the Jianyuan Monastery the same person as Huilang (慧 ave a record in the Dabanniepan le of the Dabanniepan jing jijie prefaces to the sūtra, including ing yishu xu (大般涅槃經義疏序; ository Commentary on the Nie- eror Wu of the Liang composed mpose) for Baoliang, as well as her dharma masters, including ng, Sengzong (僧宗; 438–496 CE), elf. The prefaces are parsed by the i ji's compiler into eight topical e title (shiming [釋名]); the substance (of the sūtra; bianti eing (shu benyou [敘本有]); endence of names (tan jueming of the word "mahā" (in the title; 字]);

f the word "sūtra" (in the title; jie
]);
doctrinal meaning (he jiaoyi
d

---

8. classifying the divisions (of the sūtra; pan keduan [判科段]).

To obtain this arrangement, the compiler identified statements in the prefaces that bore a common connection to each of these eight topics and placed these portions of the prefaces under their respective topical indices. In addition to the authors of the component prefaces, the first fascicle includes the names of eight other individuals of renown, notably Sengzhao and Fayun, as well as a number of comments attributed to them.

From the second fascicle on, the text launches into a passage-by-passage exegesis of the basic sūtra. It parses the 25 chapters in 36 fascicles of the Dabanniepan jing into a total of 2,864 passages, beneath each of which it groups the commentaries of the various masters. These include commentaries of nine out of the ten exegetes mentioned previously as authors of prefaces to the sūtra (Tanzhun's [曇准; 439–c. 515 CE] commentary actually does not appear at all), and of nine additional individuals, including Huilang and Zhizang (智藏; 458–522), making a total of 18 commentaries. Among these 18, Sengliang's commentary is cited 2,130 times, Sengzong's 1,145 times, and Baoliang's 1,081 times; by contrast, the commentaries of Huiling (慧令; dates unknown) and Zhizang are cited only once each. In addition to the 18 names cited above, the commentary of a certain Mingjun (明駿; dates unknown) is cited some 83 times, always as the last one in the sequence. This Mingjun might have been the editor or compiler of the Dabanniepan jing jijie or, perhaps more likely, a later commentator whose glosses were integrated into the original text after the compilation of the original work.

One of the outstanding features of the Dabanniepan jing jijie is the compiler's analytic division of the prefaces of the ten masters into eight topical categories, as described above. These eight topical categories show some commonalities with the topical rubrics seen in commentaries by later figures such as Zhiyi and Jizang. The Dabanniepan jing jijie then exhibits the earliest surviving example of this important interpretive strategy.

(2) The Fahua yiji basically consists of Fayun's lectures on the Fahua jing as recorded by one of his disciples. This disciple's identity remains unknown: all we can say is that he belonged to Fayun's scholastic lineage. He did not record Fayun's lectures word for word, but, in an apparent attempt to ensure for this work the status of the definitive commentarial text on the Fahua jing, he made a special point of introducing and critiquing alternative interpretations current by his day. In view of the compiler's considerable contributions to the content of the text, it is possible to identify traces of his own critical position.

At the very beginning of the Fahua yiji, we find a section that might properly be called a general preface. It contains remarks on the doctrinal classification of the sūtra, an explanation of its title, and a basic breakdown of its contents. These three elemental themes figure also in the opening sections of the commentaries by Jingying Huiyuan (淨影慧遠; 523–592 CE). However, Fayun's Fahua yiji follows much more closely the model pattern of a sūtra preface.

After this opening section, there follows the commentary proper, which engages the sūtra passage by passage, beginning with the opening line, "Thus have I heard," and ending with the bodhisattva Samantabhadra's exhortations at the end of the final chapter. The structure is identical to that found in Jingying Huiyuan's commentaries and in Jizang's Fahua tonglüe (法華統略; ZZ 582), although Fayun's Fahua yiji stands out for its extremely detailed, architectonic parsing of the entire text of the basic sūtra. Indeed it appears that this comprehensiveness was for Fayun a cardinal objective. The analytic parsing witnessed in the Fahua yiji exerted profound influence on the later Zhiyi's and Jizang's commentaries to the Fahua jing.

Commentaries of the "Three Great Dharma Masters of the Sui"

Chronologically, Jingying Huiyuan was the first among the "three great dharma masters of the Sui" (Suidai san dashi [隋代三大師]), a traditional category that included also Zhiyi and Jizang. Here we will first look at the opening sections of Huiyuan's commentaries and at aspects of his exegetical style evidenced in his Weimo jing yiji (維摩經義記; T. 1776). Later, moving on to Zhiyi and Jizang, we will confine ourselves to their composition of commentaries of the "profound meaning" (xuanyi [玄義]), "profound treatise" (xuanlun [玄論]), and "survey of the meaning" (youyi [遊意]) styles that do not involve passage-by-passage explanation of the sūtra text, and we will only touch on the more salient points of their unique interpretive approaches.

Extant sūtra commentaries attributed to Jingying Huiyuan include the Weimo jing yiji, Niepan jing yiji (涅槃經義記; T. 1764), Shengman jing yiji (勝鬘經義記; ZZ 351), Wenshi jing yiji (溫室經義記; T. 1793), Wuliangshou jing yishu (無量壽經義疏; T. 1745), and Guan wuliangshou jing yishu (觀無量 壽經義疏; T. 1749; the latter work, the oldest surviving commentary on the Guan wuliangshoufo jing [觀無量壽佛經; T. 365], was translated and studied in Tanaka, 1990; for an overview of the chronology of Huiyuan's works, see Okamoto, 2010). The opening sections of these commentaries, those that precede the passage-by-passage exegesis, all contain fairly similar content, namely:

1. classification of the sūtra in relation to the two scriptural "canons," that is, the śrāvaka canon and the bodhisattva canon;
2. explanation of the sūtra's title; and
3. general parsing of its contents into preface, main discourse, and dissemination.

The detail and depth of explanation vary among the commentaries. The Guan wuliangshou jing yishu divides the first section (the classification according to the two canons of the śrāvaka and bodhisattva) and the second section (explanation of the title) into "five essentials" (wuyao [五要]; see below), while the Wenshi jing yiji breaks them down into "six essentials" (liuyao [六要]), adding to the former list the category of "thematic thrust" (zong qu [宗趣]). While the explanations in the Wenshi jing yiji are overall quite brief, its rubric of "six essentials" merits a closer look.

The "first essential" section discusses the śrāvaka canon and the classificatory rubric of the twofold canon and points out that the sūtra at hand belongs to the bodhisattva canon.

The "second essential" focuses on the differences between "sudden" and "gradual" (dunjian [頓漸]) presentations of the teaching and states that the present text employs the gradual approach.

The "third essential" introduces the "threefold canon" (sanzang [三藏]) – the "tripiṭaka" of sūtra (jing [經]), vinaya (lü [律]), and śāstra (lun [論]) – and situates the present scripture in the sūtra canon.

The "fourth essential" deals with the thematic thrust (zongqu [宗趣]) of the sūtra, which it locates in the practice of charity as the main causal factor in the generation of merit.

The "fifth essential" explains the circumstances of and rationale behind the setting up of sūtra titles: the text at hand, we are told, derives its title both from the person who preached it (the Buddha) and from the dharma preached therein (the sūtra uses the metaphor of bathing to discuss the healing powers of the Buddha: it "speaks of bathing the monks"; shuo xiseng [說洗僧]).

The "sixth essential" addresses the differences among five sorts of persons who might preach the dharma (i.e. the Buddha, a saintly disciple, a deva, a divine immortal [shenxian (神仙)], and an apparitional person produced by magic) and asserts that this sūtra was indeed preached by the Buddha.

Next comes an analysis of the sūtra's title. In Huiyuan's other commentaries of the yiji type as listed above, this section on the title is longer than in the Wenshi jing yiji and includes discussion of some of the "six essentials." Finally, we find introduced the familiar threefold division of the sūtra's contents into preface, main discourse, and dissemination.

On the whole, Huiyuan adopts this threefold division in most of his commentaries. One important divergence from this pattern is seen in his Niepan jing yiji, in which he divides the basic text not into three but into five sections of "preface" (xufen [序分] "revealing the merits" (xiande fen [顯德分]), "merits acquired through cultivation" (xiuchengde fen [修成德分]), "refuting the heretical and conforming to the correct" (poxie tongzheng fen [破邪通正分]), and "demise of the Tathāgata and the rite of his cremation" (rulai miedu zhewei gongyang fen [如來滅度闍維供養分; according to Huiyuan, this final section of the Niepan jing was never transmitted to China). The threefold division reemerges in the Weimo jing yiji, a text that stands out for its extraordinarily complex analytic parsing.

One major feature found exclusively in Huiyuan's commentaries is a propensity for linguistic analysis (Kanno, 1984). For instance, first, Huiyuan points out differences between the word order or syntax in a given Chinese translation of a sūtra and the word order used in the general run of texts composed originally in Chinese. Second, he singles out particular words from the basic sūtra (notional words or functional particles) and submits them to analysis using a number of set patterns, for instance "A means B" (A wei [謂] B ye [也]), "A is analogous to B" (A you [猶] B ye [也]), "A has the meaning of B" (A shi [是] B yi [義]), "A functions as B" (A zhe [者] B ci [辭]; used chiefly in explanations of functional particles), and "A connotes or means AB" (A wei [謂] AB; used to set the target character within a more familiar two-character compound). Third, through attention to the specific grammatical context, Huiyuan explains why certain auxiliary particles appear and what function they perform in a given passage. This preoccupation with syntax, almost never seen in Zhiyi or Jizang, is particularly noteworthy.

While Zhiyi is credited with the authorship of numerous sūtra commentaries, most of them were in fact produced in later generations, while the Miaofa lianhuajing xuanyi (妙法蓮華經玄義

T. 1716; translated in large part 157–256), Miaofa lianhuajing 經文句; T. 1718), Weimojing xu 疏; T. 1777), and Weimojing wen ZZ 338) were compiled and edi ciple Guanding (灌頂; 561–632 argued that in his work as edito Zhiyi's commentaries, Guanding tage of the writings of Jizang ( in turn was the main systemat (三論) school. He approached th tures from the theoretical perspe of the unattainable" (wusuode ko anupalambhaśūnyatā*) and co taries on more than ten of them.

Zhiyi and Jizang developed sūtra commentaries. This form interlinear style and can be see the expository form. Zhiyi's xuanyi and Weimojing xuanshu Fahua xuanlun (法華玄論; T. 17 lun (淨名玄論; T. 1780), and Fah T. 1722), do not include passage-of their respective basic sūtras cally to bring out their "profound ing. In this respect, they can be of commentary that seeks to on the thematic contents of sū of earlier periods. For example huajing xuanyi, Zhiyi strives to exposition of the Fahua jing f
"five modes of profound meanin [五重玄義]) and indeed posits should be employed in comme ally. The "five modes" include th

1. explanation of title (shimi
2. definition of substance [辨體]);
3. explication of thematic [明宗]);
4. determination of functio
and
5. classification of doctrine

These "five modes" seem Jizang's Renwang banruo jing
T. 1707), with slight difference "substance" and "thematic trust

In Zhiyi's Miaofa lianhuajin nation of title" consists in an and extensive analysis of the lianhua jing. The "definition of the main ontological concern no less than the ultimate reali ddha, a saintly disciple, a deva, shenxian (神仙)], and an appa-uced by magic) and asserts that d preached by the Buddha.

alysis of the sūtra's title. In Hui-entaries of the yiji type as listed on the title is longer than in the includes discussion of some of Finally, we find introduced the ivision of the sūtra's contents iscourse, and dissemination.

iyuan adopts this threefold divi-commentaries. One important s pattern is seen in his Niepan divides the basic text not into ctions of "preface" (xufen [序分), " (xiande fen [顯德分]), "merits ltivation" (xiuchengde fen [修成 heretical and conforming to the zheng fen [破邪通正分]), and igata and the rite of his crema-ewei gongyang fen [如來滅度闍 to Huiyuan, this final section as never transmitted to China). on reemerges in the Weimo jing out for its extraordinarily com-
.

re found exclusively in Hui-s is a propensity for linguistic 4). For instance, first, Huiyuan ces between the word order Chinese translation of a sūtra used in the general run of texts in Chinese. Second, he singles from the basic sūtra (notional particles) and submits them to ber of set patterns, for instance 謂] B ye [也]), "A is analogous [也]), "A has the meaning of B" , "A functions as B" (A zhe [者] y in explanations of functional notes or means AB" (A wei [謂] arget character within a more er compound). Third, through ific grammatical context, Hui-rtain auxiliary particles appear ey perform in a given passage. with syntax, almost never seen particularly noteworthy.

redited with the authorship commentaries, most of them ed in later generations, while ing xuanyi (妙法蓮華經玄義;

T. 1716; translated in large part in Swanson, 1989, 157–256), Miaofa lianhuajing wenju (妙法蓮華經文句; T. 1718), Weimojing xuanshu (維摩經玄疏; T. 1777), and Weimojing wenshu (維摩經文疏; ZZ 338) were compiled and edited by Zhiyi's disciple Guanding (灌頂; 561–632 CE). It has been argued that in his work as editor-cum-compiler of Zhiyi's commentaries, Guanding often took advantage of the writings of Jizang (Hirai, 1985). Jizang in turn was the main systematizer of the Sanlun (三論) school. He approached the Mahāyāna scriptures from the theoretical perspective of "emptiness of the unattainable" (wusuode kong [無所得空]; Skt. anupalambhaśūnyatā*) and composed commentaries on more than ten of them.

Zhiyi and Jizang developed a novel format for sūtra commentaries. This format differs from the interlinear style and can be seen as a subgenre of the expository form. Zhiyi's Miaofa lianhuajing xuanyi and Weimojing xuanshu, as well as Jizang's Fahua xuanlun (法華玄論; T. 1720), Jingming xuanlun (淨名玄論; T. 1780), and Fahua youyi (法華遊意; T. 1722), do not include passage-by-passage exegesis of their respective basic sūtras but strive synthetically to bring out their "profound" (xuan [玄]) meaning. In this respect, they can be seen as a new mode of commentary that seeks to unpack and expand on the thematic contents of sūtra prefaces typical of earlier periods. For example, in his Miaofa lianhuajing xuanyi, Zhiyi strives to provide a synthetic exposition of the Fahua jing from the vantage of "five modes of profound meaning" (wuchong xuanyi [五重玄義]) and indeed posits that this approach should be employed in commentary writing generally. The "five modes" include the following:

1. explanation of title (shiming [釋名]);
2. definition of substance (of the sūtra; bianti [辨體]);
3. explication of thematic thrust (mingzong [明宗]);
4. determination of function (lunyong [論用]); and
5. classification of doctrine (panjiao [判教]).

These "five modes" seem to have influenced Jizang's Renwang banruo jing shu (仁王般若經疏; T. 1707), with slight differences in the sections on "substance" and "thematic trust."

In Zhiyi's Miaofa lianhuajing xuanyi, the "explanation of title" consists in an analytic breakdown and extensive analysis of the sūtra's title, Miaofa lianhua jing. The "definition of substance" specifies the main ontological concern of the Fahua jing as no less than the ultimate reality of all phenomena (for Zhiyi, ultimate reality is the substance of all Mahāyāna sūtras, not just of the Fahua jing). The "explication of thematic thrust" centers on problems of cause and effect in the context of the Buddha's self-cultivation or of the religious path more generally. The "determination of function" discusses the two wisdoms of provisional and ultimate reality or truth in their three aspects (of self-cultivation, training of others, and simultaneous self-practice and conversion of others) as the functional power of the Fahua jing's ability to sever doubts and arouse faith. The "classification of doctrine" attempts to place the Fahua jing in relation to the manifold teachings delivered over the entire span of the Buddha's preaching career.

In Zhiyi's Weimo jing xuanshu (維摩經玄疏; T. 1777), the structural organization of the commentary proceeds, in sequence, through the four siddhāntas (xitan [悉檀], i.e. Shijie xitan [世界悉檀; worldly siddhānta], Gege weiren xitan [各各爲人悉檀; siddhānta for individual needs], Duizhi xitan [對治悉檀; corrective siddhānta], and Diyiyi xitan [第一義悉檀; siddhānta of the supreme truth]), the three contemplations (of emptiness, of the provisional truth, and of the middle way), and the four types of teaching (the Tripiṭaka teaching [sanzang jiao (三藏教)], the shared teaching [tong jiao (通教)], the separate teaching [bie jiao (別教)], and the perfect teaching [yuan jiao (圓教)]).

A different pattern is seen in Jizang's Fahua youyi. Here Jizang structures his exegesis around the following "ten topics" (shimen [十門]):

1. the "reason of [the sūtra's] origin" (laiyi men [來意門]), which is a teleology of the existence of the sūtra as a whole and of its individual chapters;
2. the "thematic thrust" (zongzhi men [宗旨門]), which, as opposed to clarifying the concrete thought and pedagogy set forth in the Fahua jing, offers an examination of the conception of "cause and effect" (yinguo [因果]) or religious practice and its results, seen as implicit in the sūtra, hidden beneath the level of its literal meaning;
3. the "explanation of title" (shi mingti men [釋名題門]);
4. the "classification of doctrinal orientation" (bian jiaoyi men [辨教意門]), which, predictably, entails an attempt to establish the position of the Fahua jing within the entire spectrum of the Buddha's teachings;
5. the "exoteric and esoteric" (xianmi men [顯密門]), which subdivides the two chief pedagogical approaches of "Hīnayāna" (aimed at śrāvakas) and "Mahāyāna" (the purview of bodhisattvas) into exoteric and esoteric types, resulting in an organization of the entirety of the Buddha's teaching into a total of four categories: exoteric Hīnayāna and esoteric Hīnayāna and exoteric Mahāyāna and esoteric Mahāyāna;

6. the "three and the one" (sanyi men [三一門]), which centers on the relationship between the three vehicles and the one vehicle, a concept central to the Fangbian pin (方便品) chapter of the Fahua jing, as well as to much East Asian engagement with the Fahua jing in general;

7. the "efficacious function" (gongyong men [功用門]), which promotes the idea that the enormous salvific power of the Fahua jing arises from the text's possession of the ten "inconceivable" features (buke siyi [不可思議]) such as the "inconceivable" power of the sūtra to overcome the distinctions among the three vehicles or its presentation of an "inconceivable" number of the Buddha's emanations and an "inconceivable" size of his assembly;

8. the "dissemination of the sūtra" (hongjing men [弘經門]), which centers on the methods of preaching this scripture, as well as on the types of persons capable of taking up this task;

9. the "affiliations of the text" (budang men [部黨門]), which sorts out the relationship between different translations of the Fahua jing and the various texts in the extended Fahua jing cycle (Fahua bu [法華部]), and as such it represents a mode of historical research into the sūtra's translation and transmission.

10. the "beginnings" (yuanqimen [緣起門]) of exegesis on the Fahua jing, which it traces to Daorong, a member of Kumārajīva's translation team.

Another distinctive feature of Zhiyi's and Jizang's commentaries is their deployment of a novel strategy for the elucidation of specific passages by scrutinizing them from a number (usually four) of systematically predefined perspectives. For instance, in the Miaofa lianhuajing wenju, Zhiyi specifies the following perspectives:

1. origin (yinyuan [因緣]);
2. doctrinal orientation (yuejiao [約教]);
3. roots and traces (benji [本迹]); and
4. mind contemplation (guanxin [觀心]), where the passage in question is approached through the trademark Tiantai (天台) conceptual trio of provisional (jia [假]), empty (kong [空]), and middle (zhong [中]).

A slightly different, though also fourfold, set of perspectives is invoked by Jizang in his Sanlun xuanyi (三論玄義; T. 1852). Here the meaning is elucidated in the following ways:

1. by analysis of the constitutive names (yiming shiyi [依名釋義]);
2. by reference to "the teaching of principle," that is, the "middle" (lijiao shiyi [理教釋義]);
3. by demonstration of "mutual dependency (of dualistic opposites)" (huxiang shiyi [互相釋義]); and
4. without resorting to any particular method (wufang shiyi [無方釋義]).

Jizang repeats this scheme almost verbatim in his Erdiyi (二諦義; T. 1854). Although these strategies are not used with full consistency by either Zhiyi or Jizang, nevertheless they figure as prominent features of their commentaries.

While the preceding passages have centered on expository commentaries from the 5th to the 7th century, this period saw also the production of other forms of commentary. One noteworthy example is the Fahua jingwen waiyi (法華經文外義; one fasc.; available in a Dunhuang manuscript in the Shanghai Museum under the catalogue number 15 [3317]; published in Fang, 1996; it bears the date of Datong 11 [i.e. 545 CE]). An outstanding feature of this work is its question-and-answer format, rather informal, even rhapsodical in style, reminiscent of Huisi's (慧思; 515–577 CE) Fahua jing anlexing yi (法華經安樂行義; T. 1926) and of the section of Jizang's Fahua xuanlun that follows after the fourth fascicle.

While Zhiyi and Jizang specialized in expository works, they also wrote commentaries of the interlinear type. A case in point is Jizang's voluminous Fahua tonglüe (法華統略: ZZ 582). Here, prior to his passage-by-passage exegesis, Jizang includes an extensive introduction that largely reproduces the positions developed in his Sanlun xuanyi and Fahua xuanlun, while the commentary itself follows the format of the works of Jingying Huiyuan and of Fayun's Fahua yiji. A number of Zhiyi's commentaries show similar features.

Tang and Post-Tang Commentaries

Commentarial genres developed by the 7th century – mainly the interlinear format of the earlier period and the expository styles of the Liang and Sui – continued to function as models for commentary writers in the Tang period and beyond. In view of this, no special description is necessary of the formal aspects of sūtra commentaries produced in and after the Tang.

One important development in this period is the emergence of the subcommentary. As state patronage of Buddhist groups f onward encouraged the establ tionally discrete "schools" of monastic practice (zong [宗]) began to be written on the ex the earlier epochs now enshri for the respective schools. Fo (湛然; 711–782 CE), the sixth pa sect and its most important syst wrote, among other works key Fahua xuanyi shiqian (法華玄 Fahua wenju ji (法華文句記; T.

---

Zhiyi's Miaofa lianhuajing xu Miaofa lianhuajing wenju, res 1966; Penkower, 1993).

The most significant of th schools from the perspective duction were arguably the F based on the sūtra and śā Xuanzang (玄奘; 602–664 C (華嚴) school founded de fact patriarch, Fazang (法藏; 643– oversimplification, we can sa mentaries of the Faxiang and oped from general sūtra pre interlinear commentaries an similar to pre-Tang exegetic characteristic of Faxiang com regard exhibited in them for lations of both mainstream a particularly the Cheng weishi
One of Xuanzang's leading 632–682 CE), wrote, among on Xuanzang's Banruoboluo 羅蜜多心經; T. 251), the Xin
T. 1710; trans. Shi & Lusthau linear commentary, it reprod basic text – made easier by t yet for every section, it offer analysis reminiscent of expo

Fazang inherited and syst patrimony of the earlier Dus and Zhiyan (智儼; 602–668 distinctive characteristic of was its predominant focus o
The Huayan school's put Chengguan (澄觀; 738–839 others, the magisterial Hua T. 1735) in 60 fascicles and the same, the 90-fascicle H chao (華嚴經隨疏演義鈔; T

Throughout the Song
mentaries and subcomme

s of the constitutive names (yiming 釋義]);
ice to "the teaching of principle,"
"middle" (lijiao shiyi [理教釋義]); stration of "mutual dependency (of pposites)" (huxiang shiyi [互相釋 esorting to any particular method iyi [無方釋義]).

his scheme almost verbatim in his T. 1854). Although these strategies h full consistency by either Zhiyi or less they figure as prominent feammentaries.
eceding passages have centered on mentaries from the 5th to the 7th iod saw also the production of other ntary. One noteworthy example is en waiyi (法華經文外義; one fasc.; nhuang manuscript in the Shangler the catalogue number 15 [3317];
g, 1996; it bears the date of Datong n outstanding feature of this work d-answer format, rather informal, l in style, reminiscent of Huisi's ) Fahua jing anlexing yi (法華經安 and of the section of Jizang's Fahua ows after the fourth fascicle.
d Jizang specialized in expository wrote commentaries of the inter-se in point is Jizang's voluminous 去華統略: ZZ 582). Here, prior to assage exegesis, Jizang includes roduction that largely reproduces eloped in his Sanlun xuanyi and hile the commentary itself follows works of Jingying Huiyuan and of
i. A number of Zhiyi's commentareatures.

st-Tang Commentaries

enres developed by the 7th cene interlinear format of the earlier xpository styles of the Liang and o function as models for commen-Tang period and beyond. In view l description is necessary of the sūtra commentaries produced in g.
t development in this period is f the subcommentary. As state

---

patronage of Buddhist groups from the Sui period onward encouraged the establishment of institutionally discrete "schools" of interpretation and monastic practice (zong [宗]), subcommentaries began to be written on the exegetical works from the earlier epochs now enshrined as foundational for the respective schools. For example, Zhanran (湛然; 711–782 CE), the sixth patriarch of the Tiantai sect and its most important systematizer after Zhiyi, wrote, among other works key to this tradition, the Fahua xuanyi shiqian (法華玄義釋籤; T. 1717) and Fahua wenju ji (法華文句記; T. 1719) in response to Zhiyi's Miaofa lianhuajing xuanyi and Guanding's Miaofa lianhuajing wenju, respectively (see Hibi, 1966; Penkower, 1993).

The most significant of the new Tang dynasty schools from the perspective of commentary production were arguably the Faxiang (法相) school based on the sūtra and śāstra translations by Xuanzang (玄奘; 602–664 CE) and the Huayan (華嚴) school founded de facto by its putative third patriarch, Fazang (法藏; 643–712 CE). At the risk of oversimplification, we can say that the sūtra commentaries of the Faxiang and Huayan sects developed from general sūtra prefaces as well as from interlinear commentaries and as such are formally similar to pre-Tang exegetical works. One special characteristic of Faxiang commentaries is the high regard exhibited in them for Xuanzang's new translations of both mainstream and Mahāyāna treatises, particularly the Cheng weishi lun (成唯識論; T. 1585). One of Xuanzang's leading disciples, Kuiji (窺基; 632–682 CE), wrote, among others, a commentary on Xuanzang's Banruoboluomiduo xin jing (般若波羅蜜多心經; T. 251), the Xin jing youzan (心經幽贊; T. 1710; trans. Shi & Lusthaus, 2001). Like an interlinear commentary, it reproduces the entirety of the basic text – made easier by the brevity of the latter – yet for every section, it offers systematic structured analysis reminiscent of expository works.

Fazang inherited and systematized the exegetical patrimony of the earlier Dushun (杜順; 557–640 CE) and Zhiyan (智儼; 602–668 CE; see Gimello, 1976). A distinctive characteristic of this exegetical tradition was its predominant focus on the Buddhāvataṃsaka. The Huayan school's putative fourth patriarch, Chengguan (澄觀; 738–839 CE), wrote, among many others, the magisterial Huayan jing shu (華嚴經疏; T. 1735) in 60 fascicles and an autocommentary on the same, the 90-fascicle Huayan jing suishu yanyi chao (華嚴經隨疏演義鈔; T. 1736).

Throughout the Song period and later, commentaries and subcommentaries continued to be produced on a large scale to the sūtras at the center of individual schools, but simultaneously a number of nonaffiliated sūtras – those that never came to be enshrined as foundational by the disparate sects – were gaining popularity, such as Yuanjue jing (圓覺經; T. 842), Shoulengyan jing (首楞嚴經; T. 945), and Lengqie jing (楞伽經; T. 671, T. 672), as reflected in the voluminous production of commentaries on these texts.

The emergence of the Chan school's rhetoric of immediacy can be seen as a radical response to the basic challenge of Buddhist exegesis. That challenge had been to make the Buddha's awakening experience accessible again here and now, in an age – and, in the East Asian case, a land – far removed from that of the Buddha (for an exploration of related theoretical issues, see Lopez, 1998). Chan rhetoric turned against the established scholastic answer to this problem, which had privileged textual interpretation as the surest way of recovering definitive meaning (Skt. nītārtha; Chn. liaoyi [了義]). For Chan exponents, that meaning, being nothing other than the Buddha's awakening, must be available "without reliance on words and letters" (buli wenzi [不立文字]), in a "special transmission outside of the teachings" (jiaowai biechuan [教外別傳]). Armed with this premise, Chan masters replaced the sūtra commentary with histories of lineage transmission, recorded sayings of awakened masters, and the gong'an (公案) collections. While these novel genres could not have developed without the momentous shifts in the social, political, and cultural context in the Song period, including the rapid spread of printing technologies, we may see them as a response to the same hermeneutical concern that motivates the commentarial impulse.

The Late Imperial Period also saw the progressive weakening of traditional boundaries between lay and monastic Buddhist scholarship, with laypersons commonly composing commentaries on sūtras (e.g. the Confucian iconoclast Li Zhuowu's [李卓吾; 1527–1602] Huayan jing helun jianyao [華嚴經合論簡要; ZZ 225]) and Buddhist savants targeting non-Buddhist works. As an example of the latter, Ouyi Zhixu (蕅益智旭; 1599–1655) wrote a commentary on the Yijing (易經), the Zhouyi chanjie (周易禪解; see Lo, 2008), and on the four books of Confucianism, Sishu chanjie (四書禪解), while Hanshan Deqing (憨 山德清; 1546–1623) authored one on the Zhuangzi (莊子), the Zhuangzi neipian zhu (莊子內篇註; fragments translated in Ziporyn, 2009; see also Epstein, 2006; for a comprehensive list of Late Ming commentaries, see Shi Shengyan, 1992). These shifts necessarily impacted the forms and strategies of exegesis, shaping the trends that, despite the upheavals of modernity, continue until today.

Sūtra Commentaries in Korea

Korean Buddhism developed on foundations inherited from China, and in terms of form, Korean commentaries show no fundamental differences from their Chinese models. In the Silla period, Wŏnch'ŭk (圓測; 613–696 CE) traveled to China by sea, studied under Xuanzang as one of his two main disciples alongside Kuiji, and wrote commentaries on Yogācāra śāstras, as well as on sūtras. The latter group of works includes his Panya paramilda simgyŏng ch'an (般若波羅蜜多心經贊; T. 1711), being one of the earliest commentaries on the Banruoboluomiduo xin jing (般若波羅蜜多心經; T. 251; studies in Hwang, 2000; Choo, 2003; see also Lusthaus, 2003), Inwanggyŏng so (仁王經疏; T. 1708) in six fasc., and, most important, the ten-fasc. Haesimmilgyŏng so (解深密經疏; ZZ 369). The latter, an encyclopedic work of Buddhist doctrine, is of unique historical value in that it was translated into Tibetan and gained considerable status among Tibetan scholiasts. This translation, by Facheng (法成; Tib. Chos grub; ?–c. 865 CE), under the title 'Phags pa dgongs pa zab mo nges par 'grel pa'i mdo'i rgya cher 'grel pa (D 4016/P 5517), was studied extensively by S. Inaba (1944; 1972; 1977; for a partial translation, see Muller, 2012c). E. Steinkellner (1989) opines that this commentary may have been instrumental in inaugurating in Tibet the practice of beginning a commentary with a table of contents (sa bcad), which effects a type of doctrinal parsing of the contents.

Wŏnhyo (元暁; 617–686 CE) wrote numerous interlinear commentaries, but what stands out are his writings of the "doctrinal essentials" (chong'yo [宗要] type), the format of which resembles Jizangs's "survey-of-the-meaning" (youyi [遊義]) texts. Examples include Taehyedo kyŏng chong'yo (大慧度經宗要; T. 1697), a one-fascicle reading of Kumārajīva's translation of the Larger Prajñāpāramitā (T. 223), the Pŏphwa chong'yo (法華宗要; T. 1725; trans. Muller, 2012a), the Yŏlban chong'yo (涅槃宗要; T. 1769), and the Muryangsu kyŏng chong'yo (無量壽經宗要; T. 1747; trans. Muller, 2012b). Wŏnhyo's magisterial commentary on the Vajrasamādhisūtra (T. 273), the Kŭmgang sammaegyŏng non (金剛三昧經論; T. 1730), was translated and studied by R. Buswell (2007).

Ŭijŏk (義寂; late 7th–early 8th cents.), an expert in the Vijñaptimātra and Pure Land schools, wrote, among 25 commentaries on a wide variety of scriptures, the three-fascicle Muryangsukyŏng suŭiki (無量壽經述義記), partially preserved in the form of quotations in other texts. Ŭijŏk's exegetical approach, in contrast to that of Kuiji and Wŏnch'ŭk, rested on a belief in the compatibility of the various Mahāyāna philosophic orientations. Taehyŏn (大賢; dates unknown) from the mid-Silla period specialized in Vijñaptimātra. Among his more than 50 works, which include important studies of the Cheng weishi lun as well as commentaries on a variety of Mahāyāna texts, we find the Pŏmmanggyŏng kojŏkki (梵網經古迹記; T. 1815), which was later studied extensively in Japan. The term kojŏkki (古迹記; traces of the ancients recorded) figures in the titles of a number of his works.

In the Koryŏ period, Kyunyŏ (均如; 923–973 CE), a Hwaŏm (華嚴) scholar and gifted proselytizer (see Buzo & Prince, 1994), authored the Sŏk hwa-ŏm-gyo pun-gi wŏn-t'ong ch'o (釋華嚴教分記圓通鈔; K1510a) in ten fascicles, as well as other Hwaŏm-related texts. In the Chosŏn era, Chinul (知訥; 1158–1210) established the groundwork for the Chogye order (曹溪宗), and, influenced by the thought of the lay hermit and scholar Li Tongxuan (李通玄; 635–730 CE, alternatively 646–740 CE), produced the Hwaŏm non chŏryo (華嚴論節要; text lost soon after its composition; a recension was discovered in 1941 in Kanazawa Bunko in Yokohama, Japan; repr. in HPC 4.767c–869c) in three fascicles and other works, some of which have been translated by R. Buswell (1983).

Sūtra Commentaries in Japan

If it is true that it was Prince Shōtoku (Shōtoku Taishi [聖德太子]; 572–622 CE) who authored the Hokke gisho (法華義疏; T. 2187), the Yuimagyō gisho (維摩經義疏; T. 2186; trans. Hubbard, 2012), and the Shōmangyō gisho (勝鬘經義疏; T. 2185; trans. Dennis, 2011), as tradition has it, then these three commentaries would have to be considered the oldest surviving Japanese texts. However, the problem of their authenticity has of late attracted considerable debate. Some scholars accept these works' traditional attribution to Shōtoku, others see them as Chinese compositions, and that they are the product of a K recently a new theory has emerg the analysis of the grammar of th expressions in the texts, it has b they could not have been writte on the Korean Peninsula, or pos (Kanno, 1989; Ishii, 2008; 2010).

---

Like the Korean, the Japan too, show no essential divergen models. In Japan, moreover, sub frequently written to exegetic in China, and, in the context o increasingly assertive sects, nu ies were produced on the discre the center of the respective sch

For instance, Hōjibō Shōshin 1220 or 1131–1215) of the Tenda nous subcommentaries to Zhiyi xuanyi. In the Pure Land sch taries were composed on the jing. Also, on account of the im tantric mikkyō (密教) practi within the Japanese Shingon schools, in comparison with t ditions of China in Korea, Japa of relatively numerous works tures, mainly on the Dainichik

Bibliography

Buswell, R., Cultivating Original
Exposition of the Vajrasa Sammaegyŏng Non), Honolulu, Buswell, R., The Korean Approach t
of Chinul, Honolulu, 1983.
Buzo, A., & T. Prince, Kyunyŏ-jŏn: T
a Tenth-Century Korean Monk, Carré, P., Introduction aux pratiq mentaire du Soutra^ de la Libert Chi Limei (池麗梅), "Tonkō sha 煌写本『維摩詰経解』; Dun Weimojiejing-jie [維摩詰経解 Choo, B.H., "An Annotated Trans mentary on the Heart Sūtra:
tion of the Yogâcāra Interpre diss., Drew University, 2003.
Dennis, M.W., Prince Shotoku's C
Sūtra, BDK English Tripiṭaka, Epstein, S.R., "Boundaries of th (1546–1623) Buddhist Comm diss., Stanford University, 200 Fang Guangchang (方广锠), ed (藏外佛教文献; Extracanoni
Beijing, 1996.

), was translated and studied by R.

late 7th–early 8th cents.), an expert mātra and Pure Land schools, wrote, mentaries on a wide variety of scripe-fascicle Muryangsukyŏng sulŭiki 記), partially preserved in the form in other texts. Ŭijŏk's exegetical ntrast to that of Kuiji and Wŏnch'ŭk, ief in the compatibility of the vari-philosophic orientations. Taehyŏn known) from the mid-Silla period ijñaptimātra. Among his more than h include important studies of the as well as commentaries on a vari-a texts, we find the Pŏmmanggyŏng 古迹記; T. 1815), which was later vely in Japan. The term kojŏkki of the ancients recorded) figures in mber of his works.

period, Kyunyŏ (均如; 923–973 CE), scholar and gifted proselytizer (see 994), authored the Sŏk hwa-ŏm-gyo ch'o (釋華嚴教分記圓通鈔; K1510a) as well as other Hwaŏm-related osŏn era, Chinul (知訥; 1158–1210) groundwork for the Chogye order nfluenced by the thought of the scholar Li Tongxuan (李通玄; rnatively 646–740 CE), produced chŏryo (華嚴論節要; text lost soon tion; a recension was discovered awa Bunko in Yokohama, Japan; 67c–869c) in three fascicles and e of which have been translated by entaries in Japan

it was Prince Shōtoku (Shōtoku ; 572–622 CE) who authored the 義疏; T. 2187), the Yuimagyō gisho 86; trans. Hubbard, 2012), and the (勝鬘經義疏; T. 2185; trans. Den-ion has it, then these three comhave to be considered the oldest texts. However, the problem of has of late attracted considere scholars accept these works' tion to Shōtoku, others see them as Chinese compositions, and yet others argue that they are the product of a Korean monk. More recently a new theory has emerged: on the basis of the analysis of the grammar of the unique honorific expressions in the texts, it has been suggested that they could not have been written in China but only on the Korean Peninsula, or possibly even in Japan (Kanno, 1989; Ishii, 2008; 2010).

Like the Korean, the Japanese commentaries, too, show no essential divergence from the Chinese models. In Japan, moreover, subcommentaries were frequently written to exegetical works composed in China, and, in the context of rivalry among the increasingly assertive sects, numerous commentaries were produced on the discrete texts that stood at the center of the respective schools.

For instance, Hōjibō Shōshin (寶地房證眞; 1136–1220 or 1131–1215) of the Tendai sect wrote voluminous subcommentaries to Zhiyi's Miaofa lianhuajing xuanyi. In the Pure Land school, many commentaries were composed on the Guan wuliangshoufo jing. Also, on account of the important position that tantric mikkyō (密教) practices came to occupy within the Japanese Shingon (真言) and Tendai schools, in comparison with the commentarial traditions of China in Korea, Japan saw the production of relatively numerous works on the mikkyō scriptures, mainly on the Dainichikyō (大日經; T. 848).

Bibliography

Buswell, R., Cultivating Original Enlightenment: Wŏnhyo's Exposition of the Vajrasamādhi-Sūtra (Kŭmgang Sammaegyŏng Non), Honolulu, 2007.

Buswell, R., The Korean Approach to Zen: The Collected Works of Chinul, Honolulu, 1983.

Buzo, A., & T. Prince, Kyunyŏ-jŏn: The Life, Times and Songs of a Tenth-Century Korean Monk, Honolulu, 1994.

Carré, P., Introduction aux pratiques de la non-dualité: commentaire du Soutraˆ de la Liberté inconcevable, Paris, 2004.

Chi Limei (池麗梅), "Tonkō shahon Yuimakitsukyōge" (敦煌写本『維摩詰経解』; Dunhuang Manuscripts of the Weimojiejing-jie [維摩詰経解]), IBK 50/1, 2001, 235–237.

Choo, B.H., "An Annotated Translation of Wŏnch'uk's Commentary on the Heart Sūtra: Wŏnch'uk's Unique Exposition of the Yogâcāra Interpretation of the Heart Sutra," diss., Drew University, 2003.

Dennis, M.W., Prince Shotoku's Commentary on the Srīmala Sūtra, BDK English Tripiṭaka, Berkeley, 2011.

Epstein, S.R., "Boundaries of the Dao: Hanshan Deqing's (1546–1623) Buddhist Commentary on the Zhuangzi," diss., Stanford University, 2006.

Fang Guangchang (方广锠), ed., Zangwai Fojiao wenxian (藏外佛教文献; Extracanonical Buddhist Texts), vol. II, Beijing, 1996.

Funayama Tōru (船山徹), "Ryō no Kaizenji Chizō Jōjitsuron taigiki to Nanchō kyōrigaku" (梁の開善寺智蔵『成実論大義記』と南朝教理学; The Chengshilun dayi ji by the Liang Dynasty Monk Zhizang of Kaishan Temple and the Scholasticism in the Southern Courts), in: Mugitani Kunio (麥谷邦夫), ed., Kōnan Dōkyō no kenkyū (江南道教の研究), Kyoto, 2007, 111–135.

Gimello, R.M., "Chih-yen (602–668) and the Foundations of Hua-yen Buddhism," diss., Columbia University, 1976.

Gomez, L.O., "Buddhist Books and Texts: Exegesis and Hermeneutics," in: L. Jones, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion, Detroit, 2005, 1268–1278.

Hamar, I., "Hermeneutical Methods in Chengguan's Commentary to the Avataṃsaka-sūtra," AD 23, 2004, 9–16.

Hanazuka Hisayoshi (花塚久義), "Chu Yuimakitsukyō no hensansha o megutte" (注維摩詰経の編纂者をめぐって; Some Problems concerning the Compiler of the Zhu weimojie jing), KDBGR 13, 1982, 201–214.

Hibi Nobumasa (日比宣正), Tōdai Tendaigaku josetsu: Tannen no chosaku ni kansuru kenky ū (唐代天台学序説—湛然の著作に関する研究; Introduction to the Study of Tang Dynasty Tiantai: On the Works of Zhanran), Tokyo, 1966.

Hirai Shun'ei (平井俊榮), "Mongu shishu shaku to kichizō shishushakugi" (『文句』四種釈と吉蔵四種釈義), in: Hirai Shun'ei (平井俊榮), Hokke mongu no seiritsu ni kansuru kenkyū (法華文句の成立に関する研究; Studies on the Compilation of Fahua wenju), Tokyo, 1985, 229–250.

Hirai Shun'ei (平井俊榮), "Shishu shakugi" (四種釈義; Four Modes of Exegesis), in: Hirai Shun'ei (平井俊榮), Ch ūgoku hannya shisōshi kenkyū: Kichizō to Sanron gakuha (中国般若思想史研究：吉蔵と三論学派; History of Prajñā Thought in China: Jizang and the Sanlun School), Tokyo, 1976, 429–440.

Hubbard, J., Expository Commentary on the Vimalakīrti Sūtra, Berkeley, 2012.

Hwang Chang-geun, "A Korean Yogâcāra Monk in China: Won-Cheuk (612–696) and His Commentary on the Heart Sutra," diss., University of Wisconsin-Madison, 2000.

Inaba Shōju (稲葉正就), "Enjiki Gejinmikky ōsho no sanitsububun no kanbun'yaku" (円測解深密経疏の散逸部分の漢文訳; Restrauration of Wŏnch'ŭk's Haesimmilgyŏng so through Its Tibetan Counterpart), ODKN 24, 1972, 1–132.

Inaba Shōju (稲葉正就), "Enjiki-sen Gejinmikkyōsho no Chibetto-yaku ni tsuite" (円測撰解深密経疏の西蔵訳に就て; On the Tibetan Translation of Wŏnch'ŭk's Haesimmilgyŏng so), OG 97/1–2, 1944, 50–65.

Inaba, S., "On Chos-grub's Translation of the Chieh-shen-mi-ching-shu," in: L. Kawamura & K. Scott, eds., Buddhist Thought and Asian Civilization, Emeryville, 1977, 105–113.

Ishii Kōsei (石井公成), "Sangyō gisho no kyōtsū hyōgen to hensoku gohō (ge)" (三経義疏の共通表現と変則語法[下]; Shared Vocabulary and Irregular Features in the Sangyō gisho [Part 2]), in: Okuda Shōō Sensei Shōju Kinen Ronshū Kankōkai (奥田聖應先生頌寿記念論集刊行会), eds., Okuda Shōō Sensei Shōju Kinen Indogaku Bukkyōgaku Ronshū (奥田聖應先生頌寿記念インド学仏教学論集; Indian and Buddhist Studies in Honor of President Dr. Shōō Okuda in Recognition of His Lifelong Scholarship), 2014, Tokyo, 982–994.

Ishii Kōsei (石井公成), "Sangyō gisho no kyōtsū hyōgen to hensoku gohō (jō)" (三経義疏の共通表現と変則語法[上]; Shared Vocabulary and Irregular Features in the Sangyō gisho [Part 1]), KDBGR 41, 2010, 43–61.

Ishii Kōsei (石井公成), "Sangyō gisho no gohō" (三経義疏的語法; The Grammar of Sanjing yishu), IBK 57/1, 2008, 43–49.

Kanno Hiroshi (菅野博史), "Hokke Mongu ni okeru shishushaku ni tsuite" (『法華文句』における四種釈について; Four Modes of Interpretation in the Fahua wenju), IBK 54/1, 2005, 79–87; repr. in: Kanno Hiroshi (菅野博史), Nanbokuchō, Zuidai no Chūgoku Bukkyō shisō kenkyū (南北朝・隋代の中国仏教思想研究; Buddhist Thought in China in the Northern and Southern Dynasties and in the Sui Period), Tokyo, 2012, 213–228.

Kanno Hiroshi (菅野博史), "Chinese Buddhist Sūtra Commentaries of the Early Period," ARRIAB 6, 2003, 301–320.

Kanno Hiroshi (菅野博史), "Ekin Daijō shirongengiki no sanshu shakugi to Kichizō no shishu shakugi" (慧均『大乗四論玄義記』の三種釈義と吉蔵の四種釈義; The Three Modes of Interpretation in Huijun's Dasheng silun xuanyi ji and the Four Modes in Jizang), in: Kimura Kiyotatka Hakushi Kanreki Kinenkai (木村清孝博士還暦記念会), eds., Higashi Ajia Bukkyō – sono seiritsu to tenkai: Kimura Kiyotaka Hakushi kanreki kinen ronshū (東アジア仏教—その成立と展開：木村清孝博士還暦記念論集; East Asian Buddhism: Its Establishment and Development: Papers in Celebration of Dr. Kimura Kiyotaka's 60th Birthday), Tokyo, 2002, 87–100; repr. in: Kanno Hiroshi (菅野博史), Nanbokuchō, Zuidai no Chūgoku Bukkyō shisō kenkyū (南北朝・隋代の中国仏教思想研究; Buddhist Thought in China in the Northern and Southern Dynasties and in the Sui Period), Tokyo, 2012, 477–492.

Kanno Hiroshi (菅野博史), Hokkekyō chūshakusho shūsei 2: Hokke giki (法華経注釈書集成 2: 法華義記; Compilation of Commentarial Literature on Lotus Sūtra 2: Fahua Yiji), Tokyo, 1996.

Kanno Hiroshi (菅野博史), Chūgoku Hokkeshisō no Kenkyū (中国法華思想の研究; Studies on Lotus Thought in China), Tokyo, 1994, 69–78.

Kanno Hiroshi (菅野博史), "Sangyō gisho no shingi mondai ni tsuite" (三経義疏の真偽問題について; The Problem of Authenticity of Sangyō gisho), in: Ōkura Seishin Bunka Kenkyūsho (大倉精神文化研究所), ed., Sōgō kenkyū Asuka bunka (綜合研究飛鳥文化; Comprehensive Studies on the Culture of the Asuka Period), Tokyo, 1989, 465–502; repr. in: Kanno Hiroshi (菅野博史), Nanbokuchō, Zuidai no Chūgoku Bukkyō shisō kenkyū (南北朝・隋代の中国仏教思想研究; Buddhist Thought in China in the Northern and Southern Dynasties and in the Sui Period), Tokyo, 2012, 557–586.

Kanno Hiroshi (菅野博史), "Daihatsunehankyō jūge no kisoteki kenkyū" (『大般涅槃経集解』の基礎的研究; A Preliminary Study of Da banniepan jing jijie), TB 66, 1986, 93–173; repr. in: Kanno Hiroshi (菅野博史), Nanbokuchō, Zuidai no Chūgoku Bukkyō shisō kenkyū (南北朝・隋代の中国仏教思想研究; Buddhist Thought in China in the Northern and Southern Dynasties and in the Sui Period), Tokyo, 2012, 351–428.

Kanno Hiroshi (菅野博史), "Jōyōji Eon Yuimakyōgiki no kenkyū" (浄影寺慧遠『維摩経義記』の研究; A Study of Jingying Huiyuan's Weimojie jing yiji), TGjK 23/2, 1984, 231–259; repr. in: Kanno Hiroshi (菅野博史), Nanbokuchō, Zuidai no Chūgoku Bukkyō shisō kenkyū (南北朝・隋代の中国仏教思想研究; Buddhist Thought in China in the Northern and Southern Dynasties and in the Sui Period), Tokyo, 2012, 273–291.

Kim Young-ho, Tao-sheng's Commentary on the Lotus Sūtra: A Study and Translation, Albany, 1990.

Kimura Senshō (木村宣彰), "Chū Yuimakyō shoin no beppon ni tsuite" (注維摩經所引の別本について; On the bieben Quoted in the Zhu Weimojie jing), IBK 35/2, 1987, 99–104.

Kogachi Ryūichi (古勝隆一), "Sekitenrei to gisogaku" (釋奠禮と義疏學; "Display-Presentation" Rites and Commentary Writing), in: Kominami Ichirō (小南一郎), ed., Chūgoku no Reisei to Reigaku (中國の禮制と禮學; Chinese Ritual Systems and Theories), Kyoto, 2001, 469–504; repr. in: Kogachi Ryūichi (古勝隆一), Chūgoku chūko no Gakujutsu (中國中古の学術; Scholarship in Medieval China), Tokyo, 2006, 93–138.

Kudara Kōgi (百済康義), "Sōjō no Yuimakitsukyō tanchūbon" (僧肇の維摩詰經單注本; Sengzhao's Solo Commentary on the Vimalakīrtinirdeśa), BgK 56, 2002, 17–34.

Kudō Masaya (工藤雅也), "Chūyuima Dōshōchū ni okeru kyōten chūshakuhō" (『注維摩』道生注における経典注釈法; Daosheng's Commentary on the Weimojie jing), IBK 48/2, 2000a, 71–73.

Kudō Masaya (工藤雅也), "Chūyuima ni okeru chūshaku keishiki no mondai ni tsuite" (『注維摩』における注釈形式の問題について; The Style of Interpretation in Zhu Weimo), TeG 42, 2000b, 150–154.

Lai, W., "The Early Chinese Understanding of the Psyche: Chen Hui's Commentary on the Yin Chih Ju Ching," JIABS 9/1, 1986, 85–103.

Lai, W., "Before the Prajñā Schools: The Earliest Chinese Commentary on the Aṣṭasāhasrikā," JIABS 6/1, 1983, 91–108.

Lai, W., "The Mahāparinirvāṇa-sūtra and Its Earliest Interpreters in China: Two Prefaces by Tao-lang and Tao-sheng," JAOS 102/1, 1982, 99–105.

Link, A.E., "Evidence for Doctrinal Continuity of Han Buddhism from the Second through the Fourth Centuries: The Prefaces of An Shih-kao's Grand Sūtra on Mindfulness of the Respiration and K'ang Senghui's Introduction to the 'Perfection of Dhyāna,'" in: J.B. Parsons, ed., Papers in Honor of Professor Woodbridge Bingham: A Festschrift for His Seventy-fifth Birthday, San Francisco, 1976, 55–126.

Lo Yuet-keung, "Change beyond Syncretism: Ouyi Zhixu's Buddhist Hermeneutics of the Yijing," JCP 35/2, 2008, 273–295.

Lopez, D.S., Jr., ed., Buddhist Hermeneutics, Honolulu, 1988.

Lusthaus, D., "The Heart Sūtra in Chinese Yogācāra: Some Comparative Comments on the Heart Sūtra Commentaries of Wonch'uk and K'uei-chi," IJBTC 3, 2003, 59–103.

Mayer, A., "Das Vajracchedikā-sūtra und die chinesische Auslegung der prajñā. Ein Beitrag zur Expositorik, Exegese und Hermeneutik im sino-buddhistischen Kommentar," diss., Heidelberg University, 1999.

Morrison, E. The Power of Patriarchs: Qis
Chinese Buddhism, Leiden, 2010.

Mou Runsun (牟潤孫), "Lun Ru Shi lia yu yishu" (論儒釋兩家之講經與義疏
Written Commentary in Confucianis SYX 4/2, 1960, 353–415; repr. in: Mou Zhushizhai conggao (zengdingben) (注 Papers from the Historian's Studio:
1987, 88–155.

Muller, A.C., "Doctrinal Essentials of the L jong-yo) 法華宗要," in: R. Buswell, C.
& R. Whitfield, eds., Collected Works
vol. I, 2012a, 83–139.

Muller, A.C., "Doctrinal Essentials of the able Life (Muryangsugyeong jong-yo R. Buswell, C. Muller, J. Jorgensen & lected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol

Muller, A.C., "Selections from the Saṁdhiromocana-sūtra, by Wonch Ximing Temple (Haesimmil Gyeong
R. Buswell, C. Muller, J. Jorgensen & lected Works of Korean Buddhism, 6,

Nattier, J., "Who Produced the Da m (T225)? A Reassessment of the Evi 2008, 295–337.

Ōchō E'nichi (横超慧日), "Jiku Dōsh kenkyū" (竺道生撰「法華経疏」 Daosheng's Fahuajing shu), ODKN in: Ōchō E'nichi (横超慧日), Hokk 華思想の研究; Studies on the Ph Sūtra), 1975, Kyoto, 111–230.

Ōchō E'nichi (横超慧日), "Shakkyōs tory of Scriptural Commentary), C 206; first published in Shina Bukky 学) 1/1, 1937, 75–110.

Okamoto Ippei (岡本一平), "Jōyōji kankei ni kansuru shiron" (淨影寺 に関する試論; The Relative Chro Jingying Huiyuan), in: Jiron shisō n 思想の形成と変容; The Formati of Dilun Thought), publ. Geumga Studies, Tokyo, 2010, 162–183.

Pas, J.F., Visions of Sukhāvatī: Shan-t Kuan Wu-liang shou-fo ching, Alba Penkower, L., "T'ien-t'ai during the and the Sinification of Buddhism," sity, 1993.

Powers, J., "Accidental Immortality: the Author of the Great Chinese 1992, 95–103.

Shi Guopu (釋果樸), Dunhuang ben Weimojie jing zhujie kao ( 本《維摩詰經》注解考; Study
P. 3006 Being a Commentary on the Vimalakīrtinirdeśa), Taipei,

Shi Heng-Ching & D. Lusthaus, A tary on the Heart Sutra (Prajñ Translated from the Chinese of K number 1710), BDK English Tripi 野博史), "Jōyōji Eon Yuimakyōgiki no 慧遠『維摩経義記』の研究; A Study ian's Weimojie jing yiji), TGjK 23/2, 1984, Kanno Hiroshi (菅野博史), Nanbokuchō, ku Bukkyō shisō kenkyū (南北朝・隋代 研究; Buddhist Thought in China in the uthern Dynasties and in the Sui Period), 291.

-sheng's Commentary on the Lotus Sūtra:
slation, Albany, 1990.

村宣彰), "Chū Yuimakyō shoin no bep-注維摩經所引の別本について; On the the Zhu Weimojie jing), IBK 35/2, 1987,

勝隆一), "Sekitenrei to gisogaku" (釋 Display-Presentation" Rites and Com-
, in: Kominami Ichirō (小南一郎), ed., i to Reigaku (中國の禮制と禮學; Chins and Theories), Kyoto, 2001, 469–504; Ryūichi (古勝隆一), Chūgoku chūko no 中古の学術; Scholarship in Medieval 6, 93–138.

義), "Sōjō no Yuimakitsukyō tanchūbon" 單注本; Sengzhao's Solo Commentary nirdeśa), BgK 56, 2002, 17–34.

推也), "Chūyuima Dōshōchū ni okeru ō" (『注維摩』道生注における経典
's Commentary on the Weimojie jing),
-73.

推也), "Chūyuima ni okeru chūshaku ni tsuite" (『注維摩』における注釈 て; The Style of Interpretation in Zhu ob, 150–154.

hinese Understanding of the Psyche: ntary on the Yin Chih Ju Ching," JIABS

jñā Schools: The Earliest Chinese Comasāhasrikā," JIABS 6/1, 1983, 91–108. rinirvāṇa-sūtra and Its Earliest Inter-o Prefaces by Tao-lang and Tao-sheng," -105.

or Doctrinal Continuity of Han Bud-nd through the Fourth Centuries: The -kao's Grand Sūtra on Mindfulness of K'ang Senghui's Introduction to the na,'" in: J.B. Parsons, ed., Papers in Voodbridge Bingham: A Festschrift for nday, San Francisco, 1976, 55–126. ge beyond Syncretism: Ouyi Zhixu's tics of the Yijing," JCP 35/2, 2008, dhist Hermeneutics, Honolulu, 1988. rt Sūtra in Chinese Yogācāra: Some ents on the Heart Sūtra Commentar-K'uei-chi," IJBTC 3, 2003, 59–103. chedikā-sūtra und die chinesische

. Ein Beitrag zur Expositorik, Exegese sino-buddhistischen Kommentar," ersity, 1999.

Morrison, E., The Power of Patriarchs: Qisong and Lineage in Chinese Buddhism, Leiden, 2010.

Mou Runsun (牟潤孫), "Lun Ru Shi liangjia zhi jiangjing yu yishu" (論儒釋兩家之講經與義疏; Oral Exegesis and Written Commentary in Confucianism and Buddhism), SYX 4/2, 1960, 353–415; repr. in: Mou Runsun (牟潤孫), Zhushizhai conggao (zengdingben) (注史齋叢稿 [增訂本; Papers from the Historian's Studio: Expanded Edition), 1987, 88–155.

Muller, A.C., "Doctrinal Essentials of the Lotus Sutra (Beophwa jong-yo) 法華宗要," in: R. Buswell, C. Muller, J. Jorgensen & R. Whitfield, eds., Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol. I, 2012a, 83–139.

Muller, A.C., "Doctrinal Essentials of the Sutra of Immeasurable Life (Muryangsugyeong jong-yo) 無量壽經宗要," in: R. Buswell, C. Muller, J. Jorgensen & R. Whitfield, eds., Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, vol. I, 2012b, 140–212.

Muller, A.C., "Selections from the Commentary on the Saṁdhiromocana-sūtra, by Woncheuk the Śramaṇa if Ximing Temple (Haesimmil Gyeong So 解深密經疏)," in: R. Buswell, C. Muller, J. Jorgensen & R. Whitfield, eds., Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, 6, 2012c, 21–123.

Nattier, J., "Who Produced the Da mingdu jing 大明度經 (T225)? A Reassessment of the Evidence," JIABS 31/1–2, 2008, 295–337.

Ōchō E'nichi (横超慧日), "Jiku Dōshō-sen Hokekyōsho no kenkyū" (竺道生撰「法華経疏」の研究; Study of Zhu Daosheng's Fahuajing shu), ODKN 5, 1952, 167–276; repr. in: Ōchō E'nichi (横超慧日), Hokke shisō no kenkyū (法華思想の研究; Studies on the Philosophy of the Lotus Sūtra), 1975, Kyoto, 111–230.

Ōchō E'nichi (横超慧日), "Shakkyōshikō" (釈経史考; History of Scriptural Commentary), CHUGOKU 3, 1979, 165–206; first published in Shina Bukkyō Shigaku (支那仏教史学) 1/1, 1937, 75–110.

Okamoto Ippei (岡本一平), "Jōyōji Eon no chosaku zengo kankei ni kansuru shiron" (淨影寺慧遠の著作前後関係に関する試論; The Relative Chronology of the Works of Jingying Huiyuan), in: Jiron shisō no Keisei to Henyō (地論思想の形成と変容; The Formation and Transformation of Dilun Thought), publ. Geumgang Center for Buddhist Studies, Tokyo, 2010, 162–183.

Pas, J.F., Visions of Sukhāvatī: Shan-tao's Commentary on the Kuan Wu-liang shou-fo ching, Albany, 1995.

Penkower, L., "T'ien-t'ai during the T'ang Dynasty: Chan-jan and the Sinification of Buddhism," diss., Columbia University, 1993.

Powers, J., "Accidental Immortality: How Wonch'uk Became the Author of the Great Chinese Commentary," JIABS 15/1, 1992, 95–103.

Shi Guopu (釋果樸), Dunhuang xiejuan P. 3006 Zhi Qian ben Weimojie jing zhujie kao (敦煌寫卷 P3006「支謙」本《維摩詰經》注解考; Study of Dunhuang Manuscript P. 3006 Being a Commentary on Zhi Qian's Translation for the Vimalakīrtinirdeśa), Taipei, 1998.

Shi Heng-Ching & D. Lusthaus, A Comprehensive Commentary on the Heart Sutra (Prajñāpāramitā-hṛdaya-sūtra): Translated from the Chinese of K'uei-chi (Taisho volume 33, number 1710), BDK English Tripiṭaka 66-I, Berkeley, 2001.

Shi Shengyan (釋聖嚴), Mingmo Fojiao yanjiu (明末佛教研究; Studies in Late Ming Buddhism), Taipei, 1992.

Steinkellner, E., "Who Is Byaṇ chub rdzu 'phrul? Tibetan and Non-Tibetan Commentaries on the Saṁdhinirmocanasūtra: A Survey of Literature," BIS 4/5, 1989, 229–251.

Swanson, P.L., Foundations of T'ien-t'ai Philosophy: The Flowering of the Two Truths Theory in Chinese Buddhism, Berkeley, 1989.

Taiyaku Chūyuimakitsukyō (対訳注維摩詰経; An Interlinear Edition of Chūyuimakitsukyō), publ. Institute for Comprehensive Studies of Buddhism of Taishō University, Tokyo, 2000.

Tanaka, K., The Dawn of Chinese Pure Land Buddhist Doctrine: Ching-ying Hui-yüan's Commentary on the Visualization Sutra, Albany, 1990.

Tao Jin, "The Formulation of Introductory Topics and the Writing of Exegesis in Chinese Buddhism," JIABS 30/1–2, 2007, 33–79.

Ui Hakuju (宇井伯寿), Yakkyōshi kenkyū (譯經史研究; Studies in the History of Sūtra Translation), Tokyo, 1971.

Ui Hakuju (宇井伯寿), "Kongōhannyakyō oyobi ron no hon'yaku narabi ni chūshaku" (金剛般若経及び論の翻訳並に註釈; The Jingang bore jing lun: Translation and Commentary), in: Miyamoto Shōson, ed., Tokiwa Hakushi kanreki kinen: Bukkyō ronshō (常盤博士還暦記念仏教論叢; Buddhist Studies Papers for the 60th Anniversary of Dr. Tokiwa), Tokyo, 1933, 35–60; repr. in: Ui Hakuju (宇井伯寿), Ui Hakuju Chosaku senshū (宇井伯寿著作選集; Collected Works of Ui Hakuju), vol. VI, Tokyo, 1967.

Ukai Mitsuaki (鵜飼光昌), "Shareiun Kongōhannyakyōchū no kisoteki kenkyū, jō" (謝霊運『金剛般若経注』の基礎的研究[上]); A Basic Study of Xie Lingyun's Commentary on the Jingang bore jing, Part 1), BDDK 20, 1992a, 1–21.

Ukai Mitsuaki (鵜飼光昌), "Shareiun Kongōhannyakyōchū no kisoteki kenkyū, ge" (謝霊運『金剛般若経注』の基礎的研究[下]); A Basic Study of Xie Lingyun's Commentary on the Jingang bore jing, Part 2), BDBR 77, 1992b, 59–75.

Usuda Junzō (臼田淳三), "Chu Yuimakitsukyō no kenkyū" (注維摩詰経の研究; Study of the Zhu Weimojie jing), IBK 26/1, 1977a, 262–265.

Usuda Junzō (臼田淳三), "Yuimakyō Sōjō tanchūbon" (維摩経僧肇単注本; Sengzhao's Solo Commentary on the Vimalakīrtinirdeśa), ShtkK 1, 1977b, 29–44.

Zacchetti, S., "Some Remarks on the Authorship and Chronology of the Yin chi ru jing zhu T 1694: The Second Phase in the Development of Chinese Buddhist Exegetical Literature," in: G. Orofino & S. Vita, eds., Buddhist Asia 2: Papers from the Second Conference of Buddhist Studies Held in Naples in June 2004, Kyoto, 2010, 141–198.

Zacchetti, Stefano, "A 'New' Early Chinese Buddhist Commentary: The Nature of the Da anban shouyi jing 大安般守意經 T. 602 Reconsidered," JIABS 31/1–2, 2008, 421–484.

Zacchetti, S., "Teaching Buddhism in Han China: A Study of the Ahan koujie sh'er yinyuan jing T 1508 Attributed to An Shigao," ARIRIAB 7, 2004, 197–224.

Zacchetti, S., "The Rediscovery of Three Early Buddhist Scriptures on Meditation: A Preliminary Analysis of the Fo shuo shi'er men jing, the Fo shuo jie shi'er men jing Translated by

An Shigao and Their Commentary Preserved in the Newly Found Kongō-ji Mnuscript," ARIRIAB 6, 2003, 251–299.
Zacchetti, S., "An Early Chinese Translation Corresponding to Chapter 6 of the Peṭakopadesa: An Shigao's Yin chi ru jing T603 and Its Indian Original: A Preliminary Survey," BSOAS 65/1, 2002, 74–98.
Ziporyn, B., Zhuangzi: Essential Writings, with Selections fro
Traditional Commentaries, Indianapolis, 2009.
Zürcher, E., The Buddhist Conquest of China: The Spread an Adaptation of Buddhism in Early Medieval China, Leiden, 20

Hiroshi Kan
Rafal Felbu

Tantr

Within learned writing in Sa commentary became central and remained so. By the time t commentaries began to be com hermeneutics were already hig tions, with a history of well ov Their origin and a considera development lie, probably, be historical Buddha, and are stro Vedic traditions and with som branches of knowledge associ (Vedāṅga[s]) such as, above with the interpretation and a the emphasis on their meanin tionship to other words), Vy grammar, dealing with the deri cal analysis of words) and Mīm with the interpretation of [Ve early history lies far beyond th (as a starting point for the st Sanskrit commentarial literat

The importance of comm Buddhism, as in classical Ind is evident from the abundan commonly used in Sanskri Among the more frequent ṭīkā, nibandha, pañjikā (and cal variant pañcikā), paddhat and vyākhyā. The two term frequently used in Brahm apparently not found in Bud literature.

Even though sometimes ceived of and used inte 2002, 159), Indian authors interpreted them as having e.g. Rājaśekhara's Kāvyamīn Hemacandra's Abhidhānacin 256–258; see also Bhattacha ṭīkā (and vivṛti) may refer to prose which leave almost no uncommented, contain nu present occasional digress (like ṭippaṇī and vṛtti) ma mentaries which focus on ficult words (viṣamapada).

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

i: Essential Writings, with Selections from entaries, Indianapolis, 2009. dhist Conquest of China: The Spread and hism in Early Medieval China, Leiden, 2007.

HIROSHI KANNO
RAFAL FELBUR

Tantric Commentaries: South Asia

Within learned writing in Sanskrit the genre of commentary became central at an early period, and remained so. By the time that Buddhist tantric commentaries began to be composed, exegesis and hermeneutics were already highly developed traditions, with a history of well over a thousand years. Their origin and a considerable period of early development lie, probably, before the time of the historical Buddha, and are strongly linked with the Vedic traditions and with some of the specialized branches of knowledge associated with the Vedas (Vedāṅga[s]) such as, above all, Nirukta (dealing with the interpretation and analysis of words with the emphasis on their meaning and supposed relationship to other words), Vyākaraṇa (traditional grammar, dealing with the derivation and grammatical analysis of words) and Mīmāṃsā (dealing mainly with the interpretation of [Vedic] sentences). This early history lies far beyond the scope of this article (as a starting point for the study of non-Buddhist Sanskrit commentarial literature see Slaje, 2007).

The importance of commentarial literature in Buddhism, as in classical Indian culture in general, is evident from the abundance of different terms commonly used in Sanskrit for "commentary." Among the more frequent are: ṭippaṇī/ṭippanī, ṭīkā, nibandha, pañjikā (and its rarer orthographical variant pañcikā), paddhati, vivaraṇa, vivṛti, vṛtti, and vyākhyā. The two terms bhāṣya and vārttika, frequently used in Brahmanical literature, are apparently not found in Buddhist tantric exegetical literature.

Even though sometimes these terms are conceived of and used interchangeably (Unithiri, 2002, 159), Indian authors have in some cases interpreted them as having a different scope (see e.g. Rājaśekhara's Kāvyamīmāṃsā, adhyāya 2, and Hemacandra's Abhidhānacintāmaṇi, Devakāṇḍa, stt. 256–258; see also Bhattacharya, 1955). For instance, ṭīkā (and vivṛti) may refer to long commentaries in prose which leave almost no passage of the root text uncommented, contain numerous quotations and present occasional digressions, whereas pañjikā (like ṭippaṇī and vṛtti) may refer to shorter commentaries which focus on the explanation of difficult words (viṣamapada). This twofold attitude is reflected also in Buddhist tantric literature: pañjikā and ṭīkā are sometimes used as synonyms, while at other times they are conceived to represent two different levels of analysis.

At the beginning of the Buddhist tantric commentarial literature, the direct models and sources were probably mainly the earlier Buddhist (non-tantric) tradition of commentary together with what had developed, by the middle of the first millennium, as a more or less standard, shared (across religious traditions), style of commenting on technical literature, including scriptural literature. Given the importance in general of commentary and exegesis, and the fact that tantric scriptures in particular, being often esoteric not only in name but in fact, may require explanation even more than most other texts, we may assume that the commentarial tradition goes back to the time of the appearance of the scriptures, at least as far as oral exegesis is concerned. Written commentaries are likely to have followed quite soon afterward.

Commentaries no doubt served several important functions. On the one hand, they were indispensable in keeping traditions alive, especially once the body of tantric scriptures had started to become so large that purely oral transmission of exegesis became difficult and would have endangered the continuity of traditions. On the other hand, they could be at the same time a means to introduce changes in a tradition, interpreting the scriptures (or the teachings of earlier authors) in the light of new ideas, doctrines or practices.

Such innovation is of course usually not presented explicitly as such. In the case of a few commentaries an entirely new interpretation of the work explained seems to have been de facto intended. This is the case, for instance, of the commentaries on the Hevajratantra and the Laghuśaṃvaratantra by Vajragarbha and Vajrapāṇi, respectively, which reject other interpretations and claim unique authority, by reason of the authors' self-identification as high bodhisattvas, for the Kālacakra-based interpretation that they give (Sferra, 2005).

An interesting case is also the commentary on the Hevajratantra by one Kelikuliśa, as yet unpublished, in which that famous yoginītantra is interpreted

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill through the teachings of the Ārya school tradition, the main texts of which are quoted profusely (Isaacson, 2009, 91).

Formal Characteristics and Style

One of the basic structures of the Buddhist commentarial tradition is a binary pattern according to which the teachings, initially given in summary form (uddeśa), are followed by more in-depth, defined explanations (nirdeśa). We find this pattern already in the Pali canon and also in Mahāyāna works, for instance the Mahāyānasūtrālaṅkāra, the Ratnagotravibhāga, and the Abhisamayālaṅkārālokā by Haribhadra. The pattern is also adopted by at least two Buddhist tantric scriptures. First, it is found in the Yoginīsañcāratantra (1.2–3), with the addition of a third level of yet more detailed analysis, here called pratinirdeśa. This latter term is apparently absent in the previous Buddhist tradition and is not found with this meaning elsewhere in Indian literature. The same terminology, but in a more complex framework, is adopted also by a second tantric scripture, the Sekoddeśa (stt. 3–5), one of the most authoritative texts of the Kālacakra tradition. Here, it is stated that "in the tantra" (tantre) uddeśa and nirdeśa are threefold: each of the two has (1) a basic aspect, which corresponds to the "[first] recitation of the tantra" (tantrasaṅgīti); (2) a prati- (repeated or more detailed) aspect, which is the pañjikā ("[short] commentary"), here intended as the "analysing of the [menanings of the] words" (padabhañjikā); and (3) a mahā- (great) aspect, which corresponds to the ṭīkā ("[long] commentary"), understood as "indicating all meanings" (sarvārthasūcikā). In his commentary, Nāropā (first half of the 11th cent.) makes it clear that this scheme applies to all yogatantras and yoginītantras and that the "recitation of the tantra" corresponds to the laghutantra in the case of the uddeśa and to the mūlatantra in the case of the nirdeśa; analogously pañjikā and ṭīkā can be composed for both the laghutantra and the mūlatantra (ed. pages 68–69).

The full scheme is the following:

uddeśa (uddeśa, pratyuddeśa, mahoddeśa); nirdeśa (nirdeśa, pratinirdeśa, mahānirdeśa) uddeśa and nirdeśa = tantrasaṅgīti (laghutantra, mūlatantra) pratyuddeśa and pratinirdeśa = pañjikā (laghutantrapañjikā, mūlatantrapañjikā) mahoddeśa and mahānirdeśa = ṭīkā (laghutantraṭīkā, mūlatantraṭīkā)

A different, more straightforward, explanation of the words uddeśa, nirdeśa and pratinirdeśa can be found in Tathāgatarakṣita's (second half of the 11th cent.; Sanderson, 2009, 161) Sañcāranibandha, where uddeśa corresponds to sūtra (i.e. tantra), nirdeśa to vṛtti, and pratinirdeśa to ṭīkā.

Another structuring device is that of the five headings or topics listed by Vasubandhu in his Vyākhyāyukti: the "aim" (prayojana) of the text commented on; the "condensed" or "summary meaning" (piṇḍārtha); the "meanings of the words" (padārtha); the "'connections," which allow one to understand the sequence in which topics are dealt with (anusandhi); and "objections" and the "responses" to them (codya and parihāra). This is not used by very many tantra commentators, but it is found for example in Bhavabhaṭṭa's Laghuśaṃvaravivṛti and in the commentary on the Guhyasamājatantra attributed to Ratnākaraśānti (early 11th cent.), both of which quote the verse of the Vyākhyāyukti that enumerates the five (Laghuśaṃvaravivṛti page 2, ll. 9–10 [the text as printed requiring some corrections], Kusumāñjali* D 1851, rgyud, ti, 202b7).

More commonly used than Vasubandhu's five headings are a not exclusively tantric, nor exclusively Buddhist, set of three, four or sometimes five: the "words/text" (abhidhāna; the most frequently omitted of the items); "content" or "subject matter" (abhidheya); "connection" (sambandha); "aim" (prayojana); and "aim of the aim", that is higher or ultimate aim (prayojanaprayojana). The term anubandha (lit. connection) is sometimes used for these in secondary literature, and is attested in non-Buddhist texts, but in none that might be as early as the tantric Buddhist commentaries dealt with here. Some set of minimally three of these is used by a majority of tantric commentators. There are authors, however, including important ones such as Ratnākaraśānti, who do not make use of them at all. The expositions of these categories by tantric authors are often not very different from those by non-tantric authors. The ultimate goal is commonly stated to be the attainment of the highest awakening, often referred to with the term mahāmudrāsiddhi, but sometimes with other expressions such as "attaining the state/level of the glorious Śaṃvara" (thus in Ratnarakṣita's commentary on the Saṃvarodayatantra). One difference from non-tantric exegesis that is seen not infrequently is that the subject matter or content of a

---

tantra is said to be the deity wit is concerned (who is normally a buddha who is the teacher of th

A set of hermeneutical c received some attention from m sunaga, 1963, 1964; Steinkellne Seyfort Ruegg, 1985) is the ṣaṭko standard terms for these six c divided into three pairs, are: sa tional speech"); nosandhyā intentional [speech]"); neyār requires to be drawn out," dee ("meaning that has been [fu surface meaning); yathāruta ( ("non-literal"). The locus class famous commentary Pradīp Guhyasamājatantra by (a) Ca [?]), a commentary which is i Ṣaṭkoṭivyākhyā (The Six Points are presented there as the th referred to as the seven-fold al for which Steinkellner propos translation "preparation"; 197

1. "introduction" (upodgh fold, consisting of a discussio tantra, the reason why it was (in the case of the Guhyasam to be Vajrasattva), the size of

2. "method" (nyāya), whic ing of "continuity"/"lineage" tion" (nidāna), "explanation" cause" (hetu), all of these four ent in the case of tantric Bud sponding elements in non-ta

3. the "six points" (see abo

4. "explanation" (vyākhyā is fourfold, consisting of the nemes" (akṣarārtha), "overal (samastāṅga), "hidden" (g (kolika), with further subdivi

5. "teaching" (vyākhyāna twofold, "teaching to a group "teaching to individual stude

6. "person" (pudgala), wh ferent types/levels of studen and finally

7. the "practice of the s (niṣpannakramasādhana).

It has been suggested himself who created this su fold alaṃkāra, drawing to in explanatory tantras and 1978, 457). For the "six to be the most widely u d mahānirdeśa = ṭīkā (laghutan- atraṭīkā)

e straightforward, explanation of śa, nirdeśa and pratinirdeśa can āgatarakṣita's (second half of the rson, 2009, 161) Sañcāranibandha, orresponds to sūtra (i.e. tantra), nd pratinirdeśa to ṭīkā. turing device is that of the five ics listed by Vasubandhu in his "aim" (prayojana) of the text comondensed" or "summary meaning" neanings of the words" (padārtha); s," which allow one to under-ce in which topics are dealt with "objections" and the "responses" nd parihāra). This is not used by commentators, but it is found havabhaṭṭa's Laghuśaṃvaravivṛti ntary on the Guhyasamājatantra ākaraśānti (early 11th cent.), both e verse of the Vyākhyāyukti that ive (Laghuśaṃvaravivṛti page 2, s printed requiring some correc-ali D 1851, rgyud, ti, 202b7). ly used than Vasubandhu's five t exclusively tantric, nor exclut of three, four or sometimes five: (abhidhāna; the most frequently ems); "content" or "subject mat-connection" (sambandha); "aim"
"aim of the aim", that is higher (prayojanaprayojana). The term onnection) is sometimes used dary literature, and is attested in s, but in none that might be as c Buddhist commentaries dealt et of minimally three of these is of tantric commentators. There ever, including important ones śānti, who do not make use of xpositions of these categories by e often not very different from tric authors. The ultimate goal ed to be the attainment of the , often referred to with the term but sometimes with other s "attaining the state/level of the (thus in Ratnarakṣita's commenarodayatantra). One difference xegesis that is seen not infre-subject matter or content of a

---

tantra is said to be the deity with whom that tantra is concerned (who is normally at the same time the buddha who is the teacher of the tantra).

A set of hermeneutical categories that has received some attention from modern authors (Matsunaga, 1963, 1964; Steinkellner, 1978; Broido, 1983; Seyfort Ruegg, 1985) is the ṣaṭkoṭi (lit. six points). The standard terms for these six categories, which are divided into three pairs, are: sandhyābhāṣā ("intentional speech"); nosandhyā/nāsandhyā ("nonintentional [speech]"); neyārtha ("meaning that requires to be drawn out," deep meaning); nītārtha ("meaning that has been [fully] drawn out," i.e. surface meaning); yathāruta ("literal"); and naruta ("non-literal"). The locus classicus for these is the famous commentary Pradīpoddyotana on the Guhyasamājatantra by (a) Candrakīrti (10th cent. [?]), a commentary which is indeed also known as Ṣaṭkoṭivyākhyā (The Six Points Commentary). They are presented there as the third in a set which is referred to as the seven-fold alaṃkāra ("ornament," for which Steinkellner proposes in this context the translation "preparation"; 1978, 450):

1. "introduction" (upodghāta), which is fivefold, consisting of a discussion of the name of the tantra, the reason why it was composed, the author (in the case of the Guhyasamājatantra this is said to be Vajrasattva), the size of the text, and its goals;
2. "method" (nyāya), which is fourfold, consisting of "continuity"/"lineage" (santāna), "foundation" (nidāna), "explanation" (nirukti), and "[direct] cause" (hetu), all of these four being said to be different in the case of tantric Buddhism from the corresponding elements in non-tantric Buddhism;
3. the "six points" (see above);
4. "explanation" (vyākhyā or ākhyāyikā), which is fourfold, consisting of the "meaning of the phonemes" (akṣarārtha), "overall" or "general meaning" (samastāṅga), "hidden" (garbhī), and "ultimate" (kolika), with further subdivisions;
5. "teaching" (vyākhyāna or ākhyāna), which is twofold, "teaching to a group" (satravyākhyāna) and "teaching to individual students" (śiṣyākhyāna);
6. "person" (pudgala), which is five-fold, five different types/levels of students being distinguished; and finally
7. the "practice of the stage of the perfected" (niṣpannakramasādhana).

It has been suggested that it is Candrakīrti himself who created this super system of the sevenfold alaṃkāra, drawing together elements found in explanatory tantras and sādhanas (Steinkellner, 1978, 457). For the "six points," which appear to be the most widely used of the seven-fold alaṃkāra, Candrakīrti quotes a passage from the Vajramālātantra, an explanatory tantra of the Guhyasamāja, that provides an already rather detailed framework, which Candrakīrti may have elaborated on to some extent. In any case, the application of the "six points" in his own exegesis of the Guhyasamājatantra was regarded by later authors as exemplary.

Although the "six points' are also alluded to by Kālacakra commentators, they seem to have been of major importance only within the Ārya school of the Guhyasamāja. Some Tibetan authors, including the polymath genius (and Sanskrit scholar, trained by Indian paṇḍits) Sa skya Paṇḍita (Kun dga' rgyal mtshan, 1182–1251), claimed that the "six points" system is to be used in the exegesis of sūtras as well as tantras (see e.g. Seyfort Ruegg, 1985, 310), but no Indian author is known to have applied the "six points" outside of tantric exegesis, or even to have mentioned such a possibility.

Several of the items included within the "six points" play, however, a role in tantric exegesis even outside that set. The most important of these is sandhyābhāṣā (variants found on this term include sandhyābhāṣa, neuter instead of feminine, sandhyāvacana, sandhāyabhāṣā, and sandhyāyabhāṣita), a term which has received some attention from scholars over almost a century. It is now generally understood to be derived from sandhi in the sense of "intention"; indeed Ratnākaraśānti analyses the compound in his commentary on Hevajratantra 2.3.1 as meaning "speaking with a [covert] intention." A number of scriptures, as well as commentaries, use sandhyābhāṣā as a term for words or phrases which are "intentional," that is to say which are not to be understood in their normal literal sense but in a secondary, metaphorical one. In some cases the words are very rare in Sanskrit, and in a few cases there is a possibility that they are Dravidian in origin. It is not always clear what the basis is for the secondary usage. Relatively obvious cases are bala (lit. strength) as sandhyābhāṣā for "meat" (eating meat is believed to cause strength) or niraṃśuka (lit. without clothes) for "ornaments made of bone," which are among the sandhyābhāṣās taught in Hevajratantra 2.3.55–63.

The vast majority of Buddhist tantric exegetical works is written in prose, though usually there are, of course, some verses, especially at the beginning and end. Commentaries written entirely in verse (a form not uncommon in other areas, with several particularly notable examples, both in Śaiva Tantra and in non-tantric Buddhism) are rare; an exceptional case is the Bodhicittavivaraṇa of

(a) Nāgārjuna, which should be understood as a commentary on a verse from the second chapter of the Guhyasamājatantra (2.3+). It should however be noted that verses quoted by the Kālacakra commentators with attribution to the large root *tantra*s that are not available to ordinary humans can be seen as basically exegetical in nature.

Authority and Status of Commentaries

When recent scholarship discusses the authority and status of commentaries on Buddhist tantric scriptures, it focuses, in part, on the fact that in cases where multiple commentaries on the same scripture are available, they often seem to differ significantly in their interpretations. R. Davidson drew the conclusion that commentaries are "independent moments in the domestication of the [Buddhakapālatantra]," whose primary purposes were "to lessen the force of the scripture's extreme content and to move the text into a symbolic realm approachable by normative Buddhist praxis" (Davidson, 2002, 250). A. Sanderson concludes from the "high degree of divergence between the various Buddhist commentators" that they were tried to make sense of material borrowed from Śaiva literature, but lacking "existing Buddhist sources and with no central authority to impose consistency on their efforts they were bound to diverge" (Sanderson, 2009, 216). C. Wedemeyer, finding R. Davidson's suggestions "problematic," suggests instead that

> [t]he fact of commentarial divergence does cast doubt on the notion of a preexistent, secret interpretation hidden via a code. However, it is rather a logical leap then to assert that the original meaning must have been literal. Although little has been established concerning the sociology of scholastic commentary in Buddhist India, some degree of diversity is certainly to be expected, given the diversity of ideological (social, institutional, cultural) commitments of their authors. (Wedemeyer, 2013, 236–237n23)

These three different perspectives on the divergences between commentaries all have something that is worth considering, although we agree with C. Wedemeyer that some of R. Davidson's ideas are problematic, and we cannot follow the latter when he takes a further step, suggesting that "[i]n reality, one of the primary motivations for the above commentarial hermeneutic was as a subtle form of criticism, taking the scriptural authors to task for real or imagined transgressions of behavioral norms" (Davidson, 2002, 252).

While commentaries should always be studied and taken into account as thoroughly as possible, what they are evidence for is, in the first place, their own author's thought, and their own historical and cultural context, rather than that of the object of exegesis. From a scholarly and historical point of view, no commentary, be it on a tantric or non-tantric text, can ever be regarded as having absolute authority in the interpretation of the text commented on. This applies even to auto-commentary; there may be interpretations which the author does not mention, for instance because they are to be left to be understood by the well-informed student or to be supplied orally by a teacher, and there may be interpretations which amount to later second thoughts, diverging from the same author's original intention. A work of exegesis always presents a subjective perspective (which may be complex and multifaceted, itself including more than one viewpoint, perhaps with more than one origin), rather than an absolute and thus a-historical, "objective" view.

While R. Davidson, A. Sanderson and C. Wedemeyer have highlighted cases in which Buddhist commentators disagreed with each other to a striking degree, to think that this is invariably the case when we have multiple commentaries on a scripture would be mistaken. There are also cases in which multiple commentaries show a perhaps no less striking degree of agreement, sometimes with numerous close verbal parallels. Clearly some tantric commentators were not reluctant to take over passages verbatim or nearly so from predecessors (see e.g. the remarks on Abhayākaragupta below).

Extent of Surviving Literature and State of Research

The extent of surviving Indian tantric commentarial literature cannot be determined accurately at present, especially because of the lack of scholarly access to some thousands of (mainly palm-leaf) manuscripts of Buddhist texts, a large percentage of which is likely to prove to contain tantric literature, in Tibet. For the sake of description we can divide the commentaries into three groups: commentaries on scriptures, commentaries on independent treatises/works, and subcommentaries (on either of the two previous kinds of commentary).

The following table is designed primarily to give a schematic idea of the development of studies of Buddhist tantric commentarial literature. In th first list, works are recorded in c of their first publication, with ref of the editor(s) and the date of

---

In some cases better and/or more were subsequently published; these editions are given in the bi One manuscript of particula century Kashmirian multiple now held in the Tibet Museum

Published Commentaries of Scri

Title of the comm. (and of the s Sekoddeśapañjikā
Sekoddeśaṭīkā
Yogaratnamālā (Hevajratantra)
Khasamā (Khasamatantra) Pradīpoddyotana (Guhyasamāj Vimalaprabhā (Laghukālacakra Nāmamantrārthāvalokinī (Nām
Guṇavatī (Mahāmāyātantra)
Ratnāvalī (Kṛṣṇayamāritantra)
Amṛtakaṇikā (Nāmasaṅgīti) Nāmamantrārthāvalokinī (Nām Vimalaprabhā (Laghukālacakr
Sekoddeśapañjikā
Sekoddeśaṭippanī Sañcāranibandha (Yoginīsañcā Upadeśānusāriṇī (Yoginīsañcā
Muktāvalī (Hevajratantra) Laghutantraṭīkā (Laghuśaṃva Laghuśaṃvaratantrapañjikā sgressions of behavioral norms" 52). ntaries should always be studied ccount as thoroughly as possible, dence for is, in the first place, their ught, and their own historical and ather than that of the object of exe-plarly and historical point of view, be it on a tantric or non-tantric egarded as having absolute author-etation of the text commented on.

n to auto-commentary; there may s which the author does not men-because they are to be left to be ne well-informed student or to be a teacher, and there may be inter-amount to later second thoughts, ne same author's original intention. is always presents a subjective per-may be complex and multifaceted, nore than one viewpoint, perhaps ne origin), rather than an absolute, ical, "objective" view. dson, A. Sanderson and C. Wede-hlighted cases in which Buddhist isagreed with each other to a strik-ink that this is invariably the case multiple commentaries on a scripmistaken. There are also cases in commentaries show a perhaps no ree of agreement, sometimes with verbal parallels. Clearly some tan-ors were not reluctant to take over im or nearly so from predecessors arks on Abhayākaragupta below).

rviving Literature and earch surviving Indian tantric commencannot be determined accurately at ally because of the lack of scholarly thousands of (mainly palm-leaf) Buddhist texts, a large percentage of o prove to contain tantric literature, e sake of description we can divide ies into three groups: commentaries ommentaries on independent tread subcommentaries (on either of the nds of commentary).

g table is designed primarily to give ea of the development of studies of ic commentarial literature. In the first list, works are recorded in chronological order of their first publication, with reference to the name of the editor(s) and the date of the editio princeps. In some cases better and/or more complete editions were subsequently published; full references to these editions are given in the bibliography.

One manuscript of particular interest, an 11th-century Kashmirian multiple-text manuscript now held in the Tibet Museum in Lhasa, evidently contains several commentarial works (see the transcription, which we believe to be not free of errors, published in Kawasaki [2004] of an index of contents contained in the manuscript). We have however not included these works in the list below, because of the difficulty in identifying them with certainty at present, since the indications in the index are not very precise and reproductions of only a very few folios of the manuscript are accessible.

Published Commentaries of Scriptures

Title of the comm. (and of the scripture)	Author	Part Published	Editor(s) & Date of editio princeps
Sekoddeśapañjikā	(unknown)	incomplete	Kielhorn, 1894 (repr. with corr. in Tsukamoto, et al., 1989, 519–520)
Sekoddeśaṭīkā	Nāropā	incomplete	Carelli, 1941
Yogaratnamālā (Hevajratantra)	Kṛṣṇācārya (also known as Kāṇha)	complete	Snellgrove, 1959
Khasamā (Khasamatantra)	Ratnākaraśānti	complete	Upadhyaya, 1983
Pradīpoddyotana (Guhyasamājatantra)	Candrakīrti	complete	Chakravarti, 1984
Vimalaprabhā (Laghukālacakratantra)	Puṇḍarīka	chapters 1–2	Upadhyaya, 1986
Nāmamantrārthāvalokinī (Nāmasaṅgīti)	Vilāsavajra	chapters 3–4	Sakurai, 1988
Guṇavatī (Mahāmāyātantra)	Ratnākaraśānti	complete	Rinpoche & Dvivedī, 1992
Ratnāvalī (Kṛṣṇayamāritantra)	Kumāracandra	complete	Rinpoche & Dvivedī, 1992
Amṛtakaṇikā (Nāmasaṅgīti)	Raviśrījñāna	complete	Lal, 1994
Nāmamantrārthāvalokinī (Nāmasaṅgīti)	Vilāsavajra	chapters 1–5	Tribe, 1994, diss.
Vimalaprabhā (Laghukālacakratantra)	Puṇḍarīka	chapters 3–5	Dvivedī & Bahulkar, 1994
Sekoddeśapañjikā	(unknown)	incomplete	Taishō team, 1994
Sekoddeśaṭippanī	Sādhuputra Śrīdharānanda	complete	Gnoli, 1997
Sañcāranibandha (Yoginīsañcāratantra)	Tathāgatarakṣita	complete	Pandey, 1998
Upadeśānusāriṇī (Yoginīsañcāratantra)	Alakakalaśa	complete	Pandey, 1998
Muktāvalī (Hevajratantra)	Ratnākaraśānti	complete	Tripathi & Negi, 2001
Laghutantraṭīkā (Laghuśaṃvaratantra)	Vajrapāṇi	complete	Cicuzza, 2001
Laghuśaṃvaratantrapañjikā	Jayabhadra	complete	Sugiki, 2001

(cont.)

Title of the comm. (and of the scripture)	Author	Part Published	Editor(s) & Date of editio princeps
Cakrasaṃvaravivṛti (Laghuśaṃvaratantra)	Bhavabhaṭṭa	complete	Pandey, 2002
Katipayākṣarā Pañjikā (Herukābhyudayatantra)	Kumāracandra	complete	Dhīḥ 37, 2004
Ṣaṭsāhasrikā (Hevajratantra)	Vajragarbha	chapters 1–8 (last ch. incomplete)	Shendge, 2004
Sekoddeśaṭīkā	Nāropā	complete	Sferra, 2006
Āmnāyamañjarī (Sampuṭatantra)	Abhayākaragupta	incomplete	Kano & Tomabechi, 2008
Catuṣpīṭhanibandha (Catuṣpīṭhatantra)	Bhavabhaṭṭa	incomplete	Szántó, 2008, 2012, diss.
Catuṣpīṭhapañjikā	Kalyāṇavarman	incomplete	Szántó, 2008
Mitapadā (Catuṣpīṭhatantra)	Durjayacandra	incomplete	Szántó, 2008
Ṣaṭsāhasrikā (Hevajratantra)	Vajragarbha	chapter 1	Sferra, 2009
Ṣaṭsāhasrikā (Hevajratantra)	Vajragarbha	chapter 10	Sferra, 2009
Abhayapaddhati (Buddhakapālatantra)	Abhayākaragupta	complete	Chog, 2009
Padminī (Saṃvarodayatantra)	Ratnarakṣita	chapters 13 (incomplete), 22	Kuranishi 2014, Tanemura 2014
Sahajālokapañjikā (Kṛṣṇayamāritantra)	Śrīdhara	incomplete	Kuranishi, published online

Published Commentaries of Independent Treatises/Works

Title of the comm. (and of the text)	Author	Part published	Editor(s) & Date of editio princeps
Pañcakramaṭippaṇī	Parahitarakṣita	complete	La Vallée Poussin, 1896
Kudṛṣṭinirghātādivākyaṭippinikā	Advayavajra	complete	Shastri, 1927
Dohākośapañjikā (Dohākośa by Saraha)	Advayavajra (?)	complete	Bagchi, 1938
Mekhalāṭīkā (Dohākośa by Kāṇha)	(anonymous)	complete	Bagchi, 1938
Sārārthapañjikā (Dohākośa by Tillopāda)	(anonymous)	complete	Bagchi, 1938
Caryāgītikośavṛtti	Munidatta	complete	Bagchi, 1956
Mahāsukhaprakāśikā (Tattvajñānasaṃsiddhi)	Jñānacandra/ Dhyānacandra	complete	The Dharmodaya Sabha, 1956
Guṇabharaṇī (Ṣaḍaṅgayoga)	Raviśrījñāna	complete	Grönbold, 1969
Kriyāsaṃgrahapañjikā	Kuladatta	chapter 6.5	Sakurai, 1988–1996

rt blished	Editor(s) & Date of editio princeps
mplete	Pandey, 2002
mplete	Dhīḥ 37, 2004
apters 3 (last ch. complete)	Shendge, 2004
mplete	Sferra, 2006
omplete	Kano & Tomabechi, 2008
omplete	Szántó, 2008, 2012, diss.
omplete	Szántó, 2008
omplete	Szántó, 2008
pter 1	Sferra, 2009
pter 10	Sferra, 2009
nplete	Chog, 2009
pters 13 complete),	Kuranishi 2014, Tanemura 2014
mplete	Kuranishi, published online

d	Editor(s) & Date of editio princeps
	La Vallée Poussin, 1896
	Shastri, 1927
	Bagchi, 1938
	Bagchi, 1938
	Bagchi, 1938
	Bagchi, 1956
	The Dharmodaya Sabha, 1956
	Grönbold, 1969
5	Sakurai, 1988–1996

(cont.)

Title of the comm. (and of the text)	Author	Part published	Editor(s) & Date of editio princeps
Rahasyadīpikā (Vasantatilakā)	Vanaratna	complete	Rinpoche & Dvivedī, 1990
Yogimanoharā (Pañcakrama)	Muniśrībhadra	complete	Jiang & Tomabechi, 1996
Tattvaratnāvalokavivaraṇa	Vāgīśvarakīrti	complete	Pandey, 1996
Kriyāsaṃgrahapañjikā	Kuladatta	chapter 7	Tanemura, 1997
Sāramañjarī Samantabhadrasādhanaṭīkā	Samantabhadra	incomplete	Tanaka, 1997
Marmakalikāpañjikā (Tattvajñānasaṃsiddhi)	Vīryaśrīmitra	complete	Pandey, 2000
Dohākośaṭīkā (Dohākośa by Kṛṣṇavajra)	Amṛtavajra	complete	Dhīḥ 32, 2001
Kriyāsaṃgrahapañjikā	Kuladatta	chapter 3.6	Mori, 2003
Kriyāsaṃgrahapañjikā	Kuladatta	chapters 1.4, 3.3, 3.5, 6.8.8	Tanemura, 2004
Cakraśaṃvarābhisamayaṭīkā	Prajñārakṣita	complete	Sakurai, 2005; Dhīḥ 53 (with attribution to Śāśvatavajra)
Guhyāvalīvivṛti	Ghanadeva	complete	Dhīḥ 46, 2008
Sekanirdeśapañjikā	Rāmapāla	complete	Isaacson & Sferra, 2014

Published Subcommentaries

Title of the comm. (and of the text	Author	Part published	Editor(s) & Date of editio princeps
Amṛtakaṇikoddyotanibandha (Amṛtakaṇikā)	Vibhūticandra	complete	Lal, 1994

Commentaries and Subcommentaries extant in manuscripts but not published

Title of the comm. (and of the text)	Author	Part published	Editor(s) & Date of editio princeps
Advayasiddhiṭīkā	(unknown)	complete (?)	TAR
Anāvilatantrapañjikā	Kumāracandra	complete	TAR
Amṛtadharā (Vajrāmṛtatantra)	Śrībhānu	complete	TAR (ed. under preparation)
Ekavṛkṣādipañjikā	[an] Āryadeva	incomplete	Kathmandu, National Archives; Asiatic Society, Calcutta

(cont.)

Title of the comm. (and of the text)	Author	Part published	Editor(s) & Date of editio princeps
Comm. on Kalyāṇakāmadhenu	Nāgārjuna	complete	Kathmandu, National Archives; TAR
Kramakaumudī (Pañcakrama)	Abhayākaragupta	complete	TAR
Comm. on Guhyasamājanidāna	Līlāvajra	incomplete	TAR
Guhyāvalīṭīkā	(unknown)	incomplete	Kathmandu, National Archives
Gūḍhapadā (Nāmasaṅgīti)	(Advayavajra [evidently different from the well-known author of that name])	complete	London, Royal Asiatic Society
Catuṣpīṭhamaṇḍalopāyikāyāścaturthapaṭalabhāṣitamantroddhāralakṣaṇasyapañjikā	anonymous	incomplete	Kathmandu, National Archives
Candraprabhā (Guhyasamājatantra)	*Pramuditākaravarman	incomplete	TAR
Ḍākinīvajrapañjaraṭippati	(anonymous)	complete	Kathmandu, Kaiser Library
Tattvajñānasaṃsiddhiṭippaṇī	Daśabalaśrīmitra	complete	London, Royal Asiatic Society; TAR
Tattvaviṣadā (Ḍākinīvajrapañjaratantra)	Mahāmatideva	incomplete	Kathmandu, National Archives & Kaiser Library (ed. under preparation)
Tattvaviṣadā (Laghuśaṃvaratantra)	Śāśvatavajra	complete (?)	TAR
Trisamayarājaṭīkā	(unknown)	incomplete	Kathmandu, National Archives; TAR
Trivajraratnāvalīmālikā (Hevajratantra)	Kelikuliśa	complete	TAR
Pañcakramapañjikā	Samayavajra	incomplete	TAR
Padmāṅkuranibandha (Hevajratantra ?)	Padmāṅkura	incomplete (?)	TAR
Padmāvatī (Caṇḍamahāroṣaṇatantra)	Mahāsukhavajrapāda	complete	Kathmandu, National Archives
Prakaraṇārthanirṇaya (Saṃpuṭatantra)	(unknown)	incomplete	Kathmandu, Kaiser Library

rt blished	Editor(s) & Date of editio princeps
nplete	Kathmandu, National Archives; TAR
nplete	TAR
omplete	TAR
omplete	Kathmandu, National Archives
nplete	London, Royal Asiatic Society
omplete	Kathmandu, National Archives
mplete	TAR
plete	Kathmandu, Kaiser Library
plete	London, Royal Asiatic Society; TAR
nplete	Kathmandu, National Archives & Kaiser Library (ed. under preparation)
lete (?)	TAR
nplete	Kathmandu, National Archives; TAR
lete	TAR
nplete	TAR
nplete	TAR
ete	Kathmandu, National Archives
plete	Kathmandu, Kaiser Library

(cont.)

Title of the comm. (and of the text)	Author	Part published	Editor(s) & Date of editio princeps
Pradīpoddyotanoddyota	*Karuṇāśrī	complete	TAR
Mahāmāyāpañjikā*	*Śrībhūṣaṇa/ *Alaṅkāraśrī (?)	incomplete	University of Tokyo
Ratnāvalī (Hevajratantra)	Kamalanātha	complete	Kathmandu, Kaiser Library
Vajrapradīpa ṭippanī (Hevajrasādhanopāyikā)	Jālandharipāda	complete	Kathmandu, National Archives; TAR
Vajrasattvasya ṭīkā (?)	(?)	(?)	Kathmandu (see Tsukamoto, et al. 1989, 510)
Vajrāmṛtapañjikā	*Vimalabhadra	complete (?)	TAR
Vohitā (Ḍākārṇavatantra)	*Padmavajra	incomplete	Kathmandu, National Archives
Vyavastholinibandha	Līlāvajra	complete	TAR
Sadāmnāyānusāriṇī (Saṃvarodayatantra)	(unknown)	incomplete	Kathmandu, National Archives
Sarvarahasyanibandha (Sarvarahasyatantra)	Ratnākaraśānti	complete	TAR (ed. under preparation)
Sādhananidhi (Laghuśaṃvaratantra)	Kambala	complete	Kathmandu, National Archives; TAR
Sāramañjarī Caturaṅgasādhanaṭīkā	Samantabhadra	complete (severely damaged)	TAR
Sūtakamelāpakaṇibandha	Līlāvajra	complete	TAR
Sūtakamelāpakavivṛti (?)	Kuloka (?)	complete	TAR (NB that this work has been wrongly identified by Sāṅkṛtyāyana [1937, 38] and others who followed him as Pañcakramavivṛti)
Svādhiṣṭhānakramavivṛti	(anonymous)	complete	TAR

Influential Commentators and Their Work

Like many tantric scriptures, many commentaries can now only be studied in Tibetan translation. This loss affects not only minor works, but also those written by celebrated authors, for instance, the works by Vajrapāṇi (11th cent.), one of the main disciples of Advayavajra (also known as Maitreyanātha, Maitrīpā, etc.), which were certainly influential in his time and also important for the later Bka' brgyud school. The original Sanskrit of none of his works (e.g. D 2255, D 2299, D 3716) has been identified in library collections to date.

Important commentaries lost in their original language are, just to quote a few examples, the commentary by *Buddhaguhya/*Buddhagupta (late 8th cent. CE) on the Mahāvairocanābhisambodhitantra; the numerous exegeses by Ānandagarbha (9th cent. CE), including two commentaries, a shorter and a longer, on the Paramādyatantra (his commentarial works include also exegeses on Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha, Sarvadurgatipariśodhanatantra, Māyājālatantra, Sarvabuddhasamāyoga [lost, but known to have existed from a reference in Mahāmatideva's commentary Tattvaviṣadā on the Ḍākinīvajrapañjaratantra], Sarvakalpasamuccaya, and Guhyasamājatantra); the exegetical works belonging to the cycle of the Sarvabuddhasamāyogatantra, among which the pañjikā by Śākyamitra (D 1661/P 2533) and the pañjikā by *Praśāntamitra (D 1663/P 2535), both likely composed in the 9th century CE; the two commentaries on the Hevajratantra written by *Ṭaṅkādāsa/*Kāyastha (10th–11th cent.) and Dharmakīrti (11th cent. [?]), the Suviṣadasampuṭahevajraṭīkā (translated twice in Tibetan: D 1184/P 2314, D 1190/P 2321) and the Netrodghāṭanapañjikā* (D 1191/P 2320) respectively; the commentarial works by Smṛtijñānakīrti (10th–11th cent. [?]), for instance the Bodhicittavivaraṇaṭīkā (D 1829/P 2694), the Guhyasamājavṛtti* (D 1914/P 2777), the Caturdevīparipṛcchāvyākhyāna* (D 1915/P 2778), and two commentaries on the Mañjuśrīnāmasaṅgīti (D 2538/P 3361, D 2584/P 3411).

Such commentaries, extant now only in translation, will not be considered here, nor will commentaries on Indian tantric scriptures composed in other languages such as Tibetan or Chinese. Of course we have cases of masters whose commentarial production is partly or completely available in Sanskrit. In this case, the study of the commentaries can be extended to, for example, the authors' style, their use of the language, the peculiarities of their terminology, and other aspects which are hard or impossible to study if texts are only available in translation. A thorough analysis of the tantric commentarial works extant in Sanskrit from these perspectives would go beyond the limits of this article. Here only a few words are said about some of the authors and works, in chronological order, that have been most influential.

One of the earliest commentators is Vilāsavajra, who probably lived in the 8th century CE (Tribe, 1994, 9–23). At the very beginning of his voluminous commentary on the Mañjuśrīnāmsaṅgīti, the Nāmamantrārthāvalokinī (D 2533/P 3356), perhaps the oldest of the Buddhist tantric commentaries presently available in Sanskrit, he states that he writes this text after having studied Buddhist works and keeping in mind the teachings of his guru lineage. Actually he does not mention specific texts, but lists the main categories to which they belong, which include the *kriyātantra*s, the caryātantras, the *yogatantra*s, the Pāramitānaya, the Sūtra and Abhidharma collections, and other Buddhist and even worldly, that is non-Buddhist, works (Tribe, 1994, 66, 210). Among the *yogatantra*s he "evidently includes texts such as the Guhyasamāja, Vajrabhairava, and Sarvabuddhasamāyoga, since he quotes these and other related works" (Sanderson, 2009, 146). The names of Mañjuśrī are interpreted from a Yogācāra perspective in a quite sophisticated ritual framework with Mañjuśrī as the main deity of the maṇḍala. Because of his early date, Vilāsavajra's quotations have proved important for establishing a terminus ante quem for the composition of a number of texts, both tantric (see above) and non-tantric, such as the Ālokamālā by Kambala.

Candrakīrti (10th cent.[?]), one of the more important exponents of the Ārya school, not to be confused with the Madhyamaka master of the 7th century CE, composed a famous commentary on the Guhyasamājatantra, the Pradīpoddyotanaṭīkā Ṣaṭkoṭivyākhyā. This commentary is perhaps the most large-scale attempt to apply the exegetical system of the seven-fold alaṃkāra and, in particular, the "six points" (see above). After the Vimalaprabhā and the currently almost inaccessible Āmnāyamañjarī (Abhayākaragupta's commentary on the Sampuṭatantra, see below), the Pradīpoddyotana is probably the largest Indian commentary on a Buddhist tantra extant in Sanskrit. It is also a difficult work, and it is not surprising that it received several subcommentaries, of which one at least survives in Sanskrit manuscripts. The Pradīpoddyotana contains a wealth of material on a wide range of tantric topics, c one may be mentioned here: the the 14th chapter of the Guhyasam ticularly rich in information on n exegesis. This draws in part on the a work which has come down Sanskrit nor in Tibetan, and is just rare works quoted in the Pradī text certainly deserves much mor monograph-length study is J.R.B.

---

A project to translate the entire w apparently underway, at Columbi

Another commentator wort Bhavabhaṭṭa (around 1000 CE; va name include *Bhavabhadra and a Bengali master who was acti and who wrote at least four c Cakraśaṃvaravivṛti and the C which are luckily preserved the Hevajratantravivṛti* (D 118 Vajraḍākavivṛti* (D 1415/P 2131), available only in Tibetan. The mission shows Bhavabhaṭṭa's C to have been important in two centuries after his time, on the Sampuṭatantra (a tant rowed considerably from the Abhayākaragupta made e Bhavabhaṭṭa's work (see Szán commentary on the Laghuśaṃ tively rich in doctrinal materia of a lengthy and apparently ra sion on causality in the comr chapter. This interesting passag for the reader by the fact that b editions are in need of correcti

No doubt important for the of tantric Buddhism in India a masters belonging to the Kāla is, Vajrapāṇi, Vajragarbha, and likely active around the beginn and whose exegeses on the the Hevajratantra, and the L respectively were later conc (skor) by some Tibetan author

Puṇḍarīka, the most influent also wrote a commentary or saṅgīti, lost in Sanskrit (D 139 kālacakratantraṭīkā Vimalapra clopedic character of the L
It is a rather long and elabor of its parts the doxographi nent and more than in othe

, and other aspects which are hard study if texts are only available in rough analysis of the tantric com-extant in Sanskrit from these pero beyond the limits of this article.
words are said about some of the s, in chronological order, that have tial.
iest commentators is Vilāsavajra, ed in the 8th century CE (Tribe, e very beginning of his volumion the Mañjuśrīnāmsaṅgīti, the alokinī (D 2533/P 3356), perhaps Buddhist tantric commentaries e in Sanskrit, he states that he r having studied Buddhist works nd the teachings of his guru lin-does not mention specific texts, categories to which they belong, kriyātantras, the caryātantras, e Pāramitānaya, the Sūtra and tions, and other Buddhist and is non-Buddhist, works (Tribe, g the yogatantras he "evidently as the Guhyasamāja, Vajrabhai- dhasamāyoga, since he quotes lated works" (Sanderson, 2009, Mañjuśrī are interpreted from a e in a quite sophisticated ritual ñjuśrī as the main deity of the f his early date, Vilāsavajra's ed important for establishing a or the composition of a number c (see above) and non-tantric, lā by Kambala.
cent.[?]), one of the more s of the Ārya school, not to be adhyamaka master of the 7th ed a famous commentary on tra, the Pradīpoddyotanaṭīkā commentary is perhaps the empt to apply the exegetiseven-fold alaṃkāra and, in oints" (see above). After the e currently almost inacces-ī (Abhayākaragupta's compuṭatantra, see below), the probably the largest Indian ddhist tantra extant in San-lt work, and it is not surpris-several subcommentaries, of ives in Sanskrit manuscripts. contains a wealth of material on a wide range of tantric topics, out of which only one may be mentioned here: the commentary on the 14th chapter of the Guhyasamājatantra is particularly rich in information on mantras and their exegesis. This draws in part on the Vajroṣṇīṣatantra, a work which has come down to us neither in Sanskrit nor in Tibetan, and is just one of the many rare works quoted in the Pradīpoddyotana. The text certainly deserves much more study. The only monograph-length study is J.R.B. Campbell, 2009. A project to translate the entire work into English is apparently underway, at Columbia University.

Another commentator worth mentioning is Bhavabhaṭṭa (around 1000 CE; variant forms of his name include *Bhavabhadra and Bhavabhaṭa [?]), a Bengali master who was active in Vikramaśīla and who wrote at least four commentaries, the Cakraśaṃvaravivṛti and the Catuṣpīṭhanibandha, which are luckily preserved in Sanskrit, and the Hevajratantravivṛti* (D 1182/P 2312) and the Vajraḍākavivṛti* (D 1415/P 2131), which are presently available only in Tibetan. The manuscript transmission shows Bhavabhaṭṭa's Catuṣpīṭhanibandha to have been important in Nepal; and about two centuries after his time, when commenting on the Sampuṭatantra (a tantra which has borrowed considerably from the Catuṣpīṭhatantra), Abhayākaragupta made extensive use of Bhavabhaṭṭa's work (see Szántó, 2012, 9–10). His commentary on the Laghuśaṃvaratantra is relatively rich in doctrinal material, especially because of a lengthy and apparently rather original digression on causality in the commentary on the first chapter. This interesting passage is rendered harder for the reader by the fact that both of the published editions are in need of correction at many points.

No doubt important for the later developments of tantric Buddhism in India are the works of three masters belonging to the Kālacakra tradition, that is, Vajrapāṇi, Vajragarbha, and Puṇḍarīka, who were likely active around the beginning of the 11th century and whose exegeses on the Laghuśaṃvaratantra, the Hevajratantra, and the Laghukālacakratantra respectively were later conceived as a "corpus" (skor) by some Tibetan authors.

Puṇḍarīka, the most influential among those three, also wrote a commentary on the Mañjuśrīnāmasaṅgīti, lost in Sanskrit (D 1398/P 2114). His Laghukālacakratantraṭīkā Vimalaprabhā reflects the encyclopedic character of the Laghukālacakratantra. It is a rather long and elaborate exegesis; in some of its parts the doxographical intent is preeminent and more than in other works one receives the impression that the audience to whom it is addressed (directly or indirectly) is not composed solely of Buddhists, but may include also Hindus, with the intention, presumably, to warn them against the common Islamic "enemy." The text, which includes numerous technical digressions, notably on astronomy and physiology, is written in a relatively uncomplicated style, although the sometimes complex doctrines and practices of the Kālacakra, abounding in detailed correspondences between the external and the internal world, can make the exposition less than perspicuous. The author was certainly an educated person, at ease with the Indian grammatical tradition (both Pāṇinian and Buddhist) and knew many major works of Brahminical culture (e.g. Matsyapurāṇa and Manusmṛti), as evidenced by short citations and references in various parts of the work. Most of the quotations, as might be expected, however, comes from Buddhist tantric texts (e.g. Ādibuddha, the mūlatantra of the Laghukālacakratantra, which is the most frequently quoted, Guhyasamājatantra, and Hevajratantra), although there are some from dhāraṇī literature (a stanza of the Mahāvajrameruśikharakūṭāgāradhāraṇī is cited twice) and from other non-tantric Mahāyāna works, including passages from the Prajñāpāramitā literature and the Abhisamayālaṅkārakārikā.

Among other influential masters who have also composed commentaries and who were active in the 11th century is the Mahāsiddha Nāropā (first half of the 11th cent.), who spent his religious life in the two famous monasteries of Nālandā and Pullahari. He wrote works connected to various tantric cycles (for a list of his compositions see Naudou, 1968, 150). In Tibetan we have the Vajrapadasārasaṅgrahapañjikā* (D 1186/P 2316), an exegesis of the Hevajratantra, and the Sarvaguhyapradīpaṭīkā* (D 1787/P 2652), dedicated to the Samājottara. Both are attributed to a certain *Yaśobhadra from Kashmir, which, along with Naḍapāda and Nāro, is most likely simply another name of Nāropā. His only commentary presently available in Sanskrit is the Paramārthasaṅgraha, a quite detailed exegesis of the Sekoddeśa. As the author himself states in the introductory stanzas, the text relies heavily on the Vimalaprabhā by Puṇḍarīka, from which he quotes numerous passages verbatim. A significant part of the Paramārthasaṅgraha is dedicated to the explanation of the sixfold yoga (ṣaḍaṅgayoga). In a long introduction to the commentary on stanzas 24–92 of the Sekoddeśa, which are those in which, in this scripture, the yoga practice is dealt with, although in a rather cryptic way, Nāropā quotes in full three of the major expositions of the topic: the locus classicus Samājottara 133–157ab, Laghukālacakra 4.115–117, 120, 5.115–116, and the pages dedicated to this subject by Vajrapāṇi in his Laghutantraṭīkā (ed. pages 137–143). While the stanzas of the Laghukālacakratantra and the words by Vajrapāṇi are simply reproduced with only a few words of introduction (the sources are explicitly mentioned), in the first case together with the commentary by Puṇḍarīka, the Samājottara stanzas are given an apparently original interpretation, which does not rely on the words of Candrakīrti, who had quoted and commented on the above mentioned stanzas of the Samājottara in the 12th chapter of his Pradīpoddyotana, and from whom Nāropā distances himself, more or less significantly, in some points (Raviśrījñāna will do otherwise, see below).

Ratnākaraśānti, an Eastern Indian, was active at the famous monastic center of learning Vikramaśīla in the first half of the 11th century. He appears to have been one of the most learned, prolific, and admired Buddhist authors of his time. A wide range of works on tantric as well as non-tantric Buddhism are attributed to him, and he also authored a handbook of Sanskrit metre, the Chandoratnākara, and a book of ingenious riddles, the Vidagdhavismāpana. Almost certainly, however, some of the works attributed to Ratnākaraśānti are not by the celebrated author of that name. In some cases it appears that a work has been deliberately given this attribution, presumably with the aim of increasing its status or readership (Isaacson, 2010, 267). Several commentaries on tantric texts do survive in Sanskrit, however, that seem to be genuinely by one man, the famous Ratnākaraśānti. Four of these are scriptural commentaries, divided into one on a Yogatantra (the Sarvarahasyanibandha), and three on tantras of the Yoginītantra class (the Hevajratantra, the Mahāmāyātantra, and the Khasamatantra). A manuscript of Ratnākaraśānti's commentary on a non-scriptural tantric text, the Guhyasamājamaṇḍalavidhi of Dīpaṃkarabhadra, is reported to be extant (Kawasaki, 2004, 904–903). There are also two tantric commentaries attributed to Ratnākaraśānti which are only accessible at present in Tibetan translation: they are on the Guhyasamājatantra (D 1851/P 2714) and the Kṛṣṇayamāritantra (D 1919/P 2782). A commentary on the Sarvadurgatipariśodhanatantra (D 2526/P 3453) is sometimes attributed to the same author, but seems rather to be by Ānandagarbha.

Among the four scriptural commentaries accessible in Sanskrit, the commentary on the Hevajratantra, called Muktāvalī (String of Pearls) is very noticeably the longest and most elaborate. It seems that this is not merely because the scripture itself is longer than the others commented on, but rather because the commentator regarded the Hevajratantra as at the pinnacle of Buddhist teachings. He has, it seems, written almost a whole cycle of works related to the Hevajratantra; apart from the commentary itself, two practice manuals related to the two stages of tantric meditation, and a manual of the initiations, though the latter appears to have survived neither in Sanskrit nor in Tibetan translation.

The general characteristics of Ratnākaraśānti's style as a commentator are lucidity, inventiveness, and a sense of the larger picture. His inventiveness often takes the form of creative, sometimes perhaps deliberately surprising, word explanations of the nirukta type (based on similarities in sound); his sense of the larger picture is one that embraces the whole of Mahāyāna Buddhism, tantric and non-tantric. An elegant, punning verse in the opening of the commentary on the Hevajratantra in which Ratnākaraśānti states that his work shows the continuity or agreement of the sūtras and the tantras (Isaacson, 2000, 126) might be taken as programmatic not only for the work in which it is found but for all of Ratnākaraśānti's tantric exegesis.

Doctrinally Ratnākaraśānti's position can be characterized as Yogācāra, though some prefer to call him a Yogācāra-Madhyamaka. A recent upsurge in scholarly interest in Ratnākaraśānti (e.g. Moriyama, 2013) is likely to lead in due course to a better understanding of the subtleties of his position; in this reassessment of one of the most important Buddhist authors of the 11th century his tantric commentaries should certainly not be neglected.

Probably active between the 11th and the 12th century, Raviśrījñāna, a master related to the Kālacakra tantric cycle, is mainly famous for his Amṛtakaṇikā, a commentary on the Mañjuśrīnāmasaṅgīti, which is preserved in numerous Sanskrit manuscripts and which has been in turn commented on by Vibhūticandra (12th-13th cent.). Two other commentaries of his are also worth mentioning, namely, his exegeses of the two Ṣaḍaṅgayoga treatises written by Anupamarakṣita (first half of the 11th cent.), one of which, the Guṇabharaṇī, is preserved in Sanskrit, while the other is extant only in Tibetan translation (D 1368/P 2084). Although Raviśrījñāna shows, as expected, the influence of the earlier

---

Kālacakra commentators, he is nality, especially in the Amṛtakaṇ source of detailed discussions o of quotations, including many v often cited works. In the Guṇa less originality. It is noteworthy tries to make a connection wi Candrakīrti, quoting, although nation of the Samājottara stanz six members of the yoga (see abov ment of verses and comments reflects the subdivision of the S in relation to the yoga limbs ( etc.) proposed by Nāropā, a su trasts with that of Candrakīrti a latter's Ṣaḍaṅgayoga (P 4792; S

Abhayākaragupta, an East active in the 12th century at Vikramaśīla, is in many respe terpart to his predecessor of t Ratnākaraśānti. Abhayākaragu widely on both non-tantric a Buddhism, and he too was re most important teachers of hi have received patronage from family (Luo Hong, 2010, 120–12 cussing the concluding verses Abhayapaddhati). Celebrate time, several Tibetans visited Abhayākaragupta, study with in the translation of Buddhis into Tibetan.

Commentaries by Abhayā Sanskrit on two scriptures, th and the Sampuṭatantra (b well as on the Pañcakrama, t work attributed to Nāgārju two tantras commented on The Buddhakapālatantra w because Abhayākaragupta tion to this tantra and its pra tantra in his other work Sampuṭatantra perhaps b and eclectic nature. Com Abhayākaragupta the opp virtually all the main aspe dhism of his time, resulti work, the publication of wh fragment has been edited a important desideratum. It Abhayākaragupta tells us a of his tantra commentaries being commanded to do so four scriptural commentaries nskrit, the commentary on the lled Muktāvalī (String of Pearls) the longest and most elaborate.

is not merely because the scripr than the others commented on, e the commentator regarded the t the pinnacle of Buddhist teach-ms, written almost a whole cycle the Hevajratantra; apart from the f, two practice manuals related to ntric meditation, and a manual of ugh the latter appears to have sur-nskrit nor in Tibetan translation. aracteristics of Ratnākaraśānti's tator are lucidity, inventiveness, larger picture. His inventiveness rm of creative, sometimes per-surprising, word explanations of (based on similarities in sound); ger picture is one that embraces hāyāna Buddhism, tantric and gant, punning verse in the open-entary on the Hevajratantra in ānti states that his work shows agreement of the sūtras and the 2000, 126) might be taken as pro-y for the work in which it is found karaśānti's tantric exegesis.

tnākaraśānti's position can be Yogācāra, though some prefer gācāra-Madhyamaka. A recent ly interest in Ratnākaraśānti (e.g. likely to lead in due course to a ing of the subtleties of his posi-sment of one of the most impor-ors of the 11th century his tantric uld certainly not be neglected.

between the 11th and the 12th cena master related to the Kālacakra inly famous for his Amṛtakaṇikā, the Mañjuśrīnāmasaṅgīti, which umerous Sanskrit manuscripts en in turn commented on by th-13th cent.). Two other com-also worth mentioning, namely, two Ṣaḍaṅgayoga treatises writ-kṣita (first half of the 11th cent.), Guṇabharaṇī, is preserved in other is extant only in Tibetan /P 2084). Although Raviśrījñāna d, the influence of the earlier

Kālacakra commentators, he is not without originality, especially in the Amṛtakaṇikā, which is a rich source of detailed discussions of tantric topics and of quotations, including many which are from less often cited works. In the Guṇabharaṇī he shows less originality. It is noteworthy, however, that he tries to make a connection with the tradition of Candrakīrti, quoting, although silently, his explanation of the Samājottara stanzas dedicated to the six members of the yoga (see above). Still, the arrangement of verses and comments in the Guṇabharaṇī reflects the subdivision of the Samājottara stanzas in relation to the yoga limbs (pratyāhāra, dhyāna, etc.) proposed by Nāropā, a subdivision that contrasts with that of Candrakīrti and Nāgārjuna in the latter's Ṣaḍaṅgayoga (P 4792; Sferra, 2000, 16).

Abhayākaragupta, an Eastern Indian master, active in the 12th century at both Nālandā and Vikramaśīla, is in many respects a striking counterpart to his predecessor of the previous century, Ratnākaraśānti. Abhayākaragupta too has written widely on both non-tantric and tantric Mahāyāna Buddhism, and he too was regarded as one of the most important teachers of his time. He appears to have received patronage from members of the royal family (Luo Hong, 2010, 120–122, translating and discussing the concluding verses of Abhayākaragupta's Abhayapaddhati). Celebrated during his lifetime, several Tibetans visited Vikramaśīla to meet Abhayākaragupta, study with him, and seek his help in the translation of Buddhist works from Sanskrit into Tibetan.

Commentaries by Abhayākaragupta survive in Sanskrit on two scriptures, the Buddhakapālatantra and the Sampuṭatantra (both yoginītantras), as well as on the Pañcakrama, the famous Ārya school work attributed to Nāgārjuna. The choice of the two tantras commented on is somewhat striking. The Buddhakapālatantra was apparently chosen because Abhayākaragupta had a special connection to this tantra and its practice (references to this tantra in his other works confirm this); the Sampuṭatantra perhaps because of its length and eclectic nature. Commenting on it gave Abhayākaragupta the opportunity to touch on virtually all the main aspects of the tantric Buddhism of his time, resulting in an encyclopedic work, the publication of which (so far only a small fragment has been edited and translated) is a very important desideratum. It may also be noted that Abhayākaragupta tells us at the beginning of both of his tantra commentaries that he wrote them after being commanded to do so by a goddess in a dream.

Next to the similarities to Ratnākaraśānti, some important differences are to be noted. Abhayākaragupta differs from his distinguished predecessor on a number of central points of doctrine and practice. It suffices to mention two: where Ratnākaraśānti's doctrinal basis is Yogācāra (see above), Abhayākaragupta's is Madhyamaka; and the later author has devoted considerable effort to refuting a position argued for by the former, according to which the "innate bliss" (sahajānanda), the soteriologically central, because non-conceptual, highest of the four blisses, is the third bliss to arise during sexual union. Abhayākaragupta's position, for which he argues at length in passages in both of his tantra commentaries, is that it is the fourth instead. This at first sight perhaps rather trivial disagreement was one of the main debates in Indian tantric Buddhism in the 11th and 12th century; it is linked to other central questions such as the existence and nature of a "fourth consecration" (Isaacson & Sferra, 2014, 97–104).

Stylistically, Abhayākaragupta's commentaries are less striking and have a less clearly recognizable individual flavor than Ratnākaraśānti's, apart from perhaps a tendency to write a few ornate and slightly difficult verses at the beginning and end of his works. To a much greater extent than Ratnākaraśānti, he composed his commentaries making extensive use of a copy and paste method. He drew not a few sections of his works verbatim or with very minor changes from writings of Ratnākaraśānti, while other sections are borrowed from other predecessors.

Bibliography

Primary Sources

Abhayapaddhati by Abhayākaragupta: Abhayapaddhati of Abhayākaragupta: Commentary on the Buddhakapālamahātantra, ed. Chog Dorje, BIT 68, Sarnath, 2009.

Abhayapaddhati by Abhayākaragupta: Abhayākaragupta's Abhayapaddhati. Chapters 9 to 14, Critically Edited and Translated by Luo Hong with a preface by Harunaga Isaacson and Alexis Sanderson, Beijing, 2010.

Abhayapaddhati by Abhayākaragupta: Abhayākaragupta's Abhayapaddhati on the Buddhakapālatantra: Chapters 1–5, Critically Edited with English Translation by Yang Mei, diss., Georg-August-Universität Göttingen, 2015.

Āmnāyamañjarī by Abhayākaragupta: Kano Kazuo and Tomabechi Toru, "A Critical Edition and Translation of a Text Fragment from Abhayākaragupta's Āmnāyamañjarī: Göttingen, Cod.ms.sanscr.259b," TaS, 2008, 22–44.

Amṛtakaṇikā by Raviśrījñāna and Amṛtakaṇikoddyotanibandha by Vibhūticandra: Āryamañjuśrīnāmasaṃgīti with Amṛtakaṇikā-ṭippaṇī by Bhikṣu Raviśrījñāna and Amṛtakaṇikoddyota-nibandha of Vibhūticandra, ed. Banarsi Lal, BIB 30, Sarnath, 1994.

Cakrasaṃvarābhisamayaṭīkā by Prajñārakṣita: "Śrīcakrasam barābhisamayavyākhyā by Śāśvatavajra," [no name of the editor(s) given,] Dhīḥ, 53 (2013), 125–136.

Cakraśaṃvarābhisamayaṭīkā by Prajñārakṣita: Sakurai Munenobu, "Prajñārakṣita Cakrasaṃvarābhisamaya 註」," in: Mandara no shosō to bunka: Yoritomi Motohiro Hakushi Kanreki Kinen Ronbun (マンダラの諸相と文化 賴富本宏博士還曆記念論文集), Kyōto, 2005, 85–100 (890–875); idem, "Prajñārakṣita Cakrasaṃvarābhisamaya (註」)," JCS 68, 2005, 161–185.

Cakrasaṃvaravivṛti by Bhavabhaṭṭa: Śrīherukābhidhānam Cakrasaṃvaratantram with the Vivṛti Commentary of Bhavabhaṭṭa, 2 vols., ed. Janārdana Śāstrī Pāṇḍeya, RBTS 26, Sarnath, 2002.

Caryāgītikośavṛtti by Munidatta: Caryāgītikoṣa, Caryāgītikoṣa of Buddhist Siddhas, Edited and Annotated by Bagchi, Prabodh Chandra, in Collaboration with Śānti Bhikṣu Śāstrī, Santiniketan, 1956.

Caryāgītikośavṛtti by Munidatta: P. Kværne, An Anthology of Buddhist Tantric Songs: A Study of the Caryāgīti, DNVA. DHFK 14, Oslo 1977, ²1986.

Catuṣpīṭhanibandha by Bhavabhaṭṭa: P.-D. Szántó, "A Critical Edition of Catuṣpīṭhatantra I.3. with Three Sanskrit Commentaries," TaS 1, 2008, 2–21.

Catuṣpīṭhanibandha by Bhavabhaṭṭa: P.-D. Szántó, "Selected Chapters from the Catuṣpīṭhatantra," 2 vols., diss., Oxford University, 2012.

Catuṣpīṭhapañjikā by Kalyāṇavarman: P.-D. Szántó, "A Critical Edition of Catuṣpīṭhatantra I.3. with Three Sanskrit Commentaries," TaS 1, 2008, 2–21.

Dohākośapañjikā by Advayavajra (?): Dohākoṣa (Apabhraṃśa Texts of the Sahajayāna School). Part I (Texts and Commentaries), ed. P.C. Bagchi, CaSS 25c, Calcutta 1938.

Dohākośaṭīkā by Amṛtavajra: 'Dohākoṣa of Kṛṣṇavajrapāda with Commentary by Paṇḍita Amṛtavajra', Dhīḥ 32, 2001, 127–155.

Guhyasamājapradīpodyotanaṭīkā Ṣaṭkoṭivyākhyā of Ācārya Candrakīrti, Chapters III–VI, Dhīḥ 49, 2010, 105–136.

Guhyasamājapradīpodyotanaṭīkā Ṣaṭkoṭivyākhyā of Ācārya Candrakīrti, Chapters VII–IX, Dhīḥ 50, 2010, 97–130.

Guhyasamājapradīpodyotanaṭīkā Ṣaṭkoṭivyākhyā of Ācārya Candrakīrti, Chapter X, Dhīḥ 52, 2012, 109–118.

Guhyāvalīvivṛti by Ghanadeva: "Guhyāvalī of Siddhācārya Dauḍīpāda with Vivṛti by Paṇḍitasthavira Śrīghanadeva," Dhīḥ 46, 2008, 113–130.

Guṇabharaṇī by Raviśrījñāna: Raviśrījñāna's Guṇabharaṇī nāma Ṣaḍaṅgayogaṭippaṇī, mit Text, Übersetzung und literarhistorischem Kommentar, ed. G. Grönbold, diss., Fakultät der Ludwig-Maximilians-Universität zu München, 1969.

Guṇabharaṇī by Raviśrījñāna: The Ṣaḍaṅgayoga by Anupamarakṣita with Raviśrījñāna's Guṇabharaṇīnāmaṣaḍaṅgayogaṭippaṇī: Text and Annotated Translation, ed. F. Sferra, SOR 85, Rome, 2000.

Guṇavatī by Ratnākaraśānti: Mahāmāyātantra with Guṇavatī by Ratnākaraśānti, ed. S. Rinpoche & V. Dwivedi, RBTS 10, Sarnath, 1992.

Katipayākṣarā Pañjikā by Kumāracandra: "Katipayākṣarāpañjikā of Kumāracandra on Herukābhyudayamahāyoginītantrarāja," Dhīḥ 37, 2004, 149–170.

Khasamā by Ratnākaraśānti: "Khasamatantrasya ācāryaratnākaraśāntiviracitā khasamā-nāmaṭīkā," ed. Jagannātha Upādhyāya, SP 1, 1983, 225–255.

Kriyāsaṃgrahapañjikā by Kuladatta (chs. 1.4, 3.3, 3.5, 6.8.8): Kuladatta's, a Critical Edition and Annotated Translation of Selected Sections by Ryugen Tanemura, Groningen, 2004.

Kriyāsaṃgrahapañjikā by Kuladatta (ch. 3.6): Mori Masahide, "密教文献に説かれるヴァーストゥナーガ" (Mikkyō Bunken ni tokareru Vāstunāga), MBKK 16, 2003, 172–144 (21–49).

Kriyāsaṃgrahapañjikā by Kuladatta (ch. 6.5): Sakurai Munenobu, "Kriyāsaṃgrahapañjikā no Kanjōron (1): Bin-Kanjō no Bonbun-Kōtei-Tekusuto oyobi Kōsatsu," CG 37, 1988, 13–46; idem, "Kriyāsaṃgrahapañjikā no Kanjōron (2): Himitsu-Kanjō," Ronshū 15, 1988, 128–106; idem, "Kriyāsaṃgrahapañjikā no Kanjōron (3): Hannyachi-Kanjō," Ronshū 16, 1989, 118–196; idem, "Kriyāsaṃgrahapañjikā no Kanjōron (4): Daiyon-Kanjō, Bonbun-Kōtei-Tekusuto," MBu 181, 1989, 113–106; idem, Indo mikkyō girei kenkyū: kōki Indo mikkyō no kanchō shidai (インド密教儀礼研究 – 後期インド密教の灌頂次第 – A Study of Indian Esoteric Ritual – Consecration in Late Indian Tantric Buddhism), Kyoto, 1996.

Kriyāsaṃgrahapañjikā by Kuladatta (ch. 7): Tanemura Ryugen, Kriyāsaṃgraha of Kuladatta. Chapter VII, BIeB 7, Tokyo 1997.

Kudṛṣṭinirghātādivākyaṭippinikā by Advayavajra: Advayavajrasaṃgraha, ed. Haraprasada Shastri, GaOS 40, Baroda, 1927.

Kudṛṣṭinirghātādivākyaṭippinikā by Advayavajra: 「アドヴァヤヴァジュラ著作集:梵文テキスト・和訳」(Advayavajra chosakushū: bonbun tekisuto · wayaku; Advayavajrasaṃgraha – New Critical Edition with Japanese translation), publ. Mikkyō seiten kenkyūkai (密教聖典研究会), TDSBKN 10, 1988, 231–178 (1–57).

Laghuśaṃvaratantrapañjikā by Jayabhadra: "Jayabhadra 作 Śrīcakrasaṃvarapañjikā 校訂梵本"」(Cakrasaṃvaratantra no seiritsu dankai ni tsuite – oyobi Jayabhadra saku Śrīcakrasaṃvarapañjikā kōtei bonpon; On the making of Śrīcakrasaṃvaratantra – with a Critical Sanskrit Text of Jayabhadra's Śrīcakrasaṃvarapañjikā), ed. Sugiki Tsunehiko, JCS 64, 2001, 94–141.

Laghuśaṃvaratantravivṛti: Śrīherukābhidhānam Cakrasaṃvaratantram with the Vivṛti Commentary of Bhavabhaṭṭa, 2 vols, ed. Janārdana Śāstrī Pāṇḍeya, RBTS 26, Sarnath, 2002.

Laghutantraṭīkā by Vajrapāṇi: The Laghutantraṭīkā by Vajrapāṇi, ed. C. Cicuzza, SOR 86, Rome, 2001.

Mahāsukhaprakāśikā by Jñānacandra/Dhyānacandra: Tattvajnānasaṃsiddhiḥ Mahāsukhaprakāśikā, DG 37, Kathmandu, 1956.

Marmakalikāpañjikā by Vīryaśrīmitra: Tattvajñānasaṃsiddhiḥ of Śūnyasamādhipāda With Marmakalikāpañjikā of Vīryaśrīmitra, ed. Janārdana Śāstrī Pāṇḍeya, RBTS 23, Sarnath, 2000.

Mekhalāṭīkā: Dohākoṣa (Apabhraṃśa Texts of the Sahajayāna School): Part I (Texts and Commentaries), ed. P.C. Bagchi, CaSS 25c, Calcutta, 1938.

Mitapadā by Durjayacandra: P.-D. Szán of Catuṣpīṭhatantra I.3. with Three ies," TaS 1, 2008, 2–21.
Muktāvalī by Ratnākaraśānti: Hevajrat
Pañjikā of Mahāpaṇḍitācārya
R.S. Tripathi & T.S. Negi, BIT 48, Sar
Nāmamantrāvalokinī by Vilāsavajra
Munenobu, "A Study on the Nāmam
A Critical Text of Its Chapters III & I 323–354.
Nāmamantrāvalokinī by Vilāsavajra ( Wisdom: A Critical Edition and An Chapters 1–5 of Vilāsavajra's Com saṃgīti, with Introduction and Text diss., Oxford University, 1994.
Padminī by Ratnarakṣita (ch. 13)
"Padminī 第 13 章 – 校訂テキスト 36, 2014, 177–194.
Padminī by Ratnarakṣita, chapter
"Ratnarakṣita 著 Padminī 第 22 ョンのサンスクリット語校訂テ Padminī, Chapter 22: A Critical E the Pratiṣṭhā Section), GM 25/36, Pañcakramaṭippanī by Parahitarakṣi riques : Pañcakrama, ed. L. de La 1896.
Pradīpoddyotana by Candra
pradīpodyotanaṭīkā Ṣaṭkoṭivyākh TSWS 25, Patna, 1984.
Pradīpoddyotana by Candra
pradīpodyotanaṭīkā Ṣaṭkoṭivyākh
Chapters I–II, Dhīḥ 48, 2009, 119– Pradīpoddyotana by Candrakīrti dyotanaṭīkā Ṣaṭkoṭivyākhyā of Ā ter X, Dhīḥ 52, 2012, 109–118.
Pradīpoddyotana by Candrakīrti:
tanaṭīkā Ṣaṭkoṭivyākhyā of Ācā
III–VI, Dhīḥ 49, 2010a, 105–136.
Pradīpoddyotana by Candrakīrti:
tanaṭīkā Ṣaṭkoṭivyākhyā of Ācā VII–IX, Dhīḥ 50, 2010b, 97–130.
Rahasyadīpikā by Vanaratna: Va Śrīkṛṣṇācārya With Commentar ratna, ed. S. Rinpoche & V. Dwiv Ratnāvalī by Kumāracandra: K
Ratnāvalīpañjikā of Kumāraca
V. Dvivedī, RBTS 9, Sarnath, 199 Sahajālokapañjikā (Kṛṣṇayamārit nishi Kenichi, "Fragments of Critical Edition of the IASWR
.academia.edu/4267123/Fragm 1lokapa%C3%B1jik%C4%81_ IASWR_Manuscript.
Samantabhadrasādhanaṭīkā: Ta
"「新出の写本『普賢成就法 尊曼荼羅について」" (The N
Mañjuvajra Explained in a Sa Samantabhadra Nāma Sādhan Sañcāranibandha by Tathāgatar With Nibandha of Tathāg

ñjikā by Kumāracandra: “Katipayākṣarā-māracandra on Herukābhyudayamahā-,” Dhīḥ 37, 2004, 149–170. ākaraśānti: “Khasamatantrasya ācāryarat-citā khasamā-nāmaṭīkā,” ed. Jagannātha , 1983, 225–255.
ñjikā by Kuladatta (chs. 1.4, 3.3, 3.5, 6.8.8): ritical Edition and Annotated Translation ons by Ryugen Tanemura, Groningen, 2004.
jikā by Kuladatta (ch. 3.6): Mori Masa-説かれるヴァーストゥナーガ” (Mikkyō reru Vāstunāga), MBKK 16, 2003, 172–144

jikā by Kuladatta (ch. 6.5): Sakurai yāsaṃgrahapañjikā no Kanjōron (1): Binn-Kōtei-Tekusuto oyobi Kōsatsu,” CG 37, m, “Kriyāsaṃgrahapañjikā no Kanjōron njō,” Ronshū 15, 1988, 128–106; idem, añjikā no Kanjōron (3): Hannyachi-6, 1989, 118–196; idem, “Kriyāsaṃgraha-njōron (4): Daiyon-Kanjō, Bonbun-MBu 181, 1989, 113–106; idem, Indo mikkyō i Indo mikkyō no kanchō shidai (イン 究 – 後期インド密教の灌頂次第 –; Esoteric Ritual – Consecration in Late ddhism), Kyoto, 1996.
ā by Kuladatta (ch. 7): Tanemura Ryugen, Kuladatta. Chapter VII, BIeB 7, Tokyo 1997. yaṭippinikā by Advayavajra: Advayava- Haraprasada Shastri, GaOS 40, Baroda, yaṭippinikā by Advayavajra: 「アドヴァ 集:梵文テキスト・和訳」(Advayavajra bun tekisuto・wayaku; Advayavajra-Critical Edition with Japanese transla-ō seiten kenkyūkai (密教聖典研究会), 31–178 (1–57). pañjikā by Jayabhadra: “Jayabhadra 作 ñjikā 校訂梵本”」(Cakrasaṃvaratantra i ni tsuite – oyobi Jayabhadra saku ñjikā kōtei bonpon; On the making of ntra – with a Critical Sanskrit Text of krasaṃvarapañjikā), ed. Sugiki Tsune-4–141.

ṛti: Śrīherukābhidhānam Cakrasaṃvara-ṛti Commentary of Bhavabhaṭṭa, 2 vols., Pāṇḍeya, RBTS 26, Sarnath, 2002.
Vajrapāṇi: The Laghutantraṭīkā by cuzza, SOR 86, Rome, 2001. yJñānacandra/Dhyānacandra: Tattva- hāsukhaprakāśikā, DG 37, Kathmandu, by Vīryaśrīmitra: Tattvajñānasaṃ- nādhipāda With Marmakalikāpañjikā Janārdana Śāstrī Pāṇḍeya, RBTS 23,

(Apabhraṃśa Texts of the Sahajayāna s and Commentaries), ed. P.C. Bagchi, 938.

Mitapadā by Durjayacandra: P.-D. Szántó, “A Critical Edition of Catuṣpīṭhatantra I.3. with Three Sanskrit Commentaries,” TaS 1, 2008, 2–21.

Muktāvalī by Ratnākaraśānti: Hevajratantram with Muktāvalī Pañjikā of Mahāpaṇḍitācārya Ratnākaraśānti, ed. R.S. Tripathi & T.S. Negi, BIT 48, Sarnath, 2001.

Nāmamantrāvalokinī by Vilāsavajra (chs. 3–4): Sakurai Munenobu, “A Study on the Nāmamantrārthāvalokinī (1) – A Critical Text of Its Chapters III & IV,” Bunka 51/3–4, 1988, 323–354.

Nāmamantrāvalokinī by Vilāsavajra (chs. 1–5): The Names of Wisdom: A Critical Edition and Annotated Translation of Chapters 1–5 of Vilāsavajra's Commentary on the Nāmasaṃgīti, with Introduction and Textual Notes, A.H.F. Tribe, diss., Oxford University, 1994.

Padminī by Ratnarakṣita (ch. 13): Kuranishi Kenichi, “Padminī 第13章 – 校訂テキストおよび註–,” TDSBKN 36, 2014, 177–194.

Padminī by Ratnarakṣita, chapter 13: Tanemura Ryugen, “Ratnarakṣita 著 Padminī 第22章 – Pratiṣṭhā セクションのサンスクリット語校訂テキス–” (Ratnarakṣita's Padminī, Chapter 22: A Critical Edition of and Notes on the Pratiṣṭhā Section), GM 25/36, 2014, 97–126.

Pañcakramaṭippanī by Parahitarakṣita: Études et textes tantriques : Pañcakrama, ed. L. de La Vallée Poussin, Louvain, 1896.

Pradīpoddyotana by Candrakīrti: Guhyasamājapradīpodyotanaṭīkā Ṣaṭkoṭivyākhyā, ed. C. Chakravarti, TSWS 25, Patna, 1984.

Pradīpoddyotana by Candrakīrti: Guhyasamājapradīpodyotanaṭīkā Ṣaṭkoṭivyākhyā of Ācārya Candrakīrti, Chapters I–II, Dhīḥ 48, 2009, 119–156.

Pradīpoddyotana by Candrakīrti: Guhyasamājapradīpodyotanaṭīkā Ṣaṭkoṭivyākhyā of Ācārya Candrakīrti, Chapter X, Dhīḥ 52, 2012, 109–118.

Pradīpoddyotana by Candrakīrti: Guhyasamājapradīpodyotanaṭīkā Ṣaṭkoṭivyākhyā of Ācārya Candrakīrti, Chapters III–VI, Dhīḥ 49, 2010a, 105–136.

Pradīpoddyotana by Candrakīrti: Guhyasamājapradīpodyotanaṭīkā Ṣaṭkoṭivyākhyā of Ācārya Candrakīrti, Chapters VII–IX, Dhīḥ 50, 2010b, 97–130.

Rahasyadīpikā by Vanaratna: Vasantatilaka of Caryāvratī Śrīkṛṣṇācārya With Commentary: Rahasyadīpikā by Vanaratna, ed. S. Rinpoche & V. Dwivedi, RBTS 7, Sarnath, 1990.

Ratnāvalī by Kumāracandra: Kṛṣṇayamāritantram With Ratnāvalīpañjikā of Kumāracandra, ed. S. Rinpoche & V. Dvivedī, RBTS 9, Sarnath, 1992.

Sahajālokapañjikā (Kṛṣṇayamāritantra) by Śrīdhara: Kuranishi Kenichi, “Fragments of the Sahajālokapañjikā: A Critical Edition of the IASWR Manuscript,” https://www.academia.edu/4267123/Fragments_of_the_Sahaj%C4%81lokapa%C3%B1jik%C4%81_A_Critical_Edition_of_the_IASWR_Manuscript.

Samantabhadrasādhanaṭīkā: Tanaka Kimiaki (田中公明), “「新出の写本『普賢成就法』註所説の文殊金剛十九尊曼荼羅について」” (The Nineteen-Deity Maṇḍala of Mañjuvajra Explained in a Sanskrit Commentary on the Samantabhadra Nāma Sādhana), MZ 16, 1997, 17–34.

Sañcāranibandha by Tathāgatarakṣita: Yoginīsañcāratantra With Nibandha of Tathāgatarakṣita and Upadeśānusāriṇīvyākhyā of Alakakalaśa, ed. Janārdana Śāstrī Pāṇḍeya, RBTS 21, Sarnath, 1998.

Sārārthapañjikā: Dohākoṣa (Apabhraṃśa Texts of the Sahajayāna School): Part I (Texts and Commentaries), ed. P.C. Bagchi, CaSS 25c, Calcutta, 1938.

Ṣaṭsāhasrikā by Vajragarbha (chs. 1–8; incomplete): Ṣaṭ-Sāhasrikā-Hevajraṭīkā: A Critical Edition, ed. M.J. Shendge, Delhi, 2004.

Ṣaṭsāhasrikā by Vajragarbha (ch. 1): F. Sferra, “The Laud of the Chosen Deity, the First Chapter of the Hevajratantrapiṇḍārthaṭīkā by Vajragarbha”, in: S. Einoo, ed., Genesis and Development of Tantrism, IOCSS 23, Tokyo, 2009, 435–468.

Ṣaṭsāhasrikā by Vajragarbha (ch. 10): F. Sferra, “The Elucidation of True Reality: The Kālacakra Commentary by Vajragrabha on the Tattvapaṭala of the Hevajratantra”, in: E.A. Arnold, ed., As Long As Space Endures: Essays on the Kalachakra Tantra in Honor of H.H. the Dalai Lama, with a Foreword by R.A.F. Thurman, Ithaca NY, 2009, 93–126.

Sekanirdeśapañjikā by Rāmapāla: H. Isaacson & F. Sferra, The Sekanirdeśa of Maitreyanātha (Advayavajra) with the Sekanirdeśapañjikā of Rāmapāla: Critical Edition of the Sanskrit and Tibetan Texts with English Translation and Reproductions of the MSS: With Contributions by Klaus-Dieter Mathes and Marco Passavanti, Manuscripta Buddhica Series 2, SOR 107, Naples, 2014.

Sekoddeśapañjikā: “Sekoddeśapañjikā:” The Results of a Joint Study of the Buddhist Tantric Texts, Taishō University, TDSBKN 16, 1994, 289–354.

Sekoddeśaṭīkā by Nāropā: M. Carelli, Sekoddeśaṭīkā of Naḍapāda (Nāropā): The Sanskrit Text Edited for the First Time with an Introduction in English, GaOS 90, Baroda, 1941.

Sekoddeśaṭīkā by Nāropā: The Paramārthasaṃgraha by Nāropā (Sekoddeśaṭīkā), Critical Edition of the Sanskrit Text by Francesco Sferra and Critical Edition of the Tibetan Translation by Stefania Merzagora, SOR 99, Rome.

Sekoddeśaṭippanī by Sādhuputra Śrīdharānanda: R. Gnoli, “La Sekoddeśaṭippanī di Sādhuputra Śrīdharānanda. Il testo sanscrito,” RSO 70, 1997, 115–146.

Tattvaratnāvalokavivaraṇa by Vāgīśvarakīrti: “Tattvaratnāvalokaḥ with Vivaraṇa of Mahāpaṇḍita-Vāgīśvarakīrti,” in: J. Pandey, ed., Bauddhalaghugrantha Samgraha, RBTS 14, Sarnath, 1997, 81–142 (the Sanskrit text was first published in Dhīḥ 21, 1996, 129–149).

Upadeśānusāriṇī by Alakakalaśa: Yoginīsañcāratantra With Nibandha of Tathāgatarakṣita and Upadeśānusāriṇīvyākhyā of Alakakalaśa, ed. Janārdana Śāstrī Pāṇḍeya, RBTS 21, Sarnath, 1998.

Vimalaprabhā by Puṇḍarīka: Vimalaprabhāṭīkā of Kalkin Śrīpuṇḍarīka on Śrīlaghukālacakratantrarāja by Śrīmañjuśrīyaśas, Vol. 1 [paṭalas 1–2], ed. Jagannātha Upadhyāya, BIT 11, Sarnath, 1986.

Vimalaprabhāṭīkā of Kalkin Śrīpuṇḍarīka on Śrīlaghukālacakratantrarāja by Śrīmañjuśrīyaśas, vol. II [paṭalas 3–4], Critically Edited & Annotated with Notes by V. Dwivedi & S.S. Bahulkar, RBTS 12, Sarnath, 1994.

Vimalaprabhāṭīkā of Kalkin Śrīpuṇḍarīka on Śrīlaghukālacakratantrarāja by Śrīmañjuśrīyaśas, Vol. III [paṭala 5], Critically Edited & Annotated with Notes by V. Dwivedi & S.S. Bahulkar, RBTS 13, Sarnath, 1994.

Yogaratnamālā by Kṛṣṇācārya (also known as Kāṇha): The Hevajra Tantra: A Critical Study, Part I, Introduction and Translation; Part II, Sanskrit and Tibetan Texts, ed. D.L. Snellgrove, LOS 6, London, 1959, 103–159.

Yogimanoharā by Muniśrībhadra: The Pañcakramaṭippaṇī of Muniśrībhadra: Introduction and Romanized Sanskrit Text, ed. Jiang Zhongxin and Tomabechi Toru, AS 23, Bern, 1996.

Secondary Sources

Bhattacharya, R.S., "Kinds of Expositions in Sanskrit Literature," ABORI 36, 1955, 123–132.

Broido, M.M., "Bshad Thabs: Some Tibetan Methods of Explaining the Tantras," in: E. Steinkellner & H. Tauscher, eds., Contributions on Tibetan Language, History and Culture: Proceedings of the Csoma de Kőrös Symposium held at Velm-Vienna, Austria, 13–19 September 1981, vol. II, Vienna, 1983, 15–45.

Brückner, H., "Bewahren und Erneuern: Philosophische Kommentartraditionen im indischen Mittelalter," in: J. Assmann & B. Gladigow, eds., Archäologie der literarischen Kommunikation, Munich, 1995, 237–246.

Campbell, J.R.B., Vajra Hermeneutics: A Study of Vajrayāna Scholasticism in the Pradīpoddyotana, diss., Columbia University, 2009.

Hodge, S., trans., The Mahā-Vairocana-Abhisaṃbodhi Tantra With Buddhaguhya's Commentary, Abingdon, 2003.

Isaacson, H., "Observations on the Development of the Ritual of Initiation (Abhiṣeka) in the Higher Buddhist Tantric Systems," in: A. Zotter & C. Zotter, eds., Hindu and Buddhist Initiations in India and Nepal, Wiesbaden, 2010, 261–279.

Isaacson, H., "A Collection of Hevajrasādhanas and Related Works in Sanskrit," in: E. Steinkellner, Duan Qing & H. Krasser, eds., Sanskrit Manuscripts in China: Proceedings of a Panel at the 2008 Beijing Seminar on Tibetan Studies, October 13 to 17, Beijing, 2009, 89–136.

Isaacson, H., "The Opening Verses of Ratnākaraśānti's Muktāvalī (Studies in Ratnākaraśānti's tantric works II)," in: Ryutaro Tsuchida & A. Wezler, eds., Harānandalaharī: Volume in Honour of Professor Minoru Hara on his Seventieth Birthday, Reinbek, 2000 [2001], 121–134.

Isaacson & Sferra 2014, see above Sekanirdeśapañjikā.

Kawasaki Kazuhiro, "On a Birch-bark Sanskrit Manuscript Preserved in the Tibet Museum," IBK 52/2, 2004, 905–903 (50–52).

Kielhorn, F., "Sanskrit Manuscripts in China," The Academy 1154, 1894, 498ff.; repr. JRAS, 1894, 835–838.

Lindtner, C., Nagarjuniana: Studies in the Writings and Philosophy of Nāgārjuna, IndS 4, Copenhagen, 1982, ^{2}1987.

Luo 2010, see above Abhayapaddhati.

Mainkar, T.G., Studies in Sanskrit Dramatic Criticism, Delhi, 1971.

Matsunaga Yūkei, "A Doubt to Authority of the Guhyasamāja-Ākhyāna-tantras," IBK 12/2, 1964, 844–83 (16–25).

Matsunaga Yūkei, "七飾について" (Shichishoku ni tsuite: On the Saptālaṅkāra), IBK 1963, 470–476.

Moriyama Shinya, "Ratnākaraśānti's Theory of Cognition with False Mental Images (alīkākāravāda*) and the Neither-One-Nor-Many Argument," JIP 42, 2013, 339–35

Naudou, J., Les bouddhistes kaśmīriens au moyen age, AMG 68, Paris, 1968.

Sanderson, A., "The Śaiva Age – The Rise and Dominance of Śaivism during the Early Medieval Period," in: S. Einoo, ed., Genesis and Development of Tantrism, IOCSS 23, Tokyo, 2009, 41–349.

Sāṅkṛtyāyana, R., "Second Search of Sanskrit Palm-leaf MSS. in Tibet," JB(O)RS 23, 1937, 1–57.

Seyfort Ruegg, D., "Purport, Implicature and Presupposition: Sanskrit Abhiprāya and Tibetan dgoṅs pa/dgoṅs gži as Hermeneutical Concepts," JIP 13, 1985, 309–325.

Sferra 2000, see above Guṇabharaṇī.

Sferra, F., "Constructing the Wheel of Time: Strategies for Establishing a Tradition," in: F. Squarcini, ed., Boundaries, Dynamics and Construction of Traditions in South Asia, Florence, 2005, 253–285.

Slaje, W., "Der Sanskrit-Kommentar," in: M. Quisinsky & P. Walter, eds., Kommentarkulturen. Die Auslegung zentraler Texte der Weltreligionen. Ein vergleichender Überblick, Cologne, 2007, 69–97.

Steinkellner, E., "Remarks on Tantristic Hermeneutics," in: L. Ligeti, ed., Proceedings of the Csoma de Kőrös Memorial Symposium held at Mátrafüred, Hungary 24–30 September 1976, BOH 23, Budapest, 1978, 445–458.

Stietencron, H. von, "Typisierung und Sitz im Leben: Anmerkungen zum Kommentar in Indien," in: J. Assmann & B. Gladigow, eds., Archäologie der literarischen Kommunikation, Munich, 1995, 249–255.

Szántó, P.-D., "Selected Chapters from the Catuṣpīṭhatantra," 2 vols., diss., Oxford University, 2012.

Tsukamoto Keisho, Matsunaga Yukei & Isoda Hirofumi, eds., Bongo Butten no Kenkyū IV, Mikkyō Kyōten Hen (A Descriptive Bibliography of the Sanskrit Buddhist Literature, vol. IV: The Buddhist Tantra), Kyoto, 1989.

Unithiri, N.V.P., "The Commentarial Literature in Sanskrit," ALB 44–45, 1980–1981, 572–580; repr. (with slight changes) in: P.C. Muraleemadhavan, Indian Theories of Hermeneutics, Delhi, 2002, 157–163.

Wedemeyer, C.K., Making Sense of Tantric Buddhism: History, Semiology, and Transgression in the Indian Traditions, New York, 2013.

HARUNAGA ISAACSON
FRANCESCO SFERRA

The Jingangding yugazhong fa an sanputixin lun (金剛頂瑜伽中發 提心論; Treatise on the Realized Peak Yogic Tradition), better kno lun or, in Japanese pronunciati (菩提心論; T. 1665), is the most in the Japanese esoteric or tantri title indicates, the Putixin lun b tual tradition of the Jingangdi Vajraśekharasūtra), which alon (大日經; Mahāvairocanasūtra) p tion for the twofold mandalic w [兩界]) central to East Asian esot twofold mandalic world compris taizang [胎藏]) realm, based on the diamond (Chn. jingang [金 the Jingangding jing. The former signifies the maternal principle, represents the paternal. A close contents of this treatise reveals with doctrinal and practical iss the Jingangding jing and the Da ditions. Therefore, the author of knowledgeable about both syst attempted to unify them.

The treatise is a Chinese ap of which is impossible to asce considered to have been trans and submitted to the imperial tant Tang dynasty master of Amoghavajra (Chn. Bukong [ in fact, the text itself claims to the esoteric master "Da[bian [辯]正廣智)," which is a refer mous title bestowed on Amog the Chinese emperor Daizong ( 2120 860a 25–26). However, the has been questioned because it nese esoteric commentary, th (大日經疏/義釋; Commentary written by Yixing (一行; 683–7 rary of Amoghavajra. We can t the actual author of the Putixi monk. A sensible conjecture tise was compiled by one of Am on the basis of Amoghavajra's t knowledge gained from other

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

, "A Doubt to Authority of the khyāna-tantras," IBK 12/2, 1964, 844–835

"七飾について" (Shichishoku ni tsuite; kāra), IBK 1963, 470–476.
"Ratnākaraśānti's Theory of Cognition ntal Images (alīkākāravāda*) and the -Many Argument," JIP 42, 2013, 339–351. ddhistes kaśmīriens au moyen age, AMG

Śaiva Age – The Rise and Dominance of he Early Medieval Period," in: S. Einoo, Development of Tantrism, IOCSS 23, 49. econd Search of Sanskrit Palm-leaf MSS.
23, 1937, 1–57.
urport, Implicature and Presupposition: a and Tibetan dgoṅs pa/dgoṅs gži as oncepts," JIP 13, 1985, 309–325. e Guṇabharaṇī.
ting the Wheel of Time: Strategies for adition," in: F. Squarcini, ed., Boundar- Construction of Traditions in South Asia, 3–285. skrit-Kommentar," in: M. Quisinsky & nmentarkulturen. Die Auslegung zentraler ligionen. Ein vergleichender Überblick, –97.
marks on Tantristic Hermeneutics," in:
eedings of the Csoma de Kőrös Memorial t Mátrafüred, Hungary 24–30 September apest, 1978, 445–458.
, "Typisierung und Sitz im Leben:
n Kommentar in Indien," in: J. Assmann ., Archäologie der literarischen Kommu- 995, 249–255.
d Chapters from the Catuṣpīṭhatantra," d University, 2012.
atsunaga Yukei & Isoda Hirofumi, eds., nkyū IV, Mikkyō Kyōten Hen (A Descripf the Sanskrit Buddhist Literature, vol. antra), Kyoto, 1989.
Commentarial Literature in Sanskrit," 81, 572–580; repr. (with slight changes) dhavan, Indian Theories of Hermeneu- –163.
aking Sense of Tantric Buddhism: His-Transgression in the Indian Traditions,

Harunaga Isaacson
Francesco Sferra

Putixin Lun

The Jingangding yugazhong fa anouduoluo sanmiao sanputixin lun (金剛頂瑜伽中發阿耨多羅三藐三菩提心論; Treatise on the Realized Mind in Diamond-Peak Yogic Tradition), better known as the Putixin lun or, in Japanese pronunciation, Bodaishin ron (菩提心論; T. 1665), is the most important treatise in the Japanese esoteric or tantric tradition. As the title indicates, the Putixin lun belongs to the textual tradition of the Jingangding jing (金剛頂經; Vajraśekharasūtra), which alongside the Dari jing (大日經; Mahāvairocanasūtra) provides the inspiration for the twofold mandalic world (Chn. liangjie [兩界]) central to East Asian esoteric Buddhism. The twofold mandalic world comprises the womb (Chn. taizang [胎藏]) realm, based on the Dari jing, and the diamond (Chn. jingang [金剛]) realm, based on the Jingangding jing. The former of these two realms signifies the maternal principle, whereas the latter represents the paternal. A close examination of the contents of this treatise reveals that the text deals with doctrinal and practical issues based on both the Jingangding jing and the Dari jing scriptural traditions. Therefore, the author of the Putixin lun was knowledgeable about both systems and may have attempted to unify them.

The treatise is a Chinese apocrypha, the origin of which is impossible to ascertain. Traditionally considered to have been translated into Chinese and submitted to the imperial court by the important Tang dynasty master of Esoteric Buddhism Amoghavajra (Chn. Bukong [不空]; 705–774 CE), in fact, the text itself claims to record the words of the esoteric master "Da[bianzheng]guangzhi (大[辯]正廣智)," which is a reference to the posthumous title bestowed on Amoghavajra in 774 CE by the Chinese emperor Daizong (代宗; 726–779 CE; T. 2120 860a 25–26). However, the text's Indian origin has been questioned because it often refers to a Chinese esoteric commentary, the Dari jing shu/yishi (大日經疏/義釋; Commentary on the Dari jing) written by Yixing (一行; 683–727 CE), a contemporary of Amoghavajra. We can therefore assume that the actual author of the Putixin lun was a Chinese monk. A sensible conjecture may be that the treatise was compiled by one of Amoghavajra's disciples on the basis of Amoghavajra's teachings and further knowledge gained from other esoteric masters.

Although the title reads fa putixin (發菩提心) or bodhicittotpāda (awakening of the resolve to attain the mind of enlightenment), the Putixin lun principally describes practical methods to acquire putixin (菩提心), a term that in this treatise has two meanings. The first is bodhicitta (the aspiration to awakening), and the second is bodhihṛdaya ([physical] heart of enlightenment). Since both hṛdaya and citta were equally translated as xin (心) in Chinese, this difference has often been overlooked. Other characteristics of the Putixin lun include both its use of the term jishen chengfo (Jpn. sokushin jōbutsu [卽身成佛]; becoming Buddha within this very body) and a stress on (visualization) practices centered on hṛdaya and the flesh body. The terminology employed in the treatise thus suggests that the esoteric practitioners attain enlightenment without first having to transform their flesh body into a mind-spun body (Skt. manomayakāya; Chn. yishengshen [意生身]) through a gradual process of meditative refinement as envisaged in non-esoteric Buddhist soteriologies. This doctrinal orientation of the Putixin lun inspired the signature doctrine of sokushin jōbutsu, as taught in Japanese esoteric Buddhism, where it often connotes the identification of macrocosmos (dharmakāya Buddha) and microcosmos (practitioner) in a single lifetime. Needless to say, diverse interpretations of this doctrine emerged in later periods.

Three Types of Practice

The Putixin lun introduces three types of practice, namely xingyuan (行願), shengyi (勝義), and sanmode (三摩地). These three play the role of esoteric precepts. Xingyuan practice consists in making a vow according to which the esoteric practitioner will labor to save all sentient beings from their lives filled with defilements. Shengyi is an abbreviation of shengyi kong (勝義空; supreme emptiness). Referring to the Dari jing, the Putixin lun considers shengyi the practice of realizing supreme emptiness, which is equated with bodhicitta. Additionally, the Nirvāṇasūtra is quoted in the description of shengyi as scriptural support for the idea that bodhicitta is realized in the flesh body. Yet this attainment is considered inferior to the realization associated with sanmode practice. The latter consists of three kinds of visualizations, the azi guan (阿字觀; visualization practice of the syllable a) the yuelun guan (月輪觀; visualization practice of the moon disk), and the wuxiang chengshen (guan; 五相成身[觀]; [visualization] practice for obtaining the buddha bodies in five phases). In the above order, the practitioner first visualizes the syllable a on his hṛdaya in order to give rise to the first cause of enlightenment, which the Putixin lun considers to be supreme emptiness. The first cause of enlightenment becomes the new moon, and the syllable a remains on it. The Putixin lun explicates the method of the visualization practice of the syllable a in the following stanza:

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

> One cubit above the eight-petaled white lotus > the pristine radiance of the syllable a is luminously revealed; > Contemplation and wisdom join into the vajra bandhanam mūdra > which indicates the quiescent wisdom of the Thus-Come-One.

This visualization practice continues until the practitioner visualizes a full moon. Next, the practitioner performs the visualization practice of the moon disk. Contemplating hṛdaya as if it were a pure and perfect full moon, the practitioner proceeds to visualize the 16 great bodhisattvas (zhiliu dapusa [十六大菩薩]), which are transformed from the four buddhas, Akṣobhya (Chn. Achu [阿閦]), Ratnasaṃbhava (Chn. Baosheng [寶生]), Amitābha (Chn. Amituo [阿彌陀]), and Amoghasiddhi (Chn. Bukong chengjiu [不空成就]). Once the above practices are completed, the practitioner attains the stage of celestial existence.

Among these practices, the Putixin lun regards the visualization practice for obtaining the buddha bodies in the five phases as the most advanced, since, according to the Vajraśekharasūtra, a former buddha bestowed this practice on Śākyamuni in order to initiate him into the diamond realm when he first attained buddhahood under the Bodhi tree (T. 865 207c–208b). The final (visualization) practice for obtaining the buddha bodies in five phases is the representative method of practice of not only the Putixin lun but the Vajraśekharasūtra tradition as a whole. This (visualization) practice is composed of visualizing (1) the awakening of the resolve to attain the mind of enlightenment (Chn. tongda xin [通達心]), (2) the mind of enlightenment (Chn. puti xin [菩提心]), (3) the diamond mind (Chn. jingang xin [金剛心]), (4) the diamond body (Chn. jingang shen [金剛身]), and (5) the solid diamond body (Chn. jingang jiangu shen [金剛堅固身]). The solid diamond body is also known as the perfection of buddha bodies (Chn. foshen yuanman [佛身圓滿]), which means that the practitioner obtains all four bodies of a buddha, namely the svabhāvakāya (Chn. zixing shen [自性身]), the saṃbhogakāya (Chn. shouyong shen [受用身]), the nirmāṇakāya (Chn. bianhua shen [變化身]), and the niṣyandakāya (Chn. dengliu shen [等流身]). In a famous stanza at the very end of the text, the author summarizes the nature of bodhihṛdaya or bodhicitta as follows, again emphasizing their sheer "fleshness":

> When a man seeks to acquire the wisdom of the Awakened One > he thoroughly penetrates bodhihṛdaya/bodhicitta > and immediately attains the stage of Great Realization > in this very body born from father and mother.

The Putixin lun in Japan

We should note that, despite its initial flourishing, esoteric Buddhism – and consequently the Putixin lun – did not occupy a position of importance in China due to the decline of Buddhism triggered by the anti-Buddhist persecution carried out by the Tang dynasty emperor Wuzong (武宗; 814–816 CE). Hence, this treatise was almost completely disregarded in China, whereas in Japan the Putixin lun played a significant role in the doctrinal and practical development of esoteric Buddhism.

Transmission Narratives

The Putixin lun was first imported in Japan by Kūkai (空海; 774–835 CE), and came to constitute a foundational text of Japanese esoteric Buddhism. While the respective doctrinal importance of the Putixin lun differs in esoteric lineages tracing themselves to Kūkai (Jpn. tōmitsu [東密]) from those associated with the Tendai school (Jpn. taimitsu [台密]), in both cases the treatise is linked to the construction of sectarian identity. In this context, the question of the authorship of the Putixin lun is of vital importance. While the Putixin lun was most likely compiled on the basis of the teachings of Amoghavajra, the version imported to Japan during the Heian period did not name a specific author but simply referred to a "great esoteric master" (Jpn. daiajari [大阿闍梨]). For Japanese esoteric scholar-monks, identifying this great esoteri cial problem. Prominent eso the early Heian period, such 然; 841–889; 915[?] CE), pro concerning the authorship o Kūkai considered Nāgār be the author of the treatis The Kyōō kyō kaidai (教 the Jingangding jing), attri that Nāgārjuna is the first esoteric transmission (T. 2 of whether this text was in or compiled in the master's is obvious that the transmi on Nāgārjuna as the first p importance for legitimizin of Tōmitsu. In contrast, Tai a narrative focused on Nāg who brought the Taimitsu system to completion, attri Mañjuśrī, by referring to the shu (大日經供養次第法疏 Offering Rite of the Dari jing yijue (金剛頂經義訣 Jingangding jing), and the 略念誦經; Sūtra of Invoc 430a–b). Alongside these xiangcheng shizi fufa ji ( Record of Master-Disciple Mandalic Teachings) play cant role in Annen's argu lineage chart featuring Ma

---

Kūkai

Kūkai employed the Putix one of eight pieces of sc no shōmon [八箇の証文]) correctness of the doctrin identification of eternal Moreover, Kūkai heavily Heizeijōkō kanjō mon ( tory Rite of Abdicated Em which gives an account o teric precepts (Jpn. sann this text, Kūkai basically three types of practice an by advocating four types (信心; mind of faith), gyō vow), shōgi shin (勝義心; ness]), and daibodai shin great awakening; T. 2461 118–123). Here one can see the diamond body (Chn. jingang shen d (5) the solid diamond body (Chn. ı shen [金剛堅固身]). The solid dia-also known as the perfection of bud-Chn. foshen yuanman [佛身圓滿]), that the practitioner obtains all four buddha, namely the svabhāvakāya en [自性身]), the saṃbhogakāya (Chn. en [受用身]), the nirmāṇakāya shen [變化身]), and the niṣyandakāya hen [等流身]). In a famous stanza at f the text, the author summarizes the ihṛdaya or bodhicitta as follows, again neir sheer "fleshness":

> seeks to acquire the wisdom of the > ne
> y penetrates bodhihṛdaya/bodhicitta > ately attains the stage of Great
>
> ody born from father and mother.

lun in Japan

e that, despite its initial flourishing, ism – and consequently the Putixin ccupy a position of importance in e decline of Buddhism triggered by ist persecution carried out by the mperor Wuzong (武宗; 814–816 CE). atise was almost completely disrea, whereas in Japan the Putixin lun ant role in the doctrinal and practit of esoteric Buddhism.

Narratives

was first imported in Japan by Kūkai CE), and came to constitute a foun-Japanese esoteric Buddhism. While octrinal importance of the Putixin teric lineages tracing themselves to itsu [東密]) from those associated i school (Jpn. taimitsu [台密]), in eatise is linked to the construction tity. In this context, the question of of the Putixin lun is of vital impor-e Putixin lun was most likely coms of the teachings of Amoghavajra, orted to Japan during the Heian name a specific author but simply eat esoteric master" (Jpn. daiajari Japanese esoteric scholar-monks, identifying this great esoteric master became a crucial problem. Prominent esoteric scholar-monks of the early Heian period, such as Kūkai and Annen (安然; 841–889; 915[?] CE), proposed their own theory concerning the authorship of the Putixin lun.

---

Kūkai considered Nāgārjuna (2nd cent. CE) to be the author of the treatise (T. 2425 336b 23–24). The Kyōō kyō kaidai (教王経開題; Explication of the Jingangding jing), attributed to Kūkai, asserts that Nāgārjuna is the first successor to the dual esoteric transmission (T. 2222 7a 8–9). Regardless of whether this text was in fact composed by Kūkai or compiled in the master's name after his death, it is obvious that the transmission narrative focused on Nāgārjuna as the first patriarch was of integral importance for legitimizing the sectarian identity of Tōmitsu. In contrast, Taimitsu did not have such a narrative focused on Nāgārjuna. Instead, Annen, who brought the Taimitsu doctrinal and liturgical system to completion, attributed the Putixin lun to Mañjuśrī, by referring to the Dari jing gongyangcidifa shu (大日經供養次第法疏; Commentary on the Offering Rite of the Dari jing), the Jingangding jing yijue (金剛頂經義訣; Commentary on the Jingangding jing), and the Yaolue niansong jing (要略念誦經; Sūtra of Invocation Synopsis; T. 2396 430a–b). Alongside these texts, the Liangbu dafa xiangcheng shizi fufa ji (両部大法相承師資付法記; Record of Master-Disciple Transmission in the Dual Mandalic Teachings) played an especially significant role in Annen's argument, for in this work, a lineage chart featuring Mañjuśrī's name is given.

Kūkai

Kūkai employed the Putixin lun in order to provide one of eight pieces of scriptural evidence (hakko no shōmon [八箇の証文]) that he adduces for the correctness of the doctrine of sokushin jōbutsu, the identification of eternal Buddha and practitioner. Moreover, Kūkai heavily used this treatise in his Heizeijōkō kanjō mon (平城上皇灌頂文; Consecratory Rite of Abdicated Emperor Heizei; T. 2461 1–4), which gives an account of the meaning of the esoteric precepts (Jpn. sanmaya kai [三昧耶戒]). In this text, Kūkai basically adopted the Putixin lun's three types of practice and modified them slightly by advocating four types of minds, namely shinjin (信心; mind of faith), gyōan shin (行願心; mind of vow), shōgi shin (勝義心; mind of supreme [emptiness]), and daibodai shin (大菩提心; mind/heart of great awakening; T. 2461 3c 6–8; Katsumata, 1970, 118–123). Here one can see at work Kūkai's doctrinal strategy in the classification of teachings (kyōhan [教判]) as he took only the fourth type of mind as belonging to the esoteric teachings by interpreting it as the kongōkai shin (金剛界身; the nirmāṇakāya buddha of the diamond realm; T. 2461 4b 8). The other three types were classified as exoteric. Furthermore, Kūkai used the (visualization) practice for obtaining the buddha bodies in five phases in his Himitsu mandara jūjūshin ron (秘密曼荼羅十住心論; Ten Abiding Stages of Mind according to the Secret Maṇḍalas) and claimed that chanting dhāraṇī, or indeed mantra corresponding to the five phases, is the means to attaining buddhahood (T. 2425 354b; see also Abe, 1999, 141–149).

Saichō and Tokuitsu

Saichō (最澄 766–822 CE) might have borrowed from Kūkai the only copy of the Putixin lun available in Japan at the time, although the collection of Saichō's letters to Kūkai and other monks does not refer to this event (Dengyōdaishi zenshū, vol. V, 441–472). Saichō's usage of the Putixin lun is unique in that, unlike Kūkai, he cited it not as a proof of the notion of sokushin jōbutsu but rather to legitimize the Lotus sūtra's One Vehicle (Jpn. ichijō [一乗]) teaching as endorsed by the Tendai school. In his Hokke shūku (法華秀句; Outstanding Teachings of the Lotus Sūtra; also known as Hokke bushō [法華輔照]; Dengyōdaishi zenshū, vol. III, 1–280), Saichō quoted passages from the Putixin lun in order to prove that śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha (Jpn. nijō [二乗]) partake in the type of enlightenment represented by the One Vehicle; Okubo, 2006, 19–39). This discussion stems from Saichō's debate with Tokuitsu (徳一; 749[?]–824[?] CE) of the Hossō school, whose doctrine asserted that certain types of sentient beings were excluded from salvation.

Tokuitsu, too, had an opportunity to read the Putixin lun, and in his Shingonshū miketsu mon (真言宗未決文; Questionable Teachings of the Esoteric School; T. 2458 862–865), he criticized it. He displayed a skeptical attitude toward esoteric doctrines such as the idea of the preaching of the dharmakāya (Jpn. hosshin seppō [法身説法]) and the notion of sokushin jōbutsu. For example, Tokuitsu argued that the Putixin lun divides the Buddha's wisdom into five degrees, each represented by one of the five buddhas at the center of the maṇḍala. He then claims that this interpretation is erroneous because it would imply that each of these buddhas acquires only a single wisdom, whereas Hossō treatises, such as the Chengweishi lun (成唯識論; Skt. Vijñaptimātratāsiddhi; Treatise on Establishing Consciousness-Only) and the Fodejing lun (佛地經論; Buddhabhūmisūtra*; Treatise on the Buddhabhūmisūtra*) assert that all buddhas obtain all five wisdoms (T. 2458 863c–864a).

Annen

Among Saichō's successors, Ennin (円仁; 793/794–864 CE) did not discuss the Putixin lun at all, and Enchin (円珍; 814–891 CE) – as well as the writings attributed to him – mentions it only occasionally and superficially. This makes Annen the first Taimitsu scholar-monk to tackle the various issues relating to the Putixin lun head on. He often refers to its teachings in his major compositions, such as the Shingonshū kyōji mondō (真言宗教時問答; Polemic on Teaching and Time in the Esoteric School; T. 2396 374–450) and the Taizō kongō bodaishingi ryaku mondō shō (胎蔵金剛菩提心義略問答抄; Commentary on the Meaning of Bodhi in Womb and Diamond Realms; T. 2397 451–560).

Annen composed the Shingonshū kyōji mondō in order to promote a reformed "Shingon school" intended to replace the one created by Kūkai. Annen reexamined Kūkai's esoteric theories and outlined five points of criticism. Among these, the criticism aimed at Kūkai's sokushin jōbutsu theory was used in the Putixin lun to provide evidence for the superiority of the esoteric teachings. (T. 2396 403b–c). In other words, Annen disagreed with presenting the Putixin lun as representative of esoteric Buddhism. This criticism may be rooted in Saichō, who expresses grief over the dominant schools of his times, such as Sanron (三論) or Hossō, all being based on treatises (ronshū [論宗]) rather than sūtra (Dengyōdaishi zenshū, vol. V, app. 1, 11–12). However, Annen never denied the importance of the Putixin lun and the practices that it advocated.

His Taizō kongō bodaishingi ryaku mondō shō in particular can be considered a commentary on the Putixin lun in its broader context, for Annen's primary aim is to interpret the three types of practice advocated in this treatise and discussed above by using the commentary on the Dari jingi and other esoteric and non-esoteric sources. Some new interpretations offered in the Taizō kongō bodaishingi ryaku mondō shō are worth mentioning. For example, the (visualization) practice for obtaining the buddha body in five phases came to be seen as corresponding to other fivefold series of esoteric concepts such as colors, wisdoms, and so on. It is Annen who first formalized one part of this correspondence (Tado, 2008, 83–99). Furthermore, Annen's interpretation of the three types of practices, all of which he considered esoteric, differed from Kūkai's, who had excluded xingyuan/gyōgan and shengyi/shōgi practices from the esoteric category. These new interpretations remained influential in later Taimitsu and Tōmitsu scholarship.

Bibliography

Abe, R., The Weaving of Mantra, New York, 1999.

Katsumata, S., Mikkyō no Nihonteki tenkai (密教の日本的展開), Tokyo, 1970.

Okubo, R., "Saichō no jōbutsu shisō" (最澄の成仏思想), Bg 48, 2006, 19–39.

Tado, T., "Gosōjōjinkan no Nihonteki tenkai: Annen to Saisen o chūshin ni," TSS 25, 2008, 83–99.

White, K.R., The Role of Bodhicitta in Buddhist Enlightenment (五相成身観の日本的展開: 安然と済暹を中心に), New York, 2005.

Shinya Mano

nied the importance of the Putixin tices that it advocated.
gō bodaishingi ryaku mondō shō in e considered a commentary on the roader context, for Annen's primary et the three types of practice advoatise and discussed above by using on the Dari jingi and other esoteric sources. Some new interpretations izō kongō bodaishingi ryaku mondō entioning. For example, the (visu-ce for obtaining the buddha body me to be seen as corresponding to ies of esoteric concepts such as coll so on. It is Annen who first formal-this correspondence (Tado, 2008, ore, Annen's interpretation of the actices, all of which he considered from Kūkai's, who had excluded and shengyi/shōgi practices from gory. These new interpretations tial in later Taimitsu and Tōmitsu of Mantra, New York, 1999. ō no Nihonteki tenkai (密教の日本的

.
o jōbutsu shisō" (最澄の成仏思想), Bg

n no Nihonteki tenkai: Annen to Saisen 25, 2008, 83–99. of Bodhicitta in Buddhist Enlightenment 本的展開: 安然と済暹を中心に), New

SHINYA MANO

Belles Lettres

Narratives: South Asia

Narratives form an important part of the Buddhist tradition for as long as the scriptural heritage can be traced back. They can be found in almost all genres of literature, except in purely technical texts, and in virtually all languages in which Buddhist literature has been handed down. The Indian tradition recognized two partly overlapping narrative genres, jātaka and avadāna, which pertain to the biography of the Buddha and his disciples and illustrate the doctrine of the moral causality of actions and that of rebirth in different ways. These two genuinely Buddhist literary forms constitute the most comprehensive and important part of the Buddhist narrative literature, which also includes legends, myths, biographies, and historical (or quasi-historical) reports.

Jātaka as Genre

The term jātaka can be translated as "related to a birth." The Buddhist tradition reads this as "[a narrative] related to a [former] birth [of the Buddha]." Thus, a jātaka relates an incident from one of the former existences of the Bodhisattva (later to become the Buddha), in which he partakes as agent or beholder. He may appear in an animal or a human form and often, though not always, as the main protagonist of the narrative.

The existence and popularity of a genre called jātaka can be proved as being older than the earliest transmitted texts. An old traditional classification of Buddhist literary forms lists jātaka as the seventh limb (aṅga) out of nine (Lamotte, 1958, 157–162). The textual history of this division into nine aṅgas and its function can only be guessed at nowadays. Nevertheless, there is agreement that it is quite an early attempt to structure Buddhist literature (von Hinüber, 1994). Archaeology also confirms an old age for the jātaka genre, since the stone railings and gateways of the Bharhut and Sanchi stūpas, dating back to the late 2nd and the 1st centuries BCE and therefore ranging among the oldest surviving Buddhist monuments of India, depict numerous representations of jātaka stories. These low reliefs are often accompanied with brief inscriptions in a Middle Indo-Aryan dialect, revealing the titles of the respective stories. These titles already contain the genre term jātaka (e.g. in Bharhut: chadaṃtiya jātakaṃ [i.e. Chaddantajātaka; Jātaka of the Six-Tusked Elephant]; Lüders, 1941, 133), and this enables us to associate many of the scenes with stories that are known to us from the Pali canon (Lüders, 1941, 136). But there are also stories that cannot be identified with the help of literary sources available to us, which indicates that only parts of the literary tradition have survived. In addition to the stūpas of Bharhut and Sanchi, there exist many other old monuments confirming the view that the popularity of the jātaka stories spread with the expansion of Buddhism, with illustrations found in such places as the reliefs of the Nagarjunakonda and Amarāvati stūpas in South India (1st to 3rd cents. CE), the Gandhara reliefs in the far northwest, originally also attached to stūpas (2nd cent. CE onward), the wall paintings in the rock caves of Ajanta and Bagh (2nd cent. BCE onward) in the West, and so forth.

There is hardly any historical evidence for the widespread view that the popularity of the jātaka stories is mainly or even exclusively due to monks catering to the needs and tastes of the illiterate lay practitioners of Buddhism as propagandistic means of preaching or converting (see e.g. Speyer, 1902–1909, v–vi). The prose portions of the Pali jātakas not infrequently have as their audience monks and nuns, who sometimes reach high levels of spiritual realization after listening to a jātaka story. Likewise, it was monks who inhabited the rock caves of Ajanta and Bagh, and even if they most likely did not create the sensuous mural paintings depicting jātaka stories themselves, they certainly ordered them and directed the way in which they were painted. There are also donative inscriptions on old stūpas at various archaeological sites in India. They provide information as to who (and sometimes even for what purpose someone) paid for certain architectural elements bearing jātaka motives. Already the oldest constructions in Bharhut bear witness to the patronage not only of many laypeople but also of a considerable number of nuns and monks, many of them scholars and of high rank in the monastic hierarchy, as their titles imply (e.g. bhāṇaka [reciter] or sutaṃtika [one who knows the suttas]; Schopen, 1997, 30ff.).

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

We may speculate that *jātaka*s were so popular among lay and ordained people alike because they tell of incidents inextricably linked to the person of the Buddha and his long way toward perfection. And that is not all, for to faithful Buddhists it is the Buddha himself who relates his experiences in his former existences. It does not matter whether the Buddha acts as the narrator himself or a story is told by an anonymous narrator, for the Buddha is always held to be the ultimate source of the accounts, and hence they command highest authority, whether handed down as part of a canonical collection or not. According to tradition, the Buddha acquired knowledge about his former existences at a crucial point on his path, namely, in the night of his enlightenment. Several canonical texts contain a passage with the Buddha talking about that night when he gained three fundamental insights, the first of them being the complete and detailed memory of all his former existences:

> I recollected my manifold past lives, that is to say, one birth, two, three, four, five births, ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty births, a hundred births, a thousand births, a hundred thousand births, many ages of world contraction, many ages of world expansion, many ages of world contraction and expansion: "I was there so-named, of such a race, with such an appearance, such food, such experience of pleasure and pain, such a life term; and passing away thence, I reappeared elsewhere, and there too I was so-named . . . with such a life term; passing away thence I reappeared here" – thus with details and particulars I recollected my manifold past life. This was the first true knowledge attained by me in the first watch of the night. Ignorance was banished and true knowledge arose. (MN i.248; trans. Ñāṇamoli, 1992, 23f.)

This presumably old passage may be considered a kind of a doctrinal nucleus of the entire jātaka literature. The countless existences in the countless eons to which the Buddha refers could be filled by the tradition with equally countless stories. This did not imply that all the stories had to be invented anew. Since only one of the agents had to be identified as the Bodhisattva, the Buddha in a former life, almost any story could be viewed as a jātaka. Especially the comprehensive collection of the Pali *jātaka*s contains numerous stories that would never be labeled Buddhist if they were to be found in any other than a Buddhist text. This shows how the manifold literary traditions of India found their way into the Buddhist tradition. Thus, it was possible to interpret familiar and favorite narratives of some other origin also as Buddhist – a fact that no doubt played a certain role in spreading the Buddhist teachings and converting people of different faiths. From very early on, a great number of stories of all kinds were firmly rooted in the Buddhist tradition, enabling it to offer its followers something for any taste. Probably there were stories for all kinds of purposes – analogies and parables to teach, lift up, and admonish or stories meant simply to entertain. We may say that the main reasons for the popularity of the jātaka genre are to be found in the direct relation of the stories to the person of the Buddha on his path to enlightenment and in its highly inclusivistic potential.

Avadāna as Genre

The original meaning of avadāna/apadāna as a term denoting a distinctive genre of Buddhist narrative literature is an unresolved subject of long discussion. We find the word avadāna attested in Sanskrit texts, Buddhist as well as non-Buddhist, in which it is written as either avadāna or (less often) apadāna, whereas in Pali, only apadāna occurs. Since in India both spellings were traditionally considered interchangeable (notably in the lexicographical works), henceforth I will write avadāna, unless I exclusively refer to Pali texts. Out of the different explanations of the Buddhist genre term (comp. e.g. the surveys in Handurukande, 1967, xix–xxii; Matsumura, 1980, xi–xviii; Ohnuma, 2007, 291n31), the following seems to be the most plausible, since it corresponds well to the central themes of the avadāna literature. In an old legend that is found in the canon of the Theravādins as well as in the Mahāvastu, the term avadāna is applied in a distinctly agricultural context in the meaning of "cutting off" or "harvesting" (DN iii.84ff.; Mvu I.338ff.; Trenckner et al., 1948–2011; s.v. apadāna). In ancient India, it was common usage to resort to agricultural imagery to illustrate the doctrine of the causality of volitional actions (karma) reaching beyond the present existence. For instance, the deed is referred to as seed (bīja) and its effects on a later existence as the ripening (vipāka) of the fruit (phala). Thus, the transfer of the term avadāna from the agricultural realm to the effects of a deed with karmic relevance is quite comprehensible. In this sense, avadāna refers to the harvest reaped by a certain person, that is, to the karmic effects of one of the person's deeds or to an account thereof (Mellick Cutler, 1994, 5ff.; Tatelman, 2000, 5f.; Matsumura however, suggests a connection of vinaya term nidāna [theme, subject this is the correct explanation of th ing of avadāna as a genre term, w tions of it in the Buddhist exeget we may presuppose that it had bee

Later, systematic, or commentaria

"comparison, example" as a defin which is further described as "a using comparison" or "a tale used (Matsumura, 1980, xxviii; also 39n38). In non-Buddhist Sanskri often has the meaning "exploit, glorious/heroic deed" (Winterni might have influenced the spe meaning of the term, especially i

Buddhist authors who were acquai literature. The entirely positiv avadāna understood as "feat" sources does not fit well with it a term for a genre including sto deeds, so it is reasonable to assum specific Buddhist notion of the te considered that in the course of ably also within different ideolog the Buddhist genre term avadān went shifts in meaning. Such dev to be researched systematically.

In spite of the lack of clarity co nal meaning of avadāna, it is the essential characteristics of tive. Within the Buddhist tradi ries seem to have gained the sta genre later than the *jātaka*s. The the above-mentioned nine-limb the Buddhist literary tradition, tains jātaka, but it finds a place i development of this list with 12 l with references to older stud there are narratives in the early that resemble later *avadāna*s i this regard, the Anavataptagāth

Anavatapta) is especially worth ent versions of this collection o been very popular and widely sp

the attestation of the Anavatap old Gandhari manuscripts, it c as the 1st century CE, and judgi other texts, probably as early as (Salomon, 2008, 5ff.). We find karmic autobiographies by mo himself. The authors recount in arratives of some other origin also as ct that no doubt played a certain role e Buddhist teachings and converting ent faiths. From very early on, a great ies of all kinds were firmly rooted in adition, enabling it to offer its follow-for any taste. Probably there were stos of purposes – analogies and parables , and admonish or stories meant sim-

. We may say that the main reasons ity of the jātaka genre are to be found lation of the stories to the person of his path to enlightenment and in its stic potential.

Genre

aning of avadāna/apadāna as a term inctive genre of Buddhist narrative unresolved subject of long discus-e word avadāna attested in Sanskrit as well as non-Buddhist, in which it er avadāna or (less often) apadāna, only apadāna occurs. Since in India were traditionally considered intertably in the lexicographical works), l write avadāna, unless I exclusively
s. Out of the different explanations genre term (comp. e.g. the surveys le, 1967, xix–xxii; Matsumura, 1980, a, 2007, 291n31), the following seems plausible, since it corresponds well themes of the avadāna literature. that is found in the canon of the well as in the Mahāvastu, the term ied in a distinctly agricultural con-ing of "cutting off" or "harvesting" I.338ff.; Trenckner et al., 1948–2011; n ancient India, it was common o agricultural imagery to illustrate the causality of volitional actions g beyond the present existence.
e deed is referred to as seed (bīja) n a later existence as the ripening fruit (phala). Thus, the transfer of a from the agricultural realm to eed with karmic relevance is quite In this sense, avadāna refers to ed by a certain person, that is, to ts of one of the person's deeds or hereof (Mellick Cutler, 1994, 5ff.; Tatelman, 2000, 5f.; Matsumura [1980, xxix–xl], however, suggests a connection of avadāna with the vinaya term nidāna [theme, subject matter]). Even if this is the correct explanation of the original meaning of avadāna as a genre term, we find no indications of it in the Buddhist exegetical tradition, so we may presuppose that it had been lost quite soon. Later, systematic, or commentarial texts often offer "comparison, example" as a definition of avadāna, which is further described as "an explanation by using comparison" or "a tale used as a comparison" (Matsumura, 1980, xxviii; also Tatelman, 2000, 39n38). In non-Buddhist Sanskrit texts, avadāna often has the meaning "exploit, (past) deed, feat, glorious/heroic deed" (Winternitz, 1930), which might have influenced the specifically Buddhist meaning of the term, especially in the case of later Buddhist authors who were acquainted with Sanskrit literature. The entirely positive connotation of avadāna understood as "feat" in non-Buddhist sources does not fit well with its Buddhist use as a term for a genre including stories about wicked deeds, so it is reasonable to assume that there was a specific Buddhist notion of the term. It has also to be considered that in the course of time and presumably also within different ideological environments, the Buddhist genre term avadāna certainly underwent shifts in meaning. Such developments have yet to be researched systematically.

In spite of the lack of clarity concerning the original meaning of avadāna, it is possible to outline the essential characteristics of this kind of narrative. Within the Buddhist tradition, avadāna stories seem to have gained the status of a distinctive genre later than the jātakas. The term is not part of the above-mentioned nine-limbed list of genres in the Buddhist literary tradition, which already contains jātaka, but it finds a place in a presumably later development of this list with 12 limbs (Nattier, 2004, with references to older studies). Nevertheless, there are narratives in the early Buddhist tradition that resemble later avadānas in many aspects. In this regard, the Anavataptagāthā (Songs from Lake Anavatapta) is especially worth mentioning. Different versions of this collection of "songs" must have been very popular and widely spread. On account of the attestation of the Anavataptagāthā in the very old Gandhari manuscripts, it can be dated as early as the 1st century CE, and judging from citations in other texts, probably as early as the 2nd century BCE (Salomon, 2008, 5ff.). We find in this text several karmic autobiographies by monks and the Buddha himself. The authors recount in verses one or various of their deeds, either good or bad, and their effects in later existences, up to the present one. It is quite remarkable that the Buddha himself tells of some bad deeds that caused suffering on his part even after having accomplished enlightenment. Even though, as R. Salomon (2008, 15ff.) shows, the narratives in the Anavataptagāthā are never referred to as avadānas, they resemble them in a striking way. Their most distinctive feature, compared to the so-to-speak classical avadānas like the Avadānaśataka, consists in the autobiographical point of view. The Anavataptagāthā and similar narratives are related by first-person narrators who talk about themselves, whereas the classical avadānas are told by the Buddha or by some other well-known member of the saṅgha. But this and some other differences (e.g. metrical form vs. prose with occasional verses) cannot conceal the fact that karmic autobiographies and karmic biographies have many essential thematic threads in common.

Thus, the overriding theme of these texts is the illustration of the working of karma. The stories of adventures of single persons show in an exemplary way that certain actions, if they are of karmic relevance, will inevitably have consequences in future existences and the manner in which these effects will manifest. In some of the earlier avadāna collections, these two aspects – the inevitability of the effects and the specific form in which they will show up – are repeated like choruses at the end of the narratives, as for example in the Avadānaśataka: "The deeds will not vanish, not even after thousand million eons. If all necessary factors are manifest and the [right] time has come, they will bear their fruit to sentient beings" (Av-ś I 80.13–14; trans. Speyer, 1902–1909). Another set phrase is the following:

> the result of utterly bad (literally: black) deeds is utterly bad, that of utterly good (literally: white) ones is utterly good, and that of mixed ones is mixed. This is why bad and mixed deeds should be avoided, whereas the utterly good deeds should be fully accomplished. (Av-ś I 226.2–4; trans. Speyer, 1902–1909)

This thematic focus can be related to further features of this genre: since the texts are mainly concerned to illustrate the effects of certain actions, the narratives usually consist of two parts – one reporting events from a past existence, the other referring to a later existence, mostly the present one, both of which are linked by a moral causality. Sometimes a prophecy (vyākaraṇa) to be fulfilled in the future is substituted for (or even added to) a report of a past existence, transforming it, so to say, into a report of a future existence. The main concern with the effects of deeds may also be an important reason why the avadāna stories tend to lay emphasis on present events. This is different in the *jātaka*s, since they clearly focus on events from a past existence. Sometimes they lack a reference point in the narrative present completely, as is usually the case in the narratives of the *jātakamālā*s (see below). Even in the prose attached to the collection of the Pali *jātaka*s with its uniform threefold structure of a story of the present, a story of the past, and an identification in the present (see below), the reports of present events often have obviously been added afterward in a rather superficial manner. Moreover, there is the seemingly strange fact that some *avadāna*s tell of bad deeds and their subsequent effects committed not only by despicable persons or persons of low esteem but also by arhats or even by the Buddha himself. Obviously this is meant to convey how complex karmic processes are: certain actions have certain effects that may manifest instantaneously or be delayed, depending on all of the manifold relevant conditions. The most striking example can be found in the above-mentioned Anavataptagāthā, relating the bad deeds of the Bodhisattva himself and also pointing out their effects, which he has to suffer even after having become a fully enlightened Buddha (e.g. the food poisoning at the end of his life). Such topics are hardly to be found in the *jātaka*s (but see Appleton, 2010, 26–28, for some counterexamples). Another characteristic feature of the *avadāna*s, distinguishing them from the *jātaka*s, is the huge range of persons acting: from lay practitioners to monks and up to the Buddha himself. This element has often served as the dividing line between the two genres, defining *jātaka*s as stories of previous existences of the Buddha and *avadāna*s as similar stories about monks and laypeople. However, this is a rather simplistic criterion, which moreover represents a historically wrong view. This can easily be proved by a quick look at some texts from the Theravāda collection explicitly entitled Buddhāpadāna (Apadāna of the Buddha), or Mahāpadānasutta (Sutta of Great *Apadāna*s), namely, a scripture about the former existences of the Buddha (Mellick Cutler, 1994, 3ff.). Nevertheless, the wide range of people acting and addressed in the *avadāna*s is a feature of the avadāna literature that may well have contributed to the increasing popularity of the genre. This feature seems to have made it easy to link local legends, rulers, or sanctuaries to the Buddhist tradition, thereby legitimizing them. The avadāna stories seem to have been intended for various addressees. As in the case of the *jātaka*s, frequent references to monks and nuns as listeners, and also the usual directives to them on how to put into practice the lesson told, advise caution against a view that sees the *avadāna*s as restricted to the realm of the laity, even though the interests and practices of lay followers seem to have played a more prominent role in the *avadāna*s than in the *jātaka*s.

Taken together, these distinguishing marks should suffice to describe the classical *avadāna*s as a distinct genre of Buddhist narrative literature, which also holds true for the Anavataptagāthā and similar karmic autobiographies (perhaps to be viewed as a subgenre; Salomon, 2008, 16). On the one hand, resemblances to the *jātaka*s are grounded in the inherently structural and thematic closeness of the two genres. On the other hand, they seem to have increased in the course of time. Thus, not infrequently different versions of the same story were entitled avadāna, and on other occasions, they were referred to as jātaka. *Jātaka*s were also sometimes interpreted as just special forms of *avadāna*s, as can be inferred by the term bodhisattvāvadāna (avadāna of the Bodhisattva) used as a synonym for jātaka (Tatelman, 2000, 9f.).

Texts

Buddhist narrative literature is extremely substantial and wide-ranging, and hence hard to survey. There are numerous single studies, but we still lack a comprehensive up-to-date study of this important branch of Buddhist literature. Although outdated in many respects, the relevant passages of M. Winternitz's History of Indian Literature (1933), enriched by many translations and summaries as they are, still provide the best survey of subjects, themes, and contents. Some works help to gain an overview of a major part of the narratives, first of all the registers of L. Grey (1994) and R. Hikata (1954, vol. II); J.L. Panglung's (1981) analysis of the vast Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinayavastu and D. Schlingloff's (2013) study of the Ajanta paintings also provide references to many literary works. The literature of the Theravāda and other "Hīnayāna" schools is sketched by K.R. Norman (1983); for the Pali literature, see also O. von Hinüber's handbook (1996). The recent past saw an increasing interest in Buddhist narrative literature, which has brought about some studies in genre (see esp. Strong, 1983; 1992; Tatelman, 2000;

Skilling, 2006, introduction, 1 Appleton, 2010; 2014).

Narratives Dispersed i Texts of Different Bud

The presumably oldest spec rated narratives are dispe *Vinayapiṭaka*s and Sūtrapiṭa collections of the different Bu texts are transmitted in vario stem from a prior oral trad an advanced stage of the en Therefore, a certain text or a tained in these collections ca sively. Nevertheless, the fact are passed on in almost ide canons of the different schoo back to the time before the schools took place. In other must have belonged to an o the Buddhist transmission. there are some *jātaka*s with story from one of his former explain a present event, so ing characters in the story persons in the audience. T the threefold structure of a ent," a "narrative in the past, [of the past protagonists w which is later often to be f and avadāna collections. W tions (nikāya, āgama), the prose, with the Bodhisattva a king or some other person is to say, these collections d animal tales, fables, and hu became so popular within addition to these jātaka-lik collections also include biog Buddha and some of his dis legends, and historical acco substantial stories, an illustr well-known Mahāparinirvā episodes, among them the genuine jātaka narrative (N

The vinaya collections contain a considerable Outstanding among the p the Vinayavastu of the M since the sheer quantity o ories seem to have been intended essees. As in the case of the jātakas, nces to monks and nuns as listen-e usual directives to them on how tice the lesson told, advise caution hat sees the avadānas as restricted he laity, even though the interests lay followers seem to have played nt role in the avadānas than in the her, these distinguishing marks o describe the classical avadānas re of Buddhist narrative literature, ds true for the Anavataptagāthā ic autobiographies (perhaps to be nre; Salomon, 2008, 16). On the one ces to the jātakas are grounded in tructural and thematic closeness es. On the other hand, they seem d in the course of time. Thus, not erent versions of the same story dāna, and on other occasions, they as jātaka. Jātakas were also some-l as just special forms of avadānas, d by the term bodhisattvāvadāna odhisattva) used as a synonym for , 2000, 9f.).

ve literature is extremely sub--ranging, and hence hard to sur-umerous single studies, but we ehensive up-to-date study of this of Buddhist literature. Although respects, the relevant passages of istory of Indian Literature (1933), y translations and summaries as vide the best survey of subjects, ents. Some works help to gain an r part of the narratives, first of all Grey (1994) and R. Hikata (1954, ung's (1981) analysis of the vast Vinayavastu and D. Schlingloff's Ajanta paintings also provide ref-terary works. The literature of the er "Hīnayāna" schools is sketched 1983); for the Pali literature, see er's handbook (1996). The recent ing interest in Buddhist narrative as brought about some studies in ong, 1983; 1992; Tatelman, 2000;

Skilling, 2006, introduction, 113–121; Ohnuma, 2007; Appleton, 2010; 2014).

Narratives Dispersed in Canonical Texts of Different Buddhist Schools

The presumably oldest specimens of fully elaborated narratives are dispersed throughout the Vinayapiṭakas and Sūtrapiṭakas of the canonical collections of the different Buddhist schools. These texts are transmitted in various Indian dialects and stem from a prior oral tradition. They represent an advanced stage of the entire textual tradition. Therefore, a certain text or a segment of a text contained in these collections cannot be dated conclusively. Nevertheless, the fact that many narratives are passed on in almost identical form within the canons of the different schools shows that they date back to the time before the schisms between the schools took place. In other words, these narratives must have belonged to an older common stock of the Buddhist transmission. Among these stories, there are some jātakas with the Buddha telling a story from one of his former existences in order to explain a present event, sometimes also identifying characters in the story with himself and with persons in the audience. This already represents the threefold structure of a "narrative in the present," a "narrative in the past," and an "identification [of the past protagonists with the present ones]," which is later often to be found in various jātaka and avadāna collections. Within the sūtra collections (nikāya, āgama), the jātakas are entirely in prose, with the Bodhisattva usually acting as either a king or some other person of high social rank. That is to say, these collections do not yet contain such animal tales, fables, and humorous stories that later became so popular within the jātaka literature. In addition to these jātaka-like narratives, the sūtra collections also include biographical accounts of the Buddha and some of his disciples as well as myths, legends, and historical accounts, often extended to substantial stories, an illustrative instance being the well-known Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra with its diverse episodes, among them the Mahāsudarśana story, a genuine jātaka narrative (Norman, 1983, 37f.).

The vinaya collections of the different schools contain a considerable amount of narratives. Outstanding among the preserved vinaya texts is the Vinayavastu of the Mūlasarvāstivāda school, since the sheer quantity of stories narrated there tends to disguise the purpose of this vinaya work, which, like similar texts of the other schools, supplies the monastic rules to the monks and nuns. The Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinayavastu has survived in a complete form only in its Tibetan translation (late 8th to early 9th cents. CE); major fragments of the original Sanskrit version are among the Gilgit manuscripts (written in the late 6th to 7th cent. CE); there also exists an incomplete Chinese translation from the beginning of the 8th century (see Panglung, 1981, xiiiff.; Wille, 1990, 15f.). The fragmentary Sanskrit text is to a certain extent complemented by the Divyāvadāna, an avadāna collection that incorporates many of the stories from the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinayavastu (see below). The Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinayavastu is composed in a simple prose with interspersed verses. On the basis of the Tibetan translation, J.L. Panglung (1981) analyzed its narratives thoroughly while presenting summaries, references to parallel versions, and various indices. His classification of the narratives according to their function within the frame of a monastic code (Panglung, 1981, xxff.) can be transferred to the similar vinaya sections of other schools, and for this reason, it is worth describing briefly here. Stories in the narrative present recount events of the Buddha's lifetime. Among them are biographical stories about the Buddha and his disciples, reports about Indian kingdoms, and the like. Besides these historical narratives, there are stories regularly related to the monastic rules. These rules were not put down as a systematic catalogue of regulations but in the form of singular instructions occasioned by concrete incidents. Stories in the narrative present function as precedents in order to justify the introduction of a specific rule as well as its application, exceptions, expansions, and modifications. Basically, the relation between a story as a precedent and a certain monastic rule most likely has a historical origin. This explains and legitimates the existence of these stories within the vinaya, even if many of them seem quite far-fetched and might be later additions. Stories in the narrative past tell of events prior to the stories in the present. They are of the jātaka and – in contrast to the sūtra collections – also of the avadāna type, as they serve to illustrate present incidents narrated (usually by the Buddha himself) about events that the persons involved experienced in their past lives. These jātakas and avadānas contain narratives of Buddhist content as well as fairy-tale-like stories about humans and animals. We may conclude that the thematic diversity and the wide range of persons involved situate the vinaya narratives closer than those of the sūtras to the later collections of jātakas and avadānas.

The Mahāvastu ([Chapter on the] Great Subject[?]; Senart, 1882–1897; Jones, 1949–1956; Hiraoka, 2010; facsimile of important manuscripts not used by Senart: Yuyama, 2001), also bears special significance as a source of narratives. It belongs to the vinaya of the Mahāsāṅghika Lokottaravādins; being a historically oriented section of the vinaya (Windisch, 1909), it contains very few monastic rules but all the more jātakas and avadānas. They are embedded in a complete biography of the Buddha, which, like the Nidānakathā from the Theravādins' jātaka collection (see below), comes in three parts relating at first the Buddha's remote past (his former lives); then his birth, childhood, and spiritual search up to the enlightenment; and finally his activities as a teacher and founder of a monastic order. Thus, the numerous stories do not promulgate monastic rules but rather illustrate deeds and virtues from former lifetimes within the biographical frame. This feature of the text may explain why in the chapter colophons found in later manuscript copies from Nepal the book is often entitled not only Mahāvastu but frequently also Mahāvastvavadāna. Though the latter designation has found its way into the edition of É. Senart and also into the influential translation of J.J. Jones, it has been shown recently to be a historically quite late change of the original title, which according to the oldest manuscript was most probably Mahāvastu (Tournier, 2012). The Mahāvastu is written in a Middle Indo-Aryan dialect influenced by Sanskrit (often called Buddhist Hybrid Sanskrit), although the language is not consistent throughout the entire text (comp. Oldenberg, 1912). This fact, as well as the lack of a clear structure and the diversity of dogmatic topics, supports the assumption that the text grew over a long period of time, while various parts were added to it. Hence, the time of its origin can be defined only approximately as the period from the 2nd century BCE to the 4th (Winternitz, 1933, 246f.) or even the 6th (Tournier, 2012, 94f.) century CE. Accordingly, it is hardly surprising that the narratives stem from different sources, and often two versions of the same story follow each other. The language, as well as the style and idiomology, of the Mahāvastu is quite close to the texts of the Theravāda canon. Correspondingly, many of the narratives have striking similarities to parallel Pali texts (esp. in the jātaka collection), while other stories display features unknown to the earlier Buddhism.

Narratives Dispersed in Commentaries

As was common practice in ancient India, many commentaries resort to stories in order to explain or illustrate certain points. In the Buddhist tradition, commentaries on canonical texts are the most rewarding sources for narratives. By far the most substantial body of commentarial literature of this kind now available belongs to the Theravāda school, and virtually all the commentaries on the Vinayapiṭaka and Suttapiṭaka contain narratives (Winternitz, 1933, 185f.). Among them, the commentary on the Dhammapada is especially worth mentioning (often referred to as Dhammapadaṭṭhakathā [Disclosure of the Dhammapada's Meaning]; Norman, 1906–1915; Burlingame, 1921). An unknown author wrote it, presumably shortly after the editing of the Jātakaṭṭhavaṇṇanā (see below), in order to explain the circumstances of the Buddha reciting the verses of the Dhammapada. For this purpose, first of all, it recounts when and in relation to what person or event the Buddha recited the respective stanza(s). The actual narrative follows, then the verse(s), and after a grammatical and lexicographical commentary of the verse(s), a brief formula of the religious merit of the audience. Sometimes this is followed by one or more stories of the past (atītavatthu) or a present story (paccupannavatthu) that suit(s) the occasion, and finally the protagonists of the stories are identified (samodhana; Burlingame, vol. I, 1921, 27f.). In this way, many paragraphs (called vatthu [subject]) become jātakas not only in content but also in form, structured as in the Jātakaṭṭhavaṇṇanā. This is not accidental, since the Jātakaṭṭhavaṇṇanā presumably had a strong impact on the design of the Dhammapada commentary (von Hinüber, 1996, 134f.). With respect to their contents, the Jātakaṭṭhavaṇṇanā and the Dhammapada commentary are closely related, too. On the one hand, the Dhammapada commentary includes many parallels and cross-references to narratives and stanzas from the jātaka collection (Burlingame, vol. I, 1921, 52ff.). On the other hand, it shares its manifold narrative forms and contents with the Jātakaṭṭhavaṇṇanā: fables, fairy tales, and droll stories of a folksy origin are easily discerned (Burlingame, vol. I, 1921, 29ff.). In addition, there are several uplifting legends obviously designed to illustrate certain stanzas. Although the design of the Dhammapada commentary with its blend of verse and prose suggests a striking similarity to the Jātakaṭṭhavaṇṇanā, the relation of verse and prose is different in the two collections.

While the jātaka stanzas were pr with an interpreting prose (thoug mined way) from the very beginn tial for the correct understandin narratives of the Dhammapada c later added to the initially indepen Hinüber, 1996, 134).

We also have access to a co Udānavarga that can be regar terpart of Dhammapada wit sarvāstivāda school. The Beng composed it around the yea the title Udānavargavivaraṇa ( Udānavarga), most likely in Sa the Udānavarga). Since the origi have to rely on its Tibetan trans 11th cent. CE (Balk, 1984). Prajñā resorts to stories of the jātaka while commenting on the stanzas though not in such a system fashion as the unknown co Dhammapada commentary, as w legends of the Hindu lore with was thoroughly conversant.

Single Narratives and C

Apart from the narratives dispe vinaya collections, and in com also jātakas and avadānas that ted – mostly anonymously – in s (e.g. the Maṇicūḍāvadāna [Han the single avadānas in the Gilg Hinüber, 2014]). We rarely k have been composed as singl they stem from other texts or c least some of them seem to be c ent sources (e.g. the Kaṭhināva But, as a remarkable recent dis stories were also transforme poetry by individual authors. century poet from east India, p to the Sāṃmitīya school, wrote comprising 376 stanzas in hitherto unknown (Hanisch, which is transmitted in a sin ten in a peculiar script (the so-or Bhaiksuki script) apparentl the Sāṃmitīya school, draws h tions of classical poetry (kāvya aesthetics.

spersed in
es

practice in ancient India, many sort to stories in order to explain in points. In the Buddhist tradi-es on canonical texts are the most s for narratives. By far the most of commentarial literature of ailable belongs to the Theravāda ally all the commentaries on the l Suttapiṭaka contain narratives 185f.). Among them, the commen-mapada is especially worth men-rred to as Dhammapadaṭṭhakathā the Dhammapada's Meaning]; 5; Burlingame, 1921). An unknown presumably shortly after the editṭhavaṇṇanā (see below), in order cumstances of the Buddha reciting Dhammapada. For this purpose, nts when and in relation to what he Buddha recited the respective ctual narrative follows, then the r a grammatical and lexicographi-of the verse(s), a brief formula of rit of the audience. Sometimes y one or more stories of the past a present story (paccupanna- ) the occasion, and finally the pro-tories are identified (samodhana; , 1921, 27f.). In this way, many para-tthu [subject]) become jātakas not ut also in form, structured as in the
ā. This is not accidental, since the ā presumably had a strong impact e Dhammapada commentary (von 4f.). With respect to their contents, ṇanā and the Dhammapada comly related, too. On the one hand, the mmentary includes many parallels ces to narratives and stanzas from tion (Burlingame, vol. I, 1921, 52ff.). nd, it shares its manifold narrative nts with the Jātakaṭṭhavaṇṇanā:
, and droll stories of a folksy origin ed (Burlingame, vol. I, 1921, 29ff.). re are several uplifting legends ed to illustrate certain stanzas. ign of the Dhammapada commend of verse and prose suggests a strikhe Jātakaṭṭhavaṇṇanā, the relation e is different in the two collections.

While the jātaka stanzas were probably furnished with an interpreting prose (though in an undetermined way) from the very beginning, often essential for the correct understanding of the text, the narratives of the Dhammapada commentary were later added to the initially independent stanzas (von Hinüber, 1996, 134).

We also have access to a commentary on the Udānavarga that can be regarded as the counterpart of Dhammapada within the (Mūla) sarvāstivāda school. The Bengali Prajñāvarman composed it around the year 800 CE under the title Udānavargavivaraṇa (Explanation of the Udānavarga), most likely in Sanskrit (as is also the Udānavarga). Since the original text is lost, we have to rely on its Tibetan translation made in the 11th cent. CE (Balk, 1984). Prajñāvarman frequently resorts to stories of the jātaka and avadāna type while commenting on the stanzas of the Udānavarga, though not in such a systematic or formalized fashion as the unknown commentator of the Dhammapada commentary, as well as to stories and legends of the Hindu lore with which he obviously was thoroughly conversant.

Single Narratives and Collections

Apart from the narratives dispersed in the sūtra and vinaya collections, and in commentaries, there are also jātakas and avadānas that have been transmitted – mostly anonymously – in separate manuscripts (e.g. the Maṇicūḍāvadāna [Handurukande, 1967] or the single avadānas in the Gilgit manuscripts [von Hinüber, 2014]). We rarely know whether these have been composed as single works or whether they stem from other texts or collections, though at least some of them seem to be compiled from different sources (e.g. the Kaṭhināvadāna; Degener, 1990). But, as a remarkable recent discovery shows, single stories were also transformed into sophisticated poetry by individual authors. Sarvarakṣita, a 12th-century poet from east India, presumably belonging to the Sāṃmitīya school, wrote his Maṇicūḍajātaka comprising 376 stanzas in a literary language hitherto unknown (Hanisch, 2008). The poem, which is transmitted in a single manuscript written in a peculiar script (the so-called arrow-headed or Bhaiksuki script) apparently used exclusively by the Sāṃmitīya school, draws heavily on the conventions of classical poetry (kāvya) as regards style and aesthetics.

The major part of the narrative literature is, however, transmitted in special collections of different form. On the one hand, there are anonymous collections of narratives compiled mainly for their narrative and didactical content; these collections cover a wide range: compilations into which the source texts were taken over in an essentially unmodified form (e.g. the Divyāvadāna), compilations with texts having undergone a strict editing and adaption process (e.g. the Avadānaśataka), and compilations with narratives partly derived from different sources, enriched with additions and integrated into a narrative frame (e.g. the avadānamālās). On the other hand, there were individual authors who handled the traditional stories in a more or less free manner, creating texts conforming to the rules of classical poetry (kāvya) with regard to themes as well as aesthetics (first of all the jātakamālās). Moreover, different ways to structure the collections can be found. Sometimes the structure is determined by that of the sources, as in the Divyāvadāna or in some of the later avadānamālās. Other collections adhere to the old Indian tradition to arrange texts according to their length, as is most prominently the case in the jātaka collection of the Theravāda school. Some collections are arranged in thematic sections, as in the case of the Avadānaśataka and some of the jātakamālās, whereas others have a narrative frame, as in some avadānamālās. Finally, there are collections with little or no discernible structure at all, like Kṣemendra's Bodhisattvāvadānakalpalatā.

Avadānas and Pūrvayogas in the Kharoshthi Manuscripts from Gandhara

The early Buddhist manuscripts from Gandhara (Salomon, 2014) include a considerable corpus of narrative literature. These texts represent by far the earliest scriptural specimens of Buddhist narrative literature in South Asia. The manuscripts of the British Library collection date back to the 1st century CE (Salomon, 2014, 10). Moreover, the form of the narratives is remarkable. Compiled in numbered collections, they all adhere to a rigid structure in an extremely abbreviated diction. These summaries probably had the function of providing a narrative skeleton as a memory aid for oral presentation – a thesis that is supported by formulas at the beginning or the end of the notes demanding the completion of the stories according to a (not-yet-discovered) pattern (Lenz, 2003, 80f.). The form of the summaries, some features of their language, and some peculiarities of the scripts suggest that they may be autographs (Lenz, 2003, 102ff.) and, therefore, part of the autochthonous literature of Gandhara. Accordingly, the content of the narratives is quite unique. Very few of the texts already edited and studied (Lenz, 2010, 8–12, table 1–2) bear similarities to Buddhist texts in other languages. Most of them seem to stem from local traditions of Gandhara, some even refer to historical persons known from finds of coins and inscriptions (Salomon, 1999, 37, 141–145). There are two types of narratives, also identified in the titles at the beginning of the texts (Lenz, 2003, 92f.). Pūrvayoga ("former connection," the term is rarely attested in other texts; Lenz, 2003, 79f.) refers to narratives reporting deeds that some person committed in the past, whereas avadāna denotes only narratives of the present existence (the narrative present). The Gandhari pūrvayogas can be compared to the classical jātakas and avadānas, and, accordingly, they contain most of the stories also known from other sources, for example a version of the famous Viśvantarajātaka (Lenz, 2003, 157–165). They mainly deal with the former existences of the Buddha or some other well-known Buddhist, after identifying them as such at the beginning of the narratives. By contrast, the Gandhari avadānas cover a greater variety of subjects: the effects of actions (karma) as in the classical avadānas, exemplary deeds of Buddhist monks and other kinds of ascetics, events from Buddhist or Gandharan history, and deeds related to the future demise of the dharma. A connection between the present and a former existence of the protagonists is very seldom established in these so-called avadānas. Knowledge of the old Gandharan narrative tradition is yet to accrue, though some aspects will probably remain obscure. The extremely spare diction allows only very limited inferences about the source narratives. This is aggravated by the fact that many of the manuscripts are fragments, which makes it even harder to interpret them (Lenz, 2010, 8, table 1).

A Collection of Narratives from the Merv Oasis

A composite manuscript on birchbark containing an untitled collection of avadānas and jātakas was found in the 1960s in the Merv oasis in Turkmenia. The manuscript is divided into three sections with different handwriting and content; besides the collection of narratives, it also contains extracts from Vinaya texts and an Abhidharma-like text with extracts from sūtras. A colophon attached to the Vinaya section links the texts contained in it with the school of the Sarvāstivādins (Vorobyova-Desyatovskaya, part 1, 1999, 27–30). The section containing the narratives consists of 68 full folios and several fragments with a total of 193 stories, while both the beginning and the end of the collection is lacking; on the basis of its handwriting it can be dated to the 5th century CE (Vorobyova-Desyatovskaya, part 1, 2000, 23). Hence we may assume that this collection of narratives belongs to the school of the Sarvāstivādins as well and was composed not later than in the 5th century CE. Parts of it were published in a series of articles by M.I. Vorobyova-Desyatovskaya (2000–2002); a complete edition and translation is under preparation (Karashima & Vorobyova-Desyatovskaya, 2015).

The narratives in the Merv collection (as the untitled text henceforth will be called) are written in a simple Sanskrit that is interspersed with Middle Indo-Aryan words and grammatical elements to a decidedly greater extent than other narrative texts affiliated with the school of the (Mūla)sarvāstivādins (e.g. Avadānaśataka and Divyāvadāna). The collection is structured by way of uddānas (summaries) inserted after each 10–12 stories. In addition there are headings before the individual stories that give their titles (Vorobyova-Desyatovskaya, part 1, 2000, 23f.). As in the case of the collections in the Kharoshthi manuscripts from Gandhara (see above), the individual stories are given as summaries only. This means that – besides mentioning the protagonists and the scenes – the plots are either not given at all or are presented by just some catchwords or laconic sentences. Frequently we find formulas that prompt one to tell the story in question in detail, for example, "thus it should be related in detail" (iti vistareṇa vācyaṃ), as well as references to the Vinaya that we may assume as the source of many of the stories, for example, "in detail [to be told] as in the Vinaya" (vistareṇa yathā vinaye; Vorobyova-Desyatovskaya, part 1, 2000, 24). But unlike the Kharoshthi collections, many stories of the Merv collection contain stanzas mentioning the main event(s) of the plot or an important statement of one of the protagonists. This is a feature that places the Merv collection near the Pali jātaka collection that is made up of stanzas and explanatory prose as well (see below) except that in the Merv collection, the explanatory prose has not been written out in full. It seems very likely that the collection once served the stories by heart as an abst Thus it seems doubtful that represents something like a fix ratives; rather it is likely that his abstract by himself (Vorob part 1, 2000, 24).

---

Most of the stories in the M to the avadāna type of narra even explicitly are called ava find the question "what [is] hi karma, or shortly kiṃ karma, o which points to a concern ab results, a typical feature of th we also find stories of the jāta of them is explicitly termed come across the term pūrvay the Kharoshthi collections as w of the stories from the Merv lels in other collections of narr Pali texts, the Karmaśataka or the Mūlasarvāstivādins. While help to understand a consid stories, the plots of some oth in the absence of any parall is to be hoped that a future translation (see above) will on the character and the gen sources of this important and of narratives.

Collections of the The Tradition

The Theravāda school is the
with a canonical collection is the most comprehensive c one most popular in the Wes referred to when talking abo ing version, it contains 547 jāt 550 (three are lost). It was e collection presumably arou monly known under the ti (Explanation of the Meaning 1877–1896; Andersen, 1897; Hinüber, 1996, 54; for the jātaka collection, see von Hin consist of one or more stanz with prose. Apart from very f stanzas (a total of approx. 2,5 the canon, whereas the pro ered to be a commentary.

vriting and content; besides the rratives, it also contains extracts xts and an Abhidharma-like text om sūtras. A colophon attached to on links the texts contained in it of the Sarvāstivādins (Vorobyova-part 1, 1999, 27–30). The section narratives consists of 68 full folios ments with a total of 193 stories, beginning and the end of the col-g; on the basis of its handwriting, o the 5th century CE (Vorobyova-part 1, 2000, 23). Hence we may s collection of narratives belongs the Sarvāstivādins as well and was later than in the 5th century CE. published in a series of articles by Desyatovskaya (2000–2002); a comd translation is under preparation robyova-Desyatovskaya, 2015). s in the Merv collection (as the ceforth will be called) are written rit that is interspersed with Middle ds and grammatical elements to a r extent than other narrative texts school of the (Mūla)sarvāstivādins ka and Divyāvadāna). The collec-d by way of uddānas (summaries) ch 10–12 stories. In addition there re the individual stories that give byova-Desyatovskaya, part 1, 2000, ase of the collections in the Khar-ts from Gandhara (see above), the are given as summaries only. This sides mentioning the protagonists the plots are either not given at all by just some catchwords or laconic ently we find formulas that prompt ry in question in detail, for exam-d be related in detail" (iti vistareṇa s references to the Vinaya that we he source of many of the stories, etail [to be told] as in the Vinaya" vinaye; Vorobyova-Desyatovskaya, But unlike the Kharoshthi collec-es of the Merv collection contain ng the main event(s) of the plot or ement of one of the protagonists. at places the Merv collection near llection that is made up of stanzas prose as well (see below) except collection, the explanatory prose ten out in full. It seems very likely that the collection once served a preacher who knew the stories by heart as an abstract for his sermons. Thus it seems doubtful that the Merv collection represents something like a fixed collection of narratives; rather it is likely that the preacher drew up his abstract by himself (Vorobyova-Desyatovskaya, part 1, 2000, 24).

Most of the stories in the Merv collection belong to the avadāna type of narratives, some of them even explicitly are called avadāna. Frequently we find the question "what [is] his karma?" (kiṃ tasya karma, or shortly kiṃ karma, or even simply karma), which points to a concern about deeds and their results, a typical feature of the avadāna genre. But we also find stories of the jātaka type, though none of them is explicitly termed a jātaka. Instead we come across the term pūrvayoga, which is used in the Kharoshthi collections as well (see above). Many of the stories from the Merv collection have parallels in other collections of narratives, for example, in Pali texts, the Karmaśataka or in the Vinayavastu of the Mūlasarvāstivādins. While these identifications help to understand a considerable portion of the stories, the plots of some others remain only vague in the absence of any parallel presently known. It is to be hoped that a future complete edition and translation (see above) will shed some more light on the character and the genesis as well as on the sources of this important and interesting collection of narratives.

Collections of the Theravāda Tradition

The Theravāda school is the only Buddhist school with a canonical collection of jātakas preserved. It is the most comprehensive collection, as well as the one most popular in the West. This is why it is often referred to when talking about jātakas. In its surviving version, it contains 547 jātakas out of the original 550 (three are lost). It was edited and formed as a collection presumably around 500 CE and is commonly known under the title Jātakaṭṭhavaṇṇanā (Explanation of the Meaning of the Jātakas; Fausbøll, 1877–1896; Andersen, 1897; Cowell, 1895–1907; von Hinüber, 1996, 54; for the textual history of the jātaka collection, see von Hinüber, 1998). The jātakas consist of one or more stanzas (gāthā), interspersed with prose. Apart from very few exceptions, only the stanzas (a total of approx. 2,500) are taken as part of the canon, whereas the prose sections are considered to be a commentary. The stanzas, composed in an antiquated language, form the basic structure of the narratives, which is filled up by the narrative prose containing the main story. Grammatical and lexicographical notes (Pal. veyyākaraṇa) comment and explain the stanzas. Within this collection, the jātakas are arranged in a strictly formal fashion according to the number of stanzas embedded. The actual collection is preceded by a long prose introduction interspersed with verses, called Nidānakathā (Jayawickrama, 1990). It contains in its first part brief biographies of the 24 former buddhas in the present eon, leading up to a comprehensive biography of Buddha Śākyamuni in the following two parts. We are told about the Buddha's birth and life up to his enlightenment and subsequently about his career as the founder of the saṅgha. The narration closes with the lay follower Anāthapiṇḍika donating the Jetavana grove to the Buddha, the place where the Buddha tells most of the following jātakas. Thus, the Nidānakathā closely connects the jātaka narratives to the biography and the person of the Buddha, both with respect to the dogma and in terms of the time and place. This link is also intensified by the jātaka prose frequently cross-referencing the Nidānakathā.

The jātakas all share the same structure: a "story in the present" (paccupannavatthu) reports an event in the Buddha's lifetime, giving him the opportunity to tell a "story of the past" (atītavatthu). This story, introduced by "once on a time" (atīte), is the actual jātaka, regularly containing the stanza(s) as well as the grammatical and lexical commentary. A so-called link (samodhāna) closes the narrative frame by leading back to the present, identifying the past protagonists with the present ones. The first quarter of the initial stanza serves as a headline of the entire narrative. The jātakas draw from various literary traditions, few of them Buddhist, many of them dating back to oral traditions before the advent of Buddhism. This accounts for the immense variety of form and content and also for the fact that many stories lack Buddhist features entirely. The collection comprises fables, fairy tales, legends, droll stories, ballads, small epics, and complex narratives ranging from less than one up to more than a hundred printed pages (for a detailed survey, see Winternitz, 1933, 113ff.). The division into canonical verses and postcanonical prose points to the old Indian narrative form of ākhyāna, which has a fixed wording of the stanzas only, whereas the actual story is to be shaped anew during each oral performance (comp. Alsdorf, 1963–1964). Initially the major part of the first five hundred stories must have been of this type, since most of the stanzas are hardly comprehensible without their corresponding prose paragraphs, although the surviving prose does not always fit the stanzas. The second part of the collection consists of longer poems or even smaller epics. In contrast to the ākhyāna-like narratives, they are not in need of any interspersed prose parts for the sake of clarity, and indeed they probably contained very few or none of them originally. Many of the stories have equivalents in common Indian narrative literature, in the two old Indian epics (the Mahābhārata and Rāmāyaṇa), and also in the literatures of other countries and cultures. Apart from this, similar versions of several jātakas can be found elsewhere in the canon and in the commentaries of the Theravāda tradition, as well as in other schools.

The Cariyāpiṭaka (Basket of Conduct [of the Buddha]; Jayawickrama, 1974; Horner, 1975), a later supplement to the canon of the Theravādins, contains 35 jātakas with most of their narrative content also to be found within the jātaka collection. The book is worth mentioning, less as a source of narrative material than because of its ideological stance: the jātakas in this text, entirely composed of verses, serve to illustrate the Bodhisattva's determination to attain Buddhahood by practicing the ten perfections (pāramī; Skt. pāramitā; Appleton, 2010, 66ff.). Since the stories are arranged according to a traditional sequence of the perfections, they are also linked to the jātakamālā literature outside the Theravāda tradition.

The school of the Theravādins includes various volumes that can be perceived as collections of avadānas, since the predominant subject of the stories is the efficacy of the law of karma. The book called Apadāna is dedicated to the Buddha, the monks, and the nuns (Lilley, 1925–1927; there is no complete translation, but see Mellick, 1993; for a study of the Apadāna, see Mellick Cutler, 1994). The bulk of the work contains karmic biographies: 547 of elder monks form the third part of the book and 40 of elder nuns form the fourth part, both composed in verses usually recited by the respective persons themselves. A typical narrative starts with the report of a meritorious deed in a former existence, usually worshipping a buddha or his relics, or giving some gift to the Buddha or the saṅgha. Then the karmic effect of this deed is related, which usually consists in subsequent fortunate existences, culminating in the attainment of the state of an arahat (Skt. arhat) in the present existence. Some poems of the elder monks and nuns are also known to be contained in the collection of the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā, therefore the apadānas of the theras and of the therīs may be interpreted as a supplement to them, and their commentary also containing apadānas. The first part of the Apadāna is a so-called Buddhāpadāna, illustrating the karmic effects of a single event in a former existence of the Buddha. The second part, the Paccekabuddhāpadāna, is not an apadāna proper and can be left aside in the present context (Mellick Cutler, 1994, 10f.). Parts of the Anavataptagāthā, which are quite similar with respect to the form and subject matter, have found their way into the Apadāna collection (Salomon, 2008, 28f.; also see above). Collections similar to the Pali apadānas seem to have existed in other Buddhist schools too, as can be seen from fragments of the Sthaviragāthās (Songs of the Elders) found in Central Asia (Bechert, 1961).

The Vimānavatthu ([Book] about Heavenly Mansions) and the Petavatthu ([Book] about the Ghosts) may be considered complementary to the Apadāna, because in these two books, Buddhist lay followers are telling their stories (Jayawickrama, 1977; Horner & Gehman, 1974; Stede, 1914). In a similar fashion to the monks and nuns in the Apadāna, they report in verse by what kind of good or bad actions they were rewarded with an existence in a vimāna, a mansion imagined as a kind of marvelous flying castle located in heaven, or thrown into the suffering existence as a peta, a wandering ghost. Since the stanzas are often few and scarce, the commentary of Dhammapāla is indispensable in order to understand their meaning (after the 5th cent. CE; Hardy, 1894; 1901; Kyaw & Masefield, 1980; Masefield, 1989). It supplies philological explanations but most importantly the frame narrative for each story. Its relation to the canonical stanzas is of a similar kind as that of the Jātakaṭṭhavaṇṇanā.

Anonymous Collections in Sanskrit Prose with Interspersed Verse

The Avadānaśataka (The Hundred Avadānas; Feer, 1891; Speyer, 1902–1909) is a collection of narratives, compiled and edited between the 2nd and the 6th century CE, presumably in northern India. The Sanskrit text has survived in a complete form in Nepalese manuscripts. However, this is not the original version, for it is probably based on a 7th-century revision done in the dogmatic environment of the (Mūla-)Sarvāstivāda school, as can be seen by the use of phrases and verbal clichés that stem from canonical texts of that school. A Chinese translation was made between the and the late 6th century CI seems to be nearer to the as though the translators hav passages from another text transmission history, see D of manuscript fragments in A Asia (Demoto, 2006, 214ff.), in later Sanskrit texts, and t Tibetan translation (early 9 wide distribution and susta this text. The narratives are unadorned Sanskrit prose interspersed. Compared to ture appears to be particula frequent use of stereotyped times of substantial length, cal way at suitable places in beginning and end, contrib windedness and monotony and the consistent use of th the Avadānaśataka underw cess. In accord with its title, tains exactly a hundred nar sections (varga) with ten n narrative is lacking in the Sa tions are arranged accordi there are stories about pr the Buddha, foretelling son dha or a pratyekabuddha ( stories about a previous e therefore in substance jāta sections); stories about pe made them become ghost deeds brought them to hea tions; thematically related t Vimānavatthu); and stories persons becoming arhats tribe, women, and forme tenth sections; see Feer, 18 survey).

---

The Karmaśataka is simi with respect to content an dred Deeds) can also be mous to that of the Avada the general meaning "explo The original Sanskrit text have access to a Tibetan Las brgya tham pa. It proba half of the 8th century (Ski afterward included in the s Kanjur (DN 340). It is diffic of the Indian original more erefore the apadānas of the theras may be interpreted as a supplement their commentary also containing irst part of the Apadāna is a so-called illustrating the karmic effects of a a former existence of the Buddha.

t, the Paccekabuddhāpadāna, is not oper and can be left aside in the t (Mellick Cutler, 1994, 10f.). Parts ptagāthā, which are quite simit to the form and subject matter, r way into the Apadāna collection , 28f.; also see above). Collections li apadānas seem to have existed in chools too, as can be seen from fraghaviragāthās (Songs of the Elders) Asia (Bechert, 1961). tthu ([Book] about Heavenly Man-tavatthu ([Book] about the Ghosts) ed complementary to the Apadāna, two books, Buddhist lay followers tories (Jayawickrama, 1977; Horner Stede, 1914). In a similar fashion to uns in the Apadāna, they report in d of good or bad actions they were n existence in a vimāna, a mansion d of marvelous flying castle located wn into the suffering existence as a g ghost. Since the stanzas are often he commentary of Dhammapāla is order to understand their mean-cent. CE; Hardy, 1894; 1901; Kyaw 80; Masefield, 1989). It supplies lanations but most importantly ve for each story. Its relation to the s is of a similar kind as that of the ā.

Collections in Sanskrit terspersed Verse

ka (The Hundred Avadānas; Feer, 1909) is a collection of narratives, ted between the 2nd and the 6th mably in northern India. The San-ived in a complete form in Nep-. However, this is not the original probably based on a 7th-century he dogmatic environment of the da school, as can be seen by the d verbal clichés that stem from that school. A Chinese translation was made between the second half of the 5th and the late 6th century CE, which on the whole seems to be nearer to the assumed Indian original, though the translators have incorporated several passages from another text (for the dating and the transmission history, see Demoto, 2006). Findings of manuscript fragments in Afghanistan and Central Asia (Demoto, 2006, 214ff.), numerous adaptations in later Sanskrit texts, and the Chinese as well as a Tibetan translation (early 9th cent.) testify to the wide distribution and sustained popular appeal of this text. The narratives are written in a plain and unadorned Sanskrit prose with occasional verses interspersed. Compared to similar texts, one feature appears to be particularly striking, namely, the frequent use of stereotyped phrases and clichés, at times of substantial length, repeated in a mechanical way at suitable places in the narrative and at its beginning and end, contributing to a certain longwindedness and monotony. The uniform language and the consistent use of these clichés indicate that the Avadānaśataka underwent a rigid editing process. In accord with its title, the Avadānaśataka contains exactly a hundred narratives, divided into ten sections (varga) with ten narratives each (the fifth narrative is lacking in the Sanskrit version). The sections are arranged according to thematic features: there are stories about prophecies (vyākaraṇa) of the Buddha, foretelling someone to become a Buddha or a pratyekabuddha (first and third sections); stories about a previous existence of the Buddha, therefore in substance jātakas (second and fourth sections); stories about persons whose bad deeds made them become ghosts (preta) or whose good deeds brought them to heaven (fifth and sixth sections; thematically related to the Pali Petavatthu and Vimānavatthu); and stories about different types of persons becoming arhats (members of the Śākya tribe, women, and former evildoers: seventh to tenth sections; see Feer, 1891, xiv–xvi, for a detailed survey).

The Karmaśataka is similar to the Avadānaśataka with respect to content and style. Its title (The Hundred Deeds) can also be read as roughly synonymous to that of the Avadānaśataka, provided that the general meaning "exploit" is applied to avadāna. The original Sanskrit text has not survived, but we have access to a Tibetan translation with the title Las brgya tham pa. It probably dates back to the first half of the 8th century (Skilling, 2001, 140), and it was afterward included in the sūtra section of the Tibetan Kanjur (DN 340). It is difficult to determine the date of the Indian original more precisely than establishing this terminus ante quem, but there is reason to presume that it was created in roughly the same period as the Avadānaśataka. The analysis and the summary translations by M.L. Feer (1901) are still the basic reference point for this work (for subsequent studies, mostly Japanese, see Silk, 2008, 180n7, who also translates a few stories). The Karmaśataka contains 127 narratives, written in a style very similar to that of the Avadānaśataka, as far as can be deduced from the Tibetan translation. Besides everything else, both collections apply the same clichés, and they share numerous stories.

The compilation entitled Divyāvadāna (Heavenly Avadānas), or Divyāvadānamālā (Garland of Heavenly Avadānas), possesses a different character. The individual parts of the text, mostly avadānas but occasionally also of the sūtra type, have different sources and dates (Tatelman, 2000, 12f.), which can easily be deduced by the diversity of theme, ideology, language, and style. All manuscripts hitherto known by the title Divyāvadāna(mālā) come from Nepal, and none is older than the 17th century. Concerning the narratives and their arrangement, they do not have much in common apart from a shared core of only seven narratives (according to Iwamoto, 1967, 143–149; see also Rotman, 2008, 8–15). One version with 38 narratives has been edited, entitled Divyāvadāna (Cowell & Neil, 1886; no. 38, however, is a later accretion to the archetype of the manuscripts used by Cowell & Neil; comp. Hahn, 2010a, 86), though no title occurs with the manuscripts used by the editors (comp. Cowell & Neil, 1886, viif.). Since, however, both titles, Divyāvadāna and Divyāvadānamālā, can be found in colophons of other manuscripts known so far (comp. the descriptive catalogue of the Nepalese-German Manuscript Cataloguing Project [NGMCP]), they should be seen as merely conventional designations as long as they are not used with regard to single manuscripts or clear-cut recensions of the textual tradition. Excerpts of the edition of E.B. Cowell and R.A. Neil have been translated into several Western languages (Dimitrov, 2008, 47n7; for a first part of a projected complete English translation, see Rotman, 2008; for an important review article, see Hiraoka, 2011), and the complete text exists in a Japanese translation (Hiraoka, 2007; for extracted text-critical remarks in English, see Hiraoka, 2009). Other versions have hardly been researched. Nevertheless, there are outlines of the contents of most of the manuscripts (most notably Matsunami, 1965, 222–226; Iwamoto, 1967, 144–147; see also Dimitrov, 2008, 45f.; and the descriptive catalogue of the NGMCP). It is still uncertain whether the different versions that have been handed down can be traced back to one single source or whether the title Divyāvadāna(mālā) rather functioned as a kind of a genre term. The date of the collection(s) also remains obscure. Two small compilations of *avadāna*s (both untitled) among the Gilgit manuscripts (late 6th-7th cents. CE) contain narratives that are also part of the Divyāvadāna(mālā) tradition (von Hinüber, 2014, 96 [entry no. 9], 98 [entry no. 13a]), and the pages of one of the compilations, having survived as fragments, list two narratives in the same order as in the text edited by E.B. Cowell and R.A. Neil (Hartmann, 1980, 251). These or similar collections may perhaps have formed the core of collections only later to be entitled Divyāvadāna(mālā), since the Gilgit manuscripts as well as a major part of the narratives transmitted within the Divyāvadāna(mālā) tradition can be assigned to the school of the Mūlasarvāstivādins (see below). More detailed information can only be obtained by arranging the remaining folios in proper order and editing them completely. The Nepalese manuscripts point to the origin of the Divyāvadāna(mālā)s in their present forms not much earlier than the 17th century. This, together with some of its versions bearing the term avadānamālā in the title, would position them closer to the genre of the Nepalese *avadānamālā*s (see below). From the point of view of literary history, the Divyāvadāna(mālā)s gain their importance not so much as a compilation but rather as a substantial source of narratives dating back to the 1st century CE. This view finds support in the early Chinese translations (2nd to 3rd cents. CE) of the Śārdūlakarṇāvadāna (Cowell & Neil, 1886, 611ff.; reedited by Mukhopadhyaya, 1954), in certain fragmented manuscripts of narratives having been found in Central Asia as well as in Pakistan and Afghanistan (see above and Rotman, 2008, 15f.; also Wille, 2014, 203f.), and mainly in the close relationship between the Divyāvadāna(mālā)s and the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinayavastu. The latter contains a major part of the narratives transmitted as a part of the collections in almost identical wording (21 out of a total of 38 narratives in the version edited by Cowell & Neil; comp. Panglung, 1981, xv–xvii). It is not clear whether one text took the narratives from the other or whether both of them share one common source that did not survive. There is, however, good reason to assume that the narratives found their direct or indirect way from the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinayavastu into the Divyāvadāna (Hiraoka, 1998, containing an overview of the older literature; for a different though not convincing view, see Li, 2011, xiii–xvii). Especially worth mentioning among the narratives of the Divyāvadāna is a series of four stories dealing with the famous "Buddhist" king Aśoka and his preceptor Upagupta (Cowell & Neil, 1886, 348–434; Strong, 1983). These stories are probably to be considered partial adaptations of an otherwise lost legend of Aśoka and Upagupta, the only ones known in an Indian language. We find other adaptations of the legend only in Chinese translations (Li, 1993; for a survey of the current state of research pertaining to the legend of Aśoka and Upagupta, see Steiner, 2009, 459f.; for the legendary figure Upagupta, see also Strong, 1992).

There are several other collections of *avadāna*s and *jātaka*s, some of them of old Indian origin but accessible only in Chinese translations, the sources missing. Brief surveys can be found by H. Nakamura (1980, 139f.), L.N. Menśikov (1980), and D. Schlingloff (vol. II, 2013, 254). É. Chavannes (1910–1934) translated a comprehensive choice of narratives from compilations and from vinaya texts (comp. also de Jong, 1965). The Bukkyo Dendo Kyokai English Tripiṭaka series contains two volumes with narrative texts from the Chinese tripiṭaka (Li, 1993; Willemen, 1994).

The *Jātakamālā*s and Their Predecessors

The *jātakamālā*s are an important branch of the Buddhist jātaka literature and also a major contribution to classical Indian poetry in general. They are not just anonymous compilations or editorial treatments of narratives already existing but distinct works of poets known by name who strove to find a new expression for traditional content by means of the style and the conventions of classical poetry (kāvya). In order to do so, they applied the genre of campū, a literary form characterized by a balanced and effectively composed blend of prose and verses in various meters (Hahn, 2011, 44f.). We have (partial or complete) access to fully fledged works by three authors: Āryaśūra, Haribhaṭṭa, and Gopadatta. Āryaśūra's Jātakamālā, the oldest, contains 34 narratives (concerning the use of "Jātakamālā" both as a title and as a genre term, see Hanisch, vol. I, 2005, xivf.). It has survived completely in its original Sanskrit and in a Tibetan translation (early 9th cent.). At least since the complete volume was first edited in Sanskrit (Kern, 1891), it was held to be the only representative of the genre (Speyer, 1895; Khoroche, 1989; for a first part of a projected ally worth mentioning among the Divyāvadāna is a series of four sto-the famous "Buddhist" king Aśoka r Upagupta (Cowell & Neil, 1886, 1983). These stories are probably partial adaptations of an otherwise oka and Upagupta, the only ones ian language. We find other adapgend only in Chinese translations vey of the current state of research legend of Aśoka and Upagupta, , 459f.; for the legendary figure o Strong, 1992).

ral other collections of avadānas of them of old Indian origin but Chinese translations, the sources veys can be found by H. Nakamura enšikov (1980), and D. Schlingloff
. É. Chavannes (1910–1934) transensive choice of narratives from from vinaya texts (comp. also e Bukkyo Dendo Kyokai English contains two volumes with narthe Chinese tripiṭaka (Li, 1993;

lās and Their

are an important branch of the erature and also a major contri-Indian poetry in general. They are is compilations or editorial treat-es already existing but distinct own by name who strove to find for traditional content by means e conventions of classical poetry o do so, they applied the genre ry form characterized by a balely composed blend of prose and eters (Hahn, 2011, 44f.). We have te) access to fully fledged works Āryaśūra, Haribhaṭṭa, and Gopa-ātakamālā, the oldest, contains cerning the use of "Jātakamālā" as a genre term, see Hanisch, t has survived completely in its d in a Tibetan translation (early since the complete volume was krit (Kern, 1891), it was held to entative of the genre (Speyer, 9; for a first part of a projected complete new edition, see Hanisch, 2005). Only recently parts of Haribhaṭṭa's and Gopadatta's Jātakamālās, the successors of Āryaśūra's, were discovered in their original Sanskrit, and these fragments have already been partly translated and published. Haribhaṭṭa's Jātakamālā, which also contains 34 narratives (with an apocryphal 35th), has survived in a complete Tibetan translation from the 12th century and in considerable fragments of the original Sanskrit (edited in various places by M. Hahn; for the most complete edition, see Hahn, 2011; for older publications, among them translations of single jātakas as well as editions and translations of some jātakas preserved only in Tibetan translation, see Hahn, 2011, 368ff.; for hints at Haribhaṭṭa's personality, see Hahn, 2011, 1–10). Discoveries of manuscript fragments in Afghanistan and Kashmir and along the Silk Road, references in Indian Sanskrit texts, translations into various Buddhist idioms, and the mural paintings of Ajanta confirm the long-lasting and wide appeal of the works by Āryaśūra and Haribhaṭṭa in India and Central Asia (for the former, see Hanisch, 2005, xxi–xxiii; for the latter, see Hahn, 2011, v). Haribhaṭṭa most likely composed his Jātakamālā before the early 5th century (Hahn, 2011, 9f.). In his foreword, he also mentions Āryaśūra, whom he obviously venerated as his predecessor (Hahn, 2011, 3ff.). Āryaśūra's Jātakamālā probably dates from the late 4th century (the meager biographic facts about Āryaśūra are collected in Khoroche, 1989, xi–xiv; Hanisch, 2005, xvii–xx). A complete text of Gopadatta's Jātakamālā has not survived, though we have knowledge of its former existence from Somendra's postscript to his father Kṣemendra's Bodhisattvāvadānakalpalatā (composed in 1051 CE). Sixteen narratives have been handed down as editorial revisions in later Nepalese compilations, and there is one separate text including a Tibetan translation, even though only in two cases can Gopadatta be defined with confidence as the author of the narratives. Thus, we have only vague hints as to the structure, content, and size of his oeuvre (Hahn, 2007; 2010a; for editions and translations, see Hahn, 2007; 2010a; esp. Hahn, 2007, 1045, 1045n7). The dates of birth and death of Gopadatta are also uncertain; he probably lived after Haribhaṭṭa and before the 8th century (Hahn, 1992, 28). The above-mentioned reference to his Jātakamālā by Somendra is the only valid reference point, and also one of the rare hints to his reception history (also Hahn, 1992, 27f.).

---

All three authors composed their narratives according to a similar pattern: at the beginning, there is a motto, frequently pointing out the moral of the narrative, followed by the opening formula tadyathānuśrūyate, "thus it is transmitted," which is a kind of trademark of the jātakamālās. Then the Bodhisattva is introduced in his respective existence, and after that, the actual jātaka is narrated in campū style. It frequently ends with a paragraph presenting the moral and calling on the audience to follow the example of the Bodhisattva (Hahn, 2011, 17–22; for differences among the individual authors, see Hahn, 1992, 20–22). This form differs from the three parts of the Pali jātakas and most of the avadānas and their frame in the narrative present with the Buddha or some other well-known member of the saṅgha relating the actual jātaka or avadāna as an event in the past. In contrast, the narrator in the jātakamālās remains anonymous. Nevertheless, in the opening formula, the narrator establishes a link to the tradition, in this way legitimizing the report as a third-person narration, starting with the identification of the Bodhisattva as the main protagonist. Instead of the narrative frame relating the circumstances and the occasion of the narration in a quasi-historical manner, the introducing motto of the jātakamālās and their concluding formula establish an ideological and didactic frame interpreting the conduct of the Bodhisattva in the light of the Buddhist cardinal virtues and demanding that one follow this example. Both Āryaśūra and Haribhaṭṭa (who explicitly refers to Āryaśūra as his predecessor) establish the six perfections (pāramitā) not only as an ideological frame but also as a blueprint for the structure of the entire work and the arrangement of the individual narratives (Hahn, 2011, 13–17). As far as we can tell from the limited sources at hand, Gopadatta seems to blaze new paths with regard to his preferred contents, because some of his narratives relate historical and philosophical themes (Hahn, 2007, 1048–1050). At the current state of research, general assumptions concerning the sources of the narratives in the three jātakamālās can only be made with respect to Āryaśūra's Jātakamālā, which shares several narratives with the jātakas of the Theravāda tradition (Khoroche, 1989, xviif).

Apart from the classical writers Āryaśūra, Haribhaṭṭa, and Gopadatta, there are two other authors related to the jātakamālā genre. Around the 2nd century CE, Kumāralāta composed a collection of 90 narratives, presumably entitled Kalpanāmaṇḍitikā Dṛṣṭāntapaṅkti (or Kalpanālaṃkṛtikā Dṛṣṭāntapaṅkti; Collection of Examples, Adorned with an [Artistic] Arrangement; Lüders, 1926, 17ff.; interpretation of the title according to Hahn, 1982, 315; for dissenting opinions, see Hahn, 1982, 315). The entire work exists only in a Chinese translation from the 5th century CE, which found its way into some older works of literary history under the wrong author Aśvaghoṣa and the equally wrong title Sūtrālaṃkāra (for a French translation, see Huber, 1908; comp. Hahn, 1982, 1f.). Fragments of a manuscript with the original Sanskrit text were found in Kizil (Lüders, 1926), and the first narrative with the verses introducing the complete oeuvre exists in a Tibetan translation as part of the Tanjur (Hahn, 1982). With the aid of these sources, this work can be classified as a predecessor to the above-mentioned three classics of the jātakamālā genre. It already contains all the stylistic features of the later works: the preceding motto (in prose), the introducing formula tadyathānuśrūyate, the blend of prose and verse, and the admonishing ending (Lüders, 1926, 46–53). Compared to his successors, Kumāralāta applies a plain language, scarcely shaped after the fashion of Indian poetry (kāvya). The contents are of a wide variety: apart from proper *jātaka*s, there are legends and quasi-historical reports of all kinds, and the last decade of the work consists of peculiar brief allegories, followed by comprehensive interpretations (Lüders, 1926, 36f., 53). Consequently, many of the legends should rather be classified as *avadāna*s, a view supported by the term dṛṣṭānta (example) used in the title of the work, which is often applied by Buddhist authors as an explanation of avadāna (see above).

In the current state of research, it is not possible to assign a date to Saṅghasena, the second known predecessor of the jātakamālā classics, who composed a compilation of narratives of hitherto unknown extent. The work (for the title, see below) is available in a Chinese translation, consisting of eight narratives (T. 153; for a German translation, see Höke, 1984). Up to now, it has been dated to the mid-3rd century CE, but this can hardly be sustained (Hahn, 2010b, 466). Fragments of a manuscript found in Kizil containing parts of the Sanskrit original have not yet been edited (Schlingloff, 1987, 96). The manuscript can confidently be dated to between the second half of the 3rd and the first half of the 4th century CE (Mette, 2007, 352); thus, it provides the terminus ante quem for Saṅghasena's work. The original Sanskrit title is unknown, but the Chinese translation is titled Pusa benyuan jing (菩薩本緣經; Sūtra of the Bodhisattva's Avadānas; pointing to a Sanskrit title Bodhisattvāvadānasūtra* that most likely is not the original title). The structure of the narratives in the Chinese translation proves Saṅghasena to be another predecessor of the jātakamālā classics. Thematically, his work is quite close to Āryaśūra's and Haribhaṭṭa's *jātakamālā*s, since the eight narratives retell typical *jātaka*s (some of them very popular), explicitly referring to the perfections (pāramitā), notably to generosity (dāna) and morality (śīla).

Kṣemendra's Bodhisattvāvadānakalpalatā

The versatile Kashmirian author Kṣemendra (fl. c. 1036–1065 CE) was considered the only Indian poet composing *jātaka*s solely in a metrical form, until Sarvarakṣita's Maṇicūḍajātaka (see above) was discovered. Nevertheless, his substantial Bodhisattvāvadānakalpalatā (Wish-Fulfilling Creeper Consisting in Avadānas of the Bodhisattva) is still held to be the only compilation of its kind (Dās et al., 1888-1918; for reeditions and translations of single parts, see Straube, 2009, 379). Kṣemendra's son Somendra completed the work in 1051 CE by adding one more jātaka to the 107 *jātaka*s of his father – 108 is an auspicious number – as well as a detailed postscript delineating his father's biography and the circumstances of the production of the work. From this we learn that Kṣemendra was aware of Āryaśūra and Gopadatta, and their blend of prose and verse, and also that he deliberately intended to blaze new paths by composing a work entirely in verse (Straube, 2009, 300f.). The narrative material of his *jātaka*s (for which bodhisattvāvadāna is obviously a synonym) is derived from different sources, although a special affinity to the tradition of the Mūlasarvāstivādins and to the narratives of their Vinayavastu (see above) can be discerned. Kṣemendra's oeuvŕe gained and still exerts a substantial influence in Tibet by means of its Tibetan translation (dating from the second half of the 13th cent.; Dimitrov, 2002, 37n151).

The Avadānamālās

These texts, named after the frequently applied component avadānamālā (Garland of Avadānas; e.g. in Bhadrakalpāvadānamālā [Garland of Avadānas from the Fortunate (i.e. Present) Era]) form a substantial body of works hitherto little researched (see the survey in Hahn, 1985, 16ff.; 2010a, 76ff.; Tuladhar-Douglas, 2006, 39). They are anonymous, mainly metrical compilations of *jātaka*s and avadānas, derived from older sources, either left unc fied by abridgments or additions, o case of prose texts, reformulated i language. The dates and intellectu of these texts have not been establ although some if not all of the tex around the 15th century in Nepal. B ple of shared features, W. Tuladha 38–52) identifies the avadānamā genuinely Nepalese genre, which literature." Apart from the avadāna also comprises Buddhist māhātmy with the specific virtue of a partic (e.g. the Svayaṃbhūpurāṇa). In ad tures already mentioned (verse re works), the texts of this genre al with respect to conceptual, dogi matters and most importantly a frame. This frame fits the narrativ between the Indian king Aśoka advisor Upagupta or between th Jinaśrī and his teacher Jayaśrī. Th asks his advisor for instructions c ticular subject matter, and the tea enquiry by delivering the narrati of the narratives contained in th have only partly survived. It Avadānaśataka enjoyed immense almost completely retold in a cyc encing *avadānamālā*s, partly follo scheme (Okano, 2006). Other pop Kṣemendra's Bodhisattvāvadānaka the *Jātakamālā*s by Āryaśūra, Hari datta. The *avadānamālā*s are an es and rewarding source for the la since their works can be derived fr only partly (Haribhaṭṭa) or not a Hahn, 2010a; 2011). Some other te regarded as Indian poetical works of their language and style, canno the oeuvres of Buddhist poets as k thus they offer precious insights i wise lost without a trace.

Bibliography

Alsdorf, L., "The Ākhyāna Theory Recons 1964, 195–207; repr. L. Alsdorf, Kleine ²2001, 36–48.

Andersen, D., Index to the Jātaka and Its C 1897.

ecessor of the jātakamālā classics.
work is quite close to Āryaśūra's jātakamālās, since the eight narical jātakas (some of them very itly referring to the perfections ly to generosity (dāna) and moral-adānakalpalatā shmirian author Kṣemendra (fl.

was considered the only Indian jātakas solely in a metrical form, 's Maṇicūḍajātaka (see above) was theless, his substantial Bodhisattvā- (Wish-Fulfilling Creeper Consist-of the Bodhisattva) is still held to ilation of its kind (Dās et al., 1888– s and translations of single parts, 379). Kṣemendra's son Somendra rk in 1051 CE by adding one more takas of his father – 108 is an auspiwell as a detailed postscript delinbiography and the circumstances of the work. From this we learn was aware of Āryaśūra and Gopalend of prose and verse, and also ly intended to blaze new paths by k entirely in verse (Straube, 2009, tive material of his jātakas (for vadāna is obviously a synonym) fferent sources, although a special dition of the Mūlasarvāstivādins es of their Vinayavastu (see above) . Kṣemendra's oeuvre gained and antial influence in Tibet by means nslation (dating from the second nt.; Dimitrov, 2002, 37n151).

mālās

d after the frequently applied comālā (Garland of Avadānas; e.g. in namālā [Garland of Avadānas te (i.e. Present) Era]) form a suborks hitherto little researched (see n, 1985, 16ff.; 2010a, 76ff.; Tuladhar-. They are anonymous, mainly metof jātakas and avadānas, derived from older sources, either left unchanged or modified by abridgments or additions, or, especially in the case of prose texts, reformulated in verse in a plain language. The dates and intellectual environments of these texts have not been established in all cases, although some if not all of the texts originate from around the 15th century in Nepal. By means of a couple of shared features, W. Tuladhar-Douglas (2006, 38–52) identifies the avadānamālās as a part of a genuinely Nepalese genre, which he calls "Garland literature." Apart from the avadānamālās, this genre also comprises Buddhist māhātmyas, works dealing with the specific virtue of a particular sacred place (e.g. the Svayaṃbhūpurāṇa). In addition to the features already mentioned (verse recensions of older works), the texts of this genre also share features with respect to conceptual, dogmatic, and ritual matters and most importantly a similar narrative frame. This frame fits the narratives into a dialogue between the Indian king Aśoka and his spiritual advisor Upagupta or between the Nepalese king Jinaśrī and his teacher Jayaśrī. The king repeatedly asks his advisor for instructions concerning a particular subject matter, and the teacher answers the enquiry by delivering the narratives. The sources of the narratives contained in the avadānamālās have only partly survived. It seems that the Avadānaśataka enjoyed immense popularity. It was almost completely retold in a cycle of cross-referencing avadānamālās, partly following a numbered scheme (Okano, 2006). Other popular sources were Kṣemendra's Bodhisattvāvadānakalpalatā, as well as the Jātakamālās by Āryaśūra, Haribhaṭṭa, and Gopadatta. The avadānamālās are an especially precious and rewarding source for the latter two authors, since their works can be derived from other sources only partly (Haribhaṭṭa) or not at all (Gopadatta; Hahn, 2010a; 2011). Some other text passages, to be regarded as Indian poetical works (kāvya) by virtue of their language and style, cannot be found within the oeuvres of Buddhist poets as known today, and thus they offer precious insights into works otherwise lost without a trace.

Bibliography

Alsdorf, L., "The Ākhyāna Theory Reconsidered," JOI 13, 1963–1964, 195–207; repr. L. Alsdorf, Kleine Schriften, Stuttgart, ^{2}2001, 36–48.

Andersen, D., Index to the Jātaka and Its Commentary, London, 1897.

Appleton, N., Narrating Karma and Rebirth: Buddhist and Jain Multi-life Stories, Cambridge UK, 2014.

Appleton, N., Jātaka Stories in Theravāda Buddhism: Narrating the Bodhisatta Path, Burlington, 2010.

Balk, M., ed., Prajñāvarman's Udānavargavivaraṇa; Transliteration of Its Tibetan Version (Based on the Xylographs of Chone/Derge and Peking), 2 vols., IeT (Arbeitsmaterialien A), Bonn, 1984.

Bechert, H., ed. & trans., Bruchstücke buddhistischer Verssammlungen aus zentralasiatischen Sanskrithandschriften, 1. Die Anavataptagāthā und die Sthaviragāthā, ADAW 51/SadT 6, Berlin, 1961.

Burlingame, E.W., trans., Buddhist Legends: Translated from the Original Pali Text of the Dhammapada Commentary, 3 vols., HOS 28–30, Cambridge MA, 1921.

Chavannes, É., trans., Cinq cents contes et apologues: Extraits du Tripiṭaka chinois et traduits en français, 4 vols., Paris, 1910–1934.

Cowell, E.B., & R.A. Neil, eds., The Jātaka or Stories of the Buddha's Former Births, 6 vols., Cambridge UK, 1895–1907.

Cowell, E.B., & R.A. Neil, eds., The Divyâvadâna: A Collection of Early Buddhist Legends, Cambridge UK, 1886.

Dās, S.C., H.M. Vidyābhūṣaṇa & S.C. Vidyābhūṣaṇa, eds., Avadána Kalpalatá, 2 vols., Calcutta, 1888–1918.

Degener, A., ed. & trans., Das Kaṭhināvadāna. Eingeleitet herausgegeben und übersetzt, IeT 16, Bonn, 1990.

Demoto, M., "Fragments of the Avadānaśataka," in: J. Braarvig, ed., Manuscripts in the Schøyen Collection, vol. III, Oslo, 2006, 207–244.

Dimitrov, D., Mārgavibhāga. Die Unterscheidung der Stilarten. Kritische Ausgabe des ersten Kapitels von Daṇḍins Poetik Kāvyādarśa und der tibetischen Übersetzung Sñan ṅag me loṅ nebst einer deutschen Übersetzung des Sanskrittextes, IeT 40, Marburg, 2002.

Dimitrov, D., "Some Remarks on the Rūpyāvatyavadāna of the Divyāvadāna(mālā)," in: D. Dimitrov, M. Hahn & R. Steiner, eds., Bauddhasāhityastabakāvalī: Essays and Studies on Buddhist Sanskrit Literature Dedicated to Claus Vogel by Colleagues, Students, and Friends, IeT 36, Marburg, 2008, 45–64.

Fausbøll, V., ed., The Jātaka together with Its Commentary: Being Tales of the Anterior Births of Gotama Buddha, 6 vols., London, 1877–1896.

Feer, L., ed., "Le Karma-Çataka," JA 17, 1901, 53–100, 257–315, 410–486.

Feer, L., ed., Avadâna-Çataka: Cent légendes bouddhiques: La centaine d'Avadânas, commençant par Pûrṇa (Pûrṇamukha-Avadâna-Çataka) traduite du Sanskrit, avec une introduction analytique, notes linguistiques et explicatives et trois index, AMG 18, Paris, 1891.

Grey, L., A Concordance of Buddhist Birth Stories, Oxford, ^{1}1990, ^{2}1994.

Hahn, M., ed., Poetical Vision of the Buddha's Former Lives: Seventeen Legends from Haribhaṭṭa's Jātakamālā, New Delhi, 2011.

Hahn, M., "Ein neuer Handschriftenfund aus Nepal und seine Konsequenzen für die Gopadatta-Hypothese," StII 27, 2010a, 71–140.

Hahn, M., "The Buddhist Contribution to the Indian Belles Lettres," AOASH 63, 2010b, 455–471.

Hahn, M., "Gopadatta's Jātakamālā: On the First Complete Edition of its 16 Extant Legends," IBK 55, 2007, 1043–1051.

Hahn, M., Haribhaṭṭa and Gopadatta: Two Authors in the Succession of Āryaśūra: On the Rediscovery of Parts of Their Jātakamālās, StPhB.OPS 1, Tokyo, ²1992.

Hahn, M., ed., Der große Legendenkranz (Mahajjātakamālā). Eine mittelalterliche buddhistische Legendensammlung aus Nepal, Wiesbaden, 1985.

Hahn, M., "Kumāralātas Kalpanāmaṇḍitikā Dṛṣṭāntapaṅkti. Nr.1 Die Vorzüglichkeit des Buddha," ZS 16, 1982, 309–336.

Handurukande, R., Maṇicūḍāvadāna: Being a Translation and Edition, and Lokānanda: A Transliteration and Synopsis, SBB 24, London, 1967.

Hanisch, A., "Sarvarakṣita's Maṇicūḍajātaka: Reproduction of the Codex Unicus with Diplomatic Transcript and Palaeographic Introduction to the Bhaikṣukī Script," in: F. Sferra, ed., Sanskrit Texts from Giuseppe Tucci's Collection, Part I, MBISOR 1/104, Rome, 2008, 195–342.

Hanisch, A., Āryaśūras Jātakamālā. Philologische Untersuchungen zu den Legenden 1 bis 15, 2 parts, IeT 43, Marburg, 2005.

Hardy, E., Dhammapāla's Paramattha-Dīpanī: Part IV, Being the Commentary on the Vimāna-Vatthu, London, 1901.

Hardy, E., Dhammapāla's Paramattha-Dīpanī: Part III, Being the Commentary on the Peta-Vatthu, London, 1894.

Harrison, P., & J.-U. Hartmann, eds., From Birch Bark to Digital Data: Recent Advances in Buddhist Manuscript Research: Papers Presented at the Conference Indic Buddhist Manuscripts: The State of the Field, Stanford, June 15–19 2009, ÖAW 460, BKGA 80, Vienna, 2014.

Hartmann, J.-U., "Notes on the Gilgit Manuscript of the Candraprabhāvadāna," JNRC 4, 1980, 251–266.

Hikata, R., Honjōkyōrui no Shisōshi-teki-Kenkyū: A Historical Study of the Thoughts in Jātakas and the Similar Stories, 2 vols., Tokyo, 1954.

Hinüber, O. von, "The Gilgit Manuscripts: An Ancient Buddhist Library in Modern Research," in: P. Harrison & J.-U. Hartmann, eds., From Birch Bark to Digital Data: Recent Advances in Buddhist Manuscript Research: Papers Presented at the Conference Indic Buddhist Manuscripts: The State of the Field, Stanford, June 15–19 2009, ÖAW 460, BKGA 80, Vienna, 2014, 79–135.

Hinüber, O. von, Entstehung und Aufbau der Jātaka-Sammlung (Studien zur Literatur des Theravāda-Buddhismus I), AAWL 7, Stuttgart, 1998.

Hinüber, O. von, A Handbook of Pāli Literature, IPSAS 2, New York, 1996.

Hinüber, O. von, "Die neun aṅgas. Ein früher Versuch zur Einteilung buddhistischer Texte," WZKS 38, 1994, 121–135.

Hiraoka, S., "The Divyāvadāna in English," IIJ 54, 2011, 231–270.

Hiraoka, S., trans., Budda no ōi naru monogatari: Bonbun 'Mahāvastu' zenyaku, 2 vols., Tokyo, 2010.

Hiraoka, S., "Text Critical Remarks on the Divyāvadāna (1)," ARIRIAB 12, 2009, 29–72.

Hiraoka, S., trans., Budda ga nazotoku sanze no monogatari: Diviya avadāna zen'yaku, 2 vols., Tokyo, 2007.

Hiraoka, S., "The Relation between the Divyāvadāna and the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya," JIP 26, 1998, 419–434.

Höke, H., trans., "Das P'u-sapen-yüan ching (Früheres Leben des Bodhisattva). Eine Sammlung buddhistischer Geschichten," BJO 7, 1984, 113–213.

Horner, I.B., trans., The Minor Anthologies of the Pali Canon: Part III: Chronicle of Buddhas (Buddhavaṁsa) and Basket of Conduct (Cariyāpiṭaka), SBB 31, London, 1975.

Horner, I.B., & H.S. Gehman, trans., The Minor Anthologies of the Pali Canon: Part IV: Vimānavatthu: Stories of the Mansions, SBB 30, London 1974.

Huber, E., trans., Açvaghoṣa: Sûtrâlaṃkâra: Traduit en français sur la version chinoise de Kumârajîva, Paris, 1908.

Iwamoto, Y., Bukkyō setsuwa kenkyū josetsu (An Introduction to the Study of Buddhist Narrative Literature), Kyoto, 1967.

Jayawickrama, N.A., trans., The Story of Gotama Buddha: The Nidāna-kathā of the Jātakaṭṭhakathā, Oxford, 1990.

Jayawickrama, N.A., ed., Vimānavatthu and Petavatthu, PTSTS 168, London, 1977.

Jayawickrama, N.A., ed., Buddhavaṃsa and Cariyāpiṭaka, PTSTS 166, London, 1974.

Jones, J.J., trans., The Mahāvastu: Translated from the Buddhist Sanskrit, 3 vols., SBB 16, 18 & 19, London, 1949–1956.

Jong, J.W. de, "Review of Chavannes, 1910–34," IIJ 8, 1965, 240–242.

Karashima, S., & M.I. Vorobyova-Desyatovskaya, "The Avadāna Anthology from Merv, Turkmenistan," in: S. Karashima & M.I. Vorobyova-Desyatovskaya, eds., The St. Petersburg Sanskrit Fragments, vol. I: Buddhist Manuscripts from Central Asia, Tokyo, 2015, 145–523.

Kern, H., ed., The Jātaka-Mālā or Bodhisattvāvadāna-Mālā by Ārya-Çūra, HOS 1, Boston, 1891.

Khoroche, P., trans., Once the Buddha Was a Monkey: Ārya Śūra's Jātakamālā, London, 1989.

Kyaw, U Ba, trans., & P. Masefield, ed., Elucidation of the Intrinsic Meaning: So Named the Commentary on the Peta-Stories (Paramatthadīpanī nāma Petavatthu-aṭṭhakathā) by Dhammapāla, Oxford, 1980.

Lamotte, E., Histoire du Bouddhisme Indien, des origines à l'ère Śaka, BM 43, Louvain, 1958; ET: History of Indian Buddhism: From the Origins to the Śaka Era, PIOL 36, Louvain-la-Neuve, 1988.

Lenz, T., Gandhāran Avadānas: British Library Kharoṣṭhī Fragments 1–3 and 21 and Supplementary Fragments A–C, GBT 6, Seattle, 2010.

Lenz, T., A New Version of the Gāndhārī Dharmapada and a Collection of Previous-Birth Stories: British Library Kharoṣṭhī Fragments 16 + 25 (With contributions by Andrew Glass and Bhikshu Dharmamitra), GBT 3, Seattle, 2003.

Li, Rongxi, trans., The Biographical Scripture of King Aśoka: Translated from the Chinese of Saṃghapāla (Taishō, Volume 50, Number 2043), BDK English Tripiṭaka 76/2, Berkeley, 1993.

Li, W., Schwanfrau und Prinz. Die chinesische Frühform einer Divyāvadāna-Legende, EAIS/IO 7, Wiesbaden, 2011.

Lilley, M.E., et al., eds., The Apadāna of the Khuddaka Nikāya, London, 1925–1927.

Lüders, H., Bhārhut und die buddhistische Literatur, AKM 26/3, Leipzig, 1941.

Lüders, H., ed., Bruchstücke der Kal Kumāralāta, KPTEKST 2, Leipzig, 1926 Masefield, P., trans., Elucidation of t ing: So Named the Commentary on (Paramatthadīpanī nāma Vimānavatthu 1989.
Matsumura, H., ed., "Four Avadānas fro script," diss., Australian National Univ Matsunami, S., A Catalogue of the Sanskr
Tokyo University Library, Tokyo, 1965.
Mellick Cutler, S., "The Pāli Apadāna 1994, 1–42.
Mellick Cutler, S., "A Critical Edition Selected Portions of the Pāli Apadāna versity, 1993.
Menśikov, L.N., "Les paraboles bouddhi ture chinoise," BÉFEO 67, 1980, 303–3 Mette, A., "Buddhistische Sanskritstro kuppelraum der Ming-öi von Qizil. P mentsammlung SHT 25," in: K. Klau eds., Indica et Tibetica: Festschrift für 65. Geburtstag von Freunden und WSTB 66, Vienna, 2007, 351–368.
Mukhopadhyaya, S., ed., The Śārdūla niketan, 1954.
Nakamura, H., Indian Buddhism: A Surv
cal Notes, IRIMS 9, Osaka, 1980.
Ñāṇamoli, The Life of the Buddha accord
Kandy, ³1992.
Nattier, J., "The Twelve Divisions of Sc in the Earliest Buddhist Translation 167–196.
Nepalese-German Manuscript Catalogu http://catalogue.ngmcp.uni-hamburg.
Norman, H.C., ed., The Commentary o
5 vols., London, 1906–1915.
Norman, K.R., Pāli Literature: Including ture in Prakrit and Sanskrit of all the Buddhism, HIL 7/2, Wiesbaden, 1983.
Ohnuma, R., Head, Eyes, Flesh, and Bl
Body in Indian Buddhist Literature, N Okano, K., "Subhāṣitamahāratnāvadān the Subhāṣitamahāratnāvadānamāl Okano, K., "A Descriptive Bibliograph Works of Buddhists," http://homep ogy/english-index.html.
Oldenberg, H., "Studien zum Mahāva phisch-historische Klasse, Heft 2, 191 Oldenberg, Kleine Schriften, vol. II, Stu Panglung, J.L., Die Erzählstoffe des Mūl analysiert auf Grund der tibetischen MS 3, Tokyo, 1981.
Rotman, A., trans., Divine Stories: Divy
sics of Indian Buddhism, Boston, 200 Salomon, R., "Gāndhārī Manuscripts i Schøyen and Other Collections," i Hartmann, eds., From Birch Bark t
Advances in Buddhist Manuscript sented at the Conference Indic Budd

s., "Das P'u-sapen-yüan ching (Frühere dhisattva). Eine Sammlung buddhistischer " BJO 7, 1984, 113–213. ns., The Minor Anthologies of the Pali Canon: nicle of Buddhas (Buddhavaṁsa) and Basket ariyāpiṭaka), SBB 31, London, 1975.
I.S. Gehman, trans., The Minor Anthologies of n: Part IV: Vimānavatthu: Stories of the Man-
, London 1974.
., Açvaghoṣa: Sûtrâlaṃkâra: Traduit en franrsion chinoise de Kumârajîva, Paris, 1908. ukkyō setsuwa kenkyū josetsu (An Introductudy of Buddhist Narrative Literature), Kyoto,

N.A., trans., The Story of Gotama Buddha: The ā of the Jātakaṭṭhakathā, Oxford, 1990.
N.A., ed., Vimānavatthu and Petavatthu,
ondon, 1977.
N.A., ed., Buddhavaṃsa and Cariyāpiṭaka,
ondon, 1974.
s., The Mahāvastu: Translated from the Bud-it, 3 vols., SBB 16, 18 & 19, London, 1949–1956.
"Review of Chavannes, 1910–34," IIJ 8, 1965,

& M.I. Vorobyova-Desyatovskaya, "The Avadāna from Merv, Turkmenistan," in: S. Karashima byova-Desyatovskaya, eds., The St. Petersburg gments, vol. I: Buddhist Manuscripts from Cen-kyo, 2015, 145–523.
The Jātaka-Mālā or Bodhisattvāvadāna-Mālā by HOS 1, Boston, 1891.
trans., Once the Buddha Was a Monkey: Ārya kamālā, London, 1989.
trans., & P. Masefield, ed., Elucidation of the eaning: So Named the Commentary on the Petaramatthadīpanī nāma Petavatthu-aṭṭhakathā) apāla, Oxford, 1980.
Histoire du Bouddhisme Indien, des origines à BM 43, Louvain, 1958; ET: History of Indian Bud-m the Origins to the Śaka Era, PIOL 36, Louvain-1988. ndhāran Avadānas: British Library Kharoṣṭhī
s 1–3 and 21 and Supplementary Fragments A–C, attle, 2010.
ew Version of the Gāndhārī Dharmapada and a of Previous-Birth Stories: British Library Kharoṣṭhī s 16 + 25 (With contributions by Andrew Glass shu Dharmamitra), GBT 3, Seattle, 2003. trans., The Biographical Scripture of King Aśoka: d from the Chinese of Saṃghapāla (Taishō, Vol-umber 2043), BDK English Tripiṭaka 76/2, Berkeanfrau und Prinz. Die chinesische Frühform einer āna-Legende, EAIS/IO 7, Wiesbaden, 2011.

, et al., eds., The Apadāna of the Khuddaka Nikāya, 1925–1927.
Bhārhut und die buddhistische Literatur, AKM pzig, 1941.

Lüders, H., ed., Bruchstücke der Kalpaṇāmaṇḍitikā des Kumāralāta, KPTEKST 2, Leipzig, 1926.

Masefield, P., trans., Elucidation of the Intrinsic Meaning: So Named the Commentary on the Vimāna Stories (Paramatthadīpanī nāma Vimānavatthu-aṭṭhakathā), Oxford, 1989.

Matsumura, H., ed., "Four Avadānas from the Gilgit Manuscript," diss., Australian National University, 1980.

Matsunami, S., A Catalogue of the Sanskrit Manuscripts in the Tokyo University Library, Tokyo, 1965.

Mellick Cutler, S., "The Pāli Apadāna Collection," JPTS 20, 1994, 1–42.

Mellick Cutler, S., "A Critical Edition with Translation of Selected Portions of the Pāli Apadāna," diss., Oxford University, 1993.

Menšikov, L.N., "Les paraboles bouddhiques dans la littérature chinoise," BÉFEO 67, 1980, 303–336.

Mette, A., "Buddhistische Sanskritstrophen aus dem Rotkuppelraum der Ming-öi von Qizil. Proben aus der Fragmentsammlung SHT 25," in: K. Klaus & J.-U. Hartmann, eds., Indica et Tibetica: Festschrift für Michael Hahn. Zum 65. Geburtstag von Freunden und Schülern überreicht, WSTB 66, Vienna, 2007, 351–368.

Mukhopadhyaya, S., ed., The Śārdūlakarṇāvadāna, Santiniketan, 1954.

Nakamura, H., Indian Buddhism: A Survey with Bibliographical Notes, IRIMS 9, Osaka, 1980.

Ñāṇamoli, The Life of the Buddha according to the Pali Canon, Kandy, ³1992.

Nattier, J., "The Twelve Divisions of Scriptures (十二部經) in the Earliest Buddhist Translations," ARIRIAB 15, 2004, 167–196.

Nepalese-German Manuscript Cataloguing Project (NGMCP), http://catalogue.ngmcp.uni-hamburg.de/wiki/Main_Page.

Norman, H.C., ed., The Commentary on the Dhammapada, 5 vols., London, 1906–1915.

Norman, K.R., Pāli Literature: Including the Canonical Literature in Prakrit and Sanskrit of all the Hīnayāna Schools of Buddhism, HIL 7/2, Wiesbaden, 1983.

Ohnuma, R., Head, Eyes, Flesh, and Blood: Giving Away the Body in Indian Buddhist Literature, New York, 2007.

Okano, K., "Subhāṣitamahāratnāvadānamālā ni tsuite" (On the Subhāṣitamahāratnāvadānamālā), SACS 1, 2006, 1–19.

Okano, K., "A Descriptive Bibliography of Sanskrit Literary Works of Buddhists," http://homepage3.nifty.com/indology/english-index.html.

Oldenberg, H., "Studien zum Mahāvastu," NAWG. Philosophisch-historische Klasse, Heft 2, 1912, 123–154; repr. in: H. Oldenberg, Kleine Schriften, vol. II, Stuttgart, 1967, 1037–1068.

Panglung, J.L., Die Erzählstoffe des Mūlasarvāstivāda-Vinaya, analysiert auf Grund der tibetischen Übersetzung, StPhB. MS 3, Tokyo, 1981.

Rotman, A., trans., Divine Stories: Divyāvadāna: Part 1: Classics of Indian Buddhism, Boston, 2008.

Salomon, R., "Gāndhārī Manuscripts in the British Library, Schøyen and Other Collections," in: P. Harrison & J.-U. Hartmann, eds., From Birch Bark to Digital Data: Recent Advances in Buddhist Manuscript Research: Papers Presented at the Conference Indic Buddhist Manuscripts: The State of the Field, Stanford, June 15–19 2009, ÖAW 460, BKGA 80, Vienna, 2014, 1–17.

Salomon, R., ed., Two Gāndhārī Manuscripts of the Songs of Lake Anavatapta (Anavatapta-gāthā): British Library Kharoṣṭhī Fragment 1 and Senior Scroll 14, GBT 5, Seattle, 2008.

Salomon, R., Ancient Buddhist Scrolls from Gandhāra: The British Library Kharoṣṭhī Fragments, London, 1999.

Schlingloff, D., Narrative Wall-Paintings, 3 vols., New Delhi, 2013.

Schlingloff, D., Studies in the Ajanta Paintings: Identifications and Interpretations, New Delhi, 1987.

Schopen, G., Bones, Stones, and Buddhist Monks: Collected Papers on the Archaeology, Epigraphy, and Texts of Monastic Buddhism in India, SBT 2, Honolulu, 1997.

Senart, É., ed., Le Mahâvastu: Texte sanscrit publié pour la première fois et accompagné d'introductions et d'un commentaire, 3 vols., Paris, 1882–1897.

Silk, J.A., Managing Monks: Administrators and Administrative Roles in Indian Buddhist Monasticism, Oxford, 2008.

Skilling, P., "Jātaka and Paññāsa-jātaka in South-East Asia," JPTS 28, 2006, 113–173.

Skilling, P., "Eṣā agrā: Images of Nuns in (Mūla-)Sarvāstivādin Literature," JIABS 24, 2001, 134–157.

Speyer, J.S., ed., Avadānaçataka: A Century of Edifying Tales Belonging to the Hīnayāna, BBU 3, Saint Petersburg, 1902–1909.

Speyer, J.S., trans., The Gâtakamâlâ or Garland of Birth Stories by Ârya Sûra, SBB 1, London, 1895.

Stede, W., Die Gespenstergeschichten des Peta Vatthu. Untersuchungen, Übersetzung und Pāli-Glossar, Leipzig, 1914.

Steiner, R., "Drei Buddhacarita-Strophen im Divyāvadāna," in: M. Straube et al., eds., Pāsādikadānaṃ. Festschrift für Bhikkhu Pāsādika, IeT 52, Marburg, 2009, 459–470.

Straube, M., Studien zur Bodhisattvāvadānakalpalatā. Texte und Quellen der Parallelen zu Haribhaṭṭas Jātakamālā, VHGSM 1, Wiesbaden, 2009.

Strong, J.S., The Legend and Cult of Upagupta: Sanskrit Buddhism in North India and Southeast Asia, Princeton, 1992.

Strong, J.S., The Legend of King Aśoka: A Study and Translation of the Aśokāvadāna, Princeton, 1983.

Tatelman, J., ed. & trans., The Heavenly Exploits: Buddhist Biographies from the Divyāvadāna, vol. I, New York, 2005.

Tatelman, J., The Glorious Deeds of Pūrṇa: A Translation and Study of the Pūrṇāvadāna, Richmond, 2000.

Trenckner, V., et al., A Critical Pāli Dictionary, Copenhagen, 1948–2011.

Tournier, V., "The Mahāvastu and the Vinayapiṭaka of the Mahāsāṃghika-Lokottaravādin," ARIRIAB 15, 2012, 87–104.

Tuladhar-Douglas, W., Remaking Buddhism for Medieval Nepal: The Fifteenth-century Reformation of Newar Buddhism, London, 2006.

Vorobyova-Desyatovskaya, M.I., "A Sanskrit Manuscript on Birch-Bark from Bairam-Ali. I. The Vinaya of the Sarvāstivādins," part 1, MO 5/2, 1999, 27–36; part 2, MO 5/3, 1999, 27–35; part 3, MO 5/4, 1999, 7–19; part 4, MO 6/1, 2000, 15–18.

Vorobyova-Desyatovskaya, M.I., "A Sanskrit Manuscript on Birch-Bark from Bairam-Ali. II. Avadānas and Jātakas," part 1, MO 6/3, 2000, 23–32; part 2, MO 7/1, 2001, 10–23; part 3, MO 7/2, 2001, 10–19; part 4, MO 7/3, 2001, 9–14, part 5, MO 7/4, 2001, 12–21; part 6, MO 8/1, 2002, 18–26; part 7, MO 8/2, 2002, 20–28; part 8, MO 8/3, 2002, 26–33.

Wille, K., "Survey of the Sanskrit Manuscripts in the Turfan Collection (Berlin)," in: P. Harrison & J.-U. Hartmann, eds., From Birch Bark to Digital Data: Recent Advances in Buddhist Manuscript Research: Papers Presented at the Conference Indic Buddhist Manuscripts: The State of the Field, Stanford, June 15–19 2009, ÖAW 460, BKGA 80, Vienna, 2014, 187–211.

Wille, K., Die handschriftliche Überlieferung des Vinayavastu der Mūlasarvāstivādin, VOHD Suppl. 30, Stuttgart, 1990.

Willemen, C., trans., The Storehouse of Sundry Valuables, BDK English Tripiṭaka 76/2, Berkeley, 1994.

Windisch, E., Die Komposition des Mahāvastu. Ein Beitrag zur Quellenkunde des Buddhismus, APHKKSGW 27/4, Leipzig, 1909.

Winternitz, M., "Avadāna, Apadāna," TDG 6–7, 1930, 7–18; repr. in: M. Winternitz, Kleine Schriften, vol. II, Stuttgart, 1991, 839–844.

Winternitz, M., Geschichte der indischen Litteratur, vol. II: Die buddhistische Litteratur und die heiligen Texte der Jainas, Leipzig, 1920; ET: A History of Indian Literature, vol. II: Buddhist Literature and Jaina Literature, Calcutta, 1933.

Yuyama, A., The Mahāvastu-Avadāna in Old Palm-Leaf and Paper Manuscripts, 2 vols., Tokyo, 2001.

Martin Straube

Narrati

Aśvaghoṣa (c. 2nd cent. CE) author of Buddhist poems and His most influential and po two epic poems, classics of r (mahākāvya), the Buddhacarit dha) and Saundarananda (H Sundarī and Nanda), which masterpieces both of Sansk Buddhist didactic literature. H of a Buddhist drama, the Śārip Drama of Śāriputra), preserved form. According to the general ogy of Sanskrit literature, Aśv plays are the earliest survivin genres. But we know that bot before his time, since he ex adoption for Buddhist purpos kāvya style. Although his wo Brahmanical mainstream, Aśv influence on later poetry, bot manical. Echoes of his style a able in later works such as the and the poems of Kālidāsa (J lxxxii; B. Bhattacharya, 1976, 3 the description of the women in canto 7 of Kālidāsa's Rag Raghu) seems to be modeled of the future Buddha to Kapi the Buddhacarita. Although th scene and certainly not a matt it is nonetheless generally agr other classical poets must ha and at least indirectly influe works. Although not the only influential Buddhist kāvyas, A the tradition is unique.

Aśvaghoṣa's Life and T

In addition to his two mahāk fragments, some two dozen have been attributed to Aśvag including the Vajrasūcī (Th Gaṇḍīstotra (Praise of the paripṛcchā (Questions about

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

ie Komposition des Mahāvastu. Ein Beitrag unde des Buddhismus, APHKKSGW 27/14,

"Avadāna, Apadāna," TDG 6–7, 1930, 7–12;
Vinternitz, Kleine Schriften, vol. II, Stuttgart,

Geschichte der indischen Litteratur, vol. II: Die Litteratur und die heiligen Texte der Jainas, ; ET: A History of Indian Literature, vol. II: rature and Jaina Literature, Calcutta, 1933.
Mahāvastu-Avadāna in Old Palm-Leaf and ripts, 2 vols., Tokyo, 2001.

MARTIN STRAUBE

Narratives and Long Poetry: Aśvaghoṣa

Aśvaghoṣa (c. 2nd cent. CE) was a prominent author of Buddhist poems and dramas in Sanskrit. His most influential and popular works were two epic poems, classics of refined poetic style (mahākāvya), the Buddhacarita (Life of the Buddha) and Saundarananda (Handsome Nanda or Sundarī and Nanda), which are acknowledged masterpieces both of Sanskrit poetry and of Buddhist didactic literature. He was also the author of a Buddhist drama, the Śāriputraprakaraṇa (The Drama of Śāriputra), preserved only in fragmentary form. According to the generally accepted chronology of Sanskrit literature, Aśvaghoṣa's poems and plays are the earliest surviving specimens of their genres. But we know that both genres existed well before his time, since he explicitly refers to his adoption for Buddhist purposes of an established kāvya style. Although his work lay outside of the Brahmanical mainstream, Aśvaghoṣa had a strong influence on later poetry, both Buddhist and Brahmanical. Echoes of his style and imagery are traceable in later works such as the so-called Bhāsa plays and the poems of Kālidāsa (Johnston, 1936, lxxxi–lxxxii; B. Bhattacharya, 1976, 380–383). For example, the description of the women watching Prince Aja in canto 7 of Kālidāsa's Raghuvaṃśa (Dynasty of Raghu) seems to be modeled on that of the return of the future Buddha to Kapilavāstu in canto 3 of the Buddhacarita. Although this is a standard genre scene and certainly not a matter of direct imitation, it is nonetheless generally agreed that Kālidāsa and other classical poets must have been familiar with and at least indirectly influenced by Aśvaghoṣa's works. Although not the only poet to have written influential Buddhist kāvyas, Aśvaghoṣa's position in the tradition is unique.

Aśvaghoṣa's Life and Times

In addition to his two mahākāvyas and the drama fragments, some two dozen other Buddhist texts have been attributed to Aśvaghoṣa (Kanakura, 1959), including the Vajrasūcī (The Diamond Needle), Gaṇḍīstotra (Praise of the Gong), Nairātmyaparipṛcchā (Questions about Selflessness), the so-called Mahāyānaśraddhotpāda* (Awakening of Faith in the Mahāyāna; Dasheng qi xin lun [大乘起信論]), and Kalpanāmaṇḍitikā (The Stage of Imagination), but it is generally agreed by modern researchers that most if not all of these attributions are doubtful, since these texts are not consistent in style, content, and doctrinal position with his unquestionably authentic works. It therefore seems either that there were multiple authors named Aśvaghoṣa, or that works by other later authors were attracted to his renowned name.

As with most authors of Buddhist and Sanskrit literature, little is known with certainty about Aśvaghoṣa's life. The only incontestable information is the few details provided in the colophons of his three main works, in which he is described as the son of an otherwise unknown Suvarṇākṣī, a native of Sāketa (i.e. Ayodhyā in north India), a Buddhist monk (bhadanta), a great poet (mahākavi), and a great preacher (mahāvādin). In later hagiographical traditions he is said to be a Brahman, and although this is not stated in the colophons it is generally accepted by modern critics in light of the detailed knowledge of Brahmanical literature and traditions that he exhibits in his poems, especially the Buddhacarita.

Aśvaghoṣa's dates are uncertain. Most experts have placed him in the 1st or 2nd century CE, principally because in later Buddhist traditions, such as his biography entitled Maming pusa zhuan (馬鳴普薩傳; T. 2046; Li, 2002), he is associated with Kaniṣka, the great Kushana emperor and Buddhist patron who probably ruled in or around the second quarter of the 2nd century. A 2nd century date is supported by the Central Asian fragments of Aśvaghoṣa's dramatic work, which on paleographic grounds seem to date from around the time of Kaniṣka or his successor Huviṣka (Lüders, 1911a).

Aśvaghoṣa explicitly states the intent of his literary efforts in the two final verses of the Saundarananda, where he justifies his use of an ornate and sensual poetic style (kāvya) which might seem inconsistent with the Buddhist ideals which his poem teaches. His explanation is that "this composition was written in the guise of poetry, in order to attract the attention of listeners whose minds are on other matters, as one coats a bitter medicine with honey to make it palatable" (Saundarananda 18.63). Similarly, the final verse of the Buddhacarita (28.74; preserved only in Tibetan and Chinese translation) declares that "This poem has been composed for the good and happiness of all people . . . and not to display the qualities of learning or skill in poetry" (Johnston, 1937, 286).

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

Here Aśvaghoṣa shows that his intended audience was the sophisticated Sanskrit-speaking elite, especially Brahmans, and that he was trying to present Buddhism in a format that would be accessible and attractive to them. The Buddhacarita in particular records many discussions and debates between the Buddha and the followers of the Vedic/Brahmanical traditions, wherein he establishes the superiority of his path to enlightenment and salvation; for example, the famous debate with the sage Arāḍa Kalāma, who espouses an early form of Sāṃkhya (12.1–83). In these discussions the Bodhisattva (the Buddha before his awakening) frequently cites and criticizes Brahmanical legends, belief systems, and social conventions, referring particularly frequently to the Rāmāyaṇa (Johnston, 1936, xlvii–l; Hiltebeitel, 2006, 247–54), and even borrowing poetic motifs from it (Raghavan, 1956).

Aśvaghosa's works are all imperfectly preserved, no doubt because they fell out of popularity with the decline of Buddhism in India, so that their manuscripts ceased to be copied and preserved. Only the Saundarananda is more or less complete in the original Sanskrit, while other works are preserved only fragmentarily, or perhaps totally lost. Both his poems and plays were entirely forgotten in India until the late 19th and early 20th centuries when modern scholars discovered in Nepal manuscripts of the two poems dating from around the 12th to 13th centuries. Subsequently, much earlier but very fragmentary remnants of the plays as well as the poems have been discovered in Central Asia. Although Aśvaghoṣa's works eventually ceased to be studied and were not retained in the traditional canon of (non-Buddhist) Sanskrit literature, it is clear from numerous references to and citations of his poems that they were known to scholars, Buddhist and otherwise, for many centuries after their composition. For example, the rhetorician Rājaśekhara (9th–10th cent.) refers in his Kāvyamīmāṃsā (Inquiry into Poetry; Stchoupak & Renou, 1946, 72) to a verse from the Buddhacarita, and many lexicographers and grammarians cite his works.

A great deal has been written about the ordinational and scholastic affiliations of Aśvaghoṣa, but the results have been inconclusive and have led to no consensus (see the summary in de Jong, [illegible] 125–126). E.H. Johnston, in the still-authoritative introductory essay to his translation of the Buddhacarita (1936), thought it most likely that he belonged to the Bahuśrutika or a related doctrinal school, but this opinion has since been criticized and other affiliations, such as Sautrāntika and Yogācāra, have been proposed. Among ordination lineages (which have not always been clearly distinguished from scholastic positions in the relevant literature), Sarvāstivāda, Mūlasarvāstivāda, and Dharmaguptaka have been suggested. The Sarvāstivādin theory deserves attention since the Central Asian fragments of Aśvaghoṣa's works were found together with a large corpus of texts belonging mostly to that school. A recent study of canto 16 of the Buddhacarita (Eltschinger, 2013) compares its biographical episodes with corresponding accounts in the Vinayas of the various schools, showing that Aśvaghoṣa closely follows the (Mūla-)Sarvāstivādin versions of the legends. However, according to E.H. Johnston (1936, xxv), a verse in the Saundarananda (XVII.18) seems to criticize a basic tenet of Sarvāstivādin doctrine, and in at least one case there is reason to suspect that the text of the Saundarananda was tampered with by later editors in order to make it agree with their doctrinal positions (Choi, 2010). In light of this contradictory evidence, it is still not possible to decisively determine Aśvaghoṣa's affiliations; in any case, his works were evidently meant to inculcate the overall principles of Buddhism rather than the traditions or doctrines of any particular Buddhist school.

Works

Saundarananda

The Saundarananda, the only one of Aśvaghoṣa's works that is almost completely intact in its original Sanskrit, is a mahākāvya (ornate epic) in 18 sargas (cantos), telling the story of the Buddha's forcible conversion of his half-brother Nanda ("The Handsome"), who was vain and infatuated with worldly pleasures, especially the charms of his beautiful young wife Sundarī ("The Beautiful"). The first three cantos describe the historical background of the story, going back to (1) the founding by the Śākya clan of the city of Kapilavāstu, (2) the birth of the Buddha and Nanda, and (3) an account of the Buddha's early career up to his return to Kapilavāstu in order to convert his clansmen. The 4th and 5th

---

cantos recount how the Buddha lure from his mansion and his beloved w him his begging bowl and then refu back, so that Nanda had to follow hi astery where he was initiated as a m will. Cantos six and seven describe tions of Nanda and Sundarī and Na to flee back to his wife. In cantos eig unnamed monk tries in vain to pers the evils of sexual and sensory pleasu

When that monk's efforts prove dha himself flies Nanda to heaven its nymphs, compared to whom his repulsive (9–10). Nanda then undert in the hope of being reborn in heav explains to him the foolishness (11–12). Nanda finally begins to see Buddha preaches to him about faith and self-control (13), meditation (14 mind (15), and the four noble truths concluding cantos, Nanda finally a enment and dedicates himself to dharma.

The plot of the Saundarananda i end which appears in varying for texts, most notably in the Pali U pada commentary, and jātakas, Kṣemendra's Bodhisattvāvadānak
Chinese and Tibetan translations skrit versions such as those in the M Vinaya and the so-called Abhinisk benxing ji jing [佛本行集經]; T. ing that relatively brief tale into Aśvaghoṣa freely adapted the tra for instance adding such elements of Ānanda. The story of Nanda's co favorite theme in Buddhist art, es the 2nd to 5th centuries CE, illustr 30 pieces at Nagarjunakonda, Gol Ajanta in the south and at Hadda sites in Gandhara, as well as at B nesia (Zin, 2006). In some cases, and Borobudur, the artistic repr dently based on Aśvaghoṣa's vers the canonical texts and commen 1975).

The central theme of the S Nanda's particularly difficult q worldly attachments and attai Buddhist insight. Aśvaghoṣa ma theme in order to demonstrate with deep-rooted attachments e been inconclusive and have led to (see the summary in de Jong, 1978, Johnston, in the still-authoritative ssay to his translation of the Buddha- ought it most likely that he belonged tika or a related doctrinal school, but as since been criticized and other ch as Sautrāntika and Yogācāra, posed. Among ordination lineages ot always been clearly distinguished positions in the relevant literature), ūlasarvāstivāda, and Dharmagupsuggested. The Sarvāstivādin theory on since the Central Asian fragments works were found together with a exts belonging mostly to that school. of canto 16 of the Buddhacarita 13) compares its biographical epi-sponding accounts in the Vinayas of ols, showing that Aśvaghoṣa closely a-)Sarvāstivādin versions of the leg-according to E.H. Johnston (1936, he Saundarananda (XVII.18) seems sic tenet of Sarvāstivādin doctrine, ne case there is reason to suspect he Saundarananda was tampered tors in order to make it agree with sitions (Choi, 2010). In light of this idence, it is still not possible to ine Aśvaghoṣa's affiliations; in any vere evidently meant to inculcate iples of Buddhism rather than the trines of any particular Buddhist

a da, the only one of Aśvaghoṣa's st completely intact in its original ākāvya (ornate epic) in 18 sargas e story of the Buddha's forcible half-brother Nanda ("The Hand-vain and infatuated with worldly lly the charms of his beautiful arī ("The Beautiful"). The first ribe the historical background back to (1) the founding by the ity of Kapilavāstu, (2) the birth of anda, and (3) an account of the eer up to his return to Kapilavāstu t his clansmen. The 4th and 5th cantos recount how the Buddha lured Nanda away from his mansion and his beloved wife by handing him his begging bowl and then refusing to take it back, so that Nanda had to follow him to the monastery where he was initiated as a monk against his will. Cantos six and seven describe the lamentations of Nanda and Sundarī and Nanda's decision to flee back to his wife. In cantos eight and nine, an unnamed monk tries in vain to persuade Nanda of the evils of sexual and sensory pleasures.

When that monk's efforts prove futile, the Buddha himself flies Nanda to heaven and shows him its nymphs, compared to whom his wife now seems repulsive (9–10). Nanda then undertakes strict vows in the hope of being reborn in heaven, but Ānanda explains to him the foolishness of such efforts (11–12). Nanda finally begins to see the light as the Buddha preaches to him about faith (12), discipline and self-control (13), meditation (14), control of the mind (15), and the four noble truths (16). In the two concluding cantos, Nanda finally achieves enlightenment and dedicates himself to propagating the dharma.

The plot of the Saundarananda is based on a legend which appears in varying forms in numerous texts, most notably in the Pali Udāna, Dhammapada commentary, and *jātaka*s, in Sanskrit in Kṣemendra's Bodhisattvāvadānakalpalatā, and in Chinese and Tibetan translations of original Sanskrit versions such as those in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya and the so-called Abhiniṣkramaṇasūtra (Fo benxing ji jing [佛本行集經]; T. 190). In expanding that relatively brief tale into a full length epic Aśvaghoṣa freely adapted the traditional versions, for instance adding such elements as the preaching of Ānanda. The story of Nanda's conversion is also a favorite theme in Buddhist art, especially between the 2nd to 5th centuries CE, illustrated in more than 30 pieces at Nagarjunakonda, Goli, Amaravati, and Ajanta in the south and at Hadda, Swat, and other sites in Gandhara, as well as at Borobudur in Indonesia (Zin, 2006). In some cases, notably at Ajanta and Borobudur, the artistic representation is evidently based on Aśvaghoṣa's version rather than on the canonical texts and commentaries (Schlingloff, 1975).

The central theme of the Saundarananda is Nanda's particularly difficult quest to rise above worldly attachments and attain the serenity of Buddhist insight. Aśvaghoṣa may have chosen this theme in order to demonstrate that even a person with deep-rooted attachments to the world can ultimately transcend them by assiduously following the Buddhist way, with the help of the Buddha and his followers. The theme of conversion, central to the Saundarananda, is also prominent in Aśvaghoṣa's other works, and this may reflect his personal experience as, according to later traditions, a Brahman convert to Buddhism.

The editio princeps of the Saundarananda was published by H. Sastri in 1910. This was followed by a series of critical studies by prominent Indologists whose contributions were incorporated into E.H. Johnston's definitive edition (1928) and translation (1932). This edition was based mainly on two Nepali manuscripts, the principal source being a palm leaf text dating from about 1165. But this text has suffered from extensive damage by ants, so that the missing portions, some one-third of the whole, depend on a much later (c. 17th cent.) and inferior paper manuscript which was directly descended from the earlier one. Moreover, both the manuscripts contain numerous corrupt readings.

Since E.H. Johnston's edition, two fragments of much older manuscripts of the Saundarananda were discovered in Central Asia. A single complete leaf of a manuscript found at Šorcuq and published by F. Weller (1953a) preserves the end of the 4th and the beginning of the 5th canto, while another fragment, also from Šorcuq, consists of three pieces of a single palm-leaf folio containing parts of 13 verses from canto 16 (Hartmann, 1988, 66–73). Despite their meager remnants, these fragments have considerable textual significance, evidently belonging to a recension independent from that preserved in the Nepali manuscripts. While they largely confirm and justify E.H. Johnston's judicious and insightful editorial methods, they also present some variants from his manuscripts which are clearly preferable and which elucidate the processes of transmission of the text in antiquity (Salomon, 1999; Choi, 2010).

Since these fragments show that the Saundarananda was known in the Buddhist monasteries of Central Asia in the 1st millenium CE, it is surprising that there exists no Chinese or Tibetan translation of the poem, unlike the case of the Buddhacarita. We also have no record of commentaries on either poem; these might have once existed, but if so, they have not survived. Johnston's translation of the Saundarananda, 1932, remains definitive, while the most recent translation is that of Covill (2007). Worthy of special note is the Italian rendition by Passi (1985), which contains numerous improvements on Johnston's interpretation, which however have mostly gone unnoticed in subsequent scholarship.

Buddhacarita

The Buddhacarita seems to have been more popular than the Saundarananda in antiquity, presumably because of the intrinsic importance and appeal of its subject matter. It was translated into both Chinese and Tibetan, and its popularity is attested in Yijing's account of Buddhism in India and Southeast Asia in the 7th century CE, where he reports that the Buddhacarita was "widely read or sung throughout the five divisions of India, and the countries of the Southern Sea" (T. 2125 [LIV] 228a14; Takakusu, 1896, 166). By way of explanation of its appeal, Yijing says that the poet "clothes manifold meanings and ideas in a few words, which rejoice the heart of the reader so that he never feels tired from reading the poem. Besides, it should be counted as meritorious for one to read this book, inasmuch as it contains the noble doctrines in a concise form." (T. 2125 [LIV] 228a14–16). A further indication of its popularity is the existence of Central Asian fragments of what seems to be a reworking of the poem in mixed verse and prose (Hartmann, 1988, 60–66).

The poem opens with descriptions of the future Buddha's birth and early years (cantos 1–2) and his rejection of the pleasures of his life as a wealthy prince (3–4). He flees the palace and begins to undertake a life of ascetic meditation (5–7) while his family mourns for their lost son and seeks in vain to induce him to return (8–9). King Śreṇya of Magadha then offers the Bodhisattva half his kingdom if he will renounce asceticism, but he refuses the offer and reaffirms his determination to pursue spiritual rather than worldly goals (10–11). The Bodhisattva goes to hear the teachings of the sages Arāḍa Kālāma and Udraka, but, deeming them unsatisfactory, undertakes severe austerities on his own. Finding that this path too does not lead to the goal, he takes a seat at Gayā and resolves not to get up until he finds the ultimate secret of transcending saṃsāra (12). Māra attacks the Bodhisattva in order to distract him from his quest, but in vain, and the Bodhisattva discovers the principle of dependent co-origination and achieves enlightenment (13–14).

As the Buddha, he then proceeds to the Deer Park of Vārāṇasī and preaches the dharma there (15). He converts the five mendicants, Yaśas and his 53 companions, the three Kāśyapa brothers and their followers, and Śreṇya, king of Magadha (16). Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana become the Buddha's chief disciples, and Mahākāśyapa also joins the community (17). The Buddha converts the wealthy Sudatta (Anāthapiṇḍada), who offers the Jeta Garden to the saṅgha (18). He then returns to his home city of Kapilavāstu and after converting his father and other relatives there (19) goes on to Śrāvastī to preach to Prasenajit, king of Kosala (20).

After the Buddha converts many others in various parts of India, his cousin Devadatta plots unsuccessfully to assassinate him (21). He then proceeds to Vaiśālī, where he converts the courtesan Amrapālī (22), preaches to the Licchavis, and is again approached by Māra (23). The Buddha announces that his end is near, and Ānanda and the Licchavis mourn (24). He offers his final instructions for preserving the dharma, takes his last meal at the home of Cunda, and lies down to await the end (25). After converting the ascetic Subhadra, he instructs the monks in how to behave after he is gone, and finally enters into nirvāṇa (26). After a eulogy by Aniruddha, the Mallas cremate the body and recover its relics (27), which are then shared with seven neighboring kings by the Brahman Droṇa (28).

The Buddhacarita draws its material from biographic traditions about the Buddha recorded in canonical sources such as those reflected in the Nidānakathā (prologue to the jātaka), the biographical sections of the Vinaya, and, for the latter part of the poem, the Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra. While Aśvaghoṣa felt free to adapt the details of the traditional material for his literary purposes, he remained true to the tradition in all essential points. According to A.K. Warder (1974, 146–147), the poem as a whole can be considered as structured in four sections of seven cantos each, treating the Buddha's birth and youth, quest for enlightenment, teaching and conversions, and later life and parinirvāṇa.

The Buddhacarita was first edited by E.C. Cowell in 1893 on the basis of three recent and incomplete Nepali manuscripts. The standard edition by E.H. Johnston (1935) is based on a much older Nepali manuscript on palm leaf, datable to about 1300, which was the direct archetype of the three modern manuscripts. However, this manuscript was evidently never finished, ending abruptly in the middle of the 14th of 28 cantos, and it also lacks substantial portions of the first two cantos due to the loss of four of its original 55 leaves. However, the contents of the parts of the poem which are lost in the Sanskrit original – more than half of the whole – can be accurately determined from the Tibetan and Chinese translations, respectively Sangs rgyas kyi spyod pa zhes bya ba'i snyan dngags chen po (D 4156/P 5656; see Jackson, 1997) and Fo suoxing zan (佛所行讚; T. 192).

Our knowledge of the Sanskrit t carita has been supplemented by s three much older manuscripts f preserving portions of cantos 2, 3, 1953b; Hartmann, 1988, 57–60). As Asian fragments of the Saundarar ments, though meager, are textual cially in providing a sample (fron portion which was previously not Three verses from canto 28 are Sanskrit in the Aśokāvadāna (Oka surviving Sanskrit portion of the been translated many times into and Asian languages, first by C most recently by Olivelle (2009). tial translation is still that of Johns though it had no pretension t established a standard interpreta largely intact. The part of the t Sanskrit original is lost was trans (1937), on the basis of the Tibetan sions. The Chinese translation h into English by Beal (1883) and and part of the Tibetan [cantos by Weller (1926–1928).

Śāriputraprakaraṇa and Oth

A drama by Aśvaghoṣa entitled Śā is preserved only in the form of se fragments of two manuscripts Central Asia, which seem to conta two acts (act 8 and 9). Fortunately, of one of the manuscripts has s both the title Śāriputraprakaraṇ alternate title Śāradvatīputrapr name of the author, "Aśvaghoṣa, s There can be no doubt that this is Aśvaghoṣa; this is certified by the names with those given in the colo works, by textual and stylistic sim works (e.g. Lüders, 1911b, 399), an of the manuscripts, one of which paleographic grounds to the Kush As far as can be determined the meager remains of the text, the conversion of Śāriputra and M Buddha's two foremost disciples associated fragments seem not to the content that would be expecte of them concern a series of allego Buddhi ("Wisdom"), Dhṛti ("Str ("Fame"), while others involve a c Moreover, one fragment of the ). The Buddha converts the wealthy apiṇḍada), who offers the Jeta Gar-ha (18). He then returns to his home stu and after converting his father ves there (19) goes on to Śrāvastī to ajit, king of Kosala (20). ddha converts many others in vari-a, his cousin Devadatta plots unsucssinate him (21). He then proceeds to e converts the courtesan Amrapālī to the Licchavis, and is again Māra (23). The Buddha announces ear, and Ānanda and the Licchavis offers his final instructions for pre-ma, takes his last meal at the home es down to await the end (25). After ascetic Subhadra, he instructs the behave after he is gone, and finally ṇa (26). After a eulogy by Anirudcremate the body and recover its are then shared with seven neigh-he Brahman Droṇa (28).

arita draws its material from bios about the Buddha recorded in es such as those reflected in the rologue to the jātaka), the bios of the Vinaya, and, for the lat-poem, the Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra.
felt free to adapt the details of aterial for his literary purposes, he the tradition in all essential points.
. Warder (1974, 146–147), the poem e considered as structured in four cantos each, treating the Buddha's quest for enlightenment, teaching and later life and parinirvāṇa. rita was first edited by E.C. Cowell sis of three recent and incomplete pts. The standard edition by E.H. s based on a much older Nepali alm leaf, datable to about 1300, rect archetype of the three mod-However, this manuscript was evihed, ending abruptly in the middle antos, and it also lacks substantial st two cantos due to the loss of four aves. However, the contents of the which are lost in the Sanskrit origi-alf of the whole – can be accurately the Tibetan and Chinese translay Sangs rgyas kyi spyod pa zhes gags chen po (D 4156/P 5656; see Fo suoxing zan (佛所行讚; T. 192).

Our knowledge of the Sanskrit text of the Buddhacarita has been supplemented by small remnants of three much older manuscripts from Central Asia preserving portions of cantos 2, 3, 13, and 16 (Weller, 1953b; Hartmann, 1988, 57–60). As with the Central Asian fragments of the Saundarananda, these fragments, though meager, are textually revealing, especially in providing a sample (from canto 16) of the portion which was previously not extant in Sanskrit. Three verses from canto 28 are also preserved in Sanskrit in the Aśokāvadāna (Okamoto, 2006). The surviving Sanskrit portion of the Buddhacarita has been translated many times into various European and Asian languages, first by Cowell (1894), and most recently by Olivelle (2009). The most influential translation is still that of Johnston (1936), which, though it had no pretension to literary quality, established a standard interpretation that remains largely intact. The part of the text for which the Sanskrit original is lost was translated by Johnston (1937), on the basis of the Tibetan and Chinese versions. The Chinese translation has been rendered into English by Beal (1883) and Willemen (2009); and part of the Tibetan [cantos 1–17] into German by Weller (1926–1928).

Śāriputraprakaraṇa and Other Dramas

A drama by Aśvaghoṣa entitled Śāriputraprakaraṇa is preserved only in the form of several dozen small fragments of two manuscripts found in Kizil in Central Asia, which seem to contain parts of the last two acts (act 8 and 9). Fortunately, the final colophon of one of the manuscripts has survived, providing both the title Śāriputraprakaraṇa (along with the alternate title Śāradvatīputraprakaraṇa) and the name of the author, "Aśvaghoṣa, son of Suvarṇākṣī." There can be no doubt that this is a genuine work of Aśvaghoṣa; this is certified by the agreement of the names with those given in the colophons in his other works, by textual and stylistic similarities with those works (e.g. Lüders, 1911b, 399), and by the age of one of the manuscripts, one of which can be dated on paleographic grounds to the Kushana era.

As far as can be determined from the title and the meager remains of the text, the play concerns the conversion of Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana, the Buddha's two foremost disciples. But some of the associated fragments seem not to be consistent with the content that would be expected in this play. Some of them concern a series of allegorical figures called Buddhi ("Wisdom"), Dhṛti ("Strength"), and Kīrti ("Fame"), while others involve a courtesan (gaṇikā). Moreover, one fragment of the earlier manuscript has on the recto the end of the Śāriputraprakaraṇa, while the verso refers to the courtesan. Therefore the editor (Lüders, 1911a; 1911b) proposed that there were actually three separate dramas which had been combined in a single anthological manuscript. The style and wording of the so-called "allegorical drama" are so close to that of the authenticated works of Aśvaghoṣa that it can safely be attributed to him (Johnston, 1936, xx–xxi; B. Bhattacharya, 1976, 76–90). The style of the "haetera drama" also shows similarities to Aśvaghoṣa's, but the situation here is less clear (Johnston, 1936, xxi–xxii).

However, the interpretation of these fragments as parts of three separate plays has not gone unchallenged (B. Bhattacharya, 1976, 90–101), for example on the grounds that Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana, who are evidently the main characters of the Śāriputraprakaraṇa, also appear in fragments of H. Lüders's "haetera drama." B. Bhattacharya thus came to the conclusion that all of fragments belong to a single play, namely the Śāriputraprakaraṇa. The surviving fragments simply are not sufficient to permit a definite decision on the question of how many works are involved, so the issue remains open.

In any case, these manuscripts prove that Aśvaghoṣa was a playwright as well as a poet, and certain points indicate that his plays were popular in Central Asia. The earlier drama manuscript, which was evidently written in India and imported to Central Asia, must have been read repeatedly, as the edges are worn and the ink rubbed off in many places, and in some places the damaged text has been rewritten in a later Central Asian hand (Lüders, 1911a, 15). Moreover, some of the secondary additions and corrections seem to be based on variant readings, which must have been taken from other manuscripts that have not survived (Lüders, 1911a, 65). Thus although Central Asian manuscripts of Aśvaghoṣa's works are far less common than those of some other Buddhist Sanskrit authors, notably the stotras of Mātṛceṭa, it is still clear that his poems and dramas were popular in the Buddhist monasteries there.

Several later Buddhist texts in Sanskrit and Chinese, notably Dharmakīrti's Vādanyāya, refer to another drama entitled Rāṣṭrapālanāṭaka (The Drama of Rāṣṭrapāla) which they attribute to Aśvaghoṣa, while the Jaina Piṇḍaniryukti (Piṃḍanijjutti) refers to a similar composition by one Aṣāḍhabhūti (Lévi, 1928; V. Bhattacharya, 1938; Johnston, 1938). The brief references provided in these texts to the theme and contents of this play are consistent with those of Aśvaghoṣa's certified works; for example, the conversion of Rāṣṭrapāla, which was presumably its main subject, is also mentioned in the Buddhacarita (21.26). Therefore, although no text of this play is extant, it is quite likely that it was one of Aśvaghoṣa's authentic works.

Style and Language

Aśvaghoṣa is beyond question one of the master poets of Sanskrit literature, whose works anticipate and influence the high classical mode. His relatively simple and elegant style prefigures the towering works of Kālidāsa some two or three centuries later. His poems are masterpieces of precise and vivid description; the observation of E.H. Johnston, the master of Aśvaghoṣa studies, that "Every word in Aśvaghoṣa has its point" (1928, 162) is almost literally true. For example, the poignant love scene of Nanda and Sundarī in canto 4 of Saundarananda, often cited as one of the high points of Aśvaghoṣa's poetry, is subtly echoed in Sundarī's lamentation in canto 6, where the same or similar words and images are recycled as tokens of grief and separation instead of love and joy. Thus in canto 4 he describes Sundarī's necklaces as "tossed up from her breasts" (stanodvartitahārayaṣṭir; 4.19a), whereas in canto 6 they are "hanging down" (vilambahārā; 6.3a); here the poet employs directional shifts to convey the inevitability of the transformation of pleasure into suffering (Salomon, 2009, 183–184; Covill, 2009, 215–241). In this way Aśvaghoṣa manipulates the conventions of romantic poetry to express his Buddhist message of the evanescence and ultimately unsatisfactory nature of worldly happiness.

Like all Sanskrit poets, Aśvaghoṣa makes abundant use of formal figures of speech (alaṃkāra), including figures of sense (arthālaṃkāra) and of sound (śabdānuprāsa; Johnston, 1936, lxxxviii–xciii; B. Bhattacharya, 1976, 363–74; Warder, 1974, 174–178). Among the former category he uses the two basic figures, simile (upamā) and metaphor (rūpaka), particularly frequently and creatively, often using multiple similes (mālopamā) and complex, multi-part comparisons. These devices are exemplified in Saundarananda 18.1:

> atha dvijo bāla ivāptavedaḥ kṣipraṃ vaṇik prāpta ivāptalābhaḥ/jitvā ca rājanya ivārisainyaṃ nandaḥ kṛtārtho gurum abhyagacchat // Then, like a Brahman boy who has mastered the Vedas, like a merchant who has returned after quickly winning a profit, and like a king who has conquered his enemy's army, Nanda, having achieved his goal, approached his teacher [to thank him]. (trans. by author)

Here the main proposition in the 4th quarter is balanced by a set of three similes in the first three quarters. This pattern is typical of Aśvaghoṣa's liking for symmetrical syntactic structures, and the structural balance is reinforced by the balance in the sense of the three similes, referring in turn to each of the three highest social classes (Brahman, Vaiśya, Kṣatriya). This relatively simple parallel verse structure contrasts with the more complex syntax and structures which predominate in the highly ornate style of later kāvya. Also characteristic of Aśvaghoṣa, and again contrasting with later kāvya, is the relatively limited and moderate use of nominal compounds, typically, as here, with only two members. This verse also exemplifies Aśvaghoṣa's use of syllabic alliteration (yamaka) in the repetition of the sequence (āpta) three times in the first half of the verse.

Thus Aśvaghoṣa's poetry is characterized by structural balance at all levels: not only in the individual verses and in the relationships between verses and cantos, but also in the overall distribution of themes and images. For example, L. Covill (2009) shows how such themes as the training of elephants, the curing of disease, and the refining of gold are strategically deployed throughout the Saundarananda as overarching thematic links.

In his two kāvyas Aśvaghoṣa utilizes a wide range of the usual classical meters, 18 different ones in all (Johnston, 1936, lxiii–lxiv; Warder, 1974, 173). These include common shorter meters such as anuṣṭubh (679 verses), upajāti (936) and vaṃśastha (201) as well as rarer and more complex ones like kusumalatāvellitā (1) and suvadanā (2), which are typically used only for the concluding verses of a canto.

The language of Aśvaghoṣa's works resembles high classical Sanskrit, but with a distinctly Buddhist flavor. This is manifested, first of all, in his vocabulary, which naturally includes not only many Buddhist technical terms such as upaniṣad (cause) and pratyaya (secondary or coordinating cause; Hakeda, 1962) but also nontechnical terms characteristic of Buddhist idiom such as ādarśana (mirror) and pratimaṇḍita (decorated; Salomon, 1983). Aśvaghoṣa's Sanskrit is also characterized by occasional features of syntax and morphology that would be considered solecisms from the point of view of strict classical usage but which are typical of Buddhist languages such as Pali and Buddhist s teacher [to thank him]. (trans. by proposition in the 4th quarter is et of three similes in the first three attern is typical of Aśvaghoṣa's lik-rical syntactic structures, and the ce is reinforced by the balance in the ee similes, referring in turn to each est social classes (Brahman, Vaiśya, elatively simple parallel verse strucith the more complex syntax and predominate in the highly ornate ya. Also characteristic of Aśvaghoṣa, asting with later kāvya, is the relad moderate use of nominal comy, as here, with only two members. exemplifies Aśvaghoṣa's use of syl(yamaka) in the repetition of the three times in the first half of the ṣa's poetry is characterized by struc-all levels: not only in the individual e relationships between verses and n the overall distribution of themes example, L. Covill (2009) shows es as the training of elephants, the

, and the refining of gold are stratethroughout the Saundarananda as natic links.

yas Aśvaghoṣa utilizes a wide range ssical meters, 18 different ones in 936, lxiii–lxiv; Warder, 1974, 173). common shorter meters such as rses), upajāti (936) and vaṃśastha rarer and more complex ones like ā (1) and suvadanā (2), which are nly for the concluding verses of a of Aśvaghoṣa's works resembles nskrit, but with a distinctly Buds is manifested, first of all, in his ch naturally includes not only technical terms such as upaniṣad tyaya (secondary or coordinating 962) but also nontechnical terms Buddhist idiom such as ādarśana atimaṇḍita (decorated; Salomon,

's Sanskrit is also characterized by es of syntax and morphology that ered solecisms from the point of ssical usage but which are typical uages such as Pali and Buddhist Hybrid Sanskrit, such as the nominative absolute construction, the locative case in place of the instrumental, the optative with preterite indicative sense, and nonstandard gerund forms like gṛhya and vivardhayitvā (Salomon, 1983). Most of these features are not exclusive to Buddhist languages but also appear in epic and other less formal varieties of Sanskrit that may be generally characterized as "Vernacular Sanskrit." Such informal usages may have been more acceptable in the earlier stages of the development of classical kāvya, of which Aśvaghoṣa's works are virtually the only surviving examples.

Aśvaghoṣa's choice of Sanskrit as the language of his Buddhist poems is on the surface surprising, since during his presumed lifetime Buddhists still favored Prakrit over Sanskrit, in keeping with the traditional Buddhist preference for vernacular languages. No doubt he chose Sanskrit in large part because of its appeal to his intended audience of Brahmans and other elite non-Buddhists. Even as he sprinkles his classical language with occasional Buddhist forms and usages, he takes care to address the aesthetic values of the grammatically oriented scholasticism of the Brahmanical tradition, for example by providing a comprehensive catalogue of aorist verb forms (Saundarananda 2.12–44).

It is perhaps not coincidental that Aśvaghoṣa's lifetime coincided with the beginning of a shift from Prakrit to Sanskrit among Buddhists in northern India, and his innovation may even have provided an impetus for the gradual adoption of Sanskrit over the next few centuries. Since this is the period at which Buddhist Hybrid Sanskrit and similar dialects emerge, it is striking that he occasionally sneaks in bilingual puns, for example on aśvattha (fig tree) and asvāsthya (disturbance; Buddhacarita 13.7), which in Prakritic pronunciation would be homophonous (assattha; Johnston, 1936, xci). Thus Aśvaghoṣa simultaneously appeals to the linguistic and aesthetic sensibilities of the Brahmanical tradition while addressing the Buddhists in something resembling their familiar idioms.

The several Prakrit dialects spoken by some of the characters in the drama, characterized by H. Lüders (1911a) as Old Magadhi, Old Ardhamagadhi, and Old Shauraseni, present important material for the historical development of the literary Prakrits. They generally prefigure the corresponding dialects (Magadhi etc.) of the later classical dramas, but are archaic in their phonological features, especially in generally retaining intervocalic consonants in their original (Old Indo-Aryan/Sanskrit) form.

Bibliography

Beal, S., The Fo-Sho-Hing-Tsan-King, Oxford, 1883.

Bhattacharya, B., Aśvaghoṣa: A Critical Study, Santiniketan, 1976.

Bhattacharya, V., "A New Drama of Aśvaghoṣa," JGIS 5, 1938, 51–53.

Choi, J.K., "The Eightfold Path in Aśvaghoṣa's Saundarananda," BDDKBKH 38, 2010, 31–38.

Covill, L., A Metaphorical Study of the Saundarananda, Delhi, 2009.

Covill, L., Handsome Nanda by Aśvaghoṣa, New York, 2007.

Cowell, E.B., The Buddha-Karita of Asvaghosha, Oxford, 1894.

Cowell, E.B., The Buddha-Karita or Life of Buddha by Asvaghosha: Edited, from Three Mss., Oxford, 1893.

Eltschinger, V., "Aśvaghoṣa and His Canonical Sources II: Yaśas, the Kāśyapa Brothers and the Buddha's Arrival in Rājagṛha (Buddhacarita 16.3–71)," JIABS 35/1–2, 2012–2013, 171–224.

Hakeda, Y.S., "Buddhist Hybrid Sanskrit Words in Aśvaghoṣa's Kāvyas," JAOS 82, 1962, 150–163.

Hartmann, J-U., Neue Aśvaghoṣa- und Mātṛceṭa-Fragmente aus Ostturkistan, NAWG 2, Göttingen, 1988.

Hiltebeitel, A., "Aśvaghoṣa's Buddhacarita : The First Known Close and Critical Reading of the Brahmanical Sanskrit Epics," JIP 34, 2006, 229–286.

Jackson, D.P., 1997. "On the Date of the Tibetan Translation of Aśvaghoṣa's Buddhacarita," SI 4, 41–62.

Johnston, E.H., "The Rāṣṭrapālanāṭaka of Aśvaghoṣa," JGIS 5, 1938, 151–153.

Johnston, E.H., "The Buddha's Mission and Last Journey: Buddhacarita, xv to xxviii," AO 15, 1937, 26–111, 231–292.

Johnston, E.H., The Buddhacarita: Or, Acts of the Buddha, Part II, Calcutta, 1936, repr. Delhi, 1972.

Johnston, E.H., The Buddhacarita: Or, Acts of the Buddha, Part I, Calcutta, 1935, repr. Delhi, 1972.

Johnston, E.H., The Saundarananda: Or, Nanda the Fair, London, 1932, repr. Delhi, 1975.

Johnston, E.H., The Saundarananda of Aśvaghoṣa, London, 1928, repr. Delhi, 1975.

Jong, J.W. de, "Review of B. Bhattacharya, Aśvaghoṣa: A Critical Study, Santiniketan, 1976," IIJ 20, 1978, 124–127.

Kanakura, Y., "A Bibliographical Study of Açvaghoṣa's Works – As a Key to the Study of the Formations of Indian Religions," in: The Japanese Association for Religious Studies and Japanese Organizing Committee of the 9th International Congress for the History of Religions, ed., Religious Studies in Japan, Tokyo, 1959, 300–307.

Law, B.C., Aśvaghoṣa, Calcutta, 1946.

Lévi, S., "Encore Aśvaghoṣa," JA 213, 1928, 193–216.

Li Rongxi, "The Life of Asvaghosa Bodhisattva," in: Jung-hsi Li & A.A. Dalia, eds., The Lives of Great Monks and Nuns, Berkeley, 2002, 9–16.

Lüders, H., Bruchstücke buddhistischer Dramen, Berlin, 1911a.

Lüders, H., "Das Śāriputraprakaraṇa, ein Drama des Aśvaghoṣa," SKPAW 30, 1911b, 388–411.

Okamoto, K., "Three Parallel Verses in the Buddhacarita and the Aśokāvadāna," IBK 54, 2006, 1187–1191.

Olivelle, P., Life of the Buddha by Aśvaghoṣa, New York, 2009.

Passi, A., Nanda il bello (Saundarananda-mahākāvya), Milan, 1985.

Passi, A., Le gesta del Buddha (Buddhacarita canto I–XIV), Milan, 1979.

Raghavan, V., "Buddhological Texts and the Epics," ALB 20, 1956, 349–359.

Salomon, R., "Aśvaghoṣa's Saundarananda IV–VI: A Study in the Poetic Structure of Buddhist Kāvya," IIJ 52, 2009, 179–196.

Salomon, R., "Aśvaghoṣa in Central Asia: Some Comments on the Recensional History of His Works in Light of Recent Manuscript Discoveries," in: E. Zürcher & L. Sander, eds., Collection of Essays 1993: Buddhism across Boundaries – Chinese Buddhism and the Western Regions, Taipei, 1999, 219–263.

Salomon, R., "The Buddhist Sanskrit of Aśvaghoṣa's Saundarananda," WZKS 27, 1983, 97–112.

Schlingloff, D., "Aśvaghoṣas Saundarānanda in Ajanta," WZKS 19, 1975, 85–102.

Shastri, H., Saundarananda Kāvyam Aśvaghoṣa praṇītam, Calcutta, 1910.

Stchoupak, N., & L. Renou, La Kāvyamīmāṃsā de Rājaśekhara, Paris, 1946.

Takakusu, J., A Record of the Buddhist Religion as Practised in India and the Malay Archipelago (A.D. 671–695), Oxford, 1896.

Warder, A.K., Indian Kāvya Literature, vol. II: Origins and Formation of the Classical Kāvya, Delhi, 1974.

Weller, F., "Ein zentralasiatisches Fragment des Saundaranandakāvya," MIO 1, 1953a, 400–423.

Weller, F., "Zwei zentralasiatische Fragmente des Buddhacarita," ASAWL 46/4, Berlin, 1953b.

Weller, F., Das Leben des Buddha von Aśvaghoṣa. Tibetisch und Deutsch, 2 parts, Leipzig, 1926–1928.

Willemen, C., Buddhacarita: In Praise of Buddha's Acts (Taishō Volume 4, Number 192), Berkeley, 2009.

Zin, M., Mitleid und Wunderkraft. Schwierige Bekehrungen und ihre Ikonogaphie im indischen Buddhismus, Wiesbaden, 2006.

RICHARD SALOMON

Tibetan Buddhist narratives comp Tibetan themes and stories as we legends received from the surrou countries, most notably India, b Asia and China. No clear-cut dist Buddhist and non-Buddhist narra however, since Buddhist legend cycles have often incorporated Tibetan folk stories, and Tibetan ta Buddhicized by adding Indic featu moral. A survey of Tibetan Buddhis fore perforce takes account of a nu strands, such as foreign and indig motifs and secular and religious th

Tibetan narratives are transm and down to the present day, in b ten form. Storytelling was purely ation of the Tibetan script in th since then, oral and written narr ished side by side, often inspirin each other. Buddhist legends we Tibetan and transmitted in a writ are also retold orally, for exampl erings, when Buddhist teachers g tions. Indigenous narratives that were also published in manuscri versions, as, for example, the p "arisen corpse" (ro langs) and t Gesar; such written versions may a basis for oral renderings. Due t of transmission, legends and change over time and accordin cally, stories can be composed i in a combination of both. A p form of storytelling in Tibet co tion of prose narrative, providin or verse, usually rendering the characters, and in religious wo a doctrinal or spiritual message.

Buddhist Narratives in Canon

Together with the Chinese Bu survey of its narratives, see Ch the Tibetan canon is an impo

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

ord of the Buddhist Religion as Practised Malay Archipelago (A.D. 671–695), Oxford, n Kāvya Literature, vol. II: Origins and Forssical Kāvya, Delhi, 1974.

ntralasiatisches Fragment des Saundara-O 1, 1953a, 400–423.

entralasiatische Fragmente des Buddha-6/4, Berlin, 1953b.

en des Buddha von Aśvaghoṣa. Tibetisch rts, Leipzig, 1926–1928.

dhacarita: In Praise of Buddha's Acts Number 192), Berkeley, 2009.

Wunderkraft. Schwierige Bekehrungen und im indischen Buddhismus, Wiesbaden,

RICHARD SALOMON

Narratives: Tibet

Tibetan Buddhist narratives comprise indigenous Tibetan themes and stories as well as stories and legends received from the surrounding Buddhist countries, most notably India, but also Central Asia and China. No clear-cut distinction between Buddhist and non-Buddhist narrative is possible, however, since Buddhist legends and narrative cycles have often incorporated elements from Tibetan folk stories, and Tibetan tales have become Buddhicized by adding Indic features and a religious moral. A survey of Tibetan Buddhist narrative therefore perforce takes account of a number of different strands, such as foreign and indigenous stories and motifs and secular and religious themes.

Tibetan narratives are transmitted, historically and down to the present day, in both oral and written form. Storytelling was purely oral until the creation of the Tibetan script in the 7th century CE; since then, oral and written narratives have flourished side by side, often inspiring and influencing each other. Buddhist legends were translated into Tibetan and transmitted in a written form, but they are also retold orally, for example at religious gatherings, when Buddhist teachers give public instructions. Indigenous narratives that were originally oral were also published in manuscript and block-print versions, as, for example, the popular tales of the "arisen corpse" (ro langs) and the Tibetan epic of Gesar; such written versions may then again become a basis for oral renderings. Due to these fluid forms of transmission, legends and tales develop and change over time and according to region. Stylistically, stories can be composed in prose, in verse, or in a combination of both. A particularly frequent form of storytelling in Tibet consists of a combination of prose narrative, providing the plot, and song or verse, usually rendering the direct speech of the characters, and in religious works often containing a doctrinal or spiritual message.

Buddhist Narratives in the Tibetan Canon

Together with the Chinese Buddhist canon (for a survey of its narratives, see Chavannes, 1910–1934), the Tibetan canon is an important source for the knowledge of Buddhist stories and legends, especially since a considerable number of Indian works did not survive in the original but have been preserved in Chinese and/or Tibetan translations. Indian Buddhist tales and legends were translated into Tibetan from the 8th century onward and later included in the Tibetan canon. They include the life story of Buddha Śākyamuni as well as *jātaka*s and *avadāna*s. The canon also contains translations of a certain number of non-Buddhist narrative and poetic materials (including even the famous Sanskrit poem Meghadūta by Kālidāsa).

The life of the Buddha was known in Tibet from several sources, the most important version being the Lalitavistara in the sūtra section of the Kanjur (D 95/P 763) and the account contained in the Vinayavastu of the Mūlasarvāstivādins (D 1/P 1030), both translated into Tibetan in the late 8th-early 9th centuries. The Tanjur also contains Aśvaghoṣa's famous poem Buddhacarita (The Life of the Buddha; D 4156/P 5656). Many Tibetan authors have retold the life story of the Buddha, sometimes following the convention of subdividing it into the most significant "twelve deeds" (mdzad pa bcu gnyis), starting with his descent from Tuṣita heaven and ending with his passing into parinirvāṇa. An early example of a Tibetan adaptation based on the "twelve deeds" scheme is found in the Chos la 'jug pa'i sgo (Introduction to Buddhism) by Bsod nams rtse mo (1142–1182; on this and later works, see van der Kuijp, 2002, 119). The pattern of "twelve deeds" became so prominent in Tibet that it was applied to some hagiographies of Tibetan Buddhist masters and even to the life of Gshen rab mi bo, the founding figure of the Tibetan Bön tradition (see e.g. Bon brgya dge legs lhun grub rgya mtsho et al., 2011, xiii; for a modern retelling, see Sangye Tenzin, 1995). As the foundation narrative of the Buddhist tradition, the life of the Buddha is practically omnipresent and is retold or summarized in various contexts; for example, it is usually included in the introductory sections of Tibetan works on the "history of Buddhism" (chos 'byung), thus authenticating the origins of the Tibetan transmission lineages.

Numerous Buddhist legends of the jātaka and avadāna type are contained in the Tibetan canon. Like their Pali and Sanskrit counterparts, these pre-birth stories are meant to illustrate the effect of karman or, in some cases, the Buddhist pāramitās (perfections), and due to their edifying and entertaining nature, the canonical stories became highly popular in Tibet. Within the Kanjur, toward the end of the sūtra section (mdo), one finds the Tibetan translation of several important collections of pre-birth stories: the Avadānaśataka (D 343/P 1012), the Karmaśataka (D 340/P 1007; for a summary, see Feer, 1901), and the Mdzangs blun zhes bya ba'i mdo (Sūtra of the Wise and the Foolish; D 341/P 1008). The latter, translated from the Chinese by 'Gos Chos grub (a well-known translator active in Dunhuang in the early 9th cent., known in Chinese as Wu Facheng), became particularly popular in Tibet and is often referred to by Buddhist authors. For unknown reasons, the number and arrangement of the stories in the Tibetan version differ from the Chinese (see Takakusu, 1901; Baruch, 1955; Roesler, 2007). These three large avadāna collections are followed by several individual avadānas (D 344–350/P 1013–1019), including the Sumāghadhāvadāna, Puṇyabalāvadāna, and Candraprabhāvadāna. These Buddhist legends became so popular that they were adapted by Buddhist scholars of much later times; for example, the Rnying ma scholar Zhe chen 'Gyur med padma rnam rgyal (1871–1926) published a slightly modernized and abridged version of the above-mentioned canonical collections in a voluminous compilation in 1819 under the title Mdo las byung ba'i gtam rgyud sna tshogs (Various Stories from the Sūtras; TBRC W3888).

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

The Vinaya section of the Kanjur contains the Tibetan translation of the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya with its numerous legends (Panglung, 1981). Several Tibetan scholars composed anthologies and abridgments of these legends. For instance, the famous polymath Bu ston Rin chen grub (1290–1364) published a collection of stories from the Vinaya called 'Dul ba pha'i gleng 'bum chen mo (Large Collection of Stories from the Vinaya; 1971), which in turn formed the basis for the 'Dul ba gleng 'bum (Collection of Stories from the Vinaya) of Dge 'dun grub (1391–1475), the disciple of Tsong kha pa, who was posthumously identified as the first Dalai Lama (on the techniques of quotation, paraphrase, and abridgment used, see Eimer, 2007).

The Tanjur, in its skyes rabs (jātaka) section, contains several poetical jātaka and avadāna cycles composed in Indian kāvya style: the Jātakamālās of Āryaśūra (D 4150/P 5650; Hanisch, 2005) and his successor Haribhaṭṭa (D 5152/P 5652; most recently Hahn, 2011) as well as Kṣemendra's Bodhisattvāvadānakalpalatā (D 4155/P 5655; for a bibliographical survey, see Kirde, 2002; on its impact in Tibet, see van der Kuijp, 1996b). The legends of the two Jātakamālās are arranged to illustrate the Buddhist pāramitās (Hahn, 2007, 12–15). Āryaśūra's Jātakamālā, translated into Tibetan in the early translation period (8th cent.), became so emblematic of the genre that the term skyes rabs is often used by Tibetan authors to refer specifically to the 34 legends of his work. The third Karma pa, Rang byung rdo rje (1248–1339), enlarged the work by composing 66 additional jātakas and, as the logical conclusion, the life story of Buddha Śākyamuni (Skyes rabs brgya pa [A Hundred Jātakas]; TBRC W1KG16609; see Tropper, 2005, 68–70; Hanisch, 2005, lxxxi). His jātakas were based on Indian Buddhist legends and emulated Āryaśūra's style, a poetical combination of prose and verse (Skt. campū). This enlarged cycle was also visually represented in a cycle of jātaka paintings and inscriptions in the skor lam chen mo (the great circumambulation path) of Zha lu Monastery, executed shortly after the composition in the 14th century (Tropper, 2005).

Another cycle of pre-birth stories that became influential in educated circles by shaping the Tibetan understanding of Indian poetry was Kṣemendra's above-mentioned Bodhisattvāvadānakalpalatā (bodhisattvāvadāna, "deeds of the Bodhisattva," being used in the same sense as jātaka). Its translation in the 13th century was a "major event in the history of Tibetan poetry and poetics" (van der Kuijp, 1996b, 401). The work was translated by Shong ston (13th cent.) and revised by Dpang Lo tsa ba (1276–1342), two scholars who had also been instrumental in introducing Indian poetics in Tibet through the translation of and commentary on Daṇḍin's Kāvyādarśa (Mirror of Poetics; Dimitrov, 2002, 25–60). Several commentaries were written on the Bodhisattvāvadānakalpalatā, its legends were retold by various authors (van der Kuijp, 1996b, 401f.) and were also represented visually in block prints and paintings (Tucci, vol. II, 1949, 442–533; for further references on visual representations, see Kirde, 2002, nos. 4.16, 4.23, 4.32, 4.33, and 4.37).

Apart from these influential large cycles, the Skyes rabs section of the Tanjur contains Aśvaghoṣa's Buddhacarita (see above) and two dramas based on Buddhist legends (Candragomin's Lokānanda and Harṣadeva's Nāgānanda; D 4153–4154/P 5653–5654; see Hahn, 1987; Steiner, 1997), which reminds us that Buddhist legends were not only retold but also performed (Seyfort Ruegg, 1999, 196f., 214). Some further individual literary avadānas are found toward the end of the 'Dul ba (Vinaya con tion of the Tanjur, just before the Sky (D 4144–4147/P 5645–5648).

---

In addition to stories of the jātak type, some works within the Tanju rated Indian material that is not speci in outlook. Most important in this stotra (poetic homily) commentaries (late 8th–early 9th cents.), an auth who spent part of his life in Tibet co Tibetan translators and became an i for the knowledge of Hindu mythol wrote not only a commentary on t the Udānavargavivaraṇa (D 4100/P but also commentaries on two stotr Śaṃkarasvāmin and Udbhaṭasiddha
1110, 1112–1113/P 2001–2002, 2004–20 who had converted from Hinduis The titles of both works have bee slightly varying forms. J. Schneider that the original title of Śaṃkarasv Devātiśayastotra* (and not Devat in the Sanskrit manuscript edited Udbhaṭasiddhasvāmin's work wa tled Viśiṣṭastava* (rather than * Schneider, 1993; 2014), judging fron the Sanskrit title in the Tanjur. Bot the qualities that make the Buddl Hindu gods. The allusions to Hind tained in these eulogies would no prehensible for a Tibetan readersh explanation, and Prajñāvarman thus became indispensable guide in understanding the Indian worl assume that he composed them Tibet for his local audience. It is who in his commentary on the (st. 3) provided the Tibetans wi origin story of the Tibetan peo ancestry with India: their forefa prince named Rūpati, who fled soldiers during the turmoil of the (Haarh, 1969, ch. 10; Roesler, 200 Karmay, 2014, 32f.). In the conte cal Buddhist stotras, it may also the Tanjur has preserved anoth meant to illustrate why the Budd Hindu gods, entitled Dpe'i phren it corresponds to the first story Kalpanāmaṇḍitikā Dṛṣṭāntapar and translation of the Tibetan t of relevant scholarship, see Ha only is the Tibetan canon a rich dānakalpalatā (D 4155/P 5655; for a al survey, see Kirde, 2002; on its impact an der Kuijp, 1996b). The legends of amālās are arranged to illustrate the mitās (Hahn, 2007, 12–15). Āryaśūra's ranslated into Tibetan in the early riod (8th cent.), became so emblem-re that the term skyes rabs is often n authors to refer specifically to the his work. The third Karma pa, Rang (1248–1339), enlarged the work by additional jātakas and, as the logithe life story of Buddha Śākyamuni ya pa [A Hundred Jātakas]; TBRC ee Tropper, 2005, 68–70; Hanisch, jātakas were based on Indian Budd emulated Āryaśūra's style, a poeti-n of prose and verse (Skt. campū). ycle was also visually represented ka paintings and inscriptions in the (the great circumambulation path) tery, executed shortly after the com-4th century (Tropper, 2005).

e of pre-birth stories that became cated circles by shaping the Tibetan of Indian poetry was Kṣemendra's Bodhisattvāvadānakalpalatā (bodhi- eeds of the Bodhisattva," being used se as jātaka). Its translation in the s a "major event in the history of nd poetics" (van der Kuijp, 1996b, as translated by Shong ston (13th d by Dpang Lo tsa ba (1276–1342), ho had also been instrumental ndian poetics in Tibet through of and commentary on Daṇḍin's rror of Poetics; Dimitrov, 2002, ommentaries were written on the akalpalatā, its legends were retold s (van der Kuijp, 1996b, 401f.) and nted visually in block prints and
vol. II, 1949, 442–533; for further sual representations, see Kirde, 3, 4.32, 4.33, and 4.37).

e influential large cycles, the Skyes he Tanjur contains Aśvaghoṣa's above) and two dramas based on (Candragomin's Lokānanda and anda; D 4153–4154/P 5653–5654; teiner, 1997), which reminds us nds were not only retold but also t Ruegg, 1999, 196f., 214). Some fur-rary avadānas are found toward the end of the 'Dul ba (Vinaya commentary) section of the Tanjur, just before the Skyes rabs section (D 4144–4147/P 5645–5648).

In addition to stories of the jātaka and avadāna type, some works within the Tanjur have incorporated Indian material that is not specifically Buddhist in outlook. Most important in this respect are the stotra (poetic homily) commentaries of Prajñāvarman (late 8th–early 9th cents.), an author from Bengal who spent part of his life in Tibet collaborating with Tibetan translators and became an important source for the knowledge of Hindu mythology in Tibet. He wrote not only a commentary on the Udānavarga, the Udānavargavivaraṇa (D 4100/P 5601; Balk, 2011), but also commentaries on two stotras composed by Śaṃkarasvāmin and Udbhaṭasiddhasvāmin (D 1109–1110, 1112–1113/P 2001–2002, 2004–2005), two brothers who had converted from Hinduism to Buddhism. The titles of both works have been transmitted in slightly varying forms. J. Schneider (2014, 19) argues that the original title of Śaṃkarasvāmin's work was Devātiśayastotra* (and not Devatāvimarśastuti, as in the Sanskrit manuscript edited in Hahn, 2000); Udbhaṭasiddhasvāmin's work was probably entitled Viśiṣṭastava* (rather than Viśeṣastava*, as in Schneider, 1993; 2014), judging from the rendering of the Sanskrit title in the Tanjur. Both works highlight the qualities that make the Buddha superior to the Hindu gods. The allusions to Hindu mythology contained in these eulogies would not have been comprehensible for a Tibetan readership without further explanation, and Prajñāvarman's commentaries thus became indispensable guides for the Tibetans in understanding the Indian world. It is tempting to assume that he composed them during his stay in Tibet for his local audience. It is also Prajñāvarman who in his commentary on the Devātiśayastotra* (st. 3) provided the Tibetans with a variant of the origin story of the Tibetan people that links their ancestry with India: their forefather was an Indian prince named Rūpati, who fled to Tibet with his soldiers during the turmoil of the Mahābhārata war (Haarh, 1969, ch. 10; Roesler, 2002, 438–440; see also Karmay, 2014, 32f.). In the context of these polemical Buddhist stotras, it may also be mentioned that the Tanjur has preserved another Buddhist parable meant to illustrate why the Buddha is superior to the Hindu gods, entitled Dpe'i phreng ba (D 4196/P 5695; it corresponds to the first story from Kumāralāta's Kalpanāmaṇḍitikā Dṛṣṭāntapaṅkti; for an edition and translation of the Tibetan text and an overview of relevant scholarship, see Hahn, 1983). Thus, not only is the Tibetan canon a rich source for jātaka and avadāna literature and the life of the Buddha, but it also contains some general Indian and even Hindu narrative material.

Indian Folklore and Mythology in Tibet: Didactic Stanzas and Their Commentaries

Tibetan adaptations of Indian narratives are also found outside the Tibetan Buddhist canon in commentarial literature, in particular in commentaries on stanza collections dealing with nīti (social/political skill). Several works on nīti are contained in the section thun mong ba lugs kyi bstan bcos (common [i.e. not specifically Buddhist] treatises on political skill) of the Tanjur. One of them is the Jantupoṣaṇabindu* ascribed to Nāgārjuna (D 4330/P 5822; Hahn [1985; 1993] has shown that for chronological reasons, this cannot be the philosopher Nāgārjuna). Some of its stanzas allude to popular Indian tales. The respective stories are provided in an extracanonical Tibetan commentary that has been preserved in at least two main recensions containing 27–31 stories, one of them entitled Nor bu'i rgyan (Damdinsüren, 1982; Damdinsüren & Tsendina, 1983). One of the stories in this extra-canonical commentary is mentioned in Dmar ston's commentary (see below), which suggests that it already existed around the mid-13th century. Most of the tales are known from the Indian Pañcatantra/Tantrākhyāyika cycle and the Kathāsaritsāgara. This commentary, which made non-Buddhist Indian didactic narratives known in Tibet, became popular enough to be translated into Mongolian no fewer than four times (for a survey, see Roesler, 2011, 68–72), and some of the tales have also survived in the Tibetan oral tradition (documented e.g. in Hermanns, 1955).

Very similar in style and contents are the Legs par bshad pa rin po che'i gter zhes bya ba'i bstan bcos (Skt. Subhāṣitaratnanidhināmaśāstra [Treatise [on Nīti] Called Treasury of Aphoristic Jewels]; see Eimer, 2014) by the famous Indophile scholar Sa skya Paṇḍita Kun dga' rgyal mtshan (1182–1251) and the commentary written by his disciple Dmar ston Chos kyi rgyal po (TBRC W20459). Dmar ston Chos kyi rgyal po comments on 47 of Sa ska Paṇḍita Kun dga' rgyal mtshan's stanzas, rendering stories from the Pañcatantra/Tantrākhyāyika cycle as well as some episodes of Hindu mythology. For example, he summarizes the plot of the Mahābhārata, apparently deriving the plot partly from Prajñāvarman's commentaries mentioned above (Roesler, 2002). His rendering of the Rāmāyaṇa seems not primarily based on the early Tibetan version of the Rāma story attested among the Dunhuang documents (de Jong, 1989), but it shares certain features with the wider Asian traditions of the epic. While the commentary on the _*Jantupoṣaṇabindu_ has the tendency to assimilate the plot to the Tibetan cultural context, Dmar ston Chos kyi rgyal po is keen to preserve as much of the Indian original as he possibly could, which makes him an interesting witness to the knowledge of Sanskrit narratives and literature in Tibetan scholarly circles. Like the commentary on the _*Jantupoṣaṇabindu_, Dmar ston Chos kyi rgyal po's commentary was translated four times into Mongolian. Both story collections have been analyzed in detail by D. Ëndon (1989).

A third Tibetan work deserves to be mentioned in this context – the Mdo sde me tog gsil ma (TBRC W1KG3958), a commentary by a certain Dpal mdzes rgyal mtshan on a work entitled Me tog gi mdzes pa'i rgyan. It seems to date from the first half of the 13th century and was, according to the transmission lineage at the beginning of the work, transmitted in Bka' gdams pa and Bka' brgyud pa circles. It contains numerous well-known Buddhist legends, many of them of the jātaka type, but in addition there are also ten tales from the Pañcatantra cycle (Roesler, 2011, 97–100). This makes the Mdo sde me tog gsil ma another witness to the circulation of Indian nīti tales in Tibet around the 13th century. These stories therefore seem to have been popular across the different gsar ma ("new") schools of Tibetan Buddhism, the Bka' gdams pa, the Bka' brgyud pa, and the Sa skya pa.

The genre of legs (par) bshad (pa) (lit. elegant sayings, h. elegant didactic stanzas) with story commentary, as described above in the context of Sa skya Paṇḍita's work and Dmar ston's commentary, lived on in later times. An example is the Dge ldan legs bshad of Paṇ chen Bsod nams grags pa (1478–1554), the 15th head of the Ganden Monastery (dga' ldan khri pa), who explicitly refers to Sa skya Paṇḍita Kun dga' rgyal mtshan's Legs par bshad pa rin po che'i gter (see above) as his model (comp. the evaluation in van der Kuijp, 1986). About 250 years later, the prolific scholar and commentator A kya yongs 'dzin Dbyangs can dga' ba'i blo gros (1740–1827) wrote a commentary providing the stories alluded to in the stanzas (see Dge ldan legs bshad, 2000; TBRC W942). However, this commentary mainly renders legends that are truly Buddhist in content and does not include secular and Hindu themes and stories, unlike the commentaries mentioned above. This may reflect a later shift from the innovative phyi dar (latter diffusion) period (roughly 11th–13th cents.), in which various elements of Indian culture were readily absorbed, to a more strictly Buddhist culture at a time when Tibet had developed a well-established tradition of Buddhist literature while there was no new influx from India due to the disappearance of Buddhism in its home land.

Creative Assimilation: Indic and Indigenous Narratives in Tibet

During the formative period of Tibetan literature around the 11th–13th centuries, Tibetan authors adopted and adapted genres such as the jātaka and playfully integrated Indic themes and motifs into their own indigenous Buddhist literature. In this period, in which Buddhism itself became fully assimilated into the Tibetan environment, they also created truly Tibetan forms of Buddhist narrative, going far beyond a mere adoption of Indian (or Chinese) material. At the same time, they often retained an Indic flair that links their tales and legends to the Indian Buddhist tradition. Many tales are a colorful blend of Buddhist instruction and secular entertainment. The early Bka' gdams pa tradition was particularly prolific in this respect. Three narrative cycles deserve special attention: the Ro sgrung (Tales of the Corpse), the Tibetan version of the tales of the parrot (see below), and the jātaka stories from the Bka' gdams glegs bam (The Book of Bka' gdams; TBRC W1KG8718, W1KG4473, etc.; partial transl. in Thupten Jinpa, 2008).

The Ro sgrung uses an Indian frame story (similar to the Vetālapañcaviṃśati) that at the same time resonates with indigenous Tibetan folklore about the "undead" (ro langs; 'das log). There are two main versions, one with 13 tales and the other with 21 tales (for a summary, see Lörincz, 1965; 1968; Macdonald, 1967; for a comparative overview, see, Riva, 1999; for compilations of different length, see Roesler, 2011, 86–89). The tales themselves are not taken from the Indian Vetālapañcaviṃśati, and they may at least in part be of Tibetan origin, since in addition to some Indian features, they also contain indigenous Tibetan motifs. They are embedded in a Buddhist frame story: in both versions the hero of the frame story is a boy who is sent by Nāgārjuna to fetch a corpse from a charnel ground without uttering a word. On the way back, the corpse

---

(a ro langs, "arisen corpse," which spirit) tells the boy a tale. As the b from commenting on these storie corpse disappears, and the boy again from the charnel ground. In successfully completes his task. Th ous similarities with the Indian Vet However, the Indian work is set in ment. A.K. Warder (1992, ch. 46) the Tibetan Buddhist version of th resents an original that was later audience. However, there seems material that would support this the relatively late Tibetan attest cient evidence for such a theory. one hint to the existence of an In Tibetan Ro sgrung: within the Bka (compiled on the basis of an ora Rngog Legs pa'i shes rab (11th c Atiśa, is quoted as mentioning versions of the Ro sgrung with e from an Indian scholar. Another ence to the stories of the ro lan Dpe chos of Po to ba Rin chen gsa however, mentions a mu stegs p and therefore seems to refer t Indian plot of the frame story, no sion of the Ro sgrung (Roesler, 2 sgrung has remained highly po has survived in manuscript and b as well as in oral versions (see Sc

Another narrative cycle fro similar fate: the tales of the parr [Seventy (Tales of the) Parrot]). sion of the frame story and 13 e contained in the above-ment glegs bam (Herrmann, 1983). Si Śukasaptati, a parrot recounts prevent the lady left in his char house to meet a lover. The Tib are independent of the Indian v be indigenous Tibetan stories, pilers have added some Indian by mentioning Indian proper n and Indian animals. However, s Tibetan, and even Gesar, usu Tibetan epic, appears in the pl Within the Bka' gdams glegs b of the tales of the parrot is em pre-birth (jātaka) stories abou Bka' gdams tradition, 'Brom st ston Rgyal ba'i 'byung gnas; 100 nentaries mentioned above. This r shift from the innovative phyi dar period (roughly 11th–13th cents.), in ements of Indian culture were read-more strictly Buddhist culture at a had developed a well-established dhist literature while there was no India due to the disappearance of ome land.

milation: Indic and arratives in Tibet ative period of Tibetan literature

-13th centuries, Tibetan authors apted genres such as the jātaka egrated Indic themes and motifs ndigenous Buddhist literature. In ich Buddhism itself became fully the Tibetan environment, they Tibetan forms of Buddhist narraond a mere adoption of Indian (or
l. At the same time, they often flair that links their tales and leg-Buddhist tradition. Many tales are f Buddhist instruction and secular he early Bka' gdams pa tradition rolific in this respect. Three narrae special attention: the Ro sgrung se), the Tibetan version of the tales below), and the jātaka stories from egs bam (The Book of Bka' gdams; W1KG4473, etc.; partial transl. in 08).

uses an Indian frame story (simipañcaviṃśati) that at the same ith indigenous Tibetan folklore d" (ro langs; 'das log). There are s, one with 13 tales and the other summary, see Lörincz, 1965; 1968; for a comparative overview, see, mpilations of different length, see 89). The tales themselves are not dian Vetālapañcaviṃśati, and they art be of Tibetan origin, since in Indian features, they also contain n motifs. They are embedded in story: in both versions the hero of a boy who is sent by Nāgārjuna from a charnel ground with-
rd. On the way back, the corpse

(a ro langs, "arisen corpse," which is inhabited by a spirit) tells the boy a tale. As the boy cannot refrain from commenting on these stories, each time the corpse disappears, and the boy has to retrieve it again from the charnel ground. In the end the boy successfully completes his task. This frame has obvious similarities with the Indian Vetālapañcaviṃśati. However, the Indian work is set in a Hindu environment. A.K. Warder (1992, ch. 46) hypothesizes that the Tibetan Buddhist version of the frame story represents an original that was later recast for a Hindu audience. However, there seems to be no Indian material that would support this assumption, and the relatively late Tibetan attestation is not sufficient evidence for such a theory. There is, however, one hint to the existence of an Indian model of the Tibetan Ro sgrung: within the Bka' gdams glegs bam (compiled on the basis of an oral version in 1302), Rngog Legs pa'i shes rab (11th cent.), a disciple of Atiśa, is quoted as mentioning that he had heard versions of the Ro sgrung with either 13 or 21 tales from an Indian scholar. Another, still earlier reference to the stories of the ro langs is found in the Dpe chos of Po to ba Rin chen gsal (see below). This, however, mentions a mu stegs pa (a non-Buddhist) and therefore seems to refer to the well-known Indian plot of the frame story, not the Buddhist version of the Ro sgrung (Roesler, 2011, 85–86). The Ro sgrung has remained highly popular in Tibet and has survived in manuscript and block-print editions as well as in oral versions (see Schuh, 1973, xxivf.).

Another narrative cycle from India has had a similar fate: the tales of the parrot (Skt. Śukasaptati [Seventy (Tales of the) Parrot]). A Buddhicized version of the frame story and 13 embedded tales are contained in the above-mentioned Bka' gdams glegs bam (Herrmann, 1983). Similar to the Indian Śukasaptati, a parrot recounts tales in order to prevent the lady left in his charge from leaving the house to meet a lover. The Tibetan tales, however, are independent of the Indian version and may well be indigenous Tibetan stories, although the compilers have added some Indian flavor, for instance by mentioning Indian proper names, place names, and Indian animals. However, some names are truly Tibetan, and even Gesar, usually the hero of the Tibetan epic, appears in the plot of the third story. Within the Bka' gdams glegs bam, the whole cycle of the tales of the parrot is embedded as one of the pre-birth (jātaka) stories about the founder of the Bka' gdams tradition, 'Brom ston (full name 'Brom ston Rgyal ba'i 'byung gnas; 1005–1064).

All in all, the Bka' gdams glegs bam contains 22 such jātaka stories (summarized in Schuh, 1981, 1–23), which use an ingenious narrative device. While in the Pali jātaka collection, the Buddha narrates stories about his previous lives and those of the people around him, here it is the Bengali scholar Atiśa (full name Atiśa Dīpaṃkarasrījñāna; 982–1054) who narrates the pre-birth stories (skyes rabs) of 'Brom ston. Apart from the legendary previous incarnations of 'Brom ston, the stories also feature Atiśa himself and some of his other Tibetan disciples in their previous existences. 'Brom ston is the main hero (corresponding to the Bodhisattva of the traditional jātaka) in these stories, and Atiśa has the role of the omniscient narrator that would traditionally be taken by the Buddha. This narrative frame creates a powerful way of endowing the main teachers of the tradition with spiritual authority (Miller, 2004). The compilation of the Bka' gdams glegs bam in 1302 in the monastery of Narthang may be understood as one part of the industrious efforts of the scholars of Narthang to collect, compile, and publish their Buddhist heritage during a time that saw the extinction of Buddhism in India and Mongol Sa skya hegemony in Tibet.

That the early Bka' gdams pa circles were creative storytellers is also documented in the Be'u bum sngon po (Blue Compendium; TBRC W1KG15517) and Dpe chos (Dharma Exemplified; TBRC W1KG15518) from the tradition of Po to ba Rin chen gsal (1027–1105). These two works on the lam rim (graded path [to awakening]) illustrate each step on the Buddhist path by parables and examples (Roesler, 2011). They combine Indian canonical material with indigenous parables and anecdotes and demonstrate that Tibetan Buddhist narratives were not just adaptations of Indian material. A 14th-century commentary on the Dpe chos, the Gtam rgyud rin chen phreng mdzes (Beautiful Necklace of Narrative Gems), by 'Gro mgon Dpal ldan ye shes, contains retellings of 73 Indian legends that the Dpe chos only alludes to (TBRC W1KG5964; on editions and content, see Roesler, 2011, 192–200; on various recensions, see Khamaganova, 1998). Po to ba Rin chen gsal's parables have remained extremely popular and are referred to in works ranging from Tsong kha pa Blo bzang grags pa's Lam rim chen mo (Great [Treatise] on the Graded Path; TBRC W466; 1402) to the 20th-century lam rim teachings of Pha bong ka pa Bde chen snying po (Lam rim rnam grol lag bcangs [Liberation in the Palm of Your Hand]; TBRC W3817, W1KG8583). Another, much later story collection that demonstrates the continuity of the technique of illustrating the lam rim by parables is the commentary on the Lam rim chen mo by Skyu ra yongs 'dzin Byams pa khun khyab (18th cent.) entitled Byang chub lam gyi rim pa'i sgo nas rang sems dge sbyor la 'dzug pa'i man ngag rin chen snying po (Precious Core Advice on Engaging One's Mind in Virtuous Conduct through the Graded Path to Awakening; TBRC W23549).

Didactic narratives, both canonical and extracanonical, were also used widely in other Buddhist traditions. To mention just a few early examples, the 'Brug pa Bka' brgyud master Lo ras pa (1187–1250) compiled a voluminous cycle of the Dam chos thub pa lnga'i sngon 'gro'i skabs kyi gtam rgyud rgyu 'bras la yid ches bskyed byed (Stories that Generate Faith in [the Karmic Law of] Cause and Effect; TBRC W23440). The Gsung rab rin chen bang mdzod (TBRC W23752), a work by the little known early 'Bri gung author Dpal chen Chos kyi ye shes, employs numerous parables and canonical quotations to illustrate doctrinal points, and a 13th-century commentary on the 'Bri gung Dgongs gcig contains numerous canonical legends and some life stories of siddhas (see Dam chos dgongs pa gcig pa'i 'grel chen sngang mdzad ye shes sgron me; TBRC W00EGS1017136).

While most Tibetan Buddhist storytelling is related to either pre-birth stories or life stories, illustrating karman, the pāramitās, or the Buddhist path in general, a small number of works deals with the benefits of specific Buddhist scriptures, demonstrating the power inherent in the recitation, copying, and veneration of these texts. An example from Dunhuang is PT149, a one-folio text in which Dba' Dpal byams, the priest of king Khri Srong lde brtsan, makes a thugs dam (practice commitment) to recite the Āryabhadracaryāpraṇidhāna from the Gaṇḍavyūhasūtra and thus reaches Sukhāvatī (van Schaik & Doney, 2009). There is also a set of 15 tales demonstrating the benefits of the Vajracchedikā entitled Rdo rje gcod pa'i phan yon, adapted from Chinese stories of the same type (Ho, 2013, 403–409). As in the previous case, people achieve certain benefits by making the Vajracchedikā their yi dam (practice commitment). It has to be said, however, that sūtra-related stories were much less widespread in Tibet than in China, possibly because the Tibetans did not develop the cult of specific sūtras in the same way as the Chinese Buddhists did.

Among the Tibetan narrative literature of later centuries, a genre that deserves special mention due to its great popularity is that of didactic animal stories in general and bird stories in particular (Namkhai Norbu, 1995, 16–17), as for example those contained in the anthology Bya dang ri dwags kyi rtogs brjod (Didactic Tales on Animal and Bird Themes; TBRC W23796). Two fairly well-known examples of the genre of bird stories are the Mgrin sngon zla ba'i rtogs brjod (Avadāna of [the Bird Called] Blue Neck Moon; TBRC W1KG5397) by Sumati alias Blo bzang bstan pa'i rgyal mtshan (18th cent.; see Schuh, 1981, 23–38) and the Bya chos rin chen phreng ba (Jewel Garland of the Dharma among the Birds; TBRC W23796, vol. 1; see Conze, 1955), vaguely reminiscent of South Asian didactic bird stories such as the Kuṇālajātaka (Pali jātaka no. 536; Bollée, 1970).

Tibetan storytelling has preserved Buddhist narratives in various media and performative contexts. Temples and monasteries have wall paintings of individual *jātaka*s and jātaka cycles. Ma ṇi pas (itinerant storytellers) used to retell Buddhist legends with the help of painted scrolls (on "picture recitation" in a comparative perspective, see Mair, 1988). A smaller number of *jātaka*s were adapted as theatre plays (a lce lha mo; sometimes called "Tibetan opera"), the written versions of which are called rnam thar (liberation [story]), a term also used for life stories in general (for a range of articles, see Tashi Tsering & Henrion-Dourcy, 2001).

Stories of the jātaka and avadāna type were sometimes combined with biographies (rnam thar) of reincarnate Buddhist teachers, forming narrative cycles of previous, present, and sometimes even future lives of the subject. But the relationship between avadāna and biographical literature goes further than that: even when the previous lives are not addressed at all, Tibetan biographies of Buddhist teachers or lay officials may be designated as avadāna (Tib. rtogs [par] brjod [pa]; e.g. the biography of Pho la nas, the ruler of Tibet in the first half of the 18th cent.; TBRC W7734). In Tibetan literature, the vast and varied corpus of life writing (rnam thar, rtogs brjod, and related types) is an important narrative genre in itself, which cannot be dealt with in detail here. Suffice it to mention the life stories of two extremely popular Buddhist saints: the hagiographies of Padmasambhava (see Vostrikov, 1970, 32–51; Dalton, 2004; Cantwell & Mayer, 2013) and of Mi la ras pa (Tiso, 1989; Roberts, 2010; Quintman, 2014). These works have undergone various redactions and recastings, leading to narrative formats with carefully woven plots and novelistic traits. Another genre that could arguably be included under Tibetan narrative in the wider sense is Buddhist historiography (chos 'byung; see Vostrikov,

---

1970; van der Kuijp, 1996a; Marti biographical and historical writin core of the Tibetan Buddhist tra originally inspired by Chinese tra ography and life writing, they hav vast and truly Tibetan genres of lit

It should also be mentioned biographical and (quasi-)histori be embedded in ritual settings. Si times, Tibetan societies have had a "antecedent tales" (Tib. smrang, narratives about the origin of a sp ing by whom and under what cir performed in ancient times. Thes had to be recited during the perf ual in order to render it effective. that this genre of antecedent tale for various Buddhist contexts (o in funeral rites, see Dotson, 2013; of the Padmasambhava legend in Cantwell & Mayer, 2008).

The epic of King Gesar shoul the context of Tibetan Buddhist situated between oral and writt it is traditionally recited by ba relatively recent written versio the epic features the adventures the king Gesar, he is at the sam a Buddhist ruler who conquers dues the demons for the welfar (for a detailed analysis, see Stein overview, see Samuel, 1996).

The narrative traditions of Tib exuberant, blending indigeno ments, and have been transmit turies in various mediums that such as written composition, o performance. This article has the most important literature earlier period (mostly pre-15th examples for its reception in necessarily finds its limitations written sources, which are the presumably smaller part of the dition of storytelling in Tibet.

Bibliography

Primary Sources

Bka' gdams glegs bam, vol. I: Jo bo rj thar bka' gdams pha chos, vol.

u, 1995, 16–17), as for example those e anthology Bya dang ri dwags kyi dactic Tales on Animal and Bird W23796). Two fairly well-known genre of bird stories are the Mgrin togs brjod (Avadāna of [the Bird eck Moon; TBRC W1KG5397) by o bzang bstan pa'i rgyal mtshan chuh, 1981, 23–38) and the Bya chos ba (Jewel Garland of the Dharma s; TBRC W23796, vol. 1; see Conze, miniscent of South Asian didactic as the Kuṇālajātaka (Pali jātaka 970).

elling has preserved Buddhist narmedia and performative contexts.
nasteries have wall paintings of indi-d jātaka cycles. Ma ṇi pas (itinerant to retell Buddhist legends with the crolls (on "picture recitation" in a spective, see Mair, 1988). A smaller as were adapted as theatre plays metimes called "Tibetan opera"), ons of which are called rnam thar
]), a term also used for life stories in ge of articles, see Tashi Tsering & 2001).

jātaka and avadāna type were ined with biographies (rnam thar) uddhist teachers, forming narra-evious, present, and sometimes of the subject. But the relationship and biographical literature goes even when the previous lives are all, Tibetan biographies of Bud-lay officials may be designated as gs [par] brjod [pa]; e.g. the biogra-the ruler of Tibet in the first half of RC W7734). In Tibetan literature, corpus of life writing (rnam thar, lated types) is an important nar-elf, which cannot be dealt with in e it to mention the life stories of pular Buddhist saints: the hagi-nasambhava (see Vostrikov, 1970, 4; Cantwell & Mayer, 2013) and o, 1989; Roberts, 2010; Quintman, s have undergone various redacgs, leading to narrative formats ven plots and novelistic traits. at could arguably be included rrative in the wider sense is raphy (chos 'byung; see Vostrikov, 1970; van der Kuijp, 1996a; Martin, 1997). Tibetan biographical and historical writings are at the very core of the Tibetan Buddhist traditions; possibly originally inspired by Chinese traditions of historiography and life writing, they have developed into vast and truly Tibetan genres of literature.

It should also be mentioned here that (quasi-)biographical and (quasi-)historical narrative can be embedded in ritual settings. Since pre-Buddhist times, Tibetan societies have had a tradition of ritual "antecedent tales" (Tib. smrang, rabs, or lo rgyus), narratives about the origin of a specific ritual, relating by whom and under what circumstances it was performed in ancient times. These antecedent tales had to be recited during the performance of the ritual in order to render it effective. It has been shown that this genre of antecedent tales was also adapted for various Buddhist contexts (on antecedent tales in funeral rites, see Dotson, 2013; on the emergence of the Padmasambhava legend in ritual contexts, see Cantwell & Mayer, 2008).

The epic of King Gesar should be mentioned in the context of Tibetan Buddhist narrative too. It is situated between oral and written literature since it is traditionally recited by bards, but there are relatively recent written versions as well. Although the epic features the adventures and heroic feats of the king Gesar, he is at the same time portrayed as a Buddhist ruler who conquers the world and subdues the demons for the welfare of sentient beings (for a detailed analysis, see Stein, 1959; for a concise overview, see Samuel, 1996).

The narrative traditions of Tibet are manifold and exuberant, blending indigenous and foreign elements, and have been transmitted through the centuries in various mediums that inspire one another, such as written composition, oral storytelling, and performance. This article has tried to introduce the most important literature with a focus on the earlier period (mostly pre-15th cent.), giving a few examples for its reception in more recent times. It necessarily finds its limitations in the restriction to written sources, which are the more accessible but presumably smaller part of the vast and vibrant tradition of storytelling in Tibet.

Bibliography

Primary Sources

Bka' gdams glegs bam, vol. I: Jo bo rje dpal ldan a ti sha'i rnam thar bka' gdams pha chos, vol. II: 'Brom ston rgyal ba'i 'byung gnas kyo skyes rabs bka' gdams bu chos, Xining, 1993 (for a partial English trans., see Thupten Jinpa, 2008).

Bka' gdams kyi man ngag be'u bum sngon po'i rtsa 'grel (Be'u bum sngon po) by Dol pa Shes rab rgya mtsho (also known as Rog Dmar zhur ba), Beijing, 1991.

Bya dang ri dwags kyi rtogs brjod: Tibetan Didactic Tales on Animal and Bird Themes, 2 vols., ed. by Damchoe Sangpo, Dalhousie, 1978–1979.

Byang chub lam gyi rim pa'i sgo nas rang sems dge sbyor la 'dzug pa'i man ngag rin chen snying po by Skyu ra yongs 'dzin Byams pa khun khyab, ed. Guru Deva, 3 vols., Delhi, 1977.

Dam chos dgongs pa gcig pa'i 'grel chen sngang mdzad ye shes sgron me by Rdo rje shes rab, publ. Drikung Kagyu Institute, Dehradun, 1990.

Dam chos thub pa lnga'i sngon 'gro'i skabs kyi gtam rgyud rgyu 'bras la yid ches bskyed byed by Lo ras pa Grags pa dbang phyug, in: Smad 'brug bstan pa'i mnga' bdag rgyal ba lo ras pa grags pa dbang phyug mchog gi gsung 'bum rin po che, vol. III, Kathmandu, 2002, 1–292.

Dge ldan legs bshad by (Paṇ chen) Bsod nams grags pa (incl. the commentary by Dbyangs can dga' ba'i blo gros, Mkhas dang blun po brtag pa'i bstan bcos dge ldan legs bshad padma dkar po'i chun po'i 'grel pa nyi ma'i 'od zer), Lhasa, 2000.

Dpe chos dang dpe chos rin chen spungs pa by Po to ba Rin chen gsal, Beijing, 1991.

'Dul ba gleng 'bum (Legs par gsungs pa'i dam pa'i chos 'dul ba'i gleng gzhi dang rtogs pa brjod pa lung sde bzhi kun las btus pa rin po che'i mdzod) by Dge 'dun grub, Delhi, 1970.

'Dul ba pha'i gleng 'bum chen mo by Bu ston Rin chen grub, in: L. Chandra, ed., The Collected Works of Bu-ston, part 23, New Delhi, 1971.

Gsung rab rin chen bang mdzod: A 'Bri-gung dkar-brgyud-pa Collection of Stories Illustrating the Essential Teachings of Buddhist Practice from the Various Canonical Sources by Dpal chen Chos kyi ye shes, ed. by Nawang Topgay, New Delhi, 1981.

Gtam rgyud rin chen phreng mdzes by 'Gro mgon Dpal ldan ye shes, in: Po to ba Rin chen gsal, Dpe chos dang dpe chos rin chen spungs pa, Beijing, 1991, 355–501.

Lam rim chen mo by Tsong kha pa Blo bzang grags pa; ET: The Great Treatise on the Stages of the Path to Enlightenment, publ. Lamrim Chenmo Translation Committee, 3 vols., Ithaca, 2000–2002.

Lam rim rnam grol lag bcangs by Pha bong ka pa Bde chen snying po (also known as Byams pa bstan 'dzin 'phrin las rgya mtsho); ET: M. Richards, Liberation in the Palm of your Hand, Boston, 1997.

Legs par bshad pa rin po che'i gter dang 'grel pa bzhugs so by Sa skya paṇḍita Kun dga' rgyal mtshan & Dmar ston chos kyi rgyal po, Lhasa, 1982.

Mdo las byung ba'i gtam rgyud sna tshogs by Zhe chen 'Gyur med padma rnam rgyal, Xining, 1992.

Mdo sde me tog gsil ma: A Book of Stories of the Early Bka'-gdams-pa Tradition by Dpal mdzes rgyal mtshan, ed. Topden Tsering, Delhi, 1978.

Skyes rabs brgya pa (Sangs rgyas bcom ldan 'das kyi skyes rabs brgya ba) by Āryaśūra & Karma pa Rang byung rdo rje, Beijing, 1995.

Secondary Literature

Balk, M., Untersuchungen zum Udānavarga. Unter Berücksichtigung mittelindischer Parallelen und eines tibetischen Kommentars, Marburg, 2011.

Baruch, W., "Le cinquante-deuxième chapitre du mJaṅs-blun (Sūtra du sage et du fou)," JA 243, 1955, 339–366.

Bollée, W.B., Kuṇālajātaka: Being an Edition and Translation, London, 1970.

Bon brgya dge legs lhun grub rgya mtsho, Shin'ichi Tsumagari, Musashi Tachikawa & Yasuhiko Nagano, eds., Bonpo Thangkas from Rebkong, Osaka, 2011.

Cantwell, C., & R. Mayer, "The Mythologisation of Padmasambhava in Post-Imperial Tibet," in: C. Cüppers, R. Mayer & M. Walter, eds., Tibet after Empire: Culture, Society and Religion between 850–1000, Lumbini, 2013, 19–50.

Cantwell, C., & R. Mayer, "Enduring Myths: Smrang, Rabs and Ritual in the Dunhuang Texts on Padmasambhava," in: F. Pommaret & J.-L. Achard, eds., Tibetan Studies in Honor of Samten Karmay, RET 15, November 2008, 289–312.

Chavannes, É., Cinq cents contes et apologues extraits du tripiṭaka chinois et traduits en français, 4 vols., Paris, 1910–1934.

Conze, E., trans., The Buddha's Law among the Birds, Oxford, 1955; repr. 1974.

Dalton, J., "The Early Development of the Padmasambhava Legend in Tibet: A Study of IOL Tib J 644 and Pelliot tibétain 307," JAOS 124/4, 2004, 759–772.

Damdinsüren, T., "A Brief Review of Tibetan and Mongolian Stories from the Pañcatantra," AOH 36, 1982, 95–98.

Damdinsüren, T., & A. Tsendina, eds., Tibetskij sbornik rasskazov iz "pančatantra", Ulan Bator, 1983.

Dimitrov, D., Mārgavibhāga. Die Unterscheidung der Stilarten, Marburg, 2002.

Dotson, B., "The Dead and Their Stories: Preliminary Remarks on the Place of Narrative in Tibetan Religion," in: C. Cüppers, R. Mayer & M. Walter, eds., Tibet after Empire: Culture, Society and Religion between 850–1000, Lumbini, 2013, 51–83.

Eimer, H., Sa skya legs bshad. Die Strophen zur Lebensklugheit von Sa skya Paṇḍita Kun dga' rgyal mtshan (1182–1251), nach vierzehn tibetischen Textzeugen herausgegeben, Vienna, 2014.

Eimer, H., "Die Episode über die sechs Irrlehrer aus dem Rab tu 'byung ba'i gzhi in einer tibetischen Kurzfassung," in: P. Maurer & P. Schwieger, eds., Tibetstudien. Festschrift für Dieter Schuh zum 65. Geburtstag, Bonn, 2007, 43–53.

Ëndon, D., Skazočnye sûžety v pamâtnikah tibetskoj i mongol'skoj literatur, Moscow, 1989.

Feer, L., "Le Karma-Çataka," JA 9/7, 1901, 53–100, 257–315, 410–486.

Haarh, E., The Yar-luṅ Dynasty: A Study with Particular Regard to the Contribution by Myths and Legends to the History of Ancient Tibet and the Origin and Nature of Its Kings, Copenhagen, 1969.

Hahn, M., Poetical Vision of the Buddha 's Former Lives: Seventeen Legends from Haribhaṭṭa's Jātakamālā, Delhi, 2011.

Hahn, M., Haribhaṭṭa in Nepal: Ten Legends from His Jātakamālā and the Anonymous Śākyasiṃhajātaka, Tokyo, 2007.

Hahn, M., "Śaṃkarasvāmin's Devatāvimarśastuti," in: C. Chojnacki, J.-U. Hartmann & V.M. Tschannerl, eds., Vividharatnakaraṇḍaka: Festgabe für Adelheid Mette, Swisttal-Odendorf, 2000, 313–330.

Hahn, M., "Notes on Buddhist Sanskrit Literature: Chronology and Related Topics," in: E. Mayeda, ed., Studies in Original Buddhism and Mahāyāna Buddhism in Commemoration of Late Professor Dr. Fumimaro Watanabe, 2 vols, Kyoto, 1993, 31–58.

Hahn, M., Haribhaṭṭa and Gopadatta: Two Authors in the Succession of Āryaśūra: On the Rediscovery of Parts of Their Jātakamālās, Tokyo, ^{2}1992.

Hahn, M.,Joy for the World: A Buddhist Play by Candragomin, Berkeley, 1987.

Hahn, M., "Die indischen Nītiśāstras im tibetischen Tanjur," ZDMG Suppl. 6, 1985, 227–237.

Hahn, M., "Kumāralāta's Kalpanāmaṇḍitikā Dṛṣṭāntapaṅkti. Nr. 1 Die Vorzüglichkeit des Buddha," ZS 16, 1983, 309–336.

Hanisch, A., Āryaśūra's Jātakamālā. Philologische Untersuchungen zu den Legenden 1 bis 15, 2 vols., Marburg, 2005.

Herrmann, S., Die tibetische Version des Papageienbuches, Sankt Augustin, 1983.

Hermanns, M., Himmelsstier und Gletscherlöwe. Mythen, Sagen und Fabeln aus Tibet, Eisenach, 1955.

Ho, Chiew Hui, "Tales of the Diamond Sutra: Buddhism on the Ground in Medieval China," diss., Stanford University, 2013.

Jong, J.W. de, The Story of Rāma in Tibet: Text and Translation of the Tun-huang Manuscripts, Stuttgart, 1989.

Karmay, S.G., The Arrow and the Spindle: Studies in History, Myths, Rituals and Beliefs in Tibet, vol. III, Kathmandu, 2014.

Khamaganova, E., "Sbornik 'Dragocennye četki' i ego mesto v srednevekovoj tibetskoj literature," Mongolica 4, 1998, 48–52.

Kirde, S., "Bibliographie zur Bodhisattvāvadānakalpalatā des Kṣemendra," in: D. Dimitrov et al., eds., Śikhisamuccayaḥ: Indian and Tibetan Studies, Vienna, 2002, 109–128.

Kuijp, L. van der, "Die tibetische Literatur," in: G. Ehlers et al., eds., Neues Handbuch der Literaturwissenschaft 24: Süd- und zentralasiatische Literaturen, Wiebelsheim, 2002, 115–132.

Kuijp, L. van der, "Tibetan Historiography," in: J.I. Cabezón & R.R. Jackson, eds., Tibetan Literature: Studies in Genre, Ithaca, 1996a, 39–56.

Kuijp, L. van der, "Tibetan Belles-Lettres: The Influence of Daṇḍin and Kṣemendra," in: J.I. Cabezón & R.R. Jackson, eds., Tibetan Literature: Studies in Genre, Ithaca, 1996b, 393–410.

Kuijp, L. van der, "Review of Dge-ldan legs-bshad by Bsod-nams Grags-pa," JAOS 106, 1986, 617–621.

Lörincz, L., "Les recueils Ro-sgruṅ tibétains contenant 21 contes," AOH 21/3, 1968, 317–337.

Lörincz, L., "Les 'Contes du Cadavre ensorcelé' (Ro-sgruṅ) dans la littérature et le folklore tibétains," AOH 18/3, 1965, 305–316.

Macdonald, A.W., Matériaux pour l 'étude de la littérature populaire tibétaine, vols. I–II, Paris, 1967, 1972.

Mair, V.H., Painting and Performance: Chinese Picture Recitation and Its Indian Genesis, Honolulu, 1988.

ṃkarasvāmin's Devatāvimarśastuti," in: J.-U. Hartmann & V.M. Tschannerl, eds., araṇḍaka: Festgabe für Adelheid Mette, lorf, 2000, 313–330.

on Buddhist Sanskrit Literature: Chronol- ed Topics," in: E. Mayeda, ed., Studies in ism and Mahāyāna Buddhism in Commem- Professor Dr. Fumimaro Watanabe, 2 vols., -58.

ṭṭa and Gopadatta: Two Authors in the Suc- śūra: On the Rediscovery of Parts of Their okyo, ²1992.

he World: A Buddhist Play by Candragomin, lischen Nītiśāstras im tibetischen Tanjur," 1985, 227–237.

alāta's Kalpanāmaṇḍitikā Dṛṣṭāntapaṅkti. lichkeit des Buddha," ZS 16, 1983, 309–336.

aśūra's Jātakamālā. Philologische Unter- en Legenden 1 bis 15, 2 vols., Marburg, 2005.

tibetische Version des Papageienbuches, 1983.

immelsstier und Gletscherlöwe. Mythen, n aus Tibet, Eisenach, 1955.

ales of the Diamond Sutra: Buddhism on ledieval China," diss., Stanford University, tory of Rāma in Tibet: Text and Translation Manuscripts, Stuttgart, 1989.

Arrow and the Spindle: Studies in History, nd Beliefs in Tibet, vol. III, Kathmandu, Sbornik 'Dragocennye četki' i ego mesto v etskoj literature," Mongolica 4, 1998, 48–52.

phie zur Bodhisattvāvadānakalpalatā des D. Dimitrov et al., eds., Śikhisamuccayaḥ: an Studies, Vienna, 2002, 109–128.

ie tibetische Literatur," in: G. Ehlers et al., dbuch der Literaturwissenschaft 24: Süd- tische Literaturen, Wiebelsheim, 2002, Tibetan Historiography," in: J.I. Cabezón eds., Tibetan Literature: Studies in Genre, -56.

Tibetan Belles-Lettres: The Influence of mendra," in: J.I. Cabezón & R.R. Jackson, erature: Studies in Genre, Ithaca, 1996b, eils Ro-sgruṅ tibétains contenant 21 con- 68, 317–337.

"Review of Dge-ldan legs-bshad by -pa," JAOS 106, 1986, 617–621.

ontes du Cadavre ensorcelé' (Ro-sgruṅ) et le folklore tibétains," AOH 18/3, 1965, latériaux pour l 'étude de la littérature e, vols. I–II, Paris, 1967, 1972.

and Performance: Chinese Picture Recita- Genesis, Honolulu, 1988.

Martin, D., Tibetan Histories: A Bibliography of Tibetan-Language Historical Works, London, 1997.

Miller, A.S., "Jeweled Dialogues: The Role of 'The Book' in the Formation of the Kadam Tradition within Tibet,"diss., University of Virginia, 2004.

Namkhai Norbu, Drung, Deu and Bön: Narrations, Symbolic Languages and the Bön Tradition in Ancient Tibet, ed. & trans. (from Tibetan into Italian) A. Clemente, trans. (from Italian into English) A. Lukianowicz, New Delhi, 1995.

Panglung, J., Die Erzählstoffe des Mūlasarvāstivāda-Vinaya analysiert auf Grund der tibetischen Übersetzung, Tokyo, 1981.

Quintman, A., The Yogin and the Madman: Reading the Biographical Corpus of Tibet's Great Saint Milarepa, New York, 2014.

Riva, R., "The Tales of the Bewitched Corpse: A Literary Journey from India to China," in: A. Cadonna, ed., India, Tibet, China: Genesis and Aspects of Traditional Narrative, Florence, 1999, 229–256.

Roberts, P.A., "The Biographies of Milarepa and Rechungpa," in: L. Covill, U. Roesler & S. Shaw, eds., Lives Lived, Lives Imagined: Biography in the Buddhist Traditions, Boston, 2010, 181–203.

Roesler, U., Frühe Quellen zum buddhistischen Stufenweg in Tibet. Indische und tibetische Traditionen im dPe chos des Po-to-ba Rin-chen-gsal, Wiesbaden, 2011.

Roesler, U., "Materialien zur Redaktionsgeschichte des mDzaṅs blun. Die Selbstaufopferung des Prinzen Sujāta," in: K. Klaus & J.-U. Hartmann, eds., Indica et Tibetica. Festschrift für Michael Hahn, Vienna, 2007, 405–422.

Roesler, U., "The Great Indian Epics in the Version of Dmar ston Chos kyi rgyal po," in: H. Blezer, ed., Religion and Secular Culture in Tibet, Leiden, 2002, 431–450.

Samuel, G., "The Gesar Epic of East Tibet," in: J.I. Cabezón & R.R. Jackson, eds., Tibetan Literature: Studies in Genre, Ithaca, 1996, 358–367.

Sangye Tenzin, Menri Lobpon, The Twelve Deeds: A Brief Life Story of Tonpa Shenrab, the Founder of the Bon Religion, Dharamsala, 1995.

Schaik, S. van, & L. Doney, "The Prayer, the Priest, and the Tsenpo: An Early Buddhist Narrative from Dunhuang," JIABS 30, 2009, 175–217.

Schneider, J., Eine buddhistische Kritik der indischen Götter. Śaṃkarasvāmins Devātiśayastotra mit Prajñāvarmans Kommentar, Vienna, 2014.

Schneider, J., Der Lobpreis der Vorzüglichkeit des Buddha. Udbhaṭasiddhasvāmins Viśeṣastava mit Prajñāvarmans Kommentar nach dem tibetischen Tanjur herausgegeben und übersetzt, Bonn, 1993.

Schuh, D., Tibetische Handschriften und Blockdrucke, Teil 8 (Sammlung Waddell der Staatsbibliothek Preußischer Kulturbesitz), Wiesbaden, 1981.

Schuh, D., Tibetische Handschriften und Blockdrucke sowie Tonbandaufnahmen tibetischer Erzählungen, Wiesbaden, 1973.

Seyfort Ruegg, D., "Remarks on the Place of Narrative in the Buddhist Literatures of India and Tibet," in: A. Cadonna, ed., India, Tibet, China: Genesis and Aspects of Traditional Narrative, Florence, 1999, 193–227.

Seyfort Ruegg, D., Ordre spirituel et ordre temporel dans la pensée bouddhique de l'Inde et du Tibet, Paris, 1995.

Stein, R.A., Recherches sur l'épopée et le barde au Tibet, Paris, 1959.

Steiner, R., Untersuchungen zu Harṣadevas Nāgānanda und zum indischen Schauspiel, Swisttal-Odendorf, 1997.

Takakusu, J., "Tales of the Wise Man and the Fool, in Tibetan and Chinese," JRAS 33, 1901, 447–460.

Tashi Tsering & I. Henrion-Dourcy, "The Singing Mask: Echoes of Tibetan Opera," Lungta 15, Dharamsala, 2001.

Thupten Jinpa, trans., The Book of Kadam: The Core Texts, Boston, 2008 (partial trans. of Bka' gdams glegs bam).

Tiso, F.V., "A Study of the Buddhist Saint in Relation to the Biographical Tradition of Milarepa," diss., Columbia University, 1989.

Tropper, K., Die Jātaka-Inschriften im skor lam chen mo des Klosters Zha lu. Einführung, textkritische Studie, Edition der Paneele 1–8 mit Sanskritparallelen und deutscher Übersetzung, Vienna, 2005.

Tucci, G., Tibetan Painted Scrolls, 3 vols., Rome, 1949.

Vostrikov, A.I., Tibetan Historical Literature, Calcutta, 1970.

Warder, A.K., Indian Kāvya Literature, vol. VI, Delhi, 1992.

Websites

Tibetan Buddhist Resource Center, tbrc.org.

ULRIKE ROESLER

Buddhist Narrative Literature in China

In addition to the masses of stories in the vast ocean of Buddhist literature that were translated into Chinese, narrative literature intended to propagate Buddhism was also composed in Chinese. In addition, Chinese popular literature was inspired by the forms, ideas, and images of Buddhist literature. The Buddhist doctrine of "skillful means" (Chn. fangbian [方便]; Skt. upāya) – adapting the level of discourse to the aptitude of the audience – encouraged the creation of narratives dealing with various aspects of Buddhist teaching.

Indian Buddhist narratives had been translated into Chinese beginning in the 2nd century CE. Among these were biographies of Gautama Buddha and didactic stories on the working of karmic law: jātakas (birth stories; Chn. bensheng [本生]) – stories relating the Gautama's earlier existences – and avadānas (parables; Chn. yinyuan [因緣]) about the deeds of bodhisattvas and other Buddhist figures. Many of the themes of these stories originated in India's oral literature. A representative collection of such stories is the Liudu ji jing (六度集經; Collected Scripture of the Six Perfections; T. 152), which was translated by the Sogdian monk Kang Senghui (康僧會; 3rd cent. CE). Though apparently based on original Indian sources, it is also to a considerable extent a composition by the monk himself (trans. Chavannes, 1910–1911, 1934). One large collection of Buddhist tales, constituting various parables, is the Baiyu jing (百喻經; Canonical Scripture of a Hundred Parables; T. 209) attributed to the Indian monk Saṃghasena (5th cent. CE) and translated into Chinese by his disciple Guṇavṛddhi, who lived in southern China, in 492 CE. It is known for its high literary quality (Lo, 2006). Another very influential collection of stories included in the Buddhist canon is the Xianyu jing (賢愚經; Sūtra of the Wise and the Foolish; T 202), which consists of tales collected by Chinese monks in the Central Asian city of Khotan in 445 CE (Mair, 1993).

Narrative fragments also appeared in predominantly non-narrative works of Buddhism. For example, scriptures of the sūtra type, especially popular in China, such as the Saddharmapuṇḍarīkasūtra (Miaofa lianhua jing [妙法蓮華經]; Lotus Sūtra of the Wonderful Law; T. 262) and the Vimalakīrtinirdeśa (Weimojie jing [維摩詰經]; T. 474), contain many parables and tales intended to propagate their teachings. The Larger Prajñāpāramitā commentary known as Da zhidu lun (大智度論; Mahāprajñāpāramitopadeśa; T. 1509), attributed to Nāgārjuna, contains a wealth of jātakas, avadānas, and so on (Lamotte, 1944–1980). The tales included in the Da zhidu lun have been collected and translated by Saigusa Mitsuyoshi and Watanabe Shōgo (1973).

Furthermore, when Buddhist monks preached the doctrine to the Chinese, they often resorted to the tales about retribution that were inserted into long religious services. This situation is described in the Buddhist biographical work Gaoseng zhuan (高僧傳; Lives of Eminent Monks; T. 2059) by the monk Huijiao (慧皎; 497–554 CE), which refers to the early period of the spread of Buddhism among the native populations of China. This work notes that the sermons were given in the middle of the night, when the audience was exhausted with the monotonous chanting of ritual texts and the invocation of the Buddha's names, and that they included explications of major Buddhist ideas, religious practices, and the structure of the universe (heaven and hell). These notions were illustrated in the exemplary stories, called jātakas and avadānas in this text, which were certainly related to the above-mentioned Buddhist written genres (T. 2059 [L] 417c). Huijiao described the effect of these sermons on the audience of Buddhist believers (including both clerics and lay persons) in the following words:

> [W]hen the preacher speaks about impermanence, he makes heart and body shiver with fear; if he speaks about hell, tears of anxiety gush forth in streams. If he points out earlier karma, it is as if one clearly sees one's deeds from the past; if he predicts future consequences, he manifests coming retribution. If he talks about the joys [of the Pure Land], his audience feels happy and elated; if he discourses on the sufferings [of hell], their eyes are filled with tears. (T. 2059 [L] 418a4–7)

Thus, stories illustrating major Buddhist notions functioned in both a scriptural and a performative

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

(liturgical and storytelling) setting devices.

Before going on to a discussion of Buddhist narratives in China, we great influence of Buddhist narrati the development of Chinese literat the following aspects:

1. Many topics, ideas, and ter scriptures and their popular retelli porated into Chinese literature, incl ated by authors who were highly er Chinese (e.g. Sun Changwu, 2007 Hong, 2007; Liu Huiqing, 2013);

2. The Chinese translations of tures and sermons based thereon elements of vernacular language lated the development of vernacula the 8th to the 13th centuries, inclu fiction and musical drama; and

3. Buddhist texts, such as sūtras lar explanations, were written in p (alternation of prose sections with ent forms), which was then borrov vernacular literature, including th ous storytelling genres.

Two main categories of nar were created by Buddhist monks ers in China: (1) miracle tales, m Chinese, and (2) long prosimetr semi-vernacular language.

Early miracle tales, though of monastic settings, were mostly crea of lay believers and were written authors (Campany, 2012, 2, 31). I narratives that originated in Buddh transcriptions of oral performance or by lay entertainers. Nevertheles were generally despised by Confuc formed the majority of literate ind tional China; therefore, individual tions were often dismissed and los centuries. Some, however, were re ning in 1900 in the form of manusc the sealed library of the Dunhuan Gansu province of northwestern Zhongmin et al., 1957; Kanaoka Sh Zheng & Zhang Yongquan, 1997; Xihou, 2000), and others later on i ies in Japan (e.g. Makita Tairyō, 19 in China

維摩詰經]; T. 474), contain many les intended to propagate their Larger Prajñāpāramitā com-as Da zhidu lun (大智度論; mitopadeśa; T. 1509), attributed to ins a wealth of jātakas, avadānas, tte, 1944–1980). The tales included un have been collected and trans-Mitsuyoshi and Watanabe Shōgo when Buddhist monks preached he Chinese, they often resorted to etribution that were inserted into rvices. This situation is described biographical work Gaoseng zhuan Eminent Monks; T. 2059) by the 皎; 497–554 CE), which refers to of the spread of Buddhism among ations of China. This work notes were given in the middle of the audience was exhausted with chanting of ritual texts and the Buddha's names, and that they ions of major Buddhist ideas, reli-nd the structure of the universe . These notions were illustrated in ries, called jātakas and avadānas h were certainly related to the Buddhist written genres (T. 2059 described the effect of these ser-nce of Buddhist believers (includ-nd lay persons) in the following > acher speaks about imperma> heart and body shiver with fear; > t hell, tears of anxiety gush forth > points out earlier karma, it is as > s one's deeds from the past; if he > onsequences, he manifests com-> f he talks about the joys [of the > udience feels happy and elated; if > the sufferings [of hell], their eyes > rs. (T. 2059 [L] 418a4–7) trating major Buddhist notions a scriptural and a performative

(liturgical and storytelling) setting as explanatory devices.

Before going on to a discussion of major genres of Buddhist narratives in China, we should note the great influence of Buddhist narrative literature on the development of Chinese literature, revealed in the following aspects:

1. Many topics, ideas, and terms of Buddhist scriptures and their popular retellings were incorporated into Chinese literature, including those created by authors who were highly erudite in Classical Chinese (e.g. Sun Changwu, 2007, 197–202; Chen Hong, 2007; Liu Huiqing, 2013);
2. The Chinese translations of Buddhist scriptures and sermons based thereon often contained elements of vernacular language and thus stimulated the development of vernacular literature from the 8th to the 13th centuries, including traditional fiction and musical drama; and
3. Buddhist texts, such as sūtras and their popular explanations, were written in prosimetric form (alternation of prose sections with poetry of different forms), which was then borrowed into Chinese vernacular literature, including the novel and various storytelling genres.

Two main categories of narrative literature were created by Buddhist monks and lay believers in China: (1) miracle tales, mostly in Classical Chinese, and (2) long prosimetric narratives in semi-vernacular language.

Early miracle tales, though often referring to monastic settings, were mostly created in the milieu of lay believers and were written down by literati authors (Campany, 2012, 2, 31). Long prosimetric narratives that originated in Buddhist sermons were transcriptions of oral performances either by monks or by lay entertainers. Nevertheless, both categories were generally despised by Confucian scholars, who formed the majority of literate individuals in traditional China; therefore, individual texts and collections were often dismissed and lost in the course of centuries. Some, however, were rediscovered beginning in 1900 in the form of manuscripts preserved in the sealed library of the Dunhuang cave temples in Gansu province of northwestern China (e.g. Wang Zhongmin et al., 1957; Kanaoka Shōhn, 1971; Huang Zheng & Zhang Yongquan, 1997; Mair, 1983; Zhang Xihou, 2000), and others later on in monastic libraries in Japan (e.g. Makita Tairyō, 1970).

Miracle Tales

Miracle tales (lingyan [靈驗], yingyan [應驗], or ganying [感應]; lit. miraculous responses), written down from the 4th century onward, are records of miraculous events that "testify for" the power of Buddhist deities, monks, and nuns and the efficacy of Buddhist devotional practices, as well as illustrate the veracity of Buddhist claims and warn of the consequences of violating Buddhist norms. Most scholars, especially scholars from China, consider them to be a subset of the genre of "tales of anomalies" (zhiguai [志怪]) that has indigenous Chinese roots and also developed during the period of the Northern and Southern Dynasties (420–589 CE) (Liu Jianguo, 2004, 579–600; Campany, 2012, 17). Both were quite similar in terms of formal characteristics and language (Campany, 2012, 29). Even those scholars who insist on a clear distinction between these two types of stories agree that a considerable number of the later zhiguai (5th–6th cents.) were influenced by Buddhist ideas, topics, and motifs (Zhang Zhenjun, 2014, 82–147, 226). Despite disagreement on the literary qualities of these tales (traditionally they were presented as a type of historical record), they were of paramount importance for the development of later fiction in China. Miracle tales present Buddhist concepts transplanted to Chinese soil and illustrated through the personal experience of local people; thus they represent the Chinese adaptation of Buddhism to a lay audience (Campany, 2012, 31–36).

Such Buddhist tales of the supernatural are mainly of three kinds:

1. accounts of miraculous responses to the pleas of believers who found themselves in trouble (usually about the help rendered by the almighty bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara; Chn. Guan[shi]yin [觀(世)音] or Guangshiyin [光世音]);
2. examples of piety and sincere belief; and
3. remarkable deeds of monks and laymen who possessed particular spiritual powers.

The earliest known collection of stories about the miraculous responses of Avalokiteśvara was Xie Fu's (謝敷) Guangshiyin yingyan ji (光世音應驗記; Accounts of Miracles by Avalokiteśvara), which was soon lost but, reconstructed from memory, became the basis of the Guangshiyin yingyan ji (光世音應驗記) compiled by Fu Liang (傅亮; 374–426 CE) in 399 CE (Dong Zhiqiao, 2002, 2). The latter had long been lost in China also, but a manuscript copy was discovered in Japan in 1943. Following research by Japanese scholars, it was edited and published (e.g., Makita Tairyō 1970; Dong Zhiqiao, 2002, 1–27). These collections have been quite extensively studied by scholars in several countries (e.g. Rice, 2008; Zuo, 2008). Other well-known collections of this type compiled during the period of the Northern and Southern dynasties include the following:

> the Xuanyan ji (宣験記; Records in Proclamation of Manifestations) by Liu Yiqing (劉義慶; 403–444 CE; Liu Jianguo, 2004, 586–590); the Xu Guangshiyin yingyan ji (續光世音應驗記; Further Accounts of Miracles by Avalokiteśvara) by Zhang Yan (張演; early 5th cent. CE; Dong Zhiqiao, 2002, 28–56); the Xi Guanshiyin yingyan ji (繫觀世音應驗記; Continued Accounts of Miracles by Avalokiteśvara) by Lu Gao (陸杲; 459–532 CE; Dong Zhiqiao, 2002, 57–207); the Mingxiang ji (冥祥記; Accounts of Mysterious Revelations) by Wang Yan (王琰; c. 500 CE), which, with 131 tales, is the largest of these collections (Liu Jianguo, 2004, 590–596; Campany, 2012, 63–260); and the Jingyi ji (旌異記; Citations of Marvels) by Hou Bo (侯白; late 6th cent.; Liu Jianguo, 2004, 602–605).

There were also miracle tales related to the most popular Buddhist sūtras; the rich narrative tradition related to the Diamond Sūtra is the most notable in this respect (Ho, 2013). These tales about miracles constitute an immense corpus of Buddhist literature in China; they have been continuously composed up through later times (see e.g. Gjertson, 1989, for a study and translation of the Mingbao ji [冥報記; Records of Miraculous Retribution] of Tang Lin [唐臨; 600–? CE]).

Prosimetric Narratives

Sūtra Explanation Texts and Karmic Tales

From such early sources as the Gaoseng zhuan we learn that there were itinerant monks who preached Buddhism to the laity and who often used exemplary tales as a means of proselytizing (known as shuo fa [說法] or changdao [唱導]; lit. sing and lead), called changdaoshi (唱導師; instructors in faith) during the Northern and Southern dynasties. The Gaoseng zhuan has a whole section devoted to these monks-proselytizers (T. 2059 [L] 415c–418a). During the Tang dynasty (618–907 CE), oral Buddhist preaching for the laity was usually called sujiang (俗講; lectures for the laity). These lectures on the Buddhist scriptures were quite popular in the capitals of the Tang state and were even sponsored by the imperial court, at least before the persecution of Buddhism in 845 CE, as is attested by several historical sources, for example, the diary of the Japanese pilgrim Ennin (圓仁; 793/794–864 CE), the Nittō guhō junrei gyōki (入唐求法巡禮行記; Record of Pilgrimage to Tang China in Search of the Law; Ennin, 2007; Reischauer, 1955a; 1955b). Lectures for the laity were given on festival days and were also performed at the request of believers who paid for this service in conjunction with Buddhist rituals (e.g. Reischauer 1955a, 150–156). The written versions of these sermons apparently are jiangjing wen (講經文; sūtra explanation texts), as found in Dunhuang. They were used to explain the contents of the most popular Buddhist scriptures, to a broader audience. Examples of this genre are the Miaofa lianhua jing jiangjing wen (妙法蓮華經講經文; Explanation Text of the Lotus Sūtra of the Wondrous Law), the Weimojie jing jiangjing wen (維摩詰經講經文; Explanation Text of the Vimalakīrtinirdeśa), the Jingang boruo boluomi jing jiangjing wen (金剛般若波羅蜜經講經文; Explanation Text of the Diamond Sūtra), and others (Huang Zheng & Zhang Yongquan, 1997, 706–750, 751–923, 635–666). The complete transcripts of the Buddhist lectures demonstrate that they consisted of quotations from a certain sūtra followed by long explanations in both prose and verse passages. Lectures were conducted by two persons: a dharma master (fashi [法師]), who explained the contents of the sūtra, and a cantor (dujiang [都講]), who sang the title and text passages of the sūtra (Sun Kaidi, 1956; Mair, 2013). This division of roles apparently originated in the Buddhist explanation of sūtras of the earlier period (Fukui Fumimasa, 1973; Tang Yongtong, 2000). The explanation of sūtras was preceded by the short introit in verses called yazuo wen (押座文; seat-settling text; Mair 1989; 29).

There is another genre of literature similar to the jiangjing wen, usually called yuanqi (緣起; or yinyuan [因緣]; tales of conditioned origin), which continues the canonical tradition of Buddhist parables (avadānas; Schmid, 2002, 122–123). These describe the workings of karma in a biographical context, and apparently were performed at the same religious assemblies as the lectures on sūtras. The texts that represent the genre of yuanqi were also found only in Dunhuang, the most important being Mulian yuanqi (目連緣起; Circumstances of Mulian), dealing with the story of Buddha's disciple Mulian (Mahāmaudgalyāyana) rescuing the soul of his mother from hell, and Chou nü yuanqi (醜女緣起; Circumstances of the Ugly Girl), telling a story of karmic retribution (Schmid, 2002, 163–228).

Their use of canonical subject matte ric form make them quite different f prose miracle tales composed in Chi further argues that yuanqi should b from "records of circumstances o [因緣記]), also discovered among manuscripts, that concern the li monks and represent the blend of ographies and narratives of kar (Schmid, 2002, 124–127).

Transformation Texts and Thei

Another important narrative liter in Buddhist traditions is the bianw formation text), which was popular ods of the Tang and Five Dynasties disappeared in the early Song dyr Transformation texts had been lo turies before they were discove Dunhuang manuscripts and publi scholars in the mid-20th century ( et al., 1957). They were written i guage and prosimetric style.

The term "transformation" (Ch titles is related to the Buddhist meaning supernatural manifes nirmāṇa, transformation; prātihā manifestation, etc.; Mair, 1989, 68-ifestations" originally stood for formed by Buddhist deities and m the term was applied to the perfo preachers and storytellers, who tate these effects while narrating The extant transformation tex to be connected to the oral p zhuanbian (轉變; presentation tions), which involved showing the story being narrated (Mair, 1 scroll used in these performanc as manuscripts that directly me refer to the pictures, were also huang (Mair, 1989, 99–100).

Many East Asian scholars mation texts to be a further d above-mentioned sujiang traditi has argued that transformation the Indian tradition of picture spread to Asia and ultimately to reaching China from Central A context, this type of pictorial st to the practices of visualizing bu tvas, together with the recitatio ourt, at least before the persecuin 845 CE, as is attested by sev-rces, for example, the diary of the nnin (圓仁; 793/794–864 CE), the gyōki (入唐求法巡禮行記; Record ang China in Search of the Law; hauer, 1955a; 1955b). Lectures for en on festival days and were also request of believers who paid for unction with Buddhist rituals (e.g.

150–156). The written versions of arently are jiangjing wen (講經文; texts), as found in Dunhuang. explain the contents of the most scriptures, to a broader audience. genre are the Miaofa lianhua jing 蓮華經講經文; Explanation Text f the Wondrous Law), the Weimo- n (維摩詰經講經文; Explanation akīrtinirdeśa), the Jingang boruo jing wen (金剛般若波羅蜜經講 Text of the Diamond Sūtra), and ng & Zhang Yongquan, 1997, 706– 666). The complete transcripts of ures demonstrate that they cons from a certain sūtra followed by in both prose and verse passages. ducted by two persons: a dharma ]), who explained the contents antor (dujiang [都講]), who sang assages of the sūtra (Sun Kaidi, his division of roles apparently Buddhist explanation of sūtras d (Fukui Fumimasa, 1973; Tang he explanation of sūtras was preintroit in verses called yazuo wen ng text; Mair 1989, 29).
r genre of literature similar to usually called yuanqi (緣起; or es of conditioned origin), which nonical tradition of Buddhist s; Schmid, 2002, 122–123). These ings of karma in a biographiparently were performed at the mblies as the lectures on sūtras. esent the genre of yuanqi were Dunhuang, the most important nqi (目連緣起; Circumstances with the story of Buddha's disāmaudgalyāyana) rescuing the from hell, and Chou nü yuanqi stances of the Ugly Girl), telling a ibution (Schmid, 2002, 163–228).

Their use of canonical subject matter and prosimetric form make them quite different from the mostly prose miracle tales composed in China. D.N. Schmid further argues that yuanqi should be distinguished from "records of circumstances of…" (yinyuanji [因緣記]), also discovered among the Dunhuang manuscripts, that concern the lives of Chinese monks and represent the blend of Buddhist hagiographies and narratives of karmic retribution (Schmid, 2002, 124–127).

Transformation Texts and Their Legacy

Another important narrative literary genre rooted in Buddhist traditions is the bianwen (變文; transformation text), which was popular during the periods of the Tang and Five Dynasties (907–960 CE) but disappeared in the early Song dynasty (960–1279). Transformation texts had been lost for many centuries before they were discovered among the Dunhuang manuscripts and published by Chinese scholars in the mid-20th century (Wang Zhongmin et al., 1957). They were written in vernacular language and prosimetric style.

The term "transformation" (Chn. bian) in their titles is related to the Buddhist technical terms meaning supernatural manifestation (e.g. Skt. nirmāṇa, transformation; prātihārya and virkurvita, manifestation, etc.; Mair, 1989, 68–69). These "manifestations" originally stood for the miracles performed by Buddhist deities and monks; by extension the term was applied to the performing practices of preachers and storytellers, who often tried to imitate these effects while narrating miraculous events. The extant transformation texts are considered to be connected to the oral performance called zhuanbian (轉變; presentation of transformations), which involved showing images related to the story being narrated (Mair, 1989, 107). A picture scroll used in these performances (P 4524), as well as manuscripts that directly mention or indirectly refer to the pictures, were also discovered at Dunhuang (Mair, 1989, 99–100).

Many East Asian scholars consider transformation texts to be a further development of the above-mentioned sujiang tradition. V.H. Mair (1988) has argued that transformation texts evolved out of the Indian tradition of picture storytelling, which spread to Asia and ultimately to Europe, apparently reaching China from Central Asia. In the Buddhist context, this type of pictorial storytelling is related to the practices of visualizing buddhas and bodhisattvas, together with the recitation of their names, as well as the painting of pictures showing heavens and hells. These pictures are called bianxiang (變相; transformation tableaux) in China and thus have a parallel relationship to the genre of transformation texts.

According to the strict (narrow) definition of bianwen offered by V.H. Mair (1989, 26–27), based on the original generic titles and specific formal characteristics of the texts, there are only 7 to 12 extant transformation texts. Furthermore, there appear to be two types of these texts: the first uses subject matter borrowed from the Buddhist scriptures, most notably the Xiangmo bianwen (降魔變文; Transformation Text on the Subduing of Demons) and Damujianlian mingjian jiumu bianwen (大目犍連冥間救母變文; Transformation Text on Mahāmaudgalyāyana's Rescue of His Mother from the Underworld; the second type narrates secular (historical) stories, such as Wang Zhaojun bianwen (王昭君變文; Transformation Text on Wang Zhaojun) and Zhang Yichao bianwen (張義潮變文; Transformation Text on Zhang Yichao). V.H. Mair has also argued for the necessity of a distinction between sujiang (lectures for laity) and transformation texts (Mair, 1989, 29), between which Chinese scholars usually did not distinguish (Wang Zhongmin et al., 1957; Huang Zheng & Zhang Yongquan, 1997). As several historical records demonstrate, the former category was the preserve of monks, whereas the latter was performed by professional entertainers, apparently similar to the storytellers known from later Chinese writings (Mair, 1989, 149–170). The transformation texts' treatment of secular subjects also reveals the lay affiliation of their performers.

Although transformation texts were no longer being performed by the early 11th century, the tradition of oral Buddhist narratives continued. Several sources of the 12th–13th centuries mention a type of storytelling of Buddhist subject matter called tan jing (談經; discourse on scriptures) or shuo jing (說經; telling scriptures), which was performed in the capitals by lay entertainers rather than ordained Buddhist monks. "Telling scriptures," often in a humorous fashion, was one of the performing arts of the entertainment quarters (Průšek, 1938). The long prosimetric narrative (discovered in Japan in the 20th cent.) called Datang Sanzang qu jing shihua (大唐三藏取經詩話; Story with Verses about Monk Tripiṭaka of the Great Tang Fetching Sūtras; alternative title: Datang Sanzang fashi qu jing ji [大唐三藏法師取經記]), whose author is unknown, perhaps dates back to the 13th century and is related to this oral storytelling on Buddhist themes (Li Shiren & Cai Jinghao, 1997). On the one hand, it is based on the historical story of the Chinese monk Xuanzang (玄奘; 602–664 CE), who traveled to India in search of new Buddhist texts, as narrated in the Datang xiyu ji (大唐西域記, T. 2087; Accounts of the Western Regions under the Great Tang), written down by his disciple Bianji (辯機) in 646 CE – though it adds many fantastic fictional details. On the other hand, it can be regarded as an antecedent of the famous fantastic novel Xiyou ji (西游記; Journey to the West), attributed to a scholar named Wu Cheng'en (吳承恩; 1501–1582; Dudbridge, 1970).

Precious Scrolls

During the Yuan (1260–1368) period, another genre of popular religious narratives appeared in China: baojuan (寶卷; precious scrolls). These also are prosimetric texts in vernacular language. Scholars still debate the origin of this literary form and especially its relation to the Tang transformation texts. Although the form of later 18th–19th centuries precious scrolls resembles that of transformation texts, the earliest examples of this genre are rather closer to the monastic tradition of scripture explanation than to entertaining storytelling. The form and content of the early precious scrolls follow those of Xiaoshi Jingang jing keyi (銷釋金剛經科儀; Liturgy Based on the Diamond Sūtra with Full Explication; c. 1242) by the monk Zongjing (宗鏡), which closely resembles sūtra explanation texts discovered in Dunhuang (Wang Jianchuan & Lin Wanchuan, vol. I, 1999, 1–62). It is considered to be an antecedent of the later precious scrolls that imitated the form of the Buddhist scriptures (Sawada Mizuho, 1975, 29, 101; Overmyer, 1999, 34–38; Che Xilun, 2009, 66–72). The earliest known example of narrative precious scrolls, the Mulian jiumu chuli diyu shengtian baojuan (目連救母出離地獄生天寶卷; Precious Scroll on Mulian Rescuing His Mother [and Helping Her] to Escape from Hell and Be Born in Heaven; two incomplete manuscripts are dated to 1372 and 1440), deals with the same topic as the Damujianlian mingjian jiumu bianwen. However, the details of the story in this precious scroll are closer to the ones in the later apocryphal Buddhist scripture (c. 13th cent.) than to those of transformation texts (Berezkin, 2013a).

From the 16th century onward, precious scrolls were used as a form of writing by religious leaders who founded their own teachings. These teachings often represent specific interpretations of Buddhist doctrine, notably the ideas of the Chan and Pure Land schools. Among the early examples of these sectarian precious scrolls is the Wubu liuce (五部六冊; Five Books in Six Volumes) by Patriarch Luo or Luo Qing (羅清; 1442–1527), the founder of Wuwei jiao (無爲教; Teaching of Non-Activism), first printed in 1509 (Pu Wenqi, vol. CI, 2005, 97–534). Numerous precious scrolls that date back to the 16th-18th centuries are filled with Buddhist imagery, terms, and ideas, although many religious beliefs and practices that they propagate are unknown in mainstream Buddhism (Sawada Mizuho, 1975, 34–38; Overmyer, 1999; ter Haar, 2014).

However, sectarian precious scrolls existed alongside narratives on more mainstream Buddhist themes that were not necessarily related to sectarian teachings. An example of such a precious scroll, which still remains popular in China, is the Xiangshan baojuan (香山寶卷; Precious Scroll of Incense Mountain; c. 14th–15th cent.). It tells the story of the female incarnation of Bodhisattva Guanshiyin as Princess Miaoshan (妙善; "Marvelous Goodness"), who overcame many obstacles on her path of spiritual realization (Dudbridge, 2004; Idema, 2008). The early recension of this text (printed c. 16th-17th cents.) was transmitted to Vietnam, so the earliest extant edition is that reprinted in Hanoi in 1772 on a royal order (Berezkin & Riftin, 2013). This text is typical of precious scrolls, many of which tell stories of the spiritual self-cultivation of Buddhist women. Other early examples of such texts include the Huang shi nü baojuan (黃氏女寶卷; Precious Scroll on Lady Huang; the 16th-cent. recension is included in part in the famous novel Jin Ping Mei cihua [金瓶梅詞話; Plum Flowers in the Golden Vase with Lyrics]; before 1617) and the Liu Xiang nü baojuan (劉香女寶卷; Precious Scroll on Woman Liu Xiang; earliest ed. is dated 1774; Grant, 1989; Overmyer, 1985; Grant & Idema, 2011). These precious scrolls were in high demand by female believers, who constituted the majority of the audience of precious-scrolls performances.

Precious scrolls were recited at religious assemblies by Buddhist monks and nuns, as well as by lay specialists (including sectarian masters), and this performance art became known as xuanjuan (宣卷; scroll recitation). The peculiar feature of these performances is the use for recitation of manuscripts and printed copies. From early descriptions we know that in the 16th–17th centuries, such performances took place in believers' homes and in temples (Che Xilun, 2009, 130–139). Usually the event started in the evening and lasted the whole nig recitation of precious scrolls started ers burned incense and prayed to va deities. Women in the audience cha dha's name in unison after each rhy sung by the performers.

By the early 19th century, most p performance traditions had lost th with sectarian teachings (Johnson, time, such performances had bec popular in the Jiangsu, Zhejiang, Sha provinces. These texts are perfor rural areas even now and are rec Chinese state as part of its "intangib tage" (Bender, 2001; Berezkin, 2011; & Mair, 2014). Nowadays, they inclu traditional Buddhist narratives, su phies of Gautama Buddha, Bodhisat Mulian, Bodhisattva Dizang (Skt. K the monk Xuanzang (Duan Ping, Hong, 2007; Wang Xiang, 2007; Ya
Many precious scrolls of the late pe lar stories often borrowed from nov works. However, these entertainin appear in a religious context: they from the point of view of Buddhist karma and have a didactic function

Buddhist Narrative Subjec Chinese Fiction and Dram

Buddhist narrative subjects also app vernacular fiction and drama of period. The most famous example on a Buddhist narrative is the Xiyou ji (Journey to the West), Xuanzang's traveling experiences. and ideas also feature in other such as Fengshen yanyi (封神演 the Gods) by Xu Zhonglin (許仲 Nanyou ji (南游記; Journey to the to Yu Xiangdou (余象斗; late 16 beld, 2014; von Glahn, 2004, 213–2 late 16th and early 17th centuries, appeared dedicated to particular including Guanyin, the Chan harma (Chn. Damo [達摩]), and t Jigong (濟公; "Crazy Ji"; 1133–12 8–19).

The story of Mulian rescuin adapted for dramatic performan ly the ideas of the Chan and Pure Among the early examples of these us scrolls is the Wubu liuce (五部六 in Six Volumes) by Patriarch Luo or ; 1442–1527), the founder of Wuwei Teaching of Non-Activism), first (Pu Wenqi, vol. CI, 2005, 97–534). ious scrolls that date back to the ies are filled with Buddhist imagery, s, although many religious beliefs hat they propagate are unknown Buddhism (Sawada Mizuho, 1975, r, 1999; ter Haar, 2014). ctarian precious scrolls existed tives on more mainstream Bud-at were not necessarily related to ngs. An example of such a precious ll remains popular in China, is the uan (香山寶卷; Precious Scroll of ain; c. 14th–15th cent.). It tells the le incarnation of Bodhisattva Guans Miaoshan (妙善; "Marvelous Good-came many obstacles on her path of ion (Dudbridge, 2004; Idema, 2008). sion of this text (printed c. 16th– ransmitted to Vietnam, so the earli-n is that reprinted in Hanoi in 1772 (Berezkin & Riftin, 2013). This text is us scrolls, many of which tell stories elf-cultivation of Buddhist women. mples of such texts include the ojuan (黃氏女寶卷; Precious Scroll he 16th-cent. recension is included mous novel Jin Ping Mei cihua [金 Flowers in the Golden Vase with 17) and the Liu Xiang nü baojuan cious Scroll on Woman Liu Xiang; d 1774; Grant, 1989; Overmyer, 1985; 011). These precious scrolls were in female believers, who constituted the audience of precious-scrolls ls were recited at religious assem-monks and nuns, as well as by lay ding sectarian masters), and this became known as xuanjuan (宣卷; The peculiar feature of these peruse for recitation of manuscripts

s. From early descriptions we know 17th centuries, such performances evers' homes and in temples (Che 139). Usually the event started in the evening and lasted the whole night. Before the recitation of precious scrolls started, the performers burned incense and prayed to various Buddhist deities. Women in the audience chanted the Buddha's name in unison after each rhymed verse line sung by the performers.

---

By the early 19th century, most precious-scrolls performance traditions had lost their connection with sectarian teachings (Johnson, 1994). At that time, such performances had become especially popular in the Jiangsu, Zhejiang, Shanxi, and Gansu provinces. These texts are performed in several rural areas even now and are recognized by the Chinese state as part of its "intangible cultural heritage" (Bender, 2001; Berezkin, 2011; 2013b; Berezkin & Mair, 2014). Nowadays, they include retellings of traditional Buddhist narratives, such as hagiographies of Gautama Buddha, Bodhisattva Guanshiyin, Mulian, Bodhisattva Dizang (Skt. Kṣitigarbha), and the monk Xuanzang (Duan Ping, 1992–1994; You Hong, 2007; Wang Xiang, 2007; Yao Linrong, 2011). Many precious scrolls of the late period adapt secular stories often borrowed from novels and dramatic works. However, these entertaining stories usually appear in a religious context: they are interpreted from the point of view of Buddhist teachings about karma and have a didactic function.

Buddhist Narrative Subjects in Chinese Fiction and Drama

Buddhist narrative subjects also appeared in Chinese vernacular fiction and drama of the late imperial period. The most famous example of a novel based on a Buddhist narrative is the above-mentioned Xiyou ji (Journey to the West), which describes Xuanzang's traveling experiences. Buddhist images and ideas also feature in other fantastic novels, such as Fengshen yanyi (封神演義; Investiture of the Gods) by Xu Zhonglin (許仲琳; 16th cent.) and Nanyou ji (南游記; Journey to the South), ascribed to Yu Xiangdou (余象斗; late 16th cent.; Meulenbeld, 2014; von Glahn, 2004, 213–221). Besides, in the late 16th and early 17th centuries, vernacular novels appeared dedicated to particular Buddhist deities, including Guanyin, the Chan patriarch Bodhidharma (Chn. Damo [達摩]), and the eccentric monk Jigong (濟公; "Crazy Ji"; 1133–1209; Shahar, 1998, 8–19).

The story of Mulian rescuing his mother was adapted for dramatic performances as early as the 12th century; however, the earliest extant recension of the Mulian drama is the didactic Xinbian Mulian jiumu quanshan xiwen (新編目連救母勸善戲文; Newly Compiled Drama Exhorting Goodness of Mulian Rescuing His Mother) by Zheng Zhizhen (鄭之珍; 1518–1595), which dates back to 1582 (Guo, 2005). The stories of Miaoshan, Liu Xiang, and Lady Huang that were used in precious scrolls also were adopted for dramatic pieces around the late 16th and early 17th centuries (Dudbridge, 2004, 73–79; Che Xilun, 2009, 125–126; Grant 1989, 236–237). The Mulian story is still used in the ritual theatrical performances (usually related to funerary or memorial services) in the modern period, along with several indigenous Buddhist subjects of quite early origin (10th–12th cents.), such as Tang Emperor Taizong's (598–649 CE) journey to hell (which can be found in the Dunhuang materials) and the stories of Lady Huang and Miaoshan. These dramatic pieces still appear during popular Buddhist and Daoist events of the Han and other ethnic groups in various areas of southern China, including Guangdong, Fujian, Yunnan, and Taiwan (Johnson, 1989; Wang Kui, 2010; Yang Shixian, 2011).

Bibliography

Bender, M., "A Description of 'Jiangjing' (Telling Scriptures) Services in Jingjiang, China," AFS 60/1, 2001, 101–133.

Berezkin, R., "A Rare Early Manuscript of the Mulian Story in the Baojuan (Precious Scroll) Genre Preserved in Russia and Its Place in the History of the Genre," CJ 32/2, 2013a, 109–131.

Berezkin, R., "On the Survival of Traditional Ritualized Performance Art in Modern China: A Case of Telling Scriptures by Yu Dingjun in the Shanghu Town Area of Changshu City in Jiangsu Province, MQ 181, 2013b, 103–156.

Berezkin, R., "Scripture Telling (jiangjing) in the Zhangjiagang Area and the History of Chinese Storytelling," AM 24/1, 2011, 1–42.

Berezkin, R., & V.H. Mair, "The Precious Scroll on Bodhisattva Guanshiyin from Jingjiang and Confucian Morality," JCR 42/1, 2014, 1–27.

Berezkin, R., & B.L. Riftin, "The Earliest Known Edition of The Precious Scroll of the Incense Mountain and the Connections between Precious Scrolls and Buddhist Preaching," TP 99/4–5, 2013, 445–499.

Campany, R.F., Signs from the Unseen Realm: Buddhist Miracle Tales from Early Modern China, Honolulu, 2012.

Chavannes, É., Cinq cents contes et apologues extraits du Tripiṭaka chinoise, 4 vols., Paris, 1910–1911, 1934.

Che Xilun (車錫倫), Zhongguo baojuan yanjiu (中國寶卷研究; Research on Chinese Baojuan), Guilin, 2009.

Chen Hong (陳洪), Fojiao yu zhonggu xiaoshuo (佛教與中古小說; Buddhism and Early Medieval Fiction), Shanghai, 2007.

Dong Zhiqiao (董志翹), "Guanshiyin yingyan ji san zhong" yizhu (『觀世音應驗記三種』譯注; Three Collections of Guanshiyin Miracle Tales with Explanations and Comments), Nanjing, 2002.

Duan Ping (段平), Hexi baojuan xuan (河西寶卷選; Selected Baojuan from Hexi), 6 vols., Taipei, 1992–1994.

Dudbridge, G., The Legend of Miao-shan, New York, rev. ed. 2004.

Dudbridge, G., The Hsi-yu chi: A Study of Antecedents to the Sixteenth-Century Chinese Novel, Cambridge MA, 1970.

Ennin (圓仁), Nittō guhō junrei gyōki kichū (入唐求法巡禮行記校注; The Record of a Pilgrimage to Tang [China] in Search of the Law, Collated and Annotated), Shijiazhuang, 2007.

Fukui Fumimasa (福井文雅), "Tokō no shokunō to kizen: Chūgoku-Indo kōshō no setten" (都講の職能と起源: 中国·インド交渉の接点; On the Duties and Origins of Dujiang: The Point of Cultural Interaction between India and China), in: Kushida Hakushi shōju kinen: kōsōden no kenkyū (櫛田博士頌寿記念: 高僧傳の研究; Festschrift for Dr. Kushida Ryōkō: Studies of Lives of Eminent Monks), Tokyo, 1973, 795–822.

Gjertson, D.E., Miraculous Retribution: A Study and Translation of T'ang Lin's Ming-pao chi, Berkeley, 1989.

Glahn, R. von, The Sinister Way: The Divine and the Demonic in Chinese Religious Culture, Berkeley, 2004.

Grant, B., "The Spiritual Saga of Woman Huang: From Pollution to Purification," in: D. Johnson, ed., Ritual Opera, Operatic Ritual: "Mu-lien Rescues His Mother" in Chinese Popular Culture: Papers from the International Workshop on the Mu-lien Operas, Berkeley, 1989, 224–311.

Grant, B., & W.L. Idema, trans., Escape from Blood Pond Hell: The Tales of Mulian and Woman Huang, Seattle, 2011.

Guo Qitao, Ritual Opera and Mercantile Lineage: The Confucian Transformation of Popular Culture in Late Imperial Huizhou, Stanford, 2005.

Haar, B. ter, Practicing Scripture: A Lay Buddhist Movement in Late Imperial China, Honolulu, 2014.

Ho, C.H., "Tales of the Diamond Sutra: Buddhism on the Ground in Medieval China," diss., Stanford University, 2013.

Huang Zheng (黄征) & Zhang Yongquan (張涌泉), eds., Dunhuang bianwen jiaozhu (敦煌變文校注; Dunhuang Transformation Texts Edited and Annotated), Beijing, 1997.

Idema, W.L., Personal Salvation and Filial Piety: Two Baojuan Narratives of Guanyin and Her Acolytes, Honolulu, 2008.

Johnson, D., "Mu-lien in Pao-chuan: The Performative Context and Religious Meaning of the You-ming pao-chüan," in: D. Johnson, ed., Ritual and Scripture in Chinese Popular Religion: Five Studies, Berkeley, 1994, 55–103.

Johnson, D., Ritual Opera, Operatic Ritual: "Mu-lien Rescues His Mother" in: Chinese Popular Culture: Papers from the International Workshop on the Mulien Operas, Berkeley, 1989.

Kanaoka Shōkō (金岡照光), Tonkō no bungaku (敦煌の文学), Tokyo, 1971.

Lamotte, É., Le Traité de la Grande Vertu de Sagesse de Ne Traité (Mahāprajñāpāramitāśāstra), vols. I–V, Louvain, 1944–1980.

Li Shiren (李時人) & Cai Jinghao (蔡鏡浩), eds., Da Tang Sanzang qu jing shihua jiaozhu (大唐三藏取經詩話校注; Story with Verses about Monk Tripiṭaka of the Great Tang Fetching Sūtras), Beijing, 1997.

Liu Huiqing (劉惠卿), Fojing wenxue yu liuchao xiaoshuo muti (佛經文學與六朝小說母題; Buddhist Literature and Motifs in Fiction of the Six Dynasties), Beijing, 2013.

Liu Jianguo (劉劍國), Tang qian zhiguai xiaoshuo shi (唐前志怪小說史; History of the tales of anomalies before the Tang dynasty), Beijing, 2004.

Lo, Y.K., "The Drama of Numskulls: Structure, Texture, and Functions of the Scripture of One Hundred Parables," EMC 12, 2006, 69–90.

Mair, V.H., "Chiang-Ching Wen: Oral and Written Aspects of Chinese Sūtra Lectures" in: V.H. Mair, China and Beyond: A Collection of Essays, Amherst, 2013, 93–120.

Mair, V.H., "The Linguistic and Textual Antecedents of the Sūtra of the Wise and the Foolish," SPP 38, 1993, 1–95.

Mair, V.H., T'ang Transformation Texts: A Study of the Buddhist Contribution to the Rise of Vernacular Fiction and Drama in China, Cambridge MA, 1989.

Mair, V.H., Painting and Performance: Chinese Picture Recitation and Its Indian Genesis, Honolulu, 1988.

Mair, V.H., Tun-huang Popular Narratives, Cambridge UK 1983.

Makita Tairyō (牧田諦亮), Rokuchō kōitsu Kanzeon ōkenki no kenkyū (六朝古逸觀世音應驗記の研究; Study of Lost Ancient Miracle Stories of Guanshiyin of the Six Dynasties Period), Kyoto, 1970.

Meulenbeld, M., Demonic Warfare: Daoism, Territorial Networks, and the History of a Ming Novel, Honolulu, 2014.

Ochiai Toshinori, The Manuscripts of Nanatsu-dera: A Recently Discovered Treasure-House in Downtown Nagoya, Kyoto, 1991.

Overmyer, D.L., Precious Volumes: An Introduction to Chinese Scriptures from the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries, Cambridge MA, 1999.

Overmyer, D.L., "Values in Chinese Sectarian Literature: Ming and Ch'ing Pao-chüan," in: D. Johnson et al., eds. Popular Culture in Late Imperial China, Berkeley, 1985, 219–254.

Průšek, J., "The Narrators of Buddhist Scriptures and Religious Tales in the Song Period," ArchOr 10/3, 1938, 375–384.

Pu Wenqi (濮文起), Minjian baojuan (民間寶卷; Folk Baojuan), in: Zhongguo zongjiao lishi wenxian jicheng (中國宗教歷史文獻集成; Collection of Scriptures of Chinese Religions), vols. CI-CXX, Hefei, 2005.

Reischauer, E.O., Ennin's Diary: The Record of a Pilgrimage to China in Search of the Law, New York, 1955a.

Reischauer, E.O., Ennin's Travels in T'ang China, New York, 1955b.

Rice, J., "Records of Witness of Responses of Guan(g)shiyin in Three Collections: Image, Icon, and Text," SPP 182, 2008, 4–24.

Saigusa Mitsuyoshi (三枝充悳) & Watanabe Shōgo (渡辺章悟), Daichidoron no monogatari (大智度論の物語; Stories of Mahāprajñāpāramitāśāstra), 3 vols., Tokyo, 1973.

Sawada Mizuho (澤田瑞穗), Zōho hōkan no kenkyū (增補寶卷の研究; A Study of Baojuan), Tokyo, 1975.

Schmid, D.N., "Yuanqi: Medieval Buddhis Dunhuang," diss., University of Pennsylv

Shahar, M., Crazy Ji: Chinese Religion and Cambridge MA, 1998.

Sun Changwu (孫昌武), Fojiao yu Zhonggu 中國文學; Buddhism and Chinese Lite rev. ed. 2007.

Sun Kaidi (孫開第), Sujiang, shuohua yu b 講、說話與白話小說; Lectures for Lai and Short Stories in Vernacular), Beijin

Tang Yongtong (湯用彤), "Han Jin jiangji 晉講經與注經; Recitation and Comm during the Han and Jin Dynasties), quan ji (湯用彤全集; Complete works Shijiazhuang, 2000.

Wang Jianchuan (王見川) & Lin Wanch
Ming Qing minjian zongjiao jingjuan 宗教經卷文獻; Scriptures of Folk Reli Qing Periods), 12 vols., Taipei, 1999.

Wang Kui (王馗), Guijie chaodu yu qua 節超度與勸善目連; Salvation of the Didactic Mulian), Taipei, 2010.

Wang Xiang (王翔), et al., ed., Zhonggu (中國河陽寶卷集; Collection of Heyang in China), 2 vols., Shanghai, 2 k Cai Jinghao (蔡鏡浩), eds., Da Tang ihua jiaozhu (大唐三藏取經詩話校注; bout Monk Tripiṭaka of the Great Tang eijing, 1997.

), Fojing wenxue yu liuchao xiaoshuo 與六朝小說母題; Buddhist Literature on of the Six Dynasties), Beijing, 2013.
, Tang qian zhiguai xiaoshuo shi (唐前 ry of the tales of anomalies before the
ing, 2004.
of Numskulls: Structure, Texture, and ripture of One Hundred Parables," EMC hing Wen: Oral and Written Aspects of ures" in: V.H. Mair, China and Beyond:

ys, Amherst, 2013, 93–120. uistic and Textual Antecedents of the d the Foolish," SPP 38, 1993, 1–95. nsformation Texts: A Study of the Bud-to the Rise of Vernacular Fiction and mbridge MA, 1989.
d Performance: Chinese Picture Recita-Genesis, Honolulu, 1988.
g Popular Narratives, Cambridge UK,

諦亮), Rokuchō kōitsu Kanzeon ōkenki 逸觀世音應驗記の研究; Study of Lost ries of Guanshiyin of the Six Dynasties
.
onic Warfare: Daoism, Territorial Net-ry of a Ming Novel, Honolulu, 2014.
e Manuscripts of Nanatsu-dera: A Treasure-House in Downtown Nagoya, us Volumes: An Introduction to Chinese Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries,

.
es in Chinese Sectarian Literature:
o-chüan," in: D. Johnson et al., eds., Late Imperial China, Berkeley, 1985, ors of Buddhist Scriptures and Reli-ng Period," ArchOr 10/3, 1938, 375–389.

Minjian baojuan (民間寶卷; Folk Bao- zongjiao lishi wenxian jicheng (中國 Collection of Scriptures of Chinese XX, Hefei, 2005.
's Diary: The Record of a Pilgrimage to e Law, New York, 1955a.
's Travels in T'ang China, New York, itness of Responses of Guan(g)shiyin Image, Icon, and Text," SPP 182, 2008,

枝充悳) & Watanabe Shōgo (渡辺章 monogatari (大智度論の物語; Stories mitāśāstra), 3 vols., Tokyo, 1973.
瑞穗), Zōho hōkan no kenkyū (増補寶 f Baojuan), Tokyo, 1975.

Schmid, D.N., "Yuanqi: Medieval Buddhist Narratives from Dunhuang," diss., University of Pennsylvania, 2002.

Shahar, M., Crazy Ji: Chinese Religion and Popular Literature, Cambridge MA, 1998.

Sun Changwu (孫昌武), Fojiao yu Zhongguo wenxue (佛教與中國文學; Buddhism and Chinese Literature), Shanghai, rev. ed. 2007.

Sun Kaidi (孫開第), Sujiang, shuohua yu baihua xiaoshuo (俗講・說話與白話小說; Lectures for Laity, Oral Narratives and Short Stories in Vernacular), Beijing, 1956.

Tang Yongtong (湯用彤), "Han Jin jiangjing yu zhujing" (漢晉講經與注經; Recitation and Commenting on Sūtras during the Han and Jin Dynasties), in: Tang Yongtong quan ji (湯用彤全集; Complete works of Tang Yongtong), Shijiazhuang, 2000.

Wang Jianchuan (王見川) & Lin Wanchuan (林萬傳), eds., Ming Qing minjian zongjiao jingjuan wenxian (明清民間宗教經卷文獻; Scriptures of Folk Religions of Ming and Qing Periods), 12 vols., Taipei, 1999.

Wang Kui (王馗), Guijie chaodu yu quan shan Mulian (鬼節超度與勸善目連; Salvation of the Ghost Festival and Didactic Mulian), Taipei, 2010.

Wang Xiang (王翔), et al., ed., Zhongguo Heyang baojuan ji (中國河陽寶卷集; Collection of Baojuan [Texts] of Heyang in China), 2 vols., Shanghai, 2007.

Wang Zhongmin (王重民) et al., eds., Dunhuang bianwen ji (敦煌變文集; Collection of Dunhuang Transformation Texts), 2 vols., Beijing, 1957.

Yang Shixian (楊士賢), Taiwan minnan sangli wenhua yu minjian wenxue (台灣閩南喪禮文化與民間文學; Funerary Culture and Folk Literature of the Hokkien People of Taiwan), Taipei, 2011.

Yao Linrong (姚林榮), et al., eds., Zhongguo Shashang baojuan ji (中國沙上寶卷集; Collection of Baojuan from the Sandbank in China), 2 vols., Shanghai, 2011.

You Hong (尤紅) et al., eds., Zhongguo Jingjiang baojuan (中國靖江寶卷; Baojuan from Jingjiang), 2 vols., Nanjing, 2007.

Zhang Xihou (張錫厚), Dunhuang wenxue yuanliu (敦煌文學源流; Origins and Development of Dunhuang Literature), Beijing, 2000.

Zhang Zhenjun, Buddhism and Tales of the Supernatural in Early Medieval China, Leiden, 2014.

Zuo Lala, "A Geographical Study of the Records of the Verifications of the Responses of Guanshiyin in Three Volumes," SPP 182, 2008, 25–54.

VICTOR H. MAIR
ROSTISLAV BEREZKIN

Poetry: South Asia

Traditional Indian terminology does not provide a collective word for hymns and short poetry. They are subsumed under the general category of kāvya, "ornate poetry." Therefore a range has to be defined, and in the present article, short poetry is taken to comprise hymns (stotra, stava, and stuti), letters (lekha), religious talks or sermons (parikathā), instructions (nirdeśa), and songs (gīti). Again, these terms establish no independent genres in Indian literary history, but their traditional Buddhist use allows subsuming a number of works characterized by the use of poetical embellishments (alaṃkāra) under those categories. Sermons and letters are directed toward an explicit addressee, and in this regard, they are closely related to the category of hymns; this provides an additional argument for treating them together. The addressees of *lekha*s, *parikathā*s, and *nirdeśa*s, however, are rather different from those of the *stotra*s. Letters and sermons are directed toward people of the world, toward other unenlightened persons, and they convey religious instruction for the receiver who is in need of being thus instructed. Hymns are, on the contrary, addressed not only to higher beings, foremost to the Buddha himself, but also, depending on school or vehicle, to other manifestations of the enlightened activity, and these beings are beyond any need of instruction. This is not at all meant to say that hymns are without a religious message, but their message is not directed toward the object and does not serve for the instruction of the addressee. The message of a hymn is descriptive, and if there is an educative purpose, then it is directed toward the subject, namely the reciter or reader of the hymn. Usually a stotra describes the appearance and the salvific qualities of its enlightened object, thereby serving the needs of the suffering subject. Since its basic mode is that of devotion, it has the power of generating considerable religious merit (puṇya) in the mind of the person who composes, recites, or copies it.

Different from most other literary genres, hymns, letters, and sermons employ the personal pronouns "I" and "you" for expressing the relation between the author and the addressee. In the sermons, this is much less frequently observed, but in the hymns, this is one of the most significant characteristics. It establishes a direct and very intimate relation between the reciter of a hymn and the object of veneration, be it the Buddha himself or another being of the more advanced stages on the path to liberation. Within the realm of verbal expressions the highest degree of immediacy in the relation to a higher being is probably reached in a hymn. A second distinctive characteristic of the hymns is the frequent use of words of veneration – namas (homage), vande (I venerate), namāmi (I bow down), and so on. Immediacy, veneration, and the recollection of the qualities of the venerated object turn hymns into an ideal means for establishing a personal link between subject and object. Therefore it is not surprising that hymns, different from letters and sermons, became an inherent part of ritual practice. This explains their number, which exceeds by far that of the other two genres, and also explains why hymns continue to be composed and recited in the Buddhist countries of Asia.

The beginnings of hymns, letters, and sermons in Sanskrit and as a category of kāvya lie in the dark. At present there is no indication that such works were composed before the beginning of the Common Era. To be sure, there are earlier Buddhist examples of the use of kāvya style, notably in some of the stanzas included in the Theragāthā (Songs of the Monks), and Therīgāthā (Songs of the Nuns; Lienhard, 1984, 75ff.), fully preserved only in Pali. However, here the features of kāvya are found only in single stanza poems (muktaka). Whether some fragments among the manuscripts in Gandhari are to be understood as *stotra*s or stotra-like works remains to be settled, although certain words may point in this direction (Salomon, 1999, 39). The first Buddhist author known to write kāvya works was Aśvaghoṣa, possibly in the 2nd century CE or slightly earlier. Although it is unlikely that he was without predecessors, nothing is preserved of their work. The genre of hymns as such is much older; the earliest literary document of ancient India, the Ṛgveda, consists mainly of hymns addressed to the various gods of the vedic pantheon (Pinault, 1994). It is difficult to say to what extent this vedic collection served as a model when the Buddhists began their own literary productions. Apparently hymns did not play a prominent part in early Buddhist li there is no distinct category for the arrangements of that literature. T hymn-like texts in the scriptures of e and they have inspired later author not numerous enough to explain the for hymns as a coherent developme such verses are found already in the the scriptures of early Buddhism, and addressed to the Buddha. Often it verse; works consisting of several Well-known are the hymns of the Vāgīśa in the Saṃyuttanikāya/Saṃyu vol. I, 1884, 185–196). Vaṅgīsa/Vāgīśa for his eloquence and inspiratio when it comes to composing verses the Buddha himself, they flash (pr his thoughts. Another well-known Varṇaśata (Hundred Praises), of t Upāli in the Majjhimanikāya/Ma eulogy of the Buddha consisting of thets in eleven stanzas; its title m Mātṛceṭa when he composed his (Praise of the One Worthy of Pr 1987, 54). Apparently younger are t Brahman Nīlabhūti and of the ascet both are contained only in the Bha Vinaya of the Mūlasarvāstivādins 268–280); the latter hymn, howeve similarities with the Selasutta (D Meeting with the Brahman] Sela) i (Andersen & Smith, 1913, 108–110) nects to an old tradition.

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

It is unknown who the first au pose hymns in the ornate style, an to decide which hymn is the olde served works. As usual in ancient most of the works are connected an author, but practically nothin his time and place. In a number of 1987, 34–35), the sources preserv for the same author, most nota whom some sources identify w Aśvaghoṣa. Twice this Mātṛceṭa i the stotrakāra (Hartmann, 2009, of hymns, and this is apparently t
"the stotrakāra par excellence"; h fair number of additional hymns of which may stem from his pen listic criteria are decidedly spuri holds true for many of the poe connected with the famous philo

a

a direct and very intimate relation reciter of a hymn and the object of e it the Buddha himself or another nore advanced stages on the path to thin the realm of verbal expressions, gree of immediacy in the relation to a s probably reached in a hymn. A sec-e characteristic of the hymns is the f words of veneration – namas (homvenerate), namāmi (I bow down), and acy, veneration, and the recollection s of the venerated object turn hymns neans for establishing a personal link ct and object. Therefore it is not surmns, different from letters and ser-an inherent part of ritual practice. their number, which exceeds by far er two genres, and also explains why e to be composed and recited in the tries of Asia.

ngs of hymns, letters, and sermons in a category of kāvya lie in the dark. re is no indication that such works d before the beginning of the Come sure, there are earlier Buddhist use of kāvya style, notably in some included in the Theragāthā (Songs and Therīgāthā (Songs of the Nuns; 75ff.), fully preserved only in Pali. he features of kāvya are found only poems (muktaka). Whether some ng the manuscripts in Gandhari stood as stotras or stotra-like works ettled, although certain words may ection (Salomon, 1999, 39). The first r known to write kāvya works was ibly in the 2nd century CE or slightly h it is unlikely that he was without othing is preserved of their work. nns as such is much older; the earli-ment of ancient India, the Ṛgveda, of hymns addressed to the various pantheon (Pinault, 1994). It is diffit extent this vedic collection served the Buddhists began their own lit-
s. Apparently hymns did not play a prominent part in early Buddhist literature, since there is no distinct category for them in the oldest arrangements of that literature. There are some hymn-like texts in the scriptures of early Buddhism, and they have inspired later authors, but they are not numerous enough to explain the rising fondness for hymns as a coherent development. Examples of such verses are found already in the older strata of the scriptures of early Buddhism, and they are always addressed to the Buddha. Often it is only a single verse; works consisting of several verses are rare. Well-known are the hymns of the monk Vaṅgīsa/Vāgīśa in the Saṃyuttanikāya/Saṃyuktāgama (Feer, vol. I, 1884, 185–196). Vaṅgīsa/Vāgīśa is paradigmatic for his eloquence and inspiration (pratibhāna) when it comes to composing verses: encouraged by the Buddha himself, they flash (pratibhānti) upon his thoughts. Another well-known example is the Varṇaśata (Hundred Praises), of the householder Upāli in the Majjhimanikāya/Madhyamāgama, a eulogy of the Buddha consisting of one hundred epithets in eleven stanzas; its title may have inspired Mātṛceṭa when he composed his Varṇārhavarṇa (Praise of the One Worthy of Praise; Hartmann, 1987, 54). Apparently younger are the hymns of the Brahman Nīlabhūti and of the ascetic Kaineya, since both are contained only in the Bhaiṣajyavastu of the Vinaya of the Mūlasarvāstivādins (Dutt, 1947, 9–14, 268–280); the latter hymn, however, displays certain similarities with the Selasutta (Discourse on [the Meeting with the Brahman] Sela) in the Suttanipāta (Andersen & Smith, 1913, 108–110) and thereby connects to an old tradition.

It is unknown who the first author was to compose hymns in the ornate style, and it is impossible to decide which hymn is the oldest among the preserved works. As usual in ancient Indian literature, most of the works are connected with the name of an author, but practically nothing is known about his time and place. In a number of cases (Hartmann, 1987, 34–35), the sources preserve different names for the same author, most notably for Mātṛceṭa, whom some sources identify with Āryaśūra and Aśvaghoṣa. Twice this Mātṛceṭa is simply quoted as the stotrakāra (Hartmann, 2009, 231), the composer of hymns, and this is apparently to be understood as "the stotrakāra par excellence"; he is credited with a fair number of additional hymns and sermons, some of which may stem from his pen while others by stylistic criteria are decidedly spurious, and the same holds true for many of the poetical compositions connected with the famous philosopher Nāgārjuna.

A number of hymns were considered important enough to become translated into other Buddhist languages, foremost into Chinese and Tibetan but also into some of the less well-known languages of the Buddhist cultures flourishing during the 1st millennium in Central Asia. Fragments have been found of translations, often in the form of bilinguals, into Tocharian, Uighur, and even Khotanese (Chen & Hartmann, forthcoming). The Tibetan translations were collected in a distinct volume of the Tanjur, one of the two parts of the Tibetan canon, and there are good reasons to assume that the redactors of the volume applied the supposed chronology of the authors as one of their ordering principles in arranging the hymns (Schneider, 2014, 16–17). Verification, however, is impossible, and in any case it provides only a relative chronology, since no absolute date is known for any of these authors. Considering such chronological problems and the conflicting ascriptions of authorship, it becomes evident that the authors remain rather shadowy figures despite the great fame attached to some of them.

Some of the hymns were held in high esteem throughout the Indian Buddhist world. For the late 7th century, there is even an eyewitness, the Chinese pilgrim Yijing, who traveled to India during that time; in his travelogue, he reports that all the monks in India, of the "Hīnayāna" and Mahāyāna alike, memorized the two famous hymns of Mātṛceṭa (Hartmann, 1987, 13). He further noted that they could be recited in the full- and new-moon nights when the monks congregated for the confession ceremony (uposatha), a truly atmospheric event as he adds (Hartmann, 1987, 12). This apparent popularity is borne out by the high number of quotations from these two stotras in the commentarial literature. There are no standard citations; on the contrary, a fairly large number of verses are quoted in different contexts and for various purposes (Hartmann, 2009, 230–233). Those quotations reveal another remarkable fact: some of the hymns became not only very popular but also authoritative to such a degree that they could be cited as reference in order to illustrate or confirm certain points of the teachings. Thus, it is not surprising that such hymns themselves were commented on; the volume in the Tibetan Tanjur contains 54 stotras, and for eight of them, it also preserves a commentary.

The manuscript finds outside the Indian subcontinent reveal how much of the Indian Buddhist literature was lost. At the same time, they indicate how Indian works continued to be preserved and used in foreign Buddhist cultures, notably along the ancient Silk Road during the 1st millennium. Indian works were transmitted in their original Sanskrit, they were translated into the local languages, sometimes in the form of bilingual texts in which sections of the original Sanskrit texts alternate with their translations, and they were imitated in indigenous productions, be it in Sanskrit or in local idioms. There are a number of Sanskrit hymns preserved only in Central Asian manuscripts, and in most cases, it is difficult to judge if they were transmitted from India or composed by local scholars and believers (Hartmann, 1997, 286). It is noteworthy that only hymns are attested in the Central Asian manuscripts that have come down to us; so far, not a single fragment of a sermon or a letter has been found. Most likely it was their merit-producing capacity and their function in personal and communal ritual practices that secured the hymns their importance and their omnipresence in the Buddhist world.

Taking the late Indian tradition into consideration, there are literally hundreds of stotras (Pandey, 1994), since the pantheon of tantric Buddhism extensively multiplied the praiseworthy objects and its rituals generated a constant need for devotional texts. Thus an exhaustive treatment proves impossible, and it must suffice to illustrate their wide variety with a few examples. Hymns are always composed in verses, and practically all meters known in kāvya are utilized. While śloka or anuṣṭubh (a verse with four lines of eight syllables each) is the most widespread, there are hymns with verses in varying meters and others that employ only one. A formally extreme example is the Daṇḍakavṛttastotra (Hymn in the Daṇḍaka Meter; Hahn, 1987); this is a highly unusual meter, and the single stanza of this hymn consists of four lines of 318 syllables each. The purpose of glorifying the object invites the application of the formal embellishments (alaṃkāra) taught in poetics, and the well-balanced mixture of meaningful religious content and its beautiful expression surely contributed to the success of the most popular hymns. There is another feature of the earlier hymns addressed to the Buddha that procured them a wide audience, and this is their "nonsectarian" attitude, which made them acceptable for every Buddhist practitioner.

It is impossible to decide if a title goes back to the author or was added later. Sometimes it appears to be culled from a verse in the beginning or end of the work, as in Varṇārhavarṇa 1.1 (yad avarṇārhavarṇā me; "that I [previously uttered] praise on what deserved no praise") and Prasādapratibhodbhava 153 (muniprasādapratibhodbhavasya me; "[this work] of mine which is a product of inspiration due to confidence in the sage"; see below). Sometimes the title derives from the meter, as for the Vasantatilakastava (Hymn in the Vasantatilaka Meter; Schlingloff, 1952, 116), the Sragdharāstotra (Praise in the Sragdharā Meter; Vidyabhushana, 1908), and the Daṇḍakavṛttastotra, and sometimes it is apparently based on the first word of the stotra, as in the Munayastava, which opens with the line munaye lokanāthāya ("[homage] to the sage, the protector of the world"; Schlingloff, 1952, 85–88) or in the Nirvikalpastotra (Praise of the One Free from Imaginations, i.e. Prajñāpāramitāstotra, Praise of the Perfection of Understanding), which begins with nirvikalpe namas tubhyaṃ ("homage to you, free from imaginations"; Hahn, 1988, 58). Another case in point may be the Guṇāparyantastotra (Praise of the One with Unlimited Qualities); its first line is preserved only in Tibetan, but an unpublished brief commentary preserved among the Sanskrit manuscripts in Tibet starts with the words guṇāparyanta iti ("he who disposes of unlimited qualities"). In a few cases, a second title refers to the number of verses, as Śatapañcāśatka ([Hymn] in 150 [Verses]), for the Prasādapratibhodbhava (Hartmann, 1987, 23).

Mātṛceṭa's Varṇārhavarṇa (extant in Sanskrit and Tibetan) consists of 386 stanzas unevenly distributed over 12 chapters (Hartmann, 1987; 2009). As usual we know next to nothing about the floruit of this poet, but he must have lived well before the beginning of the 5th century, when he is quoted in a datable translation into Chinese. His main stylistic device is phonetic repetition, for instance alliteration, but he employs it with restraint. The verses are never artificial, but aesthetically pleasing, and often highly elaborate in their treatment of the subject matter. The Buddha transcends every imagination and can be praised only by describing single qualities (ch. 1). Here also the term bhakti occurs; within Buddhism, hymns offer the appropriate receptacle for this kind of devotional attitude. The second and longest chapter is a continuous homage, since most stanzas are built on the word namas. In the third and fourth chapters, the author praises the Buddha's omniscience (sarvajñatā), powers (bala), and confidences (vaiśāradya), and especially in the fourth, he reveals his mastery when he excerpts a passage from a canonical sūtra and adapts it to his verses. The Buddha's unique speech and teaching are the topics of chapters 5 and 6. In the next, Mātṛceṭa equates central terms of Brahmanism with

Buddhist ones in order to demo Brahmanical concepts in their tr only in Buddhism. Chapters 8 to the many boons that the Bu the world. Some of the specific the Buddha are the subject of c chapter 11, the author singles ou feels closest to, namely the Budd since this transmits the words Sanskrit the word is feminine, a can be personified as a woman queen at the head of all the othe final short chapter serves for i cycle of existence in the hearer or the Buddha is subject to the law

The Prasādapratibhodbhava ( ration due to Confidence [in the Sanskrit, Chinese, and Tibetan later and more mature work o leton Bailey, 1951). In its 153 emphasizes concise wording embellishments only to the ext distract from the religious mes is, as in the Varṇārhavarṇa, th the Buddha, which inspires the apposite images. The Buddha's ful means in helping others are ways, and again there is a won passion (karuṇā) as the compe described as the wife cruel only self since she prompts him to difficult tasks for the benefit of These two hymns of Mātṛc sented in more detail, since th the topics recurring in the o Although the author once refe (Varṇārhavarṇa 8.23), it is imp distinct dogmatic position. Th many other authors, and even occur, the tenor of such a hym of a rather unspecific veneratio does not prefer certain dogmati others. This is somewhat differ famous four hymns forming th 1932; Lindtner, 1982, 121ff.), a Sanskrit and Tibetan, name (Hymn to Him Who Transce Niraupamyastava (Hymn to Hi ble), the Acintyastava (Hymn t and the Paramārthastava (Hy Truth). Like Mātṛceṭa's stotras sentiment of veneration and are highly philosophical, they dapratibhodbhavasya me; "[this ich is a product of inspiration due the sage"; see below). Sometimes om the meter, as for the Vasanta- n in the Vasantatilaka Meter; Sch-), the Sragdharāstotra (Praise in leter; Vidyabhushana, 1908), and stotra, and sometimes it is appar-e first word of the stotra, as in the ich opens with the line munaye omage] to the sage, the protec-Schlingloff, 1952, 85–88) or in the Praise of the One Free from Imagiñāpāramitāstotra, Praise of the derstanding), which begins with tubhyaṃ ("homage to you, free s"; Hahn, 1988, 58). Another case the Guṇāparyantastotra (Praise Unlimited Qualities); its first line in Tibetan, but an unpublished ry preserved among the Sans-in Tibet starts with the words ("he who disposes of unlimited ew cases, a second title refers to rses, as Śatapañcāśatka ([Hymn] for the Prasādapratibhodbhava 23).

ṇārhavarṇa (extant in Sanskrit sists of 386 stanzas unevenly dis-chapters (Hartmann, 1987; 2009).
next to nothing about the floruit e must have lived well before the 5th century, when he is quoted in ion into Chinese. His main stylistic c repetition, for instance alliterays it with restraint. The verses are t aesthetically pleasing, and often in their treatment of the subject ha transcends every imagination d only by describing single qualilso the term bhakti occurs; within s offer the appropriate receptacle devotional attitude. The second ter is a continuous homage, since built on the word namas. In the chapters, the author praises the ience (sarvajñatā), powers (bala), vaiśāradya), and especially in the s his mastery when he excerpts canonical sūtra and adapts it to ddha's unique speech and teach-of chapters 5 and 6. In the next, central terms of Brahmanism with

Buddhist ones in order to demonstrate that those Brahmanical concepts in their true sense are found only in Buddhism. Chapters 8 and 9 are devoted to the many boons that the Buddha has rendered the world. Some of the specific physical marks of the Buddha are the subject of chapter 10, while in chapter 11, the author singles out the mark that he feels closest to, namely the Buddha's tongue (jihvā), since this transmits the words of the Buddha. In Sanskrit the word is feminine, and thus the tongue can be personified as a woman who stands like a queen at the head of all the other bodily marks. The final short chapter serves for instilling fear of the cycle of existence in the hearer or listener, since even the Buddha is subject to the law of impermanence.

The Prasādapratibhodbhava (Production of Inspiration due to Confidence [in the Buddha]; extant in Sanskrit, Chinese, and Tibetan) is considered the later and more mature work of Mātṛceṭa (Shackleton Bailey, 1951). In its 153 stanzas, the author emphasizes concise wording and applies formal embellishments only to the extent that they never distract from the religious message. A main topic is, as in the Varṇārhavarṇa, the indescribability of the Buddha, which inspires the author to multiple apposite images. The Buddha's unsurpassable skillful means in helping others are praised in manifold ways, and again there is a woman, this time compassion (karuṇā) as the compelling force, which is described as the wife cruel only to the Buddha himself since she prompts him to undertake the most difficult tasks for the benefit of others.

These two hymns of Mātṛceṭa's are here presented in more detail, since they contain most of the topics recurring in the other buddhastotras. Although the author once refers to the Mahāyāna (Varṇārhavarṇa 8.23), it is impossible to identify a distinct dogmatic position. The same holds true of many other authors, and even if Mahāyāna terms occur, the tenor of such a hymn often remains that of a rather unspecific veneration of the Buddha that does not prefer certain dogmatic attitudes nor reject others. This is somewhat different with Nāgārjuna's famous four hymns forming the Catuḥstava (Tucci, 1932; Lindtner, 1982, 121ff.), all four preserved in Sanskrit and Tibetan, namely the Lokātītastava (Hymn to Him Who Transcends the World), the Niraupamyastava (Hymn to Him Who Is Incomparable), the Acintyastava (Hymn to the Inconceivable), and the Paramārthastava (Hymn to the Ultimate Truth). Like Mātṛceṭa's stotras, they reveal a deep sentiment of veneration and devotion, but they are highly philosophical, they allude to Mahāyāna sūtras, and they are clearly composed from a Mahāyāna standpoint and with the Mahāyāna view of reality.

Nāgārjuna (possibly 2nd to 3rd cents. CE) is credited with a large number of stotras, but most of them were composed by others and decidedly later. Well-known are the Prajñāpāramitāstotra (Hymn to the Perfection of Wisdom) in 21 stanzas (extant in Sanskrit and Tibetan), actually written by Rāhulabhadra (Hahn, 1988, 57–80) and often used as introduction in Prajñāpāramitā sūtra manuscripts, the Trikāyastava or Kāyatrayastotra (Hymn to the Three Bodies [of a Buddha]; extant in Sanskrit and Tibetan) in four stanzas (Staël-Holstein, 1911), and the Dharmadhātustava (Hymn to the True Reality) in 101 stanzas (Seyfort Ruegg, 1971), so far available only in Chinese and Tibetan, but for which a Sanskrit manuscript has recently been found in Tibet and will soon be published (Liu, forthcoming). Apart from the description by Yijing, it is difficult to know if and when the buddhastotras were employed in ritual. A function in such a context is to be assumed for the Sugatapañcatriṃśatstotra (Hymn to the 35 Buddhas; extant in Tibetan) in 37 stanzas, wrongly ascribed to Mātṛceṭa (Python, 1973, 156–165); these buddhas are addressed in a confession ritual. A well-known example of a hymn used in tantric ritual and meditation is the Tārā Ekaviṃśatistotra (Hymn to the 21 [Forms of] Tārā; extant in Sanskrit and Tibetan; Wayman, 1959), which is ascribed to the Buddha himself.

Several hymns – and the earliest ones, if the arrangement of their Tibetan translations in the Tanjur represents a chronological sequence – take up the gods of the Brahmanical pantheon as their starting point in order to establish, by way of contrast, the superiority of the Buddha. They are apologetic in nature, they reflect debates, and they show a means of the Buddhists to deal with the contested claims of their major rivals. Such a text is Udbhaṭasiddhasvāmin's Viśeṣastava (Hymn to the Excellence [of the Buddha]; extant in Tibetan; Schneider, 1993). In the first 70 of its 76 stanzas, the author juxtaposes a prominent figure or a phenomenon of Hinduism and a corresponding quality of the Buddha, thereby illustrating the preeminence of the latter (see also the inscription in Phanigiri, below). In another, shorter hymn consisting of only 20 stanzas, the Sarvajñamaheśvarastotra (Hymn to the Omniscient as the Great Lord; extant in Tibetan; Schneider, 1995), the allegedly same author goes a step further: he confines himself to Maheśvara (i.e. Śiva) and reinterprets the characteristic epithets of this god in a Buddhist sense, which provides him with ample opportunities for severe criticism. The Buddha is shown as the true Śiva, and the hymn clearly aims at replacing this god in the central position that he holds among his followers. A third similar work is Śaṃkarasvāmin's Devātiśayastotra (Hymn to the Preeminence [of the Buddha] among the Gods; extant in Sanskrit and Tibetan), in 21 stanzas (Schneider, 2014). However, although classified as a stotra, the work deviates from the main formal characteristic: the author does not speak to the Buddha, but about him, and the addressees are the non-Buddhists.

A rather sophisticated variant of a hymn is presented by Jñānaśrīmitra (c. 980–1040) in his Vṛttamālāstuti (Praise [of the Bodhisattva Mañjuśrī] in a Garland of Meters; extant in Sanskrit and Tibetan; Hahn, 1971). In 150 stanzas, the author illustrates the same number of different meters, and he does so in the form of a hymn addressed to Mañjuśrī. Each stanza exemplifies one meter, and, no small feat, the name of the meter is always worked into the respective stanza. When M. Hahn edited the work on the basis of its Tibetan translation, he was unaware of the fact that the Sanskrit text is still extant and that the manuscript of a commentary, the Vṛttamālā(stuti)vivṛti possibly by Śākyarakṣita, had survived in Nepal. M. Hahn's new edition of the Sanskrit original together with the commentary is currently prepared for the press and will appear posthumously.

While hymns enjoyed a lasting popularity, the (pari)*kathā*s never reached a similar status. The term is not clearly defined and therefore admits of a formal variety, which brings out the difficulty of subsuming all the relevant works under the rubric of short poetry. The Buddhist *parikathā*s have no exact counterpart in the literature of the other Indian religious traditions. They display a considerable variety in style, length, and content (Westermann, 2002). Most of them are metrical, but prose is also found, as is a mixture of both. Most are short, but the length varies between six (e.g. the Udānakathā) and five hundred stanzas (the Ratnāvalī), and the longest work, the Supathadeśanāparikathā (Sermon on the Instruction in the Wholesome Ways), covers 30 folios in the Tibetan Tripiṭaka and is written mainly in prose (Hahn & Saito, 2013, 193). The contents are diverse, and a text can be addressed to a single topic or a variety of themes. Generally *parikathā*s are nonphilosophical (with the exception of the Ratnāvalī), but practice oriented, and they may best be understood as sermons, although sometimes they also address worldly wisdom in a manner similar to that of the gnomic verses (subhāṣita). Another feature that reminds us of the latter genre is, in some *parikathā*s, the rather loose connection among the single verses. Only a few texts are preserved; there are 16 *parikathā*s and 3 *nirdeśa*s, which have so much in common that they are treated together (Dietz, 1984, 93–101; Hahn & Saito, 2013, 194–195). Only two, the Ratnāvalī and the Subhāṣitaratnakaraṇḍakakathā, are partly or fully preserved in their original Sanskrit, while all the others are known only from translations into Tibetan. The main reason for translating them may have been the fact that most of them are ascribed to well-known authors and poets. Only one of them, Nāgārjuna's Ratnāvalī, became famous, and in Tibetan Buddhism, it continues to be learned, studied, quoted, and commented on until today.

For several reasons, the Ratnāvalī (Necklace of Jewels; also known as Rājaparikathāratnāvalī [The Necklace of Jewels That Is a Sermon to a King]) is a singular work. With its five hundred stanzas, equally distributed over five chapters, it is by far the longest metrical parikathā (Hahn, 1982a). It is the only text of this genre in which the authorship is accepted as genuine. Its outstanding importance is documented by the number of quotations, by translation into Chinese and into Tibetan, and also by the existence of an Indian commentary, a ṭīkā written by Ajitamitra and preserved in Tibetan translation (Okada, 1990). Nāgārjuna directs his work to an addressee, a feature normally found in *lekha*s. The first chapter introduces the way of liberation, namely the accumulation of merit and understanding, and then goes on explaining the Madhyamaka doctrine of equally transcending being and nonbeing and realizing that neither a person nor any other reality exists (pudgaladharmanairātmya). The second chapter continues this explanation and treats moral behavior with specific reference to the situation of a king. As a result of the right practice, the king will obtain the major and minor characteristics of a great person. Building from there, the third chapter summarizes the attainment of Buddhahood as the core doctrine of the Mahāyāna. This goal requires the two accumulations (saṃbhāra), namely of an extraordinary amount of merit (puṇya) and of knowledge (jñāna). The first will result in attaining the form body (rūpakāya) of a buddha, the second in attaining the truth body (dharmakāya). Then the king is instructed on how he should practice benefiting himself as well as others. The fourth chapter advises him on the correct behavior toward his subjects and his ministers and pr for policy. This again refers to the d order to develop knowledge, Nāgā the emptiness of feeling and bod Mahāyāna is extolled as the most p efficient teaching, disparaged by ignorance. In the fifth chapter, the the duties of a monk and lists a spe takes that have to be abandoned.

---

he will perform the six perfection gradually progress through the te Finally he will become a buddha v able amount of merit. The work c exhortation to put the advice int wish that the king and all others v ing (Dietz, 1984, 94–96; Lindtner, The Vivekakathā* (On Seclusion allegedly by Gopadatta, describes benefits of a life in the wilderness 1984, 98), while the Saptaguṇa* (Description of the Seven V Tibetan), perhaps of Vasubandhu stanzas the worldly benefits of le and abstaining from anger, env and similar unfavorable emotion The Saṃbhāraparikathā* (On the tions; extant in Tibetan), consisti ascribed to the same author, and the Svapnacintāmaṇiparikathā* ing Gem in a Dream; extant in to Nāgārjuna, teach the path of th address topics that concern the like the six perfections and the thought of awakening (Dietz, 198 work said to be composed by Śīlaparikathā* (On Morality; 11 Tibetan), which stresses the in strong moral behavior; this short only one besides the Ratnāvalī f commentary is preserved in a T (Hahn & Saito, 2009). Two ser to Mātṛceṭa: the Caturviparyās* Desire to Abandon the Four extant in Tibetan; Dietz, 200 how to overcome the errone the impermanent as permanen bliss, of the impure as pure, an self, while the Kaliyugaparikat* Quarrel; 13 stanzas; extant in T the decline and the suffering in 2000). Listed again under the n the Dānaparikathā* (On Giving emphasizes in 13 stanzas the w es they also address worldly er similar to that of the gnomic Another feature that reminds us s, in some parikathās, the rather mong the single verses. Only a ved; there are 16 parikathās and have so much in common that ether (Dietz, 1984, 93–101; Hahn 95). Only two, the Ratnāvalī and karaṇḍakakathā, are partly or heir original Sanskrit, while all wn only from translations into eason for translating them may that most of them are ascribed ors and poets. Only one of them, valī, became famous, and in it continues to be learned, studmmented on until today.

ons, the Ratnāvalī (Necklace of as Rājaparikathāratnāvalī [The That Is a Sermon to a King]) is a its five hundred stanzas, equally e chapters, it is by far the longest (Hahn, 1982a). It is the only text ch the authorship is accepted as ding importance is documented quotations, by translation into Tibetan, and also by the exis-commentary, a ṭīkā written by served in Tibetan translation ārjuna directs his work to an re normally found in lekhas. troduces the way of liberation, lation of merit and understand-on explaining the Madhyamaka transcending being and nonbe-t neither a person nor any other aladharmanairātmya). The secues this explanation and treats h specific reference to the situasult of the right practice, the king or and minor characteristics of a ng from there, the third chapter ainment of Buddhahood as the e Mahāyāna. This goal requires tions (saṃbhāra), namely of mount of merit (puṇya) and of The first will result in attaining akāya) of a buddha, the second h body (dharmakāya). Then the n how he should practice ben-ell as others. The fourth chap-the correct behavior toward his subjects and his ministers and provides guidelines for policy. This again refers to the domain of merit; in order to develop knowledge, Nāgārjuna emphasizes the emptiness of feeling and bodily pleasures. The Mahāyāna is extolled as the most profound and most efficient teaching, disparaged by others only out of ignorance. In the fifth chapter, the author focuses on the duties of a monk and lists a specific set of 57 mistakes that have to be abandoned. As a bodhisattva, he will perform the six perfections (pāramitā) and gradually progress through the ten stages (bhūmi). Finally he will become a buddha with an immeasurable amount of merit. The work concludes with the exhortation to put the advice into practice and the wish that the king and all others will attain awakening (Dietz, 1984, 94–96; Lindtner, 1982, 163–169).

The Vivekakathā* (On Seclusion; extant in Tibetan), allegedly by Gopadatta, describes in 47 stanzas the benefits of a life in the wilderness for a monk (Dietz, 1984, 98), while the Saptaguṇaparivarṇanākathā* (Description of the Seven Virtues; extant in Tibetan), perhaps of Vasubandhu, emphasizes in 19 stanzas the worldly benefits of leading a moral life and abstaining from anger, envy, jealousy, pride, and similar unfavorable emotions (Dietz, 1984, 97). The Saṃbhāraparikathā* (On the [Two] Accumulations; extant in Tibetan), consisting of 42 verses and ascribed to the same author, and the 32 stanzas of the Svapnacintāmaṇiparikathā* (The Wish-fulfilling Gem in a Dream; extant in Tibetan), ascribed to Nāgārjuna, teach the path of the bodhisattva and address topics that concern the relevant practice like the six perfections and the generation of the thought of awakening (Dietz, 1984, 96–97). Another work said to be composed by Vasubandhu is the Śīlaparikathā* (On Morality; 11 stanzas; extant in Tibetan), which stresses the indispensability of a strong moral behavior; this short composition is the only one besides the Ratnāvalī for which an Indian commentary is preserved in a Tibetan translation (Hahn & Saito, 2009). Two sermons are ascribed to Mātṛceṭa: the Caturviparyāsajihāsākathā* (The Desire to Abandon the Four Errors; 32 stanzas; extant in Tibetan; Dietz, 2008, 17–43) teaches how to overcome the erroneous conception of the impermanent as permanent, of the painful as bliss, of the impure as pure, and of the selfless as self, while the Kaliyugaparikathā* (On the Age of Quarrel; 13 stanzas; extant in Tibetan) deals with the decline and the suffering in the kaliyuga (Dietz, 2000). Listed again under the name of Nāgārjuna, the Dānaparikathā* (On Giving; extant in Tibetan) emphasizes in 13 stanzas the wholesome result of liberality (Hahn & Saito, 2013); two of these stanzas, however, are taken from Āryaśūra's Jātakamālā. The Subhāṣitaratnakaraṇḍakakathā (Basket Filled with Jewels of Good Sayings; extant in Sanskrit and Tibetan; Hahn, 1982b) is devoted to giving (dāna), the first perfection and an extremely important concept in Buddhism. It is ascribed to Āryaśūra, and in 191 stanzas, it deals mainly with the virtue of giving and describes the manifold meritorious results of this practice. The last five chapters address the remaining five perfections (pāramitā). On good grounds, the authorship of Āryaśūra is rejected by present-day scholars; quite clearly it is a compilation, since its compiler borrowed verses from many other poetical works, and probably it is a rather late one, since it quotes profusely from Śāntideva's Bodhicaryāvatāra (c. 8th cent.).

The three instructions (nirdeśa) are, basically, admonitions to leading a moral life and refraining from nonvirtuous actions and the pleasures of the senses. Again they are connected with famous names. The Daśakuśalakarmapathanirdeśa* (Instruction on the Ten Wholesome Courses of Action; extant in Tibetan), ascribed to Dhārmikasubhūtighoṣa, is a prose text with inserted verses (Dietz, 1984, 100). It describes the well-known set of ten wholesome actions and the corresponding set of the ten unwholesome ones, and it contains two quotations from Mahāyāna sūtras. This corresponding set is also treated in the Daśākuśalakarmapathanirdeśa* (Instruction on the Ten Unwholesome Courses of Action; extant in Tibetan), ascribed to Aśvaghoṣa (Mochizuki & Kanno, 1996; Mochizuki, 2004, 64–67). Vasubandhu appears once more as the author of the Pañcakāmaguṇādīnavanirdeśa* (Instruction on the Evil of the Five Sensual Pleasures; Tibetan), which exemplifies how indulging into each of the five senses may lead to a very unpleasant result (Dietz, 2009, 89–96). Five of its verses are taken from the Kāmandakīyanītisāra (The Elements of Polity by Kāmandaki; Mitra, 1982), a non-Buddhist collection of gnomic verses, and this reveals once more part of the mechanics of some of the works dealt with here: there is a certain kind of intertextuality, and stanzas are drawn like building blocks from other sources and reassembled in order to create a new or a similar text.

There are few formal distinctions between parikathās and lekhas, letters. Their basic character is didactic, they deal with the same topics, and they are in verse, but may also contain prose passages. This close relation led the redactors of the Tibetan canon to unite them in the same section.

A letter shows two distinctive features: the first is the introduction, in which the addressee is named, the reason and purpose of the letter are stated, and the attention and benevolence of the addressee are invoked; the second is the ending, which concludes with an exposition of the benefits of the instruction and a benediction (Dietz, 1984, 101–106). However, these criteria were rather flexible, as revealed by the Ratnāvalī, which is termed a parikathā but could equally well be classified as a lekha.

Apart from the genres addressed so far, there is a variety of texts and formats that by the criteria of length and poetical intention also fall into the category of short poetry but defy a clear-cut classification. There are many short compositions that in one way or another exemplify Buddhist doctrines and, at the same time, serve as expressions of personal devotion. An example would be the Praṇidhānasaptati (Septuagint of Lofty Aspirations), allegedly by Mātṛceṭa (Lindtner, 1984), a somewhat doubtful ascription, since the work reveals a genuine Mahāyāna background. Regrettably it is only preserved in a Tibetan translation, which makes it difficult to assess its poetical merits. Most likely it is a work of kāvya. Then there are the many stray stanzas of Buddhist authors, which came to be included in later anthologies of subhāṣitas, that is "well-spoken" verses composed in the tradition of Sanskrit court poetry. A typical example would be Dharmakīrti (c. 600–660 CE) and the verses ascribed to him in the Subhāṣitaratnakoṣa (Kosambi & Gokhale, 1957, lxxxi). In most cases, however, it is impossible to confirm the ascriptions, since the original sources of the verses remain unknown, and therefore a classification appears difficult.

A section of Buddhist kāvya literature easily overlooked is poetry in the context of epigraphical sources. Its purpose is often panegyrical, and this connects, as in the case of the single subhāṣita verses, with the tradition of Sanskrit court poetry. Inscriptions are written on solid material, and often they are at least roughly datable by means of their paleography or by a date given in the text. An interesting example, and possibly the earliest one of a Buddhist poem in an inscription, is found at Phanigiri in Andhra Pradesh. This inscription commemorates the raising of a wheel of the law (dharmacakra); it may stem from the year 306 or 316 CE and extols the Buddha with four stanzas (Skilling & von Hinüber, 2011). As in the hymns of Udbhaṭasiddhasvāmin, the Buddha is construed as superior to various Brahmanical gods. A dedicatory inscription incised on a copper scroll for the consecration of a stūpa contains seven stanzas of praise and good wishes (Melzer, 2006, 275–278). It was found in Afghanistan and probably is to be dated to the late 5th century. There are many more dedicatory inscriptions containing short Buddhist poems (e.g. Sircar, 1983, 56–58, 60–62), often in the form of eulogies (praśasti), but they still await comprehensive study.

There is yet another area not normally thought of in which short examples of Buddhist poetry are found. For Indian Buddhist writers, it was not unusual to introduce, and sometimes also to conclude, their works on doctrinal topics with one or more verses in order to pay homage or to state the purpose of their work. Such verses are written in the meters employed for poetry, and to varying degrees they are adorned with the characteristic embellishments of kāvya. Again there is no study of these short compositions, and it is unknown when and why an author felt the need to open his work with a piece of poetry.

Finally mention has to be made of a literary development characteristic of late Indian Buddhism (c. 1000 CE). Within tantric circles, songs (gīti) became a popular medium for expressing spiritual experience on the path to Buddhahood. They presuppose the tantric imagery and terminology, and they seek to communicate a mode of being perhaps best described with the word "mystic". They were intended to be sung, and their origin is not found in kāvya literature, but in folk song, adapted to religious purposes. Their language is neither Sanskrit nor Middle Indic, but a form of Old Bengali, and in this they mark the transition to the upcoming regional languages. Since the teachings that they convey are partly esoteric, they employ a specific kind of ambiguous language (saṃdhyābhāṣā) that allows them to express an everyday meaning and an esoteric one at the same time. One of the better-known examples is the Caryāgīti (Songs of the Mystic Path; Kværne, 1977), a collection of 50 songs ascribed to various authors, among them famous figures of tantric Buddhism like Saraha and Śāntipa. In India and Nepal, only few songs have survived of what originally must have been a considerable body of texts, but this tradition proved extremely influential in Tibetan Buddhism and became an important genre in the literature, best exemplified by Mi la ras pa, the paradigmatic figure of a saint and yogin, and his religious biography, entitled Mgur 'bum (Hundred Thousand Songs; Chang, 1962).

Bibliography

Andersen, D., & H. Smith, eds., Suttanip

Chang, G.C.C., The Hundred Thousan 2 vols., New York, 1962.

Chen R., & J.-U. Hartmann, "Eine kho Triratnadāsas Guṇāparyantastotra," Dietz, S., "Der Pañcakāmaguṇādīna* Vasubandhu zugeschriebenes Lehrg et al., eds., Pāsādikadānaṃ. Fe Pāsādika, Marburg, 2009, 89–96.

Dietz, S., "Mātṛceṭas Caturviparyāsajihās et al.*, eds., Bauddhasāhityastabakāv on Buddhist Sanskrit Literature Dedi Colleagues, Students, and Friends, M Dietz, S., "Mātṛceṭas Kaliyugaparikat et al., eds., Vividharatnakaraṇḍaka. Mette, Swisttal-Odendorf, 2000, 173–

Dietz, S., Die buddhistische Briefliterat 1984.

Dutt, N., Gilgit Manuscripts, vol. III-1, S

Feer, L., The Saṃyuttanikāya of the London, 1884–1898.

Hahn, M., Jñānaśrīmitra's Vṛttamālās Tibetan Translation, Śākyarakṣita English Rendering and Two Glossari

Hahn, M., "Bemerkungen zu zwei Tex Kanjur," in: H. Eimer, ed., Indolog Thirty Years of Indian and Indo-Ti Bonn, 1988, 53–80.

Hahn, M., "Sanskrittexte aus dem tibe Nāgārjuna zugeschriebene Daṇḍ 1987, 51–102.

Hahn, M., Nāgārjuna's Ratnāvalī: The

Hahn, M., Die Subhāṣitaratnakaraṇḍ dhistischer Text zur Verdienstlehre, Hahn, M., Jñānaśrīmitras Vṛttamālās lung zur altindischen Metrik, Wiesb

Hahn, M., & N. Saito, "Pseudo-Nāg Giving (Dānaparikathā)," in: S.F. H eds., Wading into the Stream of Wis Leslie S. Kawamura, Berkeley, 2013

Hahn, M., & N. Saito, "Vasubandh Sittlichkeit mit dem Kommenta M. Straube et al., eds., Pāsādik Bhikkhu Pāsādika, Marburg, 2009, Hartmann, J.-U., "Neues zum Varṇār et al., eds., Pāsādikadānaṃ. Pāsādika, Marburg, 2009, 229–241.

Hartmann, J.-U., "Der Praṇāmastava den Gilgit-Funden," in: P. Kieffer- eds., Bauddhavidyāsudhākaraḥ: St Bechert on the Occasion of His Odendorf, 1997, 285–296.

Hartmann, J.-U., Das Varṇārhavar Göttingen, 1987.

Kosambi, D.D., & V.V. Gokhale, Compiled by Vidyākara, Cambridg

Kværne, P., An Anthology of Buddhis of the Caryāgīti, Oslo, 1977, repr. 1 sed on a copper scroll for the conse-pa contains seven stanzas of praise es (Melzer, 2006, 275–278). It was istan and probably is to be dated to tury. There are many more dedica-s containing short Buddhist poems , 56–58, 60–62), often in the form of ti), but they still await comprehen-nother area not normally thought ort examples of Buddhist poetry ndian Buddhist writers, it was not duce, and sometimes also to con-ks on doctrinal topics with one or rder to pay homage or to state the work. Such verses are written in the l for poetry, and to varying degrees with the characteristic embellish-gain there is no study of these short d it is unknown when and why an eed to open his work with a piece on has to be made of a literary aracteristic of late Indian Bud-). Within tantric circles, songs (gīti) r medium for expressing spiritual e path to Buddhahood. They preic imagery and terminology, and nunicate a mode of being perhaps th the word "mystic". They were ng, and their origin is not found , but in folk song, adapted to reliheir language is neither Sanskrit but a form of Old Bengali, and the transition to the upcoming

s. Since the teachings that they esoteric, they employ a specific s language (saṃdhyābhāṣā) that press an everyday meaning and the same time. One of the bet-es is the Caryāgīti (Songs of the e, 1977), a collection of 50 songs s authors, among them famous ddhism like Saraha and Śāntipa.
l, only few songs have survived must have been a considerable this tradition proved extremely tan Buddhism and became an the literature, best exemplified aradigmatic figure of a saint and ious biography, entitled Mgur usand Songs; Chang, 1962).

Bibliography

Andersen, D., & H. Smith, eds., Suttanipāta, London, 1913.

Chang, G.C.C., The Hundred Thousand Songs of Milarepa, 2 vols., New York, 1962.

Chen R., & J.-U. Hartmann, "Eine khotanische Bilingue aus Triratnadāsas Guṇāparyantastotra," forthcoming.

Dietz, S., "Der Pañcakāmaguṇādīnavanirdeśa* – Ein dem Vasubandhu zugeschriebenes Lehrgedicht," in: M. Straube et al., eds., Pāsādikadānaṃ. Festschrift für Bhikkhu Pāsādika, Marburg, 2009, 89–96.

Dietz, S., "Mātṛceṭas Caturviparyāsajihāsākathā*," in: D. Dimitrov et al., eds., Bauddhasāhityastabakāvalī: Essays and Studies on Buddhist Sanskrit Literature Dedicated to Claus Vogel by Colleagues, Students, and Friends, Marburg, 2008, 17–43.

Dietz, S., "Mātṛceṭas Kaliyugaparikathā," in: C. Chojnacki et al., eds., Vividharatnakaraṇḍaka. Festgabe für Adelheid Mette, Swisttal-Odendorf, 2000, 173–186.

Dietz, S., Die buddhistische Briefliteratur Indiens, Wiesbaden, 1984.

Dutt, N., Gilgit Manuscripts, vol. III-1, Srinagar, 1947.

Feer, L., The Saṃyuttanikāya of the Sutta-Piṭaka, 5 vols., London, 1884–1898.

Hahn, M., Jñānaśrīmitra's Vṛttamālāstuti: Together with Its Tibetan Translation, Śākyarakṣita's Vṛttamālāvivṛti, an English Rendering and Two Glossaries, forthcoming.

Hahn, M., "Bemerkungen zu zwei Texten aus dem Phudrag-Kanjur," in: H. Eimer, ed., Indology and Indo-Tibetology: Thirty Years of Indian and Indo-Tibetan Studies in Bonn, Bonn, 1988, 53–80.

Hahn, M., "Sanskrittexte aus dem tibetischen Tanjur (I): Das Nāgārjuna zugeschriebene Daṇḍakavṛttastotra," BIS 3, 1987, 51–102.

Hahn, M., Nāgārjuna's Ratnāvalī: The Basic Texts, Bonn, 1982a.

Hahn, M., Die Subhāṣitaratnakaraṇḍakakathā. Ein spätbuddhistischer Text zur Verdienstlehre, NAWG 9, 1982b.

Hahn, M., Jñānaśrīmitras Vṛttamālāstuti. Eine Beispielsammlung zur altindischen Metrik, Wiesbaden, 1971.

Hahn, M., & N. Saito, "Pseudo-Nāgārjuna's Sermon about Giving (Dānaparikathā)," in: S.F. Haynes & M.J. Sorensen, eds., Wading into the Stream of Wisdom: Essays in Honor of Leslie S. Kawamura, Berkeley, 2013, 193–208.

Hahn, M., & N. Saito, "Vasubandhus Mahnrede über die Sittlichkeit mit dem Kommentar des Prakāśakīrti," in: M. Straube et al., eds., Pāsādikadānaṃ. Festschrift für Bhikkhu Pāsādika, Marburg, 2009, 177–204.

Hartmann, J.-U., "Neues zum Varṇārhavarṇa," in: M. Straube et al., eds., Pāsādikadānaṃ. Festschrift für Bhikkhu Pāsādika, Marburg, 2009, 229–241.

Hartmann, J.-U., "Der Praṇāmastava. Ein Buddhastotra aus den Gilgit-Funden," in: P. Kieffer-Pülz & J.-U. Hartmann, eds., Bauddhavidyāsudhākaraḥ: Studies in Honour of Heinz Bechert on the Occasion of His 65th Birthday, Swisttal-Odendorf, 1997, 285–296.

Hartmann, J.-U., Das Varṇārhavarṇastotra des Mātṛceṭa, Göttingen, 1987.

Kosambi, D.D., & V.V. Gokhale, The Subhāṣitaratnakoṣa Compiled by Vidyākara, Cambridge MA, 1957.

Kværne, P., An Anthology of Buddhist Tantric Songs: A Study of the Caryāgīti, Oslo, 1977, repr. 1984.

Lienhard, S., A History of Classical Poetry: Sanskrit – Pali – Prakrit, Wiesbaden, 1984.

Lindtner, C., "Mātṛceṭa's Praṇidhānasaptati," AS 38, 1984, 100–128.

Lindtner, C., Nagarjuniana: Studies in the Writings and Philosophy of Nāgārjuna, Copenhagen, 1982.

Liu Zhen, The Dharmadhātustava: A Critical Edition of the Sanskrit Text with the Tibetan and Chinese Translations, Beijing, forthcoming.

Melzer, G., "A Copper Scroll Inscription from the Time of the Alchon Huns," in: J. Braarvig, ed., Buddhist Manuscripts, vol. III, Oslo, 2006, 251–278.

Mitra, R., The Nītisāra or the Elements of Polity by Kāmandaki: Revised with English translation by S.K. Mitra, Calcutta, 1982.

Mochizuki, K., "Some Remarks on the Small Texts Attributed to Dīpaṃkaraśrījñāna," JASUM 20, 2004, 61–76.

Mochizuki, K., & R. Kanno, "Meimyō ni kisareru Jūfuzengōdō sesshi no kenkyū" 馬鳴に帰される『十不善業道説示』の研究 (Aśvaghoṣa's Daśākuśalakarmapathanirdeśa), BgR 20, 1996, 1–24.

Okada, Y., Die Ratnāvalīṭīkā des Ajitamitra, Bonn, 1990.

Pandey, J.S., Bauddhastotrasaṃgraha, Varanasi, 1994.

Pinault, G.-J., "Le genre de l'éloge dans les hymnes védiques," in: N. Balbir, ed., Genres littéraires en Inde, Paris, 1994, 35–67.

Python, P., Vinaya-viniścaya-upāli-paripṛcchā: Enquête d'Upāli pour une exégèse de la discipline, Paris, 1973.

Salomon, R., Ancient Buddhist Scrolls from Gandhāra: The British Library Kharoṣṭhī Fragments, Seattle, 1999.

Schlingloff, D., Buddhistische Stotras aus ostturkestanischen Sanskrittexten, Berlin, 1952.

Schneider, J., Eine buddhistische Kritik der indischen Götter. Śaṃkarasvāmins Devātiśayastotra mit Prajñāvarmans Kommentar, Vienna, 2014.

Schneider, J., "Der Buddha als der wahre Śiva. Udbhaṭasiddhasvāmins Sarvajñamaheśvarastotra," BIS 8, 1995, 153–187.

Schneider, J., Der Lobpreis der Vorzüglichkeit des Buddha. Udbhaṭasiddhasvāmins Viśeṣastava mit Prajñāvarmans Kommentar, Bonn, 1993.

Seyfort Ruegg, D., "Le Dharmadhātustava de Nāgārjuna," in: Études tibétaines dédiées à la mémoire de Marcelle Lalou, Paris, 1971, 449–471.

Shackleton Bailey, D.R., The Śatapañcāśatka of Mātṛceṭa, Cambridge UK, 1951.

Sircar, D.C., Select Inscriptions Bearing on Indian History and Civilization, Delhi, 1983.

Skilling, P., & O. von Hinüber, "An Epigraphical Buddhist Poem from Phanigiri (Andhrapradesh) from the Time of Rudrapuruṣadatta," ARIRIAB 14, 2011, 7–12.

Staël-Holstein, A. von, "Bemerkungen zum Trikāyastava," BAISP 11, 1911, 837–845.

Tucci, G., "Two Hymns of the Catuḥ-stava of Nāgārjuna," JRAS 1932, 309–325.

Vidyabhusana, S.C., Sragdharā-stotram or A Hymn to Tārā in Sragdharā Metre by Bhikṣu Sarvajña Mitra of Kaśmīra: With the Sanskrit Commentary of Jina Rakṣita, together with Two Tibetan Versions, Calcutta, 1908.

Wayman, A., "The Twenty-one Praises of Tārā, a Syncretism of Śaivism and Buddhism," JB(O)RS 45, 1959, 36–43.

Westermann, N., "Die Parikathā als literarisches Genre," in: D. Dimitrov et al., eds., Śikhisamuccaya: Indian and Tibetan Studies, Vienna, 2002, 211–227.

Zorin, Alexander V. (Александр В. Зорин), У истоков тибетской поэзии: Буддийские гимны в тибетской литературе VIII–XIV вв. (At the Source of Tibe Poetry: Buddhist Hymns in Tibetan Literature, 8th-1 Centuries), Saint Petersburg, 2010.

JENS-UWE HARTMAN

Poetry

That Buddhism had a major im poetic tradition is beyond dispu awareness prompted by the p from Indo-European language verifiable influence on prosod many other influences in form detectable. Yet "poetry" (shi [詩 China defined not only in ling by reference to history. Th straightforward, in the style o awareness of literary traditio not just an identification wit stretching back to Confucius the Shijing (詩經; Classic of Po participate in this tradition wa the well educated could aspir that Buddhism was establish the end of the 2nd century CE, membership of what has been the Text" (Connery, 1998). In however, was by definition n nese sense and was seldom ref nese term. Literary translatio for cultural as well as linguist very occasional attempts at i cultural references may be f 248–249). A Chinese Buddhi lessly, but the need to obse linguistic codes barred any B ten in accordance with the p acceptance as poetry, thou monks (Cao, 1994, 251–286) an rose to the challenge of writin which did moreover graduall by the late Tang.

One versified Chinese gen different history from poet rhapsody, termed fu (賦). As sentiments, it was used with c the lay follower Sun Chuo (孫 composition on the ascent of (You Tiantai shan fu [遊天 Roaming the Celestial Terra tges, 1987, 243–253; Mather on earlier narratives of spir emerging interest in lands

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

-XIV 66. (At the Source of Tibetan Hymns in Tibetan Literature, 8th–14th etersburg, 2010.

JENS-UWE HARTMANN

Poetry: China (Until the Song Period)

That Buddhism had a major impact on the Chinese poetic tradition is beyond dispute. The phonological awareness prompted by the process of translation from Indo-European languages, for example, had a verifiable influence on prosody (Mair & Mei, 1991); many other influences in form and content are also detectable. Yet "poetry" (shi [詩]) was in premodern China defined not only in linguistic terms but also by reference to history. The language may be straightforward, in the style of a folk ballad, but an awareness of literary tradition generally obtrudes, not just an identification with a cultural heritage stretching back to Confucius – supposed editor of the Shijing (詩經; Classic of Poetry) – and beyond. To participate in this tradition was something that only the well educated could aspire to, and by the time that Buddhism was establishing itself in China at the end of the 2nd century CE, participation granted membership of what has been termed an "Empire of the Text" (Connery, 1998). Indian Buddhist poetry, however, was by definition not poetry in the Chinese sense and was seldom referred to using the Chinese term. Literary translation was thus impossible for cultural as well as linguistic reasons, and so only very occasional attempts at including intertextual cultural references may be found (Palumbo, 2013, 248–249). A Chinese Buddhist might versify faultlessly, but the need to observe both cultural and linguistic codes barred any Buddhist verse not written in accordance with the prevailing norms from acceptance as poetry, though there were some monks (Cao, 1994, 251–286) and more laypeople who rose to the challenge of writing within the tradition – which did moreover gradually broaden, especially by the late Tang.

One versified Chinese genre that had a slightly different history from poetry was the expository rhapsody, termed fu (賦). As a vehicle for Buddhist sentiments, it was used with conspicuous success by the lay follower Sun Chuo (孫綽; fl. 330–365), whose composition on the ascent of the Tiantai Mountains (You Tiantai shan fu [遊天台山賦]; Rhapsody on Roaming the Celestial Terrace Mountains; Knechtges, 1987, 243–253; Mather, 1961), drawing both on earlier narratives of spiritual travel and on an emerging interest in landscape (Kirkova, 2008), was one of the very few pieces of literature mentioning Buddhism to be included in the normative Wenxuan (文選; Selections of Refined Literature) literary anthology of the 6th century. More than half a dozen other Buddhist pieces in this genre were collected in 644 in Daoxuan's (道宣; 597–667 CE) Guang Hongming ji (廣弘明集; Extended Collection on the Propagation of Light; T. 2103 [LVII] 335b29–342c4), the earliest surviving compilation of literary verses on Buddhism, though despite the continued vitality of secular compositions, nothing Buddhist in this genre has been transmitted from after the 7th century before the revival of its use by Yanshou (or Yongming Yanshou [永明延壽]; 904–975 CE): one of his pieces, the Zhu Xinfu (註心賦; Annotated Prose Poem on the Mind), was eventually printed as a separate item in the Jiaxing (嘉興) edition of the Buddhist canon in 1637 (ZZ 1231).

From the earliest period of the formation of the Buddhist canon in China, much poetry had of course been present, but in a somewhat disguised form, translated more often than not without regard for rhyme, and labeled not as poetry but as ji (偈), a transcription of gāthā (Saitō, 2013). But though this might be no more than "blank verse," it still tended to follow the five- or seven-syllable line length that in the late Han had superseded, outside the most formal contexts, the four-word lines of the Shi jing. Despite the lack of high cultural prestige for this new genre in China, it has been seen as influencing the main poetic tradition, specifically in the development of seven-syllable poetry and of the Chinese quatrain or jueju (絕句; Chen, 2004; Li & Wu, 2004). But by the 6th century, when these developments are apparent, Chinese poetry had in fact been opened up to a certain amount of Buddhist content as well, while still constrained by the limits of tradition. This development was traced by later commentators from the 5th century onward to innovations made in the century before (Holzman, 1996, 126–138). The monk Zhi Dun (支遁; 314–366 CE), teacher of Sun Chuo, had availed himself of a vogue for verse drawing on the abstract language of Laozi (老子) and Zhuangzi (莊子) to produce poetry using largely the same vocabulary but introducing Buddhist meanings: the resulting Buddhist message can be misconstrued but was evidently recognized at the time (Lo, 1994). The same vogue even allowed the preservation of some lines attributed to the Kuchean translator Kumārajīva (350–409/413 CE) in the 76th fascicle of the 7th-century Yiwen leiju (藝文類聚; Collection of Literature Arranged by Categories; Ouyang, 1982, 1294).

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

This vogue was not sustained, however, as poetry turned to matters such as landscape description, another area in which Buddhist influence has been posited, especially in the poetry of Xie Lingyun (謝靈運; 385–433 CE). In fact, the material world in Indian Buddhism was no more than the product of collective past karma, even if in time, East Asian Buddhists came to imbue it with the potential for enlightenment (Barrett, 1991a). So arguably the introduction of Buddhism did not in itself stimulate the development of landscape poetry, which perhaps had deeper Chinese roots and a longer process of maturation. But even so, Xie Lingyun's writings of scenic description have been recognized since the second half of the 20th century as poetry tinged with strong Buddhist feeling (Chan, 2012, 127–158). In the century following Xie Lingyun's life, the influence of Buddhist conceptions of vision – that is, Buddhist ways of seeing things – have also been suspected in poetic contexts (Tian, 2007, 200–208, 233–252). One of the poets most conspicuous in this respect, the Liang-dynasty prince Xiao Gang (蕭綱; 505–551 CE), is represented in Daoxuan's anthology by a collective sequence of poems on the theme of the four excursions of the youthful prince Siddhārtha from his palace that eventually prompted his quest to become a buddha. Poetry on this theme had evidently already been collected in an earlier anthology by the start of the 6th century, to judge from its table of contents preserved in the Chu Sanzang jiji (出三藏記集; Collection of Notes on the Translated Tripiṭaka; T. 2145 [LV] 87a1). But Xiao Gang's pieces, for all their Buddhist topics, were produced as part of a literary-salon contest and observe all the sumptuous conventions of contemporary palace poetry, scarcely conforming to our own image of what East Asian Buddhist poetry might be (Martin, 2002; 2004).

Yet the very artificiality of the "palace style" (gong ti [宮體]; closely wrought poetry of the type found in the Yutai xinyong [玉台新詠; New Songs from the Jade Terrace] anthology: Tian, 2007, 162–262) and of its later Tang descendant "regulated verse" (lüshi [律詩], which follows set tonal and syllabic patterns, as explained in a number of translated anthologies; see e.g. Yip, 1976, 226–230) depends entirely on a conscious phonological awareness of tone as well as rhyme that was, as mentioned above, unambiguously the outcome of the linguistic encounter between Chinese and South Asian languages. The complexities of these styles recreate in the Chinese language the levels of entirely different phonological complexity seen in Sanskrit poetry, and arguably do so in such a way as to render poetry no longer something to be sung but to be chanted after the manner of Chinese Buddhist liturgy (Klein, 2013, 78). Chinese Buddhist liturgical singing itself was also because of the difference between Chinese and South Asian languages, unrelated in musical terms to South Asian liturgy, but again was a creation independent of earlier Chinese musical tradition, legitimated by stories of divine revelation and by false ascription. Buddhist liturgical compositions in China remained, however, textually quite distinct from "poetry" especially of the intricate, lüshi type, so this hypothesis requires careful examination – it may be, however, that creating a tonally aware poetry brought it closer to the chanting of Buddhist prose in the Indian fashion (Demiéville, 1929, 96; Whitaker, 1957, 587). In any case, the importance of Indian approaches to literature, communicated through Buddhism, in suggesting modes of analysis of the Chinese tradition is clear (Mair, 2001).

That these influences are not overt is not simply to be explained by the linguistic difference between China and South Asia, which in itself prevented the importation of Indian poetry, save in translated forms that disguised its very status as literature. The new literary knowledge concerning the potential of prosodic elements conveyed through Buddhism to the educated elite who during the 5th and 6th centuries rethought the Chinese literary tradition did not find expression in an overtly alien language, larded with Buddhist Chinese neologisms, precisely because Buddhist thought affirmed the value of the Chinese literary tradition at the mundane (shijian [世間]; Skt. laukika) level (Barrett, 2009): its language was worthy of respect, even if its religious value was only relative. The tradition was not thereby "Buddhicized," but it no longer unfolded on purely indigenous lines. Thus, even while the point may be made that innovations in thinking about poetry in Tang times – such as are to be found, for example, under the name of Wang Changling (王昌齡; c. 698–755 CE) – are not Buddhist, the relevant terminology used to express these innovations suggests at some points an awareness of Buddhist translation usage. The best example of this excerpts from Wang Changling's w requirements of poetic writing co jing (境), meaning a "scene" envis China the term referred originally ritory but in Buddhist translatio used to indicate more abstract re action (Yang, 2007, 172–174).

---

Wang Changling's friend, the ebrated poet Wang Wei (王维; 701 a practical illustration of the na written by a devout Buddhist wit tion. It is easy to find Buddhist r Wei's poetry, with poems dedica Buddhist monastery, for exampl phenomenon of the Buddhist m celebrated – in one influential 1996, 473–481) – even in the gen lar Wenxuan, and many poets Wang Wei were happy to com such places. But Wang Wei does poetry, in the sense that he do use verse for the exposition of B if some of his work moves in that 2006). The attitude of restraint that he conveys in this regard h interpreted as displaying a form ics, and it is certainly true that th display of patronage that Buddh the late 7th and early 8th cent Wei's time been curtailed by so a degree of what could be c conspicuous in the Buddhist th time, including the thought of whom Wang Wei had dealings

But explicit statements of an ics are completely absent at th In fact, there is also no evidenc dition at this time, in the sense ment within which the vario themselves back to the parad patriarch Bodhidharma all sit that seems to be a developmen To emphasize such historical n ignore the evidence of Wang selves, but it is difficult to be su them without reference to ou image of what Chan poetry m terms it is just as possible that ied in Wang Wei's poetry infl Chan tradition as that someth call Chan thought influenced For there is nothing to show 226–230) depends entirely on a ogical awareness of tone as well s, as mentioned above, unamome of the linguistic encounter nd South Asian languages. The se styles recreate in the Chinese of entirely different phonologi-in Sanskrit poetry, and arguably y as to render poetry no longer ng but to be chanted after the e Buddhist liturgy (Klein, 2013, hist liturgical singing itself was, difference between Chinese and ges, unrelated in musical terms urgy, but again was a creation rlier Chinese musical tradition, ies of divine revelation and by ddhist liturgical compositions in owever, textually quite distinct ially of the intricate, lüshi type, requires careful examination – r, that creating a tonally aware oser to the chanting of Buddhist fashion (Demiéville, 1929, 96; ). In any case, the importance es to literature, communicated in suggesting modes of analysis tion is clear (Mair, 2001).

nces are not overt is not simply he linguistic difference between ia, which in itself prevented the ian poetry, save in translated its very status as literature. The edge concerning the potential ts conveyed through Buddhism te who during the 5th and 6th the Chinese literary tradition ion in an overtly alien language, t Chinese neologisms, precisely ought affirmed the value of the dition at the mundane (shijian ) level (Barrett, 2009): its lan-of respect, even if its religious
e. The tradition was not thereby t no longer unfolded on purely us, even while the point may ations in thinking about poetry h as are to be found, for exam-e of Wang Changling (王昌齡; not Buddhist, the relevant terress these innovations suggests areness of Buddhist translation usage. The best example of this in the surviving excerpts from Wang Changling's work on the formal requirements of poetic writing concerns the word jing (境), meaning a "scene" envisaged mentally; in China the term referred originally to a bounded territory but in Buddhist translations had long been used to indicate more abstract realms or spheres of action (Yang, 2007, 172–174).

Wang Changling's friend, the much more celebrated poet Wang Wei (王维; 701–761 CE), provides a practical illustration of the nature of the poetry written by a devout Buddhist within a secular tradition. It is easy to find Buddhist references in Wang Wei's poetry, with poems dedicated to describing a Buddhist monastery, for example. The this-worldly phenomenon of the Buddhist monastery had been celebrated – in one influential prose piece (Forte, 1996, 473–481) – even in the generally strictly secular Wenxuan, and many poets less Buddhist than Wang Wei were happy to commemorate visits to such places. But Wang Wei does not write religious poetry, in the sense that he does not consistently use verse for the exposition of Buddhist ideas, even if some of his work moves in that direction (Lomová, 2006). The attitude of restraint and circumspection that he conveys in this regard has frequently been interpreted as displaying a form of Chan (禪) poetics, and it is certainly true that the excessive material display of patronage that Buddhism enjoyed during the late 7th and early 8th centuries had by Wang Wei's time been curtailed by government action, so a degree of what could be called inwardness is conspicuous in the Buddhist thought of Wang Wei's time, including the thought of those masters with whom Wang Wei had dealings (Barrett, 1991b, 258).

But explicit statements of any kind of Chan poetics are completely absent at this time (Yang, 2007). In fact, there is also no evidence even of a Chan tradition at this time, in the sense of an overall movement within which the various lineages tracing themselves back to the paradigmatic 6th-century patriarch Bodhidharma all situated themselves – that seems to be a development of the next century. To emphasize such historical niceties might seem to ignore the evidence of Wang Wei's writings themselves, but it is difficult to be sure that we are reading them without reference to our own anachronistic image of what Chan poetry might be. In historical terms it is just as possible that the aesthetic embodied in Wang Wei's poetry influenced the emerging Chan tradition as that something we can justifiably call Chan thought influenced his writing of poetry. For there is nothing to show that the word "chan" (a transcription of a Middle Indic form of the Sanskrit word dhyāna) meant at this stage anything other than meditation, as it always had done earlier in Chinese Buddhism. Explicit confirmation that this was no longer the case only comes much later.

The gradual realignment of the relationship between Buddhism and poetry is, however, one of the features of the Tang period following the An Lushan (安祿山) Rebellion of 755 CE, and it includes the bringing into conjunction of notions of meditation and poetic composition, among other changes. But the earliest and most obvious change was the appearance (or reappearance) of members of the Buddhist clergy in literary life. Gao Zhongwu (高仲武), for example, the editor of a collection of poetry put together in the 780s CE, includes some verses by the monk Lingyi (靈一; 727–762 CE), commenting that there were accomplished literary monks in the 5th–6th centuries, but Lingyi is considered better than the most famous of these (Gao, 1978, 295). Lingyi was not the only monk to make an impression in literary circles in the late 8th century, when the shaken self-confidence of the intellectual elite engendered in some a new seriousness of purpose that made the Buddhist engagement of educated laypersons much more a topic of discussion. The most successful of the monk-poets of the late 8th century was Jiaoran (皎然; 730–799 CE), not only because of his versatility but also because of his writings on poetry, which clearly introduce further elements of Buddhist derivation into the vocabulary of criticism. The key term "zuoyong" (作用), a collocation often found in Buddhist translations, he redeploys to signify the creation of literary effect (Williams, 2013, 5–8).

Though the term appears in the "recorded sayings" (yulu [語錄]) of meditation masters of a younger generation than Jiaoran (and also in Stein 2669, a manuscript from Dunhuang [敦煌] containing a miscellany of works from the emerging Chan tradition down to the late 8th cent.), there is nothing that ties it specifically to Chan at this date. But Jiaoran does seem to show an interest in bringing the practice of meditation and poetry together (Williams, 2013, 10). This may relate to an increased interest in the process of poetic composition that appears in the late 8th and early 9th centuries (Owen, 1997, 107–129). Discussion of the relationship between enlightenment and meditation, an issue for the contemporary Buddhist clergy, seems also to have spread to laypeople (Barrett, 1992, 84–5). In 814, Liu Yuxi (劉禹錫; 772–842 CE) introduced this relationship into an account of the poetry written by monks (DeBlasi, 2002, 107); specifically he asserted that as a result of meditation, they were able to obtain "scenes" (jing). But in addressing his friend Bai Juyi (白居易; 772–846 CE), he speaks of Buddhism and poetry as two coordinate realms, rather than combining them, while Bai Juyi contrasts meditation with drinking alcohol as a means to achieve an altered state of consciousness (Sun, 1993, 198–199); monks were properly not allowed this latter option, and indeed one can construe the Buddhist promotion of tea as a way of overcoming this handicap by providing another social drink for literary gatherings.

It is furthermore clear from a dictum of Zhou Pu (周朴; d. 879 CE) that the realm of poetry and the realm of meditation could also be seen as on an equal footing (Sun, 2006, 148). But while it is true that Buddhist expert knowledge of mental states became a matter of interest to poets of the second half of the Tang (Fuller, 2013, 158), to speak of a Chan aesthetic in poetry at this point seems anachronistic. Indeed, Jiaoran is said to have felt some tension between his religious and his literary life, while Bai Juyi also speaks of his writings in a way that suggests that he too saw a tension between his devotion to literature and his identity as a Buddhist layman (Nielson, 1972, 57–58; Waley, 1949, 194–195). To Bai Juyi, a poet-monk's activities could be justified as an expedient measure; their ultimate purpose should lie elsewhere (Waley, 1949, 171; Cartelli, 2012, 204–205). If one looks at the religious lives of poet-monks, moreover, this notion of expediency should be qualified. Of the score or so of such figures from the late Tang and Five Dynasties, only one, Wenyi (or Fayan Wenyi [法眼文益]; 885–958 CE) remains known both for his poetry and for his religious life – and his standing in the latter was viewed by the Chan tradition as a negation of the former, so that his first Chan biographies do not quote his poetry at all (Diener, 1989, 106). Much more typical of this period is Guanxiu (貫休; 832–912 CE), the first poet in China to have his works printed – though for political rather than religious or even literary reasons (Barrett, 2013, 100–108).

The Chan tradition does celebrate the verse of one Tang figure famous throughout East Asia and beyond, namely Hanshan (寒山; 9th cent.). But the corpus under this name, portions of which would seem to date to different periods of the Tang, does not seem to have attracted the attention of Buddhists until the mid-9th century; before then, Hanshan seems to have been regarded as much as a Daoist as a Buddhist, while the verses themselves seem to have had no impact on the literary world until much later times (Hobson, 2003, 115–151). The picture of Buddhist verse and elite poetry as two separate though interacting literatures is, however, complicated by the manuscript evidence retrieved from Dunhuang. Here we find not only nonelite Buddhist verse from figures almost completely ignored by the main poetic tradition, such as Wang Fanzhi (王梵志; "Wang the Devotee"; Demiéville, 1982; Tafel-Kehren, 1982), but also mixed in with these verses, and elsewhere in vernacular texts, stanzas borrowed from the 6th-century poet monk Wangming (亡名 or 忘名), a figure already represented in Daoxuan's anthology (Xiang, 1991, 1–5).

It is also possible to retrieve poems by Tang poet-monks known to the literary tradition, such as lost poems by Guanxiu (see above) and others (Xu, 2000, 786, 337), interspersed with pieces by complete unknowns. The broader literary environment provided by so much rediscovered Buddhist verse further allows us to see that the mainstream tradition of poetry was affected not only by the blank verse of Buddhist translations – something that modern scholarship agrees influenced even those who professed opposition to Buddhism (Chen, 1988, 147–158) – but also by the vernacular style of Wang Fanshi, a factor not immediately apparent before (Kuangfu, 1990, 118–123). Buddhist versifying turns out to have been a vibrant and complex activity in which common themes could be treated in a wide variety of verse forms (Cartelli, 2012), not all associated with the emerging Chan movement, which certainly preserved and transmitted its own religious verse, besides providing a home for the Hanshan corpus. Chan masters of the 9th century are already depicted as drawing on verses handed down from earlier times, a practice that can be verified from the Dunhuang manuscripts (Murakami, 1996, 353–400; Tanaka, 1983, 293–312). Verse and response to verse have often indeed been seen as integral to Chan training (Wawyrtko, 1992; Wang, 2003, 183–186). Though the Dunhuang manuscripts show that such religious works were never entitled shi at this stage, secular poetry was no longer the only verse tradition.

Bibliography

Barrett, T.H., From Religious Ideology to Political Expediency in Early Printing: An Aspect of Buddho-Daoist Rivalry, London, 2013.

Barrett, T.H., "The Advent of the Budd Religion and Its Consequences for t ism," SJEAS 9/2, 2009, 149–165.
Barrett, T.H., Li Ao: Buddhist, Taoist,
Oxford, 1992.
Barrett, T.H., "Devil's Valley to Omega the Emergence of a Theme from the ed., The Buddhist Forum, vol. II, Lond Barrett, T.H., "The Date of the Leng-ch
1/2, 1991b, 255–259.
Cao Shibang (曹仕邦), Zhongguo sham Hanmo zhi Wudai (中國沙門外學 Taipei, 1994.
Cartelli, M.A., The Five-Colored Clouds o
from Dunhuang, Leiden, 2012.
Chan, T.W.K., Considering the End: Mo
eval Chinese Poetic Representation, L Chen Yunji (陳允吉), Tangyin fojiao bi 錄), Shanghai, 1988.
Chen Yunji (陳允吉), "Zhonggu qiyan fanyi" (中古七言詩體的發展与佛
et al., eds., Fojing wenxue yanjiu lun
Shanghai, 2004, 327–347.
Connery, C.L., The Empire of the Text:
in Early Imperial China, Lanham, 19 DeBlasi, A., Reform in the Balance: The ture in Mid-Tang China, Albany, 200 Demiéville, P., L'oeuvre de Wang le Zél suivi des Instructions Domestiques d kiao) Poèmes populaires des T'ang, 1982.
Demiéville, P., "Bombai" (梵唄), in:
eds., Hōbōgirin, vol. I, Tokyo, 1929, Diener, M.S., "Fa-yen Wen-yi," in:
G. Woerner, eds., The Rider Encyc losophy and Religion, London, 1989, Forte, A., "A literary Model for Adam: Inscription," in: P. Pelliot, L'Inscrip ngan-fou, Kyoto, 1996, 473–487.
Fuller, M.A., Drifting among Rivers an Dynasty Poetry and the Problem of bridge MA, 2013.
Gao Zhongwu, Zhongxing jianqi ji ( 1978.
Hobson, P., Poems of Hanshan, Waln Holzman, D., Landscape Appreciatio
Medieval China: The Birth of Land 1996; repr. Chinese Literature in T to the Middle Ages, Aldershot, 1998 Kirkova, Z., "Distant Roaming and Visi
'You Tiantai shan fu' Reconsidered Knechtges, D.R., Wen Xuan or Selecti
vol. II, Princeton, 1987.
Klein, L., "Indic Echoes: Form, Conte in Tang-Dynasty Regulated Verse," Kuangfu (匡扶), "Wang Fanzhi shi hua, yilunhua" 王梵志詩与宋詩 Zhang Xihou (張錫厚), ed., Wang (王梵志詩研究彙錄), Shanghai, ist, while the verses themselves io impact on the literary world ies (Hobson, 2003, 115–151). The verse and elite poetry as two eracting literatures is, however, manuscript evidence retrieved re we find not only nonelite Bud-ures almost completely ignored tradition, such as Wang Fanzhi e Devotee"; Demiéville, 1982;

, but also mixed in with these ere in vernacular texts, stanzas 6th-century poet monk Wang-, a figure already represented in y (Xiang, 1991, 1–5).
le to retrieve poems by Tang to the literary tradition, such as xiu (see above) and others (Xu, erspersed with pieces by come broader literary environment h rediscovered Buddhist verse see that the mainstream tradi-affected not only by the blank translations – something that agrees influenced even those sition to Buddhism (Chen, 1988, by the vernacular style of Wang immediately apparent before -123). Buddhist versifying turns ibrant and complex activity in mes could be treated in a wide s (Cartelli, 2012), not all associing Chan movement, which certransmitted its own religious ding a home for the Hanshan s of the 9th century are already on verses handed down from ice that can be verified from the ipts (Murakami, 1996, 353–401; 2). Verse and response to verse been seen as integral to Chan , 1992; Wang, 2003, 183–186). uang manuscripts show that were never entitled shi at this was no longer the only verse ious Ideology to Political Expediency n Aspect of Buddho-Daoist Rivalry,

Barrett, T.H., "The Advent of the Buddhist Conception of Religion and Its Consequences for the Analysis of Daoism," SJEAS 9/2, 2009, 149–165.

Barrett, T.H., Li Ao: Buddhist, Taoist, or Neo-Confucian?, Oxford, 1992.

Barrett, T.H., "Devil's Valley to Omega Point: Reflections on the Emergence of a Theme from the No," in: T. Skorupski, ed., The Buddhist Forum, vol. II, London, 1991a, 1–12.

Barrett, T.H., "The Date of the Leng-chia shih-tzu chi," JRAS 1/2, 1991b, 255–259.

Cao Shibang (曹仕邦), Zhongguo shamen waixue de yanjiu: Hanmo zhi Wudai (中國沙門外學的研 – 漢末至五代), Taipei, 1994.

Cartelli, M.A., The Five-Colored Clouds of Mount Wutai: Poems from Dunhuang, Leiden, 2012.

Chan, T.W.K., Considering the End: Mortality in Early Medieval Chinese Poetic Representation, Leiden, 2012.

Chen Yunji (陳允吉), Tangyin fojiao biansilu (唐音佛教辨思錄), Shanghai, 1988.

Chen Yunji (陳允吉), "Zhonggu qiyan shiti de fazhan yu foji fanyi" (中古七言詩體的發展与佛偈翻譯), in: Chen Yunji et al., eds., Fojing wenxue yanjiu lunji (佛經文學論文集), Shanghai, 2004, 327–347.

Connery, C.L., The Empire of the Text: Writing and Authority in Early Imperial China, Lanham, 1998.

DeBlasi, A., Reform in the Balance: The Defense of Literary Culture in Mid-Tang China, Albany, 2002.

Demiéville, P., L'oeuvre de Wang le Zélateur (Wang Fan-tche) suivi des Instructions Domestiques de l'Aïeul (T'ai-kong kia-kiao) Poèmes populaires des T'ang, VIII–IX siècles, Paris, 1982.

Demiéville, P., "Bombai" (梵唄), in: S. Lévi & J. Takakusu, eds., Hōbōgirin, vol. I, Tokyo, 1929, 93–96.

Diener, M.S., "Fa-yen Wen-yi," in: S. Schuhmacher & G. Woerner, eds., The Rider Encyclopedia of Eastern Philosophy and Religion, London, 1989, 106.

Forte, A., "A literary Model for Adam: The Dhūta Monastery Inscription," in: P. Pelliot, L'Inscription Nestorienne de Si-ngan-fou, Kyoto, 1996, 473–487.

Fuller, M.A., Drifting among Rivers and Lakes: Southern Song Dynasty Poetry and the Problem of Literary History, Cambridge MA, 2013.

Gao Zhongwu, Zhongxing jianqi ji (中興間氣集), Shanghai, 1978.

Hobson, P., Poems of Hanshan, Walnut Creek, 2003.

Holzman, D., Landscape Appreciation in Ancient and Early Medieval China: The Birth of Landscape Poetry, Hsin-chu, 1996; repr. Chinese Literature in Transition from Antiquity to the Middle Ages, Aldershot, 1998.

Kirkova, Z., "Distant Roaming and Visionary Ascent: Sun Chuo's 'You Tiantai shan fu' Reconsidered," OE 47, 2008, 192–214.

Knechtges, D.R., Wen Xuan or Selections of Refined Literature, vol. II, Princeton, 1987.

Klein, L., "Indic Echoes: Form, Content, and World Literature in Tang-Dynasty Regulated Verse," CLEAR 35, 2013, 59–96.

Kuangfu (匡扶), "Wang Fanzhi shi yu Song shi de sanwenhua, yilunhua" 王梵志詩与宋詩的散文化，議論化，in: Zhang Xihou (張錫厚), ed., Wang Fanzhi shi yanjiu huilu (王梵志詩研究彙錄), Shanghai, 1990, 118–123.

Li Xiaorong (李小榮) & Wu Haiyong (吳海勇), "Fojing jisong yu zhonggu jueju deming" (佛經偈頌与中古絕句得名), in: Chen Yunji et al., eds., Fojing wenxue yanjiu lunwenji (佛經文學論文集), Shanghai, 2004, 348–359.

Lo, Y.K., "Moving Boundaries: Implications for the Study of Texts in Ancient and Medieval China," JOS 32/1, 1994, 74–81.

Lomová, Olga, "From Suffering the Heat to Enjoying the Cool: Remarks on Wáng Wéi as a Buddhist Poet," in: C. Anderl & H. Eifring, eds., Studies in Chinese Language and Culture: Festschrift in Honour of Christoph Harbsmeier on the Occasion of His 60th Birthday, Oslo, 2006, 417–425.

Mair, V.H., "Buddhism in the Literary Mind and Ornate Rhetoric," in: Zong-qi Cai, ed., A Chinese Literary Mind: Culture, Creativity, and Rhetoric in Wenxin Diaolong, Stanford, 2001, 63–81.

Mair, V.H., & T.-S. Mei, "The Sanskrit Origins of Recent Style Prosody," HJAS 51/2, 1991, 375–470.

Martin, F., "Literary Games and Religious Practice at the End of the Six Dynasties: The Baguanzhai Poems by Xiao Gang and His Followers," in: Zong-qi Cai, ed., Chinese Aesthetics: The Ordering of Literature, the Arts, and the Universe in the Six Dynasties, Honolulu, 2004, 222–234.

Martin, F., "Les 'quatre portes de la ville' – Pratique bouddhique et jeu poétique sous les Six Dynasties," in: C. Despeux, ed., Bouddhisme et letters dans la Chine médiévale, Paris, 2002, 67–102.

Mather, R., "The Mystical Ascent of the T'ient'ai Mountains: Sun Ch'o's Yu-T'ien-t'ai-shan Fu," MS 20, 1961, 226–245.

Murakami Shun (村上俊), "Tōdai Zen shisō kenkyū," HDKZ-KKH 4, 1996, 1–657.

Nielson, T.P., The T'ang Poet-Monk Chiao-jan, Tempe, 1972.

Ouyang Xun (歐陽詢), Yiwen leiju (藝文類句), Shanghai, 1982.

Owen, S., The End of the Chinese "Middle Ages", Stanford, 1997.

Palumbo, A., An Early Chinese Commentary on the Ekottarika-āgama: The Fenbie gongde lun 分別功德論 and the History of the Translation of the Zengyi ahan jing 增一阿含經, Taipei, 2013.

Saitō Takanobu (齊藤隆信), Kango Butten ni okeru ge no kenkyū (漢語佛典における偈の研究), Kyoto, 2013.

Sun Changwu (孫昌武), "Haku Kyoi to Bukkyō: Zen to Jōdo" (白居易と佛教: 禪と淨土), in: Ōta Tsugio et al., eds., Haku Kyōi kenkyū kōza, vol. I, Tokyo, 1993, 181–205.

Sun Changwu, Chansi yu shiqing (禪思与詩情), Beijing, ^{2}2006.

Tafel-Kehren, D., Einige Gedichte von Wang Wang Fan-chih. Uebersetzungen von Texten aus Fonds Pelliot Chinois Ms. 3833, Bonn, 1982.

Tanaka Ryōshō (田中良昭), Tonkō Zenshū bunken no kenkyū (敦煌禪宗文獻の研究), Tokyo, 1983.

Tian, X., Beacon Fire and Shooting Star: The Literary Criticism of the Liang (502–557), Cambridge MA, 2007.

Waley, A., The Life and Times of Po Chü-i, London, 1949.

Wang, Y., Linguistic Strategies in Daoist Zhuangzi and Chan Buddhism, London, Wawyrtko, S.A., "The Poetics of Ch'an: Upāyic Poetry and Its Taoist Enrichment," CHBJ 5, 1992, 341–77.

Whitaker, K.P.K., "Tsau Jyr and the Introduction of Fannbay 梵唄 into China," BSOAS 20, 1957, 585–598.

Williams, N.M., "The Taste of the Ocean: Jiaoran's Theory of Poetry," TangS 31, 2013, 1–27.
Xiang Chu (項楚), Dunhuang wenxue congkao (敦煌文學叢考), Shanghai, 1991.
Xu Jun (徐俊), Dunhuang shiji canjuan jikao (敦煌詩集殘卷輯考), Beijing, 2000.
Yang, J., The Chan Interpretations of Wang Wei's Poetry: A Critical Review, Hong Kong, 2007.
Yip, W., Chinese Poetry: Major Modes and Genres, Berkeley, 1976.

T.H. (Tim) Barrett

Poet

Chinese Buddhist poetry from th 1279) onward was marked by t Chan Buddhism and the partici emergent literary elite whose writ ingly published and preserved d printing technology. All of these vidual development and occasion the most salient traits of Chinese from the Song until the literary ment (1919).

The special relationship betw poetry has been a recurring subj mostly focused on Chan (Dem 1983; Ge, 1986; Watson, 1988), yielded the study of Chan poetry 1995; Zhang, 2006). The study as literary history has focused o dhist poet-monks and establishe Buddhist-themed poetry (Sun, Buddhist poetry has also been in generating critical discourse ings within the field of poetics, p by literati within the "remarks [詩話]) genre (Du, 1976; Kaji, Zhou, 1992).

This article surveys the notab Buddhist poetry since the Song within monastic institutions an side its formal confines, with a butions of esteemed poet-monk discourse long distinguished be ing" (neixue [內學]) and "oute [外學]), and Southern Song employing "inner works" (neiji works" (waiji [外集]) to organ monks. As a taxonomy for mo are obviously Buddhistic and Buddhist canon. The category many bieji [別集]; "individual lections placed outside the B were often anthologized and lation. In the following, we that both categories of ver ing the Song that greatly inf literary history.

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

Interpretations of Wang Wei's Poetry: Hong Kong, 2007.
try: Major Modes and Genres, Berkeley,

T.H. (Tim) Barrett

Poetry: China (Song and After)

Chinese Buddhist poetry from the Song (宋; 960–1279) onward was marked by the dominance of Chan Buddhism and the participation of a newly emergent literary elite whose writings were increasingly published and preserved due to advances in printing technology. All of these factors, their individual development and occasional confluence, are the most salient traits of Chinese Buddhist literature from the Song until the literary May Fourth Movement (1919).

The special relationship between Buddhism and poetry has been a recurring subject of scholarship, mostly focused on Chan (Demiéville, 1970; Iriya, 1983; Ge, 1986; Watson, 1988), which has further yielded the study of Chan poetry and aesthetics (Pi, 1995; Zhang, 2006). The study of Buddhist poetry as literary history has focused on noteworthy Buddhist poet-monks and established poets who wrote Buddhist-themed poetry (Sun, 2006; Xiao, 2012). Buddhist poetry has also been studied for its role in generating critical discourse and influential sayings within the field of poetics, primarily articulated by literati within the "remarks on poetry" (shihua [詩話]) genre (Du, 1976; Kaji, 1979; Lynn, 1987; Zhou, 1992).

This article surveys the notable developments of Buddhist poetry since the Song, both as cultivated within monastic institutions and as circulated outside its formal confines, with a focus on the contributions of esteemed poet-monks. Chinese Buddhist discourse long distinguished between "inner learning" (neixue [内學]) and "outer learning" (waixue [外學]), and Southern Song compilers began employing "inner works" (neiji [内集]) and "outer works" (waiji [外集]) to organize the literature of monks. As a taxonomy for monkish authors, neiji are obviously Buddhistic and belong within the Buddhist canon. The category of waiji (including many bieji [別集]; "individual works") refers to collections placed outside the Buddhist canon that were often anthologized and enjoyed wide circulation. In the following, we outline the changes that both categories of verse underwent during the Song that greatly influenced subsequent literary history.

Chan Buddhist Poetry in the Song and Its Influence

The growth and institutionalization of Chan Buddhism as the foremost Buddhist tradition of the Song, along with the invention of new forms of Chan literature, had an enormous impact on the collection and conceptualization of poetry written by Buddhist monks. The two most prominent, and closely related, Chan literary innovations, "lamp records" (denglu [燈錄]) and "recorded sayings" (yulu [語錄]), both came to maturity during the Song. While denglu are extensive genealogical histories of Chan lineages that compile exemplary writings and anecdotes from hundreds of masters, yulu collect the sermons and writings of individual abbots. Both types of literature include the poetry of Chan monks in significant quantities, which tends to increase and diversify through the Song and later dynasties. Although the verses within denglu and yulu can be classified according to various genres and subgenres, they are all broadly conceptualized as jisong (偈頌), the Chinese rendering of Sanskrit gāthā, roughly meaning Buddhist religious verse.

Chan Doctrinal Verse

The term jisong originally refers to the verse sections of Indian Buddhist sūtras. In China, the term also included newly written verses on Buddhist doctrine, and this didactic function of jisong remained prevalent within Chan literature from the Tang to Song. At the forefront of most Chan denglu is a master-by-master account of the mind-to-mind transmission from Śākyamuni Buddha to the Chinese patriarchs, where the "wordless" dharma is embodied in a series of transmission verses. The didactic efficacy of poetry is further displayed in the collection of long inscriptions (ming [銘]) and songs (ge [歌]), mostly attributed to Chan masters from the Tang. The most influential denglu, Daoyuan's (道原; fl. 1004) Jingde chuandeng lu (景德傳燈錄; Jingde Era Record of the Transmission of the Lamp; T. 2076), collects many lengthy versifications (juan 29–30), including Xinxin ming (信心銘; Faith in

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

Mind) and Zhengdao ge (證道歌; Song of Enlightenment), that became fundamental expressions of Chan doctrine.

Elaborate doctrinal verses, such as Hongzhi Zhengjue's (宏智正覺; 1091–1157) Mozhao ming (默照銘; Inscription of Silent Illumination), continued to be composed by Song dynasty masters. In addition, masters frequently wrote verses on concepts drawn from the Mahāyāna Buddhist tradition and composed poetic series on Chan doctrinal schemes, especially Dongshan Liangjie's (洞山良价; 807–869 CE) "five ranks" (wuwei [五位]). Besides composing verses on set topics, Chan masters employed verse in sermons to illustrate their points, often in reference to well-known Chan dialogues. Inscriptions, songs, and jisong by Tang and Song masters were anthologized in subsequent denglu and other compilations like the Song dynasty Chanmen zhuzushi jisong (禪門諸祖師偈頌; Gāthā of Chan Patriarchs and Masters; ZZ 1298; Shiina, 2003).

Expansion of the Form and Function of Jisong

As the writings of Chan masters were increasingly recorded in yulu, the conceptualization of jisong expanded through the Song to include a broader range of poetic activity representative of practices within Chan monasteries. In Song yulu, jisong is no longer limited to verses that are strictly devoted to doctrinal themes but includes a great deal of social and occasional verse and reclusive poetry, along with praise poetry and new genres particular to the Chan establishment (see below). Although the yulu attributed to Tang dynasty masters rarely contain more than a handful of poems, poetry consistently appears as part of the records of Song dynasty masters and is often collected within a distinct section of jisong (for Tang and Song yulu, see T. vols. 47–48; ZZ 62–73). Jisong sections can be brief, but most yulu include between 50 and 200 verses, while there are more than 1,000 verses in master Hongzhi Zhengjue's (宏智正覺) Hongzhi chanshi guanglu (宏智禪師廣錄; Extensive Records of Chan Master Hongzhi; T. 2001). The recurrence of particular poetic forms and themes indicates that the composition of set types of verse constituted a key activity for Chan monks (see below).

The social and occasional poetry within yulu includes parting poems (songbieshi [送別詩] or zengbieshi [贈別詩]), poems written in the reclusive mode, epistolary verse, and verses written on specific occasions within the monastery. Although this poetry exhibits similarities with Buddhist-inspired poetry written by laypersons or collected in the "outer works" of poet-monks, overall the Buddhist character of these verses is heightened. They often contain explicit Buddhist terminology or are at least coded with recurrent metaphors and images that have religious significance within the corpus of Chan literature. Secular modes, such as the parting poem, are primarily exchanged between monks and are developed into metaphorical expositions of Chan philosophy. In general, only poetry with explicit, or strongly implicit, Buddhist significance is admitted into a master's yulu, whereas the literati-style poetry (shi [詩]) of poet-monks deals with a greater variety of nonreligious topics, including poems on history and books, on seasonal occasions, and on objects.

Due to the fact that doctrinal verses were also often exchanged among monks, there is no categorical distinction between doctrinal and social and occasional poetry within yulu. The following types of verse, however, may be collected separately from, or under subheadings within, a selection of jisong.

Praise poetry, particularly zan (讚/賛/贊; encomium or eulogy), formed an integral part of the ritual and social life of Chan monasteries. Zan are written in rhymed parallel couplets of irregular line length, usually as "portrait encomia" (zhenzan [真讚]) inscribed on images of illustrious masters and popular Buddhist figures. These portraits were used in funerary rites and for the worship of bodhisattvas. During the Song, masters also began writing encomia for portraits of themselves (zizan [自讚]), which were disseminated to lay and monastic followers to garner patronage and as a means of fundraising (Foulk & Sharf, 1993). The practice of composing self-encomia became prevalent among literati (Xie, 2012), who also wrote encomia for Chan masters and other popular figures, especially the bodhisattva Guanyin (Skt. Avalokiteśvara). Zan are similar in form and function to funerary verses written for deceased monks (foshi [佛事]) and are similar in tenor to pagoda inscriptions (taming [塔銘]) dedicated to the lives of illustrious masters.

One of the most distinctive and ubiquitous poetic genres within yulu is songgu (頌古). Songgu are versified responses to Chan gong'an (公案; Jpn. kōan), brief anecdotes and dialogues drawn from denglu as exemplars of Chan insight. While modern scholarship has focused on the language and use of the gong'an case, the master's poetic commentary was the literary focal point of Song dynasty collections. Some collections of songgu circulated independently, and songgu are at the core of the major gong'an collections. The best-known examples are

---

Wumenguan (無門關; Gateless Gat posed by Wumen Huikai (無門 and the Biyanlu (碧巖錄; The B Jpn. Hekigan-roku; T. 2003), fe Keqin's (圓悟克勤; 1063–1135) pros mentary on a collection of Xue (雪竇重顯; 980–1052) songgu (Hsi were also anthologized in the C lianzhu ji (禪宗頌古聯珠集; S Collection of Songgu of the Chan published in 1175, which organi verses under several hundred indi

Later Developments and Oth Traditions

The standards in Chan poetic gen established during the Song had a on Buddhist poetic activity. Just a monks increasingly resembled th Song laypersons in turn began to of Chan literature, a tradition tha subsequent dynasties. Celebrate (蘇軾; 1037–1101; also known as 坡]) and Huang Tingjian (黃庭 example, are best known for the shi poetry. However, they also co and taming, as did many others

In later dynasties, monks c yulu, produce Chan histories, a evident within Ming and Qing Q 153–158), late imperial jisong ued to expand and include co of social and occasional poetr poetic genres of Song China we and Korea, as Zen and Sŏn m own yulu (Jpn. goroku; Kor.
gious verse, and absorbed the of poet-monks (Pollack, 1985; P Whitfield, 2012). Poetry comp tral to kōan practice within Jap teries today (Hori, 2003).

Despite the immense lite monks, Buddhist poetry since limited to either Chan monk During the Song, the Tiantai produced their own verse coll Ciyun Zunshi (慈雲遵式; 964 nal verses are found in part 別集; Individual Collection of Temple; ZZ 951), compiled alizing Tiantai worthies, in zhaiji lizanwen (天台智者大 Veneration and Praise for by laypersons or collected in the f poet-monks, overall the Buddhist se verses is heightened. They often Buddhist terminology or are at least urrent metaphors and images that gnificance within the corpus of Chan ar modes, such as the parting poem, xchanged between monks and are metaphorical expositions of Chan eneral, only poetry with explicit, or t, Buddhist significance is admitted ulu, whereas the literati-style poetry t-monks deals with a greater variety topics, including poems on history easonal occasions, and on objects.

act that doctrinal verses were also d among monks, there is no categorbetween doctrinal and social and ry within yulu. The following types er, may be collected separately from, adings within, a selection of jisong.
, particularly zan (讚/贊/賛; enco-y), formed an integral part of the l life of Chan monasteries. Zan are med parallel couplets of irregular ally as "portrait encomia" (zhenzan ed on images of illustrious mas-ar Buddhist figures. These portraits nerary rites and for the worship of uring the Song, masters also began a for portraits of themselves (zizan were disseminated to lay and monasgarner patronage and as a means of ulk & Sharf, 1993). The practice of -encomia became prevalent among 2), who also wrote encomia for Chan her popular figures, especially the anyin (Skt. Avalokiteśvara). Zan are and function to funerary verses writ-d monks (foshi [佛事]) and are simipagoda inscriptions (taming [塔銘]) e lives of illustrious masters.
most distinctive and ubiquitous within yulu is songgu (頌古). Songgu esponses to Chan gong'an (公案; f anecdotes and dialogues drawn from plars of Chan insight. While modern s focused on the language and use of se, the master's poetic commentary y focal point of Song dynasty collecllections of songgu circulated inde-songgu are at the core of the major tions. The best-known examples are

Wumenguan (無門關; Gateless Gate; T. 2005) composed by Wumen Huikai (無門慧開; 1183–1260) and the Biyanlu (碧巖錄; The Blue-Cliff Record; Jpn. Hekigan-roku; T. 2003), featuring Yuanwu Keqin's (圓悟克勤; 1063–1135) prose and verse commentary on a collection of Xuedou Chongxian's (雪竇重顯; 980–1052) songgu (Hsieh, 2010). Songgu were also anthologized in the Chanzong songgu lianzhu ji (禪宗頌古聯珠集; String of Pearls Collection of Songgu of the Chan School; ZZ 1295), published in 1175, which organizes thousands of verses under several hundred individual cases.

Later Developments and Other Buddhist Traditions

The standards in Chan poetic genres and collections established during the Song had an enduring impact on Buddhist poetic activity. Just as the jisong of Chan monks increasingly resembled the poetry of literati, Song laypersons in turn began to emulate the genres of Chan literature, a tradition that persisted through subsequent dynasties. Celebrated poets like Su Shi (蘇軾; 1037–1101; also known as Su Dongpo [蘇東坡]) and Huang Tingjian (黃庭堅; 1045–1105), for example, are best known for their Buddhist-themed shi poetry. However, they also composed jisong, zan, and taming, as did many others (Li, 2008).

In later dynasties, monks continued to collect yulu, produce Chan histories, and write songgu. As evident within Ming and Qing yulu (See J 24–40; Q 153–158), late imperial jisong collections continued to expand and include considerable amounts of social and occasional poetry. Furthermore, the poetic genres of Song China were taken up in Japan and Korea, as Zen and Sŏn masters crafted their own yulu (Jpn. goroku; Kor. ŏrok), produced religious verse, and absorbed the literary sensibilities of poet-monks (Pollack, 1985; Pihl, 1995; Heine, 2012; Whitfield, 2012). Poetry composition remains central to kōan practice within Japanese Rinzai monasteries today (Hori, 2003).

Despite the immense literary output of Chan monks, Buddhist poetry since the Song has not been limited to either Chan monks or Chan interests. During the Song, the Tiantai and Huayan schools produced their own verse collections. For instance, Ciyun Zunshi (慈雲遵式; 964–1032), whose doctrinal verses are found in part in Tianzhu bieji (天竺別集; Individual Collection of the Abbot of Tianzhu Temple; ZZ 951), compiled a liturgy for memorializing Tiantai worthies, in Tiantai Zhizhe dashi zhaiji lizanwen (天台智者大師齋忌禮讚文; Text of Veneration and Praise for Observing the Memorial of Master Tiantai Zhiyi; T. 1948), and Zhigong (智肱; 11th cent.) did the same for the Huayan patriarch Chengguan (澄觀; 738–839 CE) in Huayan Qingliang guoshi lizanwen (華嚴清涼國師禮讚文; Text of Veneration and Praise for National Instructor Huayan Qingliang; ZZ 1471). In addition, Buddhist monks across sectarian affiliations wrote verses praising Amitābha and his Pure Land, as anthologized in the Song dynasty collection Lebang wenlei (樂邦文類; Compendium of the Land of Bliss; T. 1969), for example. Pure Land poetry notably figures in the works of late imperial monks like Yunqi Zhuhong (雲棲祩宏; 1535–1615).

Buddhist Poetry in Chinese Literature since the Song

The literary history of Chinese Buddhist poetry is long, but changes during the Song dynasty had far-reaching impacts. The Tang-Song transition witnessed the ascendancy of a new and powerful class of literati who rose to positions of authority by passing through the civil-service-examination system. Together with new woodblock-printing technologies, the examination system encouraged the spread of literacy and shifted cultural trends toward literati concerns. As these demographic changes coincided with the rise of an empire-wide network of Chan temples, the saṅgha became more intertwined with the new literati elite. From the Song, monks' poetry deeply reflected the interests and tastes of literati.

Poet-monks (shiseng [詩僧]) occupy a curious place between the religious and literary traditions. At times, they have been criticized for being too Buddhist (not enough like literati) or not Buddhist enough (too much like literati), and the tension between commitments to serving religious office and to practicing poetic arts is a recurring theme in Buddhist poetry starting from the Tang (Watson, 1992). Although the term "poet-monk" was not an official title and did not belong to a single Buddhist tradition, by the Southern Song, poet-monks increasingly were associated with Chan lineages, and this did not change until the late Ming. Song critics alleged that the forerunners of this practice were the mid-Tang monk Jiaoran (皎然; 720–c. 795 CE) and late-Tang monks Guanxiu (貫休; 832–912 CE) and Qiji (齊己; 863–937 CE). Down to today, the term "poet-monk" itself has come into and out of fashion, and at times it was employed derogatively. Poet-monks never emerged as a formal organization, institution or lineage, but local literary traditions occasionally took root. Nonetheless, the works of poet-monks and other literary monks occupy a conspicuous place in Chinese Buddhist literature.

The rise of literati to powerful positions in Northern Song dynasty (960–1127) society led to sweeping new literary styles. The "ancient prose" (guwen [古文]) movement emphasized clarity and precision in prose and had unexpected impacts on poetry as well. Shi poetry of the Song dynasty is known for its narrative and descriptive manner, philosophical intellection, interest in the ordinary events of everyday life, and strong social concerns. Compared with the so-called Late Tang style, mid-Northern Song poetics after the guwen movement emphasized refined plainness (pingdan [平淡]; "even and bland"), an ideal first formulated by Mei Yaochen (梅堯臣; 1002–1060).

The poetry of Song dynasty monks reflected general literary trends. A group posthumously known as the "nine monks" (jiuseng; 九僧), for instance, lived and wrote before the Song guwen movement had come to the fore, and their poems were soon out of fashion. In contrast, most eminent monks of the Northern Song engaged the new poetic tradition. The poet-monk Daoqian (道潛; 1043–1112[?]) corresponded with leading literary figures, especially Su Shi, and his Canliaozi shiji (參寥子詩集; The Collected Poems of Master Canliao; SBCK 407–408) embodies the aesthetics of pingdan (Kong, 2011). The eloquent intellectual Mingjiao Qisong (明教契嵩; 1007–1072), though best known for his essays, was beloved by contemporaries for the fashionable poems collected within the Tanjin wenji (鐔津文集; Collected Works of [the Monk from] Tanjin; T. 2115; SBCK 400–406). The works of Juefan Huihong (覺範惠洪; 1071–1128) are a touchstone in the evolution of the relationship between Buddhist poetry and practice. His prose about poetry, both in his literary collection Shimen Wenzi Chan (石門文字禪; The Lettered Chan of Shimen; SBCK 1015–1022; see also Kakumon, 2012) and his shihua work Lengzhai yehua (冷齋夜話; Evening Remarks from Cold Studio; included in the Xijianben Songren shihua sizhong [稀見本宋人詩話四種; Four Rare Editions of Song-Era Shihua]), was, perhaps, more influential than his poetry itself (Kakumon, 2012). Unlike most monks, Juefan Huihong dabbled in the newly popular and flamboyant song-lyric (ci [詞]) mode, albeit in a subdued and often explicitly Buddhist fashion. Juefan Huihong is associated most closely with the term "lettered Chan" (wenzi chan [文字禪]), and there is lively debate concerning its definition and significance (Gimello, 1992; Zhou, 1998; Keyworth, 2001; Xiao, 2012).

From the Song onward, scholar-officials involved themselves in the religious traditions of Buddhism and Daoism even as they upheld Confucian norms and fealty to the imperial court. Many literati participated in religious rites in their official capacity for the benefit of local municipalities as well as learning to meditate, studying gong'an, and reading scriptures. Laypersons, like Su Shi, not only wrote poetry in Buddhist genres but also appropriated Buddhist themes for exploration in contemplative poetry (Egan, 1994; Grant, 1994a). Su Shi, together with Huang Tingjian, borrowed Buddhist concepts like "the samādhi of play" (youxi sanmei [遊戲三昧]) and reinterpreted them to describe the creative arts (Zhou, 1998; Egan, 2010). The Ming-era collection Dongpo Chan xi ji (東坡禪喜集; Su Dongpo's Felicities of Chan) placed Su Shi's Buddhist works back in popular circulation.

The Jurchen invasions and calamitous siege of the Northern Song capital at Kaifeng in 1127 led to the establishment of a new capital at Lin'an (present-day Hangzhou) and the beginning of the Southern Song dynasty (1127–1279). The period is characterized by an "inward turn" toward local power and activity and away from the centralized authority of the imperial court. Though poetry of the Southern Song is often described in terms of the development of Daoxue (道學, "Neo-Confucianism"), this overlooks the central role of Buddhist poetry. Surviving sources suggest that monks engaged in literary arts more than ever, and the period witnessed a profusion of "literary monks" (wenxue seng [文學僧]; Huang, 2010; 2014). Anthologies of Buddhist poetry from the Southern Song also circulated widely, including the Song gaoseng shixuan (宋高僧詩選; Selected Poems of Eminent Monks of the Song; CMYSXB 1; XXSKQS 1621) and Jianghu fengyue ji (江湖風月集; A Collection of Wind and Moon from Rivers and Lakes; ZZ 11). Yanagida Seizan and Nishitani Keiji (1974) and Shiina Kōyū (1993) provide essential reference works for additional information on the editions and publication history of Song and Yuan sources.

The long, bloody fall of the Southern Song to Mongol forces and the establishment of the Yuan dynasty (1271–1368) cast a pallor over all society, and the poetry of Chinese elites responded to their sudden exclusion from governance under an alien dynasty. Many literati turned away from civil service and toward education, local networks, and religions

---

including Buddhism and its lite
The Jin dynasty poet Yuan Haowe 1257) was influential for both his o Chan terms and his serving as a con Su Shi's legacy in the Yuan. Khita Chucai (耶律楚材; 1190–1244) dis self in service to the early Mongol immortalized as a Confucian sta lected poems in Zhanran jushi wen Collected Writings of the Layman zan and jisong and touch on many Though doctrinal schools of ished in northern China during t Yuan dynasties, there are relati literary works to speak of. It was that flourished in China's south continued to develop Buddhist no monk from the Yuan accompl the eminent Zhongfeng Min 1263–1323), who lived in souther his many cultural achievements themes ranging across Chan and ing one hundred poems "imitatin (ni Hanshan [擬寒山]) and a highl cycle on the plum blossom (Heller most beloved poet-monks of the master Shiwu Qinggong (石屋 who wrote hundreds of "living-i (shanju [山居]) poems (Red Pine,
The advent of the Ming dy marked the restoration of a Chin
The poetry of the early Ming, unadorned simplicity, was in ma priation of Yuan period aesthetic Ming that is regarded as the sea most significant and long-lastin literary developments. Likewise, Buddhism was a ubiquitous pre the entire Ming dynasty, the late profusion of Buddhist literature, the Buddhist revival of the Wanli The "four great monks" at the fo revival – Yunqi Zhuhong, Hansha 清; 1546–1623), Zibo Zhenke (紫 and Ouyi Zhixu (蕅益智旭; 1599 significant literary figures, whos canonized in their respective co poetry of earlier monks circulat reprinting of individual collectio tion of new anthologies like th Gujin Chanzao ji (古今禪藻集; C Duckweed Past and Present; SK ere is lively debate concerning its ignificance (Gimello, 1992; Zhou, 2001; Xiao, 2012).

g onward, scholar-officials involved e religious traditions of Buddhism n as they upheld Confucian norms imperial court. Many literati pargious rites in their official capacit of local municipalities as well as tate, studying gong'an, and reading ersons, like Su Shi, not only wrote hist genres but also appropriated s for exploration in contemplative 94; Grant, 1994a). Su Shi, together jian, borrowed Buddhist concepts i of play" (youxi sanmei [遊戲三 reted them to describe the creative Egan, 2010). The Ming-era collecan xi ji (東坡禪喜集; Su Dongpo's n) placed Su Shi's Buddhist works circulation.
vasions and calamitous siege of the apital at Kaifeng in 1127 led to the a new capital at Lin'an (present-day he beginning of the Southern Song 79). The period is characterized by toward local power and activity and ntralized authority of the imperial etry of the Southern Song is often ns of the development of Daoxue nfucianism"), this overlooks the uddhist poetry. Surviving sources nks engaged in literary arts more he period witnessed a profusion ks" (wenxue seng [文學僧]; Huang, ologies of Buddhist poetry from the so circulated widely, including the xuan (宋高僧詩選; Selected Poems ks of the Song; CMYSXB 1; XXSKQS u fengyue ji (江湖風月集; A Collecl Moon from Rivers and Lakes; ZT zan and Nishitani Keiji (1974) and
3) provide essential reference works ormation on the editions and pub-f Song and Yuan sources. ody fall of the Southern Song to nd the establishment of the Yuan 68) cast a pallor over all society, f Chinese elites responded to their n from governance under an alien erati turned away from civil service ation, local networks, and religions, including Buddhism and its literary proclivities. The Jin dynasty poet Yuan Haowen (元好問; 1190–1257) was influential for both his own borrowing of Chan terms and his serving as a conduit for updating Su Shi's legacy in the Yuan. Khitan statesman Yelü Chucai (耶律楚材; 1190–1244) distinguished himself in service to the early Mongol Empire. Though immortalized as a Confucian statesman, his collected poems in Zhanran jushi wenji (湛然居士文集; Collected Writings of the Layman Zhanran) include zan and jisong and touch on many Buddhist themes.

Though doctrinal schools of Buddhism flourished in northern China during the Liao, Jin, and Yuan dynasties, there are relatively few extant literary works to speak of. It was Chan Buddhism that flourished in China's southerly regions that continued to develop Buddhist poetry. Perhaps no monk from the Yuan accomplished more than the eminent Zhongfeng Mingben (中峯明本; 1263–1323), who lived in southern China. Among his many cultural achievements is his poetry on themes ranging across Chan and Pure Land, including one hundred poems "imitating Cold Mountain" (ni Hanshan [擬寒山]) and a highly regarded poetic cycle on the plum blossom (Heller, 2014). One of the most beloved poet-monks of the Yuan is the Chan master Shiwu Qinggong (石屋清珙; 1272–1352), who wrote hundreds of "living-in-the-mountains" (shanju [山居]) poems (Red Pine, 1999).

The advent of the Ming dynasty (1368–1644) marked the restoration of a Chinese-ruled empire. The poetry of the early Ming, characterized by unadorned simplicity, was in many ways an appropriation of Yuan period aesthetics, and it is the late Ming that is regarded as the seat of the dynasty's most significant and long-lasting intellectual and literary developments. Likewise, though monastic Buddhism was a ubiquitous presence throughout the entire Ming dynasty, the late Ming witnessed a profusion of Buddhist literature, especially during the Buddhist revival of the Wanli reign (1573–1620). The "four great monks" at the fore of this Buddhist revival – Yunqi Zhuhong, Hanshan Deqing (憨山德清; 1546–1623), Zibo Zhenke (紫柏真可; 1543–1603), and Ouyi Zhixu (蕅益智旭; 1599–1655) – were also significant literary figures, whose poetry has been canonized in their respective collected works. The poetry of earlier monks circulated anew with the reprinting of individual collections and the production of new anthologies like the comprehensive Gujin Chanzao ji (古今禪藻集; Collection of Chan Duckweed Past and Present; SKQS 1416). New Buddhist poetry in this period was voluminous, and many literary monks rose to prominence. Qian Qianyi (錢謙益; 1582–1664) included about one hundred eminent monks from the era in his period anthology Liechao shiji (列朝詩集; Poems from Successive Dynasties), and there are well over two hundred individual literary collections from monks from the late Ming and early Qing dynasties (Huang, 2011). Noteworthy among them is Xuelang Hong'en (雪浪洪恩; 1545–1608), best known as the patriarch of the late Ming revival of Huayan-Yogācāra, whose poetry is found in the Xuelang ji (雪浪集; Collection of Xuelang; SKQSCC 190) and the Xuelang xuji (雪浪續集; Further Collection of Xuelang; CMYSXB 2; Liao, 2008). Although many works of poetry can be found in the Jiaxing and Qianlong editions of the Buddhist canon, the works of other celebrated poet-monks, like Huishan Jiexian (晦山戒顯; 1610–1672), only survive in rare manuscripts. Some of these are now available in modern annotated editions, such as the poetry of Cangxue Duche (蒼雪讀徹; 1588–1656; Sun, 2004; Liao, 2014).

Buddhist poetry from the Ming-Qing transition is often interpreted in light of the Ming loyalists. Dissatisfactions with Manchu rule of the Qing dynasty (1644–1911) were lodged in poetry and postures of eremitism as forms of protest. Hanyue Fazang (漢月法藏; 1573–1635) was a celebrated poet-monk whose lineage became a bastion of Ming loyalist sentiment and attracted many literati followers. Many Ming loyalists took up robes as refuge, a phenomenon known as "escaping into Chan" (tao chan [逃禪]; Wu, 2008). The erstwhile Ming official Jin Bao (金堡; dharma name Dangui Jinshi [澹歸今釋]; 1614–1680) was one of several officials who took the tonsure under the literary Caodong monk Tianran Hanshi (天然函是; 1608–1685). While in the monastery, Jin Bao wrote poetry so nostalgic for the lost Ming dynasty that one hundred years later it was banned by the Qing government. On the other hand, Muchen Daomin (木陳道忞; 1596–1674) shifted away from Ming loyalist sentiments after traveling north to meet the young Qing emperor Shunzhi (順治; r. 1644–1661). Poems from his meeting with the emperor and his time in the capital are recorded in the Beiyouji (北遊集; A Record of Travels to the North; J B180; Liao, 2008).

The Ming and Qing witnessed a remarkable rise in the writings and publications of gentry women, who were often attracted to the universalistic aspects of Buddhism in contrast to the restricted gender roles prescribed by the prevailing Neo-Confucian ideology. Along with writing verses on popular topics such as Pure Land devotion or the practice of embroidering images of buddhas and bodhisattvas, a number of laywomen produced entire poetry collections with strong Buddhist inclinations, which have been the subject of recent studies (Grant, 1994b; 1999; Fong, 2007; see also the Ming Qing Women's Writings website). Although Buddhist nuns since the Song had long composed poetry that was collected in yulu and anthologized in other Chan literary collections, the quantity of verses and other writings preserved is minimal before the flourishing print culture of the Ming and Qing. The best source for the poetry of Buddhist nuns since the Tang is Xu biqiuni zhuan (續比丘尼傳; Further Biographies of Nuns), whose poetic contents, along with poetry included in the handful of extant yulu of Ming-Qing Buddhist nuns, have been translated and studied by B. Grant (2001; 2003).

As the Qing imperium disintegrated, many public intellectuals turned to Buddhism for inspiration. The Buddhist renaissance of the late Qing and early Republic of China period was one of debate, disenchantment, and sweeping reforms. The celebrated ascetic monk and politically active institutional reformer Jing'an (敬安; 1851–1912; also known as Bazhi Toutuo [八指頭陀]) engaged deeply with the classical poetic tradition but in an iconoclastic style. Some of his poems directly respond to the violence and imperialism of the 19th century. Like many before him, he also used poetry to correspond with learned men and in more meditative moments addressed new philosophical and practical concerns (Huang, 2011).

The changes wrought upon literature by the end of imperial China and the rise of modern China are hard to overstate. In spite of assertions to the contrary, Buddhist ideas have remained a powerful force in modern creative arts and literature, especially novels and plays. Zhou Mengdie (周夢蝶; 1921–2014), born on the heels of the May Fourth Movement, may be the best-known modern Buddhist poet. Zhou Mengdie wrote idiosyncratic free verse full of allusions to traditional as well as world literatures (Zeng, 2005). Although the future of Chinese Buddhist poetry remains to be seen, interest in the Chinese Buddhist poetic tradition in both the Chinese- and English-speaking worlds remains strong as seen within numerous scholarly investigations, anthologies (Chen et al., 1982; Zhu & Chen, 2012), and recent translations (Red Pine et al., 1998; Egan, 2010).

Bibliography

Chen Xiang (陳香) et al., Chanshi liubai shou (禪詩六百首), Taipei, 1982, repr. 2008.

Demiéville, P., "Le Tch'an et la Poésie Chinoise," Hermès 7, 1970, 123–136.

Du Songbo (杜松柏), Chanxue yu Tang Song shixue (禪學與唐宋詩學), Taipei, 1976.

Egan, C., Clouds Thick, Whereabouts Unknown: Poems by Zen Monks of China, New York, 2010.

Egan, R., "The Northern Song (1020–1126)," in: K.S. Chang & S. Owen, eds., The Cambridge History of Chinese Literature, vol. I, Cambridge UK, 2010, 381–464.

Egan, R., Word, Image, and Deed in the Life of Su Shi, Cambridge MA, 1994.

Fong, G.S., "A Recluse of the Inner Quarters: The Poet Ji Xian (1614–1683)," EMW 2, 2007, 29–41.

Foulk, T.G., & R.H. Sharf, "On the Ritual Use of Ch'an Portraiture in Medieval China," CEA 7/1, 1993, 149–219.

Ge Zhaoguang (葛兆光), Chanzong yu Zhongguo wenhua (禪宗與中國文化), Shanghai, 1986.

Gimello, R., "Mārga and Culture: Learning, Letters, and Liberation in Northern Sung Ch'an," in: R. Buswell & R. Gimello, eds., Paths to Liberation: The Mārga and Its Transformation in Buddhist Thought, Honolulu, 1992, 371–437.

Grant, B., Daughters of Emptiness: Poems of Chinese Buddhist Nuns, Boston, 2003.

Grant, B., "Through the Empty Gate: The Poetry of Buddhist Nuns in Late Imperial China," in: M. Weidner, ed., Cultural Intersections in Later Chinese Buddhism, Honolulu, 2001, 87–113.

Grant, B., "Little Vimalakirti: Buddhism in the Writings of Chiang Chu (1764–1804)," in: H. Zurndorfer, ed., Chinese Women in the Imperial Past: New Perspectives, Leiden, 1999, 286–307.

Grant, B., Mount Lu Revisited: Buddhism in the Life and Writings of Su Shih, Honolulu, 1994a.

Grant, B., "Who is this I? Who is that Other? The Poetry of an Eighteenth Century Buddhist Laywoman," LIC 15/11, 1994b, 47–86.

Heine, S., "When Dōgen Went to China: Chan Poetry He Did and Did Not Write," HLCP 6, 2012, 75–100.

Heller, N., Illusory Abiding: The Cultural Construction of the Chan Monk Zhongfeng Mingben (1263–1323), Cambridge MA, 2014.

Hori, G.V.S., Zen Sand: The Book of Capping Phrases for Kōan Practice, Honolulu, 2003.

Hsieh, D., "Poetry and Chan 'Gong'an': From Xuedou Chongxian (980–1052) to Wumen Huikai (1183–1260)," JSYS 40, 2010, 39–70.

Huang Jingjia (黃敬家), Shi Chan, Kuang Chan, Nü Chan: Zhongguo Chanzong wenxue yu wenhua (詩禪, 狂禪, 女禪: 中國禪宗文學與文化探論), Taipei, 2011.

Huang Qijiang [Ch'i-chiang] (黃啓江), Nan Song liu wenxue seng jinianlu (南宋六文學僧紀念錄), Taipei, 2014.

Huang Qijiang [Ch'i-chiang] (黃啓江), Yiwei Chan yu Jianghu shi (一味禪與江湖詩), Taipei, 2010.

Iriya Yoshitaka (入矢義高), Gudō to etsu to shi (求道と悅楽: 中国の禅と詩), 2012.

Kaji Tetsujō (加地哲定), Zōho Chūgo kenkyū (増補中國佛教文學研究), 1979.

Kakumon Kantetsu (廓門貫徹), ed., Zh 注石門文字禪 (Chū sekimon moji zen

Keyworth, G., "Transmitting the Lamp sical Chan Buddhism: Juefan Huih Literary Chan," diss., University of C 2001.

Kong Fanli (孔凡禮), "Song shiseng kaolüe" (宋詩僧道潛生平考略), XL

Li Geng (李更), "Jizansong guankui" ( 7, 2008, 621–634.

Liao Zhaoheng [Liao Chao-heng] (
Ming Qing Fomen renwu qunxiang ji 明清佛門人物群像及其藝文), Taip

Liao Zhaoheng [Liao Chao-heng] ( shichan, mengxi: Mingmo Qingchu de chengxian yu kaizhan (中邊, 詩 教文化論述的呈現與開展), Taipei,

Lynn, R., "The Sudden and the Gradu Criticism: An Examination of the C in: P. Gregory, ed., Sudden and Gr Enlightenment in Chinese Thought, H

Pi Chaowang (皮朝綱), Chanzong de Kaohsiung, 1995.

Pihl, M., "Koryŏ Sŏn Buddhism and Ko
19, 1995, 62–82.

Pollack, D., Zen Poems of the Five Moun

Qian Qianyi (錢謙益), Liechao shiji (列

Red Pine, The Zen Works of Stonehous
a Fourteenth-Century Chinese Hermi repr. Berkeley, 2009.

Red Pine, M. O'Connor & P. Hansen, e Know Me by Now: Buddhist Poet M 1998.

Shiina Kōyū (椎名宏雄), "Zenmo bunken-teki kōsatsu" (《禪門諸

y et al., Chanshi liubai shou (禪詩六百首),

. 2008.
Tch'an et la Poésie Chinoise," Hermès 7, ), Chanxue yu Tang Song shixue (禪學與

i, 1976.
ck, Whereabouts Unknown: Poems by Zen
New York, 2010.
hern Song (1020–1126)," in: K.S. Chang & Cambridge History of Chinese Literature, UK, 2010, 381–464.
ge, and Deed in the Life of Su Shi, Cam-se of the Inner Quarters: The Poet Ji Xian W 2, 2007, 29–41.

harf, "On the Ritual Use of Ch'an Portrai-China," CEA 7/1, 1993, 149–219.
兆光), Chanzong yu Zhongguo wenhua ), Shanghai, 1986.
a and Culture: Learning, Letters, and rthern Sung Ch'an," in: R. Buswell & Paths to Liberation: The Mārga and Its in Buddhist Thought, Honolulu, 1992, of Emptiness: Poems of Chinese Buddhist 3.

the Empty Gate: The Poetry of Buddhist erial China," in: M. Weidner, ed., Cultural ater Chinese Buddhism, Honolulu, 2001, malakirti: Buddhism in the Writings of –1804)," in: H. Zurndorfer, ed., Chinese nperial Past: New Perspectives, Leiden, Revisited: Buddhism in the Life and Writonolulu, 1994a.

is I? Who is that Other? The Poetry of an ry Buddhist Laywoman," LIC 15/11, 1994b, gen Went to China: Chan Poetry He Did e," HLCP 6, 2012, 75–100. biding: The Cultural Construction of the gfeng Mingben (1263–1323), Cambridge

d: The Book of Capping Phrases for Kōan
, 2003.
d Chan 'Gong'an': From Xuedou Chong-o Wumen Huikai (1183–1260)," JSYS 40, 家), Shi Chan, Kuang Chan, Nü Chan: ong wenxue yu wenhua (詩禪, 狂禪, 學與文化探論), Taipei, 2011.

-chiang] (黃啓江), Nan Song liu wenxue 六文學僧紀念錄), Taipei, 2014. chiang] (黃啓江), Yiwei Chan yu Jianghu 詩), Taipei, 2010.

Iriya Yoshitaka (入矢義高), Gudō to etsuraku: chūgoku no zen to shi (求道と悦楽: 中国の禅と詩), Tokyo, 1983, exp. ed. 2012.

Kaji Tetsujō (加地哲定), Zōho Chūgoku Bukkyō bungaku kenkyū (增補中國佛教文學研究), Kyoto, 1965, exp. ed. 1979.

Kakumon Kantetsu (廓門貫徹), ed., Zhu Shimen Wenzi Chan 注石門文字禪 (Chū sekimon moji zen), Beijing, 2012.

Keyworth, G., "Transmitting the Lamp of Learning in Classical Chan Buddhism: Juefan Huihong (1071–1128) and Literary Chan," diss., University of California Los Angeles, 2001.

Kong Fanli (孔凡禮), "Song shiseng Daoqian shengping kaolüe" (宋詩僧道潛生平考略), XLML 18, 2011, 127–182.

Li Geng (李更), "Jizansong guankui" (偈讚頌管窺), BDZGYZJ 7, 2008, 621–634.

Liao Zhaoheng [Liao Chao-heng] (廖肇亨), Julang huilan: Ming Qing Fomen renwu qunxiang ji qi yiwen (巨浪迴瀾 – 明清佛門人物群像及其藝文), Taipei, 2014.

Liao Zhaoheng [Liao Chao-heng] (廖肇亨), Zhongbian, shichan, mengxi: Mingmo Qingchu fojiao wenhua lunshu de chengxian yu kaizhan (中邊, 詩禪, 夢戲: 明末清初佛教文化論述的呈現與開展), Taipei, 2008.

Lynn, R., "The Sudden and the Gradual in Chinese Poetry Criticism: An Examination of the Ch'an-Poetry Analogy," in: P. Gregory, ed., Sudden and Gradual: Approaches to Enlightenment in Chinese Thought, Honolulu, 1987, 381–427.

Pi Chaowang (皮朝綱), Chanzong de meixue (禪宗的美學), Kaohsiung, 1995.

Pihl, M., "Koryŏ Sŏn Buddhism and Korean Literature," KorSt 19, 1995, 62–82.

Pollack, D., Zen Poems of the Five Mountains, New York, 1985.

Qian Qianyi (錢謙益), Liechao shiji (列朝詩集), Beijing, 2007.

Red Pine, The Zen Works of Stonehouse: Poems and Talks of a Fourteenth-Century Chinese Hermit, San Francisco, 1999, repr. Berkeley, 2009.

Red Pine, M. O'Connor & P. Hansen, eds., The Clouds Should Know Me by Now: Buddhist Poet Monks of China, Boston, 1998.

Shiina Kōyū (椎名宏雄), "Zenmon shososhi geju no bunken-teki kōsatsu" (《禅門諸祖師偈頌》の文献的考察), in: Tanaka Ryōshō Hakushi Koki Kinen Ronshū Kankōkai eds., Zengaku kenkyū no shosō: Tanaka Ryōshō Hakushi koki kinen ronshū (禅学研究の諸相: 田中良昭博士古稀記念論集), Tokyo, 2003, 221–242.

Shiina Kōyū (椎名宏雄), Sō-Gen ban Zen seki no kenkyū (宋元版禪籍の研究), Tokyo, 1993.

Sun Changwu (孫昌武), "Shi seng Cangxue" (詩僧蒼雪), PX 20, 2004, 1–13.

Sun Changwu (孫昌武), Chansi yu shiqing (禪思與詩情), Beijing, 1997, exp. ed. 2006.

Watson, B., "Buddhist Poet-Priests of the T'ang," EB 25/2, 1992, 30–58.

Watson, B., "Zen Poetry," in: K. Kraft, ed., Zen: Tradition and Transition, New York, 1988, 105–124.

Whitfield, R., ed., Seon Poems: Selected Works, Seoul, 2012.

Wu, J., Enlightenment in Dispute, New York, 2008.

Xijianben Song ren shihua sizhong (稀見本宋人詩話四種), Nanjing, 2002.

Xiao Lihua [Hsiao Li-hua] (蕭麗華), Wenzi Chan shixue de fazhan guiji (「文字禪」詩學的發展軌跡), Taipei, 2012.

Xie Peifen (謝佩芬), "Ziwo guankan de yingxiang: Songdai zizanwen yanjiu" (自我觀看的影像: 宋代自贊文研究), XX 9, Chengdu, 2012, 104–160.

Xu biqiuni zhuan (續比丘尼傳), ZF XIX, Hefei, 2005.

Yanagida Seizan (柳田聖山) & Nishitani Keiji (西谷啓治), eds., Zenke goroku (禅家語錄), vol. II, Tokyo, 1974.

Yelü Chucai (耶律楚材), Zhanran jushi wenji (湛然居士文集), Beijing, 1986.

Zeng Jinfeng (曾進豐), Sapo shiren Zhou Mengdie (娑婆詩人周夢蝶), Taipei, 2005.

Zhang Jiemo (張節末), Chanzong meixue (禪宗美學), Beijing, 2006.

Zhou Yukai (周裕锴), Wenzi Chan yu Songdai shi xue (文字禪與宋代詩學), Beijing, 1998, repr. Kaohsiung, 2001.

Zhou Yukai (周裕锴), Zhongguo Chanzong yu shige (中國禪宗與詩歌), Shanghai, 1992, repr. Kaohsiung, 1994.

Zhu Gang (朱剛) & Chen Jue (陳珏), Songdai Chanseng shi jikao (宋代禪僧詩輯考), Shanghai, 2012.

Website

Ming Qing Women's Writings: http://digital.library.mcgill.ca/mingqing/.

CHRISTOPHER H. BYRNE
JASON PROTASS

Korean Buddhist Literature in Korean

This is a survey of literature in Korean composed to propagate Buddhism and of other Korean vernacular literature that offers insights in the ways Buddhism functioned in Korean society over the ages, from the 7th to the 21st century.

When the three ancient Korean states of Koguryŏ (高句麗), Paekche (百濟), and Silla (新羅) adopted elements of Chinese culture, the Chinese writing system and sinified Buddhism were prominent among these. Traditionally the adoption of Buddhism is equated with acceptance by the state, which is supposed to have happened in 372 CE in Koguryŏ, in 384 in Paekche, and in 527 in Silla (for this and other general information on the development of Korean Buddhism, see Grayson, 1985, 2002; Buswell, 1983; Inoue Hideo, 1989; Best, 1995; Choi Joon-sik, 2007; Chung Byung-jo, 2007; Ch'oe Pyŏnghŏn et al., 2013; Buswell & Lopez, 2013). While it did not take long before translations were made of the sacred writings of Buddhism into Chinese when Buddhism was introduced from India, a consequence of China's strong and long-established literary tradition, the smaller countries on the borders of China did not have their own writing systems yet and could not boast of a similar tradition. Therefore they tended to adopt written Chinese as a literary language, for a variety of purposes. At the time, a retranslation of the scriptures into the languages that were spoken in ancient Korea was difficult not only because no phonetic writing systems had been developed yet but also because of the nature of the Chinese characters, as the logograms were not suited to render languages that are highly inflected. Thus the states on the peninsula, like other countries on the periphery of China, all adopted Chinese as a written language, which in their cultures assumed a role similar to that of Latin in Europe. The desire to read the Chinese Buddhist scriptures acted as a strong stimulus in this regard. Eventually the educated classes in Korea learned to handle the new language with its writing system as if it were their own. The Korean term for this written language, hanmun (漢文; lit. Chinese writing), will be used here to distinguish the Chinese written by Koreans from writings in Chinese by the Chinese themselves. While hanmun became an integral part of Korean culture, vernacular literature in oral form continued to flourish, both among the elite and among the common people, and consequently Korean culture became characterized by diglossia (Kim Hunggyu, 1997; Peter H. Lee, 2003). This state of affairs lasted until the early 20th century. From the 6th century onward, efforts were made also to write the vernacular by using Chinese characters both for their meaning and for their pronunciation (as phonetic signs approximating Korean sounds), and in 1444 vernacular writing was greatly facilitated by the invention of a simple Korean phonetic alphabet (Ledyard, 1998). Yet hanmun continued to be used thanks to its cultural prestige. Before the 20th century, the quantity of hanmun literature was always infinitely larger than that written in the vernacular, and this applies to Buddhist writings, too. For most purposes, and certainly for treatises on the meaning of sūtras and ritual handbooks, Korean Buddhist monks used hanmun. They also wrote copious amounts of poetry in Chinese. Consequently, studies of "Buddhist literature" tend to be studies of the literature produced in hanmun (Yi Chino, 1997). Buddhist writings in the vernacular, mainly poetry but also some prose, are significant, however, because they provide an insight into the actual meaning of Buddhism in the daily life of the people, who for the most part were incapable of understanding Chinese. The elite, too, occasionally produced important works of Buddhist literature in the vernacular.

Hyangga

No vernacular literature has been handed down from Koguryŏ or Paekche, but from Silla there are 25 songs called hyangga (鄕歌; also called sanoe(ga) [詞腦(歌] or saenaennorae [새냇노래]), of four, eight, or ten lines (Peter H. Lee, 1959; 2003). They were recorded with the help of hyangch'al (鄕札), a system of writing in which some Chinese characters are used for their meaning and others for their pronunciation. From Korea this system was introduced to Japan, where it became known as manyōgana (萬葉がな), as it was used to record the oldest Japanese poetry collection, the Manyōshū (萬葉集

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

Collection of Ten Thousand Leav there was a much larger corpus of hy lection entitled Samdaemok (三代目 the Three Ages), compiled by two B in 888, but this has not been preserve hyangga, 14 are included in the Sam 遺事; Memorabilia of the History of t doms), a history of the early states i Buddhist point of view compiled in by the monk Iryŏn (一然; 1206–1289 are related to Buddhism. This high be because they were transmitted i a Buddhist slant rather than becaus nature of the hyangga. Dating from late 9th century, the hyangga in th have in common the fact that they a rative that explains why and in wha they were sung, which is useful for tion and sometimes provides the that the songs should be regarded a eral songs are directly or indirectl cult of Maitreya (Mirŭk [彌勒]; Lar the narratives in which the songs there are passages that suggest th grafted onto a native cult of dragon [미르]). The Tosolga (兜率歌; So the monk Wŏlmyŏng (月明) expre Maitreya but is placed in a context it had an apotropaic function, servi a second sun that had appeared in hyangga, Mo-Chukchirangga (慕 the hwarang Chukchi), is dedica a member of an association of y the hwarang (花郎; lit. flower boy assumed leadership roles in the b its competitors but also practice centered on Maitreya. The narrati nies the song suggests that Chuk of Maitreya.

Another ode to a hwarang 郎]) – the Ch'an Kip'arangga ( in Praise of [the hwarang] Kip' mous author – contains an allus Pure Land (Kor. Chŏngt'o [淨土 which is more explicitly mentio hyangga: Wŏnwangsaengga (願 Be Reborn in the Pure Land) an (祭亡妹歌; Song for a Dead Siste tices gathered force from the 7t and continued to influence ve until modern times. Wŏnwangs

in Korean

oral form continued to flourish, both e and among the common people, tly Korean culture became characssia (Kim Hunggyu, 1997; Peter H. state of affairs lasted until the early rom the 6th century onward, efforts to write the vernacular by using ters both for their meaning and for tion (as phonetic signs approximatds), and in 1444 vernacular writing litated by the invention of a simple ic alphabet (Ledyard, 1998). Yet, ed to be used thanks to its cultural the 20th century, the quantity of re was always infinitely larger than he vernacular, and this applies to gs, too. For most purposes, and tises on the meaning of sūtras and s, Korean Buddhist monks used so wrote copious amounts of poetry equently, studies of "Buddhist liter-studies of the literature produced hino, 1997). Buddhist writings in ainly poetry but also some prose, owever, because they provide an ctual meaning of Buddhism in the eople, who for the most part were erstanding Chinese. The elite, too, uced important works of Buddhist ernacular.

erature has been handed down Paekche, but from Silla there are ngga (鄕歌; also called sanoe(ga) aennorae [새냇노래]), of four, (Peter H. Lee, 1959; 2003). They h the help of hyangch'al (鄕札), a n which some Chinese characters neaning and others for their pro-Korea this system was introduced became known as manyōgana was used to record the oldest llection, the Manyōshū (萬葉集; lection of Ten Thousand Leaves). Originally there was a much larger corpus of hyangga, in a collection entitled Samdaemok (三代目; Collection of the Three Ages), compiled by two Buddhist monks 888, but this has not been preserved. Of the extant hyangga, 14 are included in the Samguk yusa (三國遺事; Memorabilia of the History of the Three Kingdoms), a history of the early states in Korea from a Buddhist point of view compiled in Chinese in 1285 by the monk Iryŏn (一然; 1206–1289). Eight of these are related to Buddhism. This high proportion may be because they were transmitted in a source with a Buddhist slant rather than because of the general nature of the hyangga. Dating from the 7th to the late 9th century, the hyangga in the Samguk yusa have in common the fact that they are part of a narrative that explains why and in what circumstances they were sung, which is useful for their interpretation and sometimes provides the only indication that the songs should be regarded as Buddhist. Several songs are directly or indirectly related to the cult of Maitreya (Mirŭk [彌勒]; Lancaster, 1989). In the narratives in which the songs are embedded, there are passages that suggest that this cult was grafted onto a native cult of dragons or snakes (mirŭ [미르]). The Tosolga (兜率歌; Song of Tuṣita) by the monk Wŏlmyŏng (月明) expresses devotion to Maitreya but is placed in a context that suggests that it had an apotropaic function, serving to chase away a second sun that had appeared in the sky. Another hyangga, Mo-Chukchirangga (慕竹旨郞歌; Ode to the hwarang Chukchi), is dedicated to Chukchi, a member of an association of young men called the hwarang (花郞; lit. flower boys), who not only assumed leadership roles in the battles of Silla with its competitors but also practiced a cult that was centered on Maitreya. The narrative that accompanies the song suggests that Chukchi was an avatār of Maitreya.

Another ode to a hwarang (Kip'arang [耆婆郞]) – the Ch'an Kip'arangga (讚耆婆郞歌; Song in Praise of [the hwarang] Kip'a), by an anonymous author – contains an allusion to Amitābha's Pure Land (Kor. Chŏngt'o [淨土]; Skt. Sukhāvatī), which is more explicitly mentioned in two other hyangga: Wŏnwangsaengga (願往生歌; Wishing to Be Reborn in the Pure Land) and Chemangmaega (祭亡妹歌; Song for a Dead Sister). Pure Land practices gathered force from the 7th century onward and continued to influence vernacular literature until modern times. Wŏnwangsaengga, written by the monk Kwangdŏk (廣德), expresses a straightforward wish to be reborn in the Pure Land, which the poem says will be reached by following the moon on its course to the west. In Chemangmaega the monk Wŏlmyŏng, who also composed Tosolga, mourns the death of his sister, wishing eventually to be reunited with her in the Pure Land.

Belief in the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara (Kor. Kwanŭm [觀音]) as a savior from all kinds of dangers and afflictions was also an important part of Silla Buddhism. Among the many shapes in which this bodhisattva may appear, there is one with a thousand arms and a thousand eyes (千手天眼; Skt. Sahasrabhujasahasranetra), an esoteric form of Avalokiteśvara (Orzech et al., 2011, 215), and it is in this form that the merciful bodhisattva appears in a hyangga. Entitled To-ch'ŏnsu-Kwanŭmga (禱千手觀音歌; Prayer to Kwanŭm with the Thousand Arms), the song is a prayer to Avalokiteśvara to lend some of his eyes to restore the eyesight of a blind child.

Ujŏkka (遇賊歌; An Encounter with Robbers) is described in the Samguk yusa as composed by the monk Yŏngjae (永才) when he met a band of robbers. When they heard his name, they recognized him as a well-known hyangga poet and asked him to make a poem for them. The contents stress the illusory nature of all phenomena, including the menacing behavior of the bandits. The robbers were so impressed by the hyangga and the behavior of Yŏngjae, the Samguk yusa narrates, that they decided to become Yŏngjae's disciples. Ujŏkka may also be read as allegorical, with the robbers as personifications of everything that tries to keep one from attaining enlightenment.

According to the Samguk yusa, the hyangga entitled Hyesŏngga (彗星歌; Song of the Comet) was composed by the monk Yungch'ŏn (融天) in order to chase away a comet as well as Japanese invaders. It is not the only example of a hyangga with an apotropaic function and might be seen as evidence of the influence of the exorcistic tendencies of esoteric Buddhism in Silla. However, the apotropaic power of poetry can also be seen in other poems in the Samguk yusa, both in non-Buddhist hyangga and in poems or songs rendered in hanmun, and perhaps should rather be explained as due to pre-Buddhist traditions.

Apart from the hyangga in the Samguk yusa, 11 Buddhist hyangga by the priest Kyunyŏ (均如; 923–973) have been transmitted in Tae-hwaŏm Sujwa Wŏnt'ong Yangjung Taesa Kyunyŏjŏn (大華嚴首 座圓通兩重大師均如傳; Biography of Kyunyŏ), or Kyunyŏjŏn for short, written by Hyŏngnyŏn Chŏng (赫連挺; dates unknown; see Buzo & Prince, 1993). This lengthy text was written in hanmun, in 1075, a century after the death of Kyunyŏ. Inspired by the Buddhāvataṃsakasūtra (Kor. Hwaŏmgyŏng [華嚴經]; Cleary, 1987), these songs are devoted to the ten vows (Kor. sibwŏn [十願]) of the bodhisattva Samantabhadra (Kor. Pohyŏn [普賢]), with a final eleventh song as a conclusion. The hanmun text in which the songs are embedded provides valuable information about the ways in which the hyangga were seen. It says that although the sanoe (i.e. hyangga) were originally meant for entertainment, they could function as a means to introduce people to higher truths and salvation. Because they could be easily disseminated and understood even by the illiterate, they were very effective as such. The Kyunyŏjŏn asserts that when people accept the ten vows, read them, recite them, or copy them, they would be able to avoid the bad karma that would send them to the hell of unremitting pain (Kor. Muganjiok [無間地獄]; Skt. Avīci) and also be liberated from physical afflictions and mental torments in their present life. A concrete example is presented of how Kyunyŏ effected the healing of a persistent disease by letting the patient constantly recite the songs of the ten vows. The text also makes clear that although the songs were written down, they were widely circulated in oral form. The Kyunyŏjŏn also contains Chinese translations of the 11 hyangga, made by a 10th-century scholar-official, Ch'oe Haenggwi (崔行歸), because he felt that they deserved to be read also by people who could not understand the Korean text. This is but one instance of the two-way traffic that took place between Korean vernacular literature and hanmun writings, which constituted separate but not isolated realms.

A number of vernacular songs from the Koryŏ (高麗) period (918–1392) were recorded in writing in the early Chosŏn (朝鮮) period after the newly invented Korean alphabet was made public in 1444. These songs, usually referred to as sogyo (俗謠; popular songs), cannot be considered Buddhist literature, but there are references to Buddhist concepts and practices, such as the lantern festival celebrating the birthday of the Buddha on the eighth day of the fourth lunar month, suggesting the extent to which Buddhism dominated daily life in this period. It is also assumed that Buddhist kasa (discursive songs; see below) were first produced in Koryŏ.

Early Chosŏn Poetry and Prose

The Chosŏn dynasty, established in 1392, attempted to make Neo-Confucianism the official ideology and took measures to reduce the influence of Buddhism by curtailing the number of sects and temples, appropriating possessions of the monasteries, and looking for Confucian alternatives to Buddhist rituals. This was a gradual process with the eventual effect that Buddhism was removed from public life, although privately even the royal court and members of the elite continued to favor Buddhism in some form. Literature constitutes important evidence in this respect. King Sejong (世宗; r. 1418–1450), who together with a team of collaborators designed the Korean alphabet, not only took measures to curtail the influence of Buddhism but also promoted the writing of vernacular Buddhist poetry and prose with the new script. He first commissioned the compilation of a life of the Buddha, titled Sŏkpo sangjŏl (釋譜祥節; Detailed Episodes from the Genealogy of Śākyamuni; 1447), and then himself composed a poetic version of it, the Wŏrinch'ŏn'gangjigok (月印千江之曲; Song of the Moon Reflected on a Thousand Rivers; also 1447; see Sasse & Ahn, 2002; Olof, 2009). His son, who ascended the throne as King Sejo (世祖; r. 1455–1468) after he had forced his nephew to abdicate, having him killed two years later, combined in 1459 both works under the title Wŏrin sŏkpo (月印釋譜). Earlier, before he became king, Sejo himself had been part of the team that composed the Sŏkpo sangjŏl.

These sources also contain stories about previous lives of the historical Buddha (Kor. ponsaengdam [本生譚]; Skt. Jātaka). One example of this is the story of Prince Allakkuk (安樂國; "Prince Paradise"), Allakkuk t'aejajŏn, which relates how a king donates servants and ultimately himself to serve a holy man (Olof, 1983). At the end of the story, it is told how in a future existence, the holy man became Śākyamuni, the king Amitābha, while the queen became the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara, and their son Allakkuk the bodhisattva Mahāsthāmaprāpta (Taeseji [大勢至]). The story has also survived in other forms, for instance as a 19th-century novel or a shamanic song from different regions (Walraven, 1994). There is also a painted version from 1576 (now in the possession of the Seizan Bunko Library [青山文庫] in Japan) with copious amounts of texts to explain different scenes. It is possible that the painting was a visual aid for storytelling, most likely

---

by monks or nuns, which sugge of practices similar to Buddhis China or etoki (繪解き; lit. pict a method used by monks and n the faith) in Japan (Kim Chinyŏ Kaminishiki, 2006; Mair, 1988). of a tale of one of the previou
the Buddha in the Wŏrin sŏkpo (忍辱太子傳; Life of the Patiently Together with Allakkuk t'aejajŏn found in Sŏkka yŏrae sipchi suh 十地修行記; Record of the Perso the Tathāgata Śākyamuni), a han Jātakas published in 1328 and rep 1660 (Olof, 1989).

In the 15th century, the newl bet was also used to publish so-c explanations in the vernacular) dhist scriptures in hanmun. Ten lated, among which not only (Kor. Myobŏbyŏnhwagyŏng [ Saddharmapuṇḍarīkasūtra) and (Kor. Kŭmgangbanyabaramilgyŏ 密經]; Skt. Vajracchedikā Prajnāp collections of the teachings of Sŏ Jpn. Zen) masters and other texts tion tradition (Ko Yŏngsŏp, 2012,

Late Chosŏn Fiction

After 1600, there was a marked i duction of vernacular prose lite considerable variation in the na of this period, but in part it was B tion and origin. Several tales fro sipchi suhaenggi collection were (小說; novels or novellas; Skill nacular form in the years that fo ing in 1660. One example is t (金牛太子傳; The Life of Prin which also appeared under the t (금송아지 전; Story of the Gol eral other, similar appellations Chinyŏng, 2012, 174–210). Sŏnu 子傳; Life of Prince Good Frien a sosŏl called Chŏk Sŏngŭi jŏn ( Chŏk Sŏngŭi). The same happe t'aejajŏn. Edifying religious lite read for entertainment were pa and not strictly distinguished. T of the historical Buddha, found i suhaenggi in the late Chosŏn peri ŏn Poetry and Prose

nasty, established in 1392, attempted Confucianism the official ideology ures to reduce the influence of Bud-iling the number of sects and tem-ting possessions of the monasteries, Confucian alternatives to Buddhist s a gradual process with the eventual lhism was removed from public life, ely even the royal court and members tinued to favor Buddhism in some e constitutes important evidence in ng Sejong (世宗; r. 1418–1450), who team of collaborators designed the t, not only took measures to curtail f Buddhism but also promoted the acular Buddhist poetry and prose ript. He first commissioned the com-of the Buddha, titled Sŏkpo sangjŏl ailed Episodes from the Genealogy 1447), and then himself composed n of it, the Wŏrinch'ŏn'gangjigok Song of the Moon Reflected on a s; also 1447; see Sasse & Ahn, 2002; son, who ascended the throne as ; r. 1455–1468) after he had forced abdicate, having him killed two bined in 1459 both works under the po (月印釋譜). Earlier, before he jo himself had been part of the team he Sŏkpo sangjŏl.

s also contain stories about previous orical Buddha (Kor. ponsaengdam ātaka). One example of this is the Allakkuk (安樂國; "Prince Parat'aejajŏn, which relates how a king s and ultimately himself to serve a 1983). At the end of the story, it is ure existence, the holy man became king Amitābha, while the queen lhisattva Avalokiteśvara, and their e bodhisattva Mahāsthāmaprāpta ]). The story has also survived in instance as a 19th-century novel or from different regions (Walraven, also a painted version from 1576 ession of the Seizan Bunko Library pan) with copious amounts of texts ent scenes. It is possible that the sual aid for storytelling, most likely by monks or nuns, which suggests the existence of practices similar to Buddhist storytelling in China or etoki (繪解き; lit. picture explanations, a method used by monks and nuns to propagate the faith) in Japan (Kim Chinyŏng, 2012, 285–318; Kaminishiki, 2006; Mair, 1988). Another example of a tale of one of the previous incarnations of the Buddha in the Wŏrin sŏkpo is Inyok t'aejajŏn (忍辱太子傳; Life of the Patiently Suffering Prince). Together with Allakkuk t'aejajŏn, this tale is also found in Sŏkka yŏrae sipchi suhaenggi (釋迦如來十地修行記; Record of the Personal Cultivation of the Tathāgata Śākyamuni), a hanmun collection of Jātakas published in 1328 and reprinted in 1448 and 1660 (Olof, 1989).

In the 15th century, the newly invented alphabet was also used to publish so-called ŏnhae (諺解; explanations in the vernacular) editions of Buddhist scriptures in hanmun. Ten titles were translated, among which not only the Lotus Sūtra (Kor. Myobŏbyŏnhwagyŏng [妙法蓮華經]; Skt. Saddharmapuṇḍarīkasūtra) and Diamond Sūtra (Kor. Kŭmgangbanyabaramilgyŏng [金剛般若波羅蜜經]; Skt. Vajracchedikā Prajnāparamitā) but also collections of the teachings of Sŏn (禪; Chn. Chán; Jpn. Zen) masters and other texts from the meditation tradition (Ko Yŏngsŏp, 2012, 193).

Late Chosŏn Fiction

After 1600, there was a marked increase in the production of vernacular prose literature. There was considerable variation in the nature of the fiction of this period, but in part it was Buddhist in inspiration and origin. Several tales from the Sŏkka yŏrae sipchi suhaenggi collection were published as sosŏl (小說; novels or novellas; Skillend, 1986) in vernacular form in the years that followed its reprinting in 1660. One example is the Kŭmu t'aejajŏn (金牛太子傳; The Life of Prince Golden Calf), which also appeared under the title Kŭmsongajijŏn (금송아지 전; Story of the Golden Calf) and several other, similar appellations (Olof, 2008; Kim Chinyŏng, 2012, 174–210). Sŏnu t'aejajŏn (善友太子傳; Life of Prince Good Friend) was turned into a sosŏl called Chŏk Sŏngŭi jŏn (赤聖儀傳; Story of Chŏk Sŏngŭi). The same happened with Allakkuk t'aejajŏn. Edifying religious literature and works read for entertainment were part of a continuum and not strictly distinguished. The story of the life of the historical Buddha, found in Sŏkka yŏrae sipchi suhaenggi in the late Chosŏn period, was also read as a sosŏl under the title P'alsangnok (八相錄; Record of the Eight Phases [of the Life of Śākyamuni]). Following the emergence of popular literature, some sosŏl of Buddhist origin were adapted by shamans to provide the plot of ritual songs that explained the origin of shamanic deities (Walraven, 1994). In other instances, shamans incorporated Buddhist concepts and figures in their narrative songs, even though in content, the songs are at odds with Buddhist teaching. Thus, in Ch'angsega (創世歌), a song about the creation of the world and civilization and the origin of suffering, Maitreya acts as the demiurge who presides over a paradisiacal world, while the eagerness of Śākyamuni to rule over this world is used to explain the origin of death and disease (Walraven, 1989; 2007a). The logic behind this is that in Buddhism, too, Maitreya is associated with an ideal age, even if it is in the future (Lancaster, 1989), while Śākyamuni is the Buddha of our world, which obviously is a world of suffering.

In the case of shamanic songs that were adaptations of sosŏl, the shift of emphasis was from the secular to the religious. In a totally different way, this also happened when the 17th-century Confucian scholar Kim Manjung 金萬重 (1637–1692) wrote a sosŏl entitled Kuunmong (九雲夢; The Cloud Dream of the Nine), allegedly to amuse his aged mother (Kim Manjung, 1922; Rutt & Kim 1974; Bantly, 1996; Chang Hyohyŏn, 2008). There has been academic debate whether this novel was first written in hanmun or in Korean, but D. Bouchez (1995) has presented strong arguments for the latter. Even if the original version was in Chinese, however, one should recognize that it is significant as vernacular literature because it was widely circulated in Korean. Its narrative was also frequently presented in visual form, on the panels of painted or embroidered folding screens. When carefully examined, Kuunmong betrays a deep interest in and sound knowledge of Buddhism. Its structure and main theme – emptiness (Skt. śūnyatā) – are based on the Vajracchedikā Prajnāparamitā (Bouchez, 1985, 445) from which a famous verse delivers the final message of the novel:

> All is dharma, illusion:
> A dream, a phantasm, bubble, shadow, > Evanescent as dew, transient as lightning;
> And must be seen as such.
> (trans. Rutt & Kim, 1974, 176; Chang Hyohyŏn, 2008, 235)

The last line of the novel states that all nine protagonists became bodhisattvas and entered the Pure Land. In a sense, this is Jātaka as romance (or vice versa).

Although the bulk of Kuunmong describes the romantic adventures of a young monk and eight female servants of Sŏwangmo (西王母; Chn. Xiwangmu; "Queen Mother of the West") who are reborn in the secular world as punishment for a moment of dalliance, in the end, the protagonists realize that all this has been an illusion. The whole story may be considered the skillful means (upāya; pangp'yŏn [方便]) by which the reader is led to a conclusion that if introduced without preparation would not have been very attractive. With its circular structure, which reflects the teaching of the Vajracchedikā Prajnāparamitā that in essence we are already enlightened but need a detour to bring us to the point from which we actually departed, the novel provides clear evidence that the oppression that Buddhism endured in this period did not preclude continued serious engagement of some members of the literate elite with its doctrines (comp. Bouchez, 1985; Eunsu Cho, 2003; Yu Hosŏn, 2006; Younghee Lee, 2007b; Walraven, 2007b; Kim Daeyeol, 2012).

Ambiguities in the social status of Buddhism in the Chosŏn period are illustrated by a 19th-century anonymous novella called Ong Kojipchŏn (옹고집전; Story of Ong the Stubborn). This was an adaptation of a tale from the repertoire of p'ansori (판소리; narrative singing). The comic story describes the successful revenge of a monk against Ong Kojip, a well-to-do gentleman who had maltreated the monk when he presented himself begging at the gate of Ong's mansion. The monk uses magic to manufacture a doppelgänger of Ong to replace the real Ong, even in his bed. The latter is ignominiously kicked out of his own home, but at the end, the real Ong shows remorse and is allowed to reassume his place. Although the tale is told in a jocular fashion, it unambiguously sympathizes with the monk and depicts Ong as a stupid brute. As a p'ansori tale and sosŏl, the story addressed a wide swath of the population, including the elite.

Kasa and Sijo

The vernacular genres of poetry of the Chosŏn period, kasa (歌辭) and sijo (時調), were originally intended to be sung and therefore often are referred to as songs, both in Korean and in other languages. When the kasa grew so long that they were no longer suitable to be sung, they were mostly read or recited. Sijo are basically a three-line form (which may be extended somewhat) and mostly lyrical in nature, while kasa are more discursive, in all senses of the word, and may count many hundreds of lines. Buddhist kasa may be considered the most significant genre of traditional vernacular Buddhist literature. While the number of works in most genres of Buddhist vernacular literature is very small, a recent collection of Buddhist kasa contains 108 titles (Im Kijung, 2000), even though a number of titles that can be found in other collections have been excluded. Buddhist kasa were also an important medium for the transmission of the teachings of the clergy to laymen. Although manuscripts continued to be an important medium for their distribution as late as the first half of the 20th century, they were quite often circulated in printed form, unlike most non-Buddhist kasa of the Chosŏn period.

Some Buddhist kasa are assumed to date from the Koryŏ period, which would make them the oldest examples of the kasa form. Sŏwangga (西往歌; Going to the West) is ascribed to the famous Sŏn monk Naong (懶翁; 1320–1376), whose teachings, however, do not match the contents of the song very well (Chŏng Chaeho, 2003). It is unlikely that the extant Buddhist kasa are so old, although it is very plausible that in the Koryŏ period, too, there were vernacular Buddhist songs. An indication of the latter is the fact that there are some songs recorded in hanmun that do not follow any rules of Chinese prosody. Probably these are renderings of songs in the vernacular (Cho Tongil, vol. II, 2005, 195–201). What may be asserted with certainty is that, whatever the actual date of composition may be, the actual texts of the Buddhist kasa that we know all date from after 1600 (Younghee Lee, 2006). It should also be noted that, in spite of the fact that kasa may be considered a traditional genre, their production did not stop when Korea opened its borders to Western influences in the last quarter of the 19th century. A considerable number of Buddhist kasa were written in the first half of the 20th century.

Scholars have made different attempts to categorize the Buddhist kasa. A recent classification reduces them to four broad categories:

1. songs that urge conversion to Buddhism following the realization that all phenomena are evanescent and illusory, and encourage the practice of yŏmbul (念佛; the practice of mental concentration on the buddha Amitābha) to effect rebirth in Amitābha's Pure Land,
2. songs that teach the workings of karma and point the way to a true practice of Buddhism by doing good and making donations,
3. songs that in order to stimulate unflagging practice encourage meditation and praise the joys

---

that follow on attaining the way by tion, and

4. songs that praise the Bud descriptions of the life of the Bud describing the vows of buddhas a to save all sentient beings convey message that with their help, th enlightenment is within reach of P'yŏnghwan, 2011, 293).

Cho P'yŏnghwan assigns 36 song egory, 15 to the second, 40 to the th fourth. While giving an impressio the kasa, classifications like this because many songs contain eleme one category. It is clear, however, th erally have didactic purposes, and personal effort, for instance thro and reliance on the salvific powe bodhisattvas.

Another way to classify the son intended audience. There is a ten that the songs were all primar the common people who would be stand texts in hanmun. In fact, e would be able to benefit from list when they were sung by monks ging rounds or in accompanime Chongjin, 2002). There is little do actually functioned in this way. of the most popular Buddhist ka the repertoire of the shamans (Ki and that elements from such ka pallbearers' songs (상여소리; s of folk song, points in this directi Ch'imgoeng (枕肱; 1616–1684) his fellow monks rather than l all kinds of abuses, such as t sumption of alcohol or just pre to be fully enlightened (Youn He was scornful of the monks the guidance of "Master One-E the Black Mountain/Drooling in (terminology traditionally appl meditate without the proper f [話頭], the topic of meditatio 2007b, 75). Ch'imgoeng counse of textual studies (incl. texts of fucian thinkers), meditation, a famous mountains around the path to enlightenment. Among the Buddhist kasa literature, respects are very similar to th ban elite of scholar-officials (fr count many hundreds of lines. Bud-be considered the most significant onal vernacular Buddhist literature. ber of works in most genres of Bud-r literature is very small, a recent Buddhist kasa contains 108 titles o), even though a number of titles nd in other collections have been hist kasa were also an important transmission of the teachings of the n. Although manuscripts continued nt medium for their distribution as half of the 20th century, they were lated in printed form, unlike most sa of the Chosŏn period. st kasa are assumed to date from l, which would make them the old-the kasa form. Sŏwangga (西往歌; est) is ascribed to the famous Sŏn 翁; 1320–1376), whose teachings, match the contents of the song very eho, 2003). It is unlikely that the kasa are so old, although it is very the Koryŏ period, too, there were hist songs. An indication of the lat-at there are some songs recorded lo not follow any rules of Chinese y these are renderings of songs in Cho Tongil, vol. II, 2005, 195–201). erted with certainty is that, what-date of composition may be, the e Buddhist kasa that we know all oo (Younghee Lee, 2006). It should , in spite of the fact that kasa may raditional genre, their production Korea opened its borders to West-he last quarter of the 19th century. mber of Buddhist kasa were writ-f of the 20th century.

made different attempts to cat-hist kasa. A recent classification our broad categories:
rge conversion to Buddhism foltion that all phenomena are evaory, and encourage the practice he practice of mental concentraa Amitābha) to effect rebirth in
and,
each the workings of karma and a true practice of Buddhism by king donations,
n order to stimulate unflagging meditation and praise the joys

---

that follow on attaining the way by personal cultivation, and

4. songs that praise the Buddha (including descriptions of the life of the Buddha), which by describing the vows of buddhas and bodhisattvas to save all sentient beings convey the comforting message that with their help, the final goal of enlightenment is within reach of everyone (Cho P'yŏnghwan, 2011, 293).

Cho P'yŏnghwan assigns 36 songs to the first category, 15 to the second, 40 to the third, and 17 to the fourth. While giving an impression of the range of the kasa, classifications like this are problematic because many songs contain elements of more than one category. It is clear, however, that the songs generally have didactic purposes, and encourage both personal effort, for instance through meditation, and reliance on the salvific power of buddhas and bodhisattvas.

Another way to classify the songs is to look at the intended audience. There is a tendency to assume that the songs were all primarily addressed to the common people who would be unable to understand texts in hanmun. In fact, even the illiterate would be able to benefit from listening to the songs when they were sung by monks during their begging rounds or in accompaniment of rituals (Kim Chongjin, 2002). There is little doubt that the kasa actually functioned in this way. The fact that one of the most popular Buddhist kasa was adopted in the repertoire of the shamans (Kim Chongjin, 2002) and that elements from such kasa became part of pallbearers' songs (상여소리; sangyŏ sori), a kind of folk song, points in this direction. Yet, the monk Ch'imgoeng (枕肱; 1616–1684) directly addressed his fellow monks rather than laymen, criticizing all kinds of abuses, such as the excessive consumption of alcohol or just pretending to laymen to be fully enlightened (Younghee Lee, 2007b). He was scornful of the monks who studied under the guidance of "Master One-Eye," "Dozing under the Black Mountain/Drooling in the Cave of Ghosts" (terminology traditionally applied to monks who meditate without the proper focus of the hwadu [話頭], the topic of meditation; Younghee Lee, 2007b, 75). Ch'imgoeng counseled a combination of textual studies (incl. texts of non-Buddhist, Confucian thinkers), meditation, and peregrination to famous mountains around the country as the right path to enlightenment. Among the most lyrical of the Buddhist kasa literature, his songs in many respects are very similar to the kasa of the yangban elite of scholar-officials (from which he hailed himself). The 19th-century priest Namho Yŏnggi (南湖 永奇; 1820–1872) also addressed the two kasa by his hand to the educated and, one might add, to the wealthy, as he used the kasa as a means to solicit donations for printing the Buddhāvataṃsakasūtra, a project that was supported by members of the royal family and some of the most powerful persons in the land (Kim Chongjin, 2004a; 2004b; 2009; Younghee Lee, 2011). Kwŏnwangga (勸往歌; Encouragement to Go [to the Pure Land]) by the 19th-century monk Tonghwa (東花) is so long – more than 1,200 lines – that it must have been intended for reading and thus for a public that possessed at least basic literacy rather than for vocal delivery. Growing urban populations in the 18th and 19th centuries may have been the intended audience of such kasa.

Buddhist kasa often were explicitly also addressed to women, who constituted a major part of the believers. "Listen to these words of mine, whether you are noble or despised/male or female, young or old" is a typical beginning for a Buddhist kasa. In some ways, they also defend women's interests, for instance by pointing out the dire karmic consequences of rape. Yet, there is no evidence that Buddhist kasa were written by women (although for other subgenres of the kasa, some female authors may be found). Women were also represented as a form of existence that was inferior to that of men. Rebirth as a woman was a form of punishment:

> If during your life you commit sodomy with a monk, in a later life you will become the lowest of women/living as a prostitute for 500 existences, and then, even if you are reborn as a human being/ it will be with a shriveled penis. (trans. Younghee Lee, 2006)

Buddhist kasa were not exclusively composed by monks. Some laymen, too, composed Buddhist songs. One of them was the Confucian scholar Kim Ch'anghŭp (金昌翕; 1655–1722), who wrote a short yŏmbulga (念佛歌; yŏmbul song). A lay believer (ch'ŏngsinsa [清信士] or kŏsa [居士]) called Chihyŏng (智瑩), who was active in book publishing and quite likely a low-ranking military official (Walraven, 2007b), published two kasa in a woodblock edition in 1795. This suggests that some of the many anonymous kasa, too, were composed by laypeople, which would accord with the fact that in the late Chosŏn period, there was a rise in the interest in Buddhism among educated laypeople, including members of the elite.

Probably the best-known Buddhist kasa of all is Hoesimgok (回心曲/悔心曲; Conversion Song/Song of Repentance), which was also used in shamanic rituals (Son Chint'ae, 1930; Kim Chongjin, 2002), became a popular item on the repertoire of folk singers, and even now is widely available on recordings. It has been attributed to the most famous priest of the Chosŏn period, Hyujŏng (休靜), commonly known as Master Sŏsan (西山大師; 1520–1604), author of hanmun treatises and supreme commander of the monks' armies that fought the Japanese during the invasions of 1592–1598, but this is as unlikely as the attribution of Sŏwangga to Naong (see above).

With the exception of one verse by Ch'imgoeng urging faith in Amitābha, there are no sijo that propagate Buddhism in the way many kasa do, but numerous sijo betray the familiarity with Buddhism of the people of Chosŏn. Sijo frequently refer to the concept of reincarnation, anathema to staunch Confucians, and to Buddha images and monks as symbols of a world that is less fleeting and full of suffering than our vale of tears (Cho P'yŏnghwan, 2011, 231–264).

Pure Land Literature

The second half of the Chosŏn period also saw the publication of Buddhist prose texts in Korean addressed to laymen. At the time, Buddhist writings were still mainly in Chinese, but Yŏmbul pogwŏnmun (念佛普勸文; Exhortation to Practice the Invocation of the Buddha [Amitābha]) is a rare exception. It is bilingual, with Chinese followed by Korean translations. The translations are not always very literal, and in some cases, fragments in the vernacular have no counterpart in the Chinese text. Pure Land practices had been known already in Silla but gained even greater popularity in Chosŏn, when laymen practiced yŏmbul both individually and in massive gatherings (Han Pogwang, 2000). Yŏmbul pogwŏnmun was a means to propagate such practices. It was compiled by a monk called Myŏngyŏn (明衍), of whom we only know that he belonged to the lineage of Hyujŏng. It was several times printed in woodblock editions during the 18th century – in 1704, 1741, 1764, 1765 (twice, in different temples), 1776, 1787, and partly in 1753 (Walraven, 2007c; Myŏngyŏn, 2012) – and may be assumed to have had considerable impact. It is a farrago of quite diverse elements held together by the actual practices and beliefs that the Amitābha faith took in the 18th century. As to be expected, the leading thought in Yŏmbul pogwŏnmun is the conviction that reliance on the buddha Amitābha by mindful concentration on the name of Amitābha (yŏmbul) is the ideal method to escape from the endless cycle of birth and rebirth by being reborn in the Pure Land. The practice was also deemed suitable to benefit third persons through the transfer of merit. Beginning in the Koryŏ period and especially in Chosŏn, Pure Land practices were often advocated by Sŏn priests, be it that in many instances, they judged these practices to be particularly suited to people of lower capacities or interpreted the Pure Land in a sophisticated manner: not as an actual paradise that exists outside the practitioner but as a state that can be realized in the practitioner's own mind, which is nothing but the Buddha nature that is present in each living being from the outset.

Myŏngyŏn's preface (Myŏngyŏn, 2012, 32) betrays an awareness of the difficult situation of Buddhism under Confucian domination by his insistence that throughout history emperors, kings, prominent ministers, and famous poets have shown reverence for Amitābha and also by a reference to the Chinese compiler of a similar but much more extensive collection of texts related to Amitābha worship who, Myŏngyŏn states, was a prominent minister and "Confucian gentleman" (儒家名相君子). He also situates his own work explicitly in the context of the latter days (malse [末世], the period of the extinction of the Buddha law), when people are ignorant and full of material desires, and adds that he has appended explanations in Korean alphabet (ŏnsŏ [諺書]) to allow "good men and women" to make spiritual progress.

Women may proceed to paradise, but they first will have to undergo a fundamental change:

> If a woman practices yŏmbul she will change her womanhood and become a man, to proceed to Ultimate Bliss [Sukhāvatī] and immediately realize the fruition of Buddhahood. (Myŏngyŏn, 2012, 38–39; trans. Walraven, 2007)

Following this, Yŏmbul pogwŏnmun also states that no vulgar people, women, evil-doers, and animals are found in the Pure Land, only buddhas, bodhisattvas, and good people. This may sound quite discriminatory to modern ears, but in the context of Chosŏn, the prospect of ultimate bliss, even after a transformation into men, offered women a great deal more solace than Confucianism did (Younghee Lee, 2006). It should also be noted that in the form of Buddhist propagation that was most accessible, namely, the kasa, the change in gender was not mentioned at all as a necessary requirement.

In the Modŭn syegye kŭngr mothăda hăsida (The Pure Lan Worlds) section of Yŏmbul pog explains the nine tiers of rebir ing with the degree of merit of th Pure Land, the Korean translation elaborate than the Chinese origina to the qualifications for the three m Chinese text, filial care for the pare ence to the precepts, not killing liv display of benevolence (仁), comp generosity (布施心) are the condit text is more specific. One should se with filial piety, show moderation hol and eating meat, not kill, reduc material possessions, make donati works. The description of the rew too, is more concrete. One obtains of birth and death but also of illne nese and the Korean text diverge respect from the Guan wuliangshou 佛經; Sūtra on Visualizing the Budd able Life), the source of the ninef This sūtra offers to the three mid better on rebirth in the Pure Lan
The Chinese text of Yŏmbul pogwŏn 2012, 42) promises the immediate fruition of buddhahood and the (Myŏngyŏn, 2012, 43) instantane a buddha. The Korean text, more unlimited knowledge of past and f less supernatural faculties. "How c to go there?" it concludes. Instan hood, as soon as the Pure Land is in store for the lowest three tier been reborn in paradise and thus to Amitābha's sermons:

> You will immediately become a > illness and death, and know ever > ous and future existences. Food > appear spontaneously. (Myŏngy > trans. Walraven 2007)

This last addition seems to add to whom a concern for these two is more urgent than escaping fro saṃsāra.

Another section is interesting b direct relation to the practice of y addresses the plight of Buddhism
It is primarily an admonishment Buddhism. Some people ridicule ers, unaware that this will result i nitābha by mindful concentraf Amitābha (yŏmbul) is the ideal om the endless cycle of birth and orn in the Pure Land. The prac-ed suitable to benefit third per-nsfer of merit. Beginning in the specially in Chosŏn, Pure Land advocated by Sŏn priests, be it ces, they judged these practices ited to people of lower capaci-he Pure Land in a sophisticated tual paradise that exists outside as a state that can be realized s own mind, which is nothing ure that is present in each living et.

ce (Myŏngyŏn, 2012, 32) betrays difficult situation of Buddhism mination by his insistence that emperors, kings, prominent us poets have shown reverence so by a reference to the Chinese but much more extensive col-ed to Amitābha worship who,
as a prominent minister and an" (儒家名相君子). He also k explicitly in the context of the 末世], the period of the extinc-aw), when people are ignorant desires, and adds that he has ons in Korean alphabet (ŏnsŏ od men and women" to make eed to paradise, but they first a fundamental change:

> es yŏmbul she will change her > ecome a man, to proceed to > hāvatī] and immediately real-> uddhahood. (Myŏngyŏn, 2012, > ven, 2007)

ul pogwŏnmun also states that omen, evil-doers, and animals e Land, only buddhas, bodhieople. This may sound quite odern ears, but in the context ect of ultimate bliss, even after men, offered women a great Confucianism did (Younghee also be noted that in the form tion that was most accessible, e change in gender was not necessary requirement.

In the Modŭn syegye kŭngnangman kătchi mothăda hăsida (The Pure Land Surpasses All Worlds) section of Yŏmbul pogwŏnmun, which explains the nine tiers of rebirth (corresponding with the degree of merit of the reborn) in the Pure Land, the Korean translation is a little more elaborate than the Chinese original when it comes to the qualifications for the three middle tiers. In the Chinese text, filial care for the parents, some adherence to the precepts, not killing living beings, and a display of benevolence (仁), compassion (慈), and generosity (布施心) are the conditions. The Korean text is more specific. One should serve one's parents with filial piety, show moderation in drinking alcohol and eating meat, not kill, reduce one's desire for material possessions, make donations, and do good works. The description of the rewards of paradise, too, is more concrete. One obtains freedom not only of birth and death but also of illness. Both the Chinese and the Korean text diverge in an important respect from the Guan wuliangshoufo jing (觀無量壽佛經; Sūtra on Visualizing the Buddha of Immeasurable Life), the source of the ninefold classification. This sūtra offers to the three middle tiers nothing better on rebirth in the Pure Land than arhatship. The Chinese text of Yŏmbul pogwŏnmun (Myŏngyŏn, 2012, 42) promises the immediate attainment of the fruition of buddhahood and the han'gŭl version (Myŏngyŏn, 2012, 43) instantaneously becoming a buddha. The Korean text, moreover, guarantees unlimited knowledge of past and future and boundless supernatural faculties. "How could one not want to go there?" it concludes. Instantaneous buddhahood, as soon as the Pure Land is reached, is even in store for the lowest three tiers after they have been reborn in paradise and thus are able to listen to Amitābha's sermons:

> You will immediately become a Buddha, avoid illness and death, and know everything of previous and future existences. Food and clothes will appear spontaneously. (Myŏngyŏn, 2012, 49–50; trans. Walraven 2007)

This last addition seems to address an audience to whom a concern for these two necessities of life is more urgent than escaping from the shackles of saṃsāra.

Another section is interesting because it bears no direct relation to the practice of yŏmbul but rather addresses the plight of Buddhism in Chosŏn Korea. It is primarily an admonishment not to speak ill of Buddhism. Some people ridicule Buddhist believers, unaware that this will result in eternal suffering in hell. Even if one does not worship the Buddha, one should not speak ill of Buddhism. The warning is quite explicitly directed to the (Confucian) elite: "The Ten Kings [of the Underworld] do not stand in awe of the high and mighty; Hell is not a fiction" (Myŏngyŏn, 2012, 53–54). Similar admonitions can be found in Buddhist kasa.

The final section of the first part of Yŏmbul pogwŏnmun, which presents the general principles of yŏmbul through excerpts and summaries of canonical literature, lists all kinds of benefits of this practice, not only for peasants and traders but also for those who hold government office and for scholars (글하는 선비; kŭl hănŭn sŏnbi) – those, in short, whom we are wont to call "Confucians" (Myŏngyŏn, 2012, 59–62). Of course, the main benefit for all is rebirth in paradise after death, but even for believers who are unable to stop eating meat and drinking alcohol completely, the practice has immediate benefits. Right in this world, it will ensure freedom from disasters and calamities and bring happiness and a long life.

Finally, Yŏmbul pogwŏnmun itself should play an important role in the life of the faithful. Whenever they have spare time, they should read it with reverence, after washing their hands and rinsing their mouths (the latter instruction is only found in the han'gŭl text). Afterward it should be stored away in a nice, clean place. The book itself becomes a repository of sanctity.

The first part of Yŏmbul pogwŏnmun is followed by biographies (all taken from Chinese Pure Land literature) of persons who reaped the rewards of Amitābha worship in the form of rebirth in the Pure Land (Myŏngyŏn, 2012, 64–86). These include cases of manifest sinners, such as an apostate monk and a butcher, who were saved in spite of their sins, thanks to yŏmbul. There is no Chinese version of a postface to this part of the book, which is a convenient though rather rambling summary of yŏmbul practice. It encourages everyone to read Yŏmbul pogwŏnmun (or listen to it being read) instead of all kinds of "inferior novels" (chapyeagich'aek [잡예아기 책]), a remark prompted by the growing popularity of sosŏl at the time (Myŏngyŏn, 2012, 84).

The next part of the Yŏmbul pogwŏnmun consists of texts to be used in yŏmbul rituals: dhāraṇī in Sanskrit and chants (ke [偈]; Skt. gāthā) in hanmun, followed by the Yŏrae siptae parwŏnmun (如來十大發願文; Ten Great Vows Made to the Tathāgata), which are transcribed in han'gŭl but fundamentally remain a hanmun text. The liturgical texts also draw attention to the fact that yŏmbul practice in many cases was a collective affair. In fact, Yŏmbul pogwŏnmun repeatedly urges the reader to "join yŏmbul [meetings]." Such meetings, which might last for an extended period, are attested in various historical sources (Han Pogwang, 2000).

It is quite likely that the kasa included in the next part of the book were also sung during more extended, collective yŏmbul rituals. These kasa are (1) Sŏwangga (see above), (2) the anonymous In'gwamun (Text on Cause and Effect), and (3) a variant of Hoesimgok (see above). To certain terms used in these kasa, glosses are added, which explain Buddhist concepts – sometimes in a rather simplified way. Thus "impermanence" (musang [無常]) is explained as meaning that man cannot live long. The kasa contain sentences that can be found word by word elsewhere in Yŏmbul pogwŏnmun. Obviously, they are not arbitrary additions but effectively reinforce the message of the other parts of Yŏmbul pogwŏnmun, propagating the same mixture of elements: the efficacy of the invocation of Amitābha for people from all walks of life and of both sexes and an insistence on virtuous behavior (in many ways in conformity with Confucian standards), together with a dramatic opposition between heaven and hell, and the depiction of life in this world as ephemeral and of worldly possessions and mundane glory as intrinsically vain.

Twentieth-Century Poetry and Prose

As mentioned above, Buddhist kasa were produced well into the 20th century. The Sŏn master Hangmyŏng (鶴鳴; 1867–1929) wrote several kasa, among which is Wŏnjŏkka (圓寂歌; Song of Perfect Tranquility). He was a reformer who promoted the economic self-sufficiency of the saṅgha, but he is less known than Manhae Han Yongun (萬海 韓龍雲; 1879–1944), who gained fame both as a radical reformer of Buddhism and as a poet. In 1913 Han Yongun published Chosŏn pulgyo yusillon (朝鮮佛教維新論; Plea for a Renewal of Korean Buddhism), in which he proposed bringing the saṅgha back from the mountain temples to the cities and towns, attacked what he saw as superstition, and advocated the marrying of monks. As a poet, he is celebrated because of his 1926 collection Nim ŭi ch'immuk (님의 침묵; Silence of the Beloved), in which the "beloved" (a traditional metaphor for the monarch to whom the poet expresses his undying loyalty) is defined as the personification of everything for which mankind yearns. This could include all kinds of political aspirations, such as the unification of Italy for Mazzini or (not explicitly mentioned, but hinted at) liberation from Japanese colonialism. The poems contain many Buddhist terms and allusions, but Han Yongun's deliberate striving for poly-interpretability makes it difficult to distinguish where the Buddhist content begins or ends. An example is the poem Naruppae wa haengin (The Ferry and the Traveler). The ferry is the means by which the traveler crosses to the other bank of the river, which is a traditional Buddhist metaphor of enlightenment. At the same time, the traveler can be seen as the "beloved," allowing a romantic interpretation, or perhaps as the colonial oppressor, who steps on the ferry "with muddy feet."

Too many works with a Buddhist slant were published in the 20th century to allow a complete survey. For the first time, Buddhist literature became a commodity, published by commercial publishing houses. This is a significant difference with Japan, where commercialization of Buddhist literature already occurred in the Tokugawa period. Only a few more authors can be mentioned apart from Han Yongun. Among them is Yi Kwangsu (李光洙; 1892–1950), who is regarded as the first modern novelist and became more and more involved with Buddhism as he grew older. He wrote a number of historical novels about Buddhist figures that, it has been suggested (Jung-Shim Lee, 2013), indirectly comment on his own times and personal situation. Another one is Kim Iryŏp (金一葉; 1896–1971), who started out as a radical feminist advocating free love but in the late 1920s turned to Buddhism and eventually entered a Buddhist nunnery. She continued to write, however, both poetry and essays, now with pronounced Buddhist content (Bonnie Oh, 2004; Jung-Shim Lee, 2013; Jin. Y. Park, 2010).

Among the authors who made their debut after liberation in 1945 is the poet and novelist Ko Ŭn (高銀; 1933–). He was a monk for ten years, but after he returned to secular life Buddhism continued to inspire his work – for example, in a collection of Sŏn poetry entitled Muŏnya? (ET: What?; 2008). His novel, Hwaŏmgyŏng (華嚴經; Flower Ornament Scripture; trans. Anthony, 1995), retells the story of the pilgrimage of a young boy, Sudhana, who on his quest for enlightenment visits an assortment of 53 sages and bodhisattvas, the most famous part of the Buddhāvataṃsakasūtra (Cleary, 1987). The monk Pŏpchŏng (法頂; 1932–2010) was much respected and loved by both the general public and intellectuals for his essays, in wh daily life from a Sŏn perspective. collection is Musoyu (無所有; Not Presently there are between 3 ers that specialize in Buddhist lite between 450 and 500 titles annua titles are huge bestsellers and re Buddhists, including Christians, negative attitudes toward other r testifying to the continuing cul Korean Buddhism. A prime exa mentioned Musoyu, which was endorsement from Cardinal Kin 2009) and reprinted 86 times.

---

A major undertaking in Budd been the publication in 2001 of translations into Korean of the e Buddhist canon from the 13th c in Chinese and early in the 20th as the basis for the authorita (Lancaster, 1979). Partial transla Korean had appeared from 1965.

Bibliography

Anthony, Brother, of Taizé (An Sonj kyong: A Modern Korean Pilgrim's 1995, 1–14.
Bantly, F.C., Embracing Illusion: Tru Dream of the Nine Clouds", Albany, Best, J.W., "Kwallŭk's Testimony C Buddhism's Introduction to Paekc ed., Religions in Traditional Korea, Bouchez, D., "La langue d'origine du neuf nuages," BÉFEO 82, 1995, 111–1 Bouchez, D., "Buddhism and Neo-Con jung's Random Essays," in: W.T. d eds., The Rise of Neo-Confucianis 1985, 445–472.
Buswell, R.E. Jr., The Korean Approa
Works of Chinul, Honolulu, 1983.
Buswell, R.E. Jr., & D.S. Lopez Jr., eds ary of Buddhism, Princeton, 2013.
Buzo, A., & T. Prince, eds. & trans Times and Songs of a Tenth-Centu way, 1993.
Chang, Hyohyŏn, Kuunmong (구운 Seongnam, 2008.
Cho, Dong-il (Cho Tongil), Cho Do
Literature, London, 2013.
Cho, Dongil (Cho Tongil), & D. Bouc ture coréenne des origines à 1919, P Cho, Eunsu, "Re-thinking Late 19th C Society," AK 6/2, 2003, 87–109.
Cho, P'yŏnghwan, Han'guk kojŏn siga yangsang (한국 고전시가의 nankind yearns. This could include ical aspirations, such as the unifior Mazzini or (not explicitly mented at) liberation from Japanese poems contain many Buddhist ons, but Han Yongun's deliberate -interpretability makes it difficult ere the Buddhist content begins or is the poem Naruppae wa haengin e Traveler). The ferry is the means veler crosses to the other bank of s a traditional Buddhist metaphor . At the same time, the traveler can eloved," allowing a romantic inter-aps as the colonial oppressor, who "with muddy feet."

ks with a Buddhist slant were pub-century to allow a complete sur-time, Buddhist literature became blished by commercial publishing significant difference with Japan, ialization of Buddhist literature in the Tokugawa period. Only a s can be mentioned apart from nong them is Yi Kwangsu (李光 ho is regarded as the first modern me more and more involved with grew older. He wrote a number of about Buddhist figures that, it has Jung-Shim Lee, 2013), indirectly own times and personal situation.
m Iryŏp (金一葉; 1896–1971), who dical feminist advocating free love os turned to Buddhism and even-Buddhist nunnery. She continued both poetry and essays, now with dhist content (Bonnie Oh, 2004; 13; Jin. Y. Park, 2010). hors who made their debut after is the poet and novelist Ko Ŭn was a monk for ten years, but after cular life Buddhism continued to
- for example, in a collection of ed Muŏnya? (ET: What?; 2008). ngyŏng (華嚴經; Flower Orna-rans. Anthony, 1995), retells the mage of a young boy, Sudhana, or enlightenment visits an assort-nd bodhisattvas, the most famous āvataṃsakasūtra (Cleary, 1987). ŏng (法頂; 1932–2010) was much d by both the general public and intellectuals for his essays, in which he looked at daily life from a Sŏn perspective. His most famous collection is Musoyu (無所有; Nothingness).

Presently there are between 30 and 40 publishers that specialize in Buddhist literature, producing between 450 and 500 titles annually. Some of these titles are huge bestsellers and read by many non-Buddhists, including Christians, who often display negative attitudes toward other religious traditions, testifying to the continuing cultural influence of Korean Buddhism. A prime example is the above-mentioned Musoyu, which was published with an endorsement from Cardinal Kim Sou-hwan (1922–2009) and reprinted 86 times.

A major undertaking in Buddhist publishing has been the publication in 2001 of the 318 volumes of translations into Korean of the entire Koryŏ-period Buddhist canon from the 13th century, which was in Chinese and early in the 20th century had served as the basis for the authoritative Taishō canon (Lancaster, 1979). Partial translations into modern Korean had appeared from 1965.

Bibliography

Anthony, Brother, of Taizé (An Sonjae), "Ko Un's Hwaomkyong: A Modern Korean Pilgrim's Progress," TRAS.KB 70, 1995, 1–14.

Bantly, F.C., Embracing Illusion: Truth and Fiction in "The Dream of the Nine Clouds", Albany, 1996.

Best, J.W., "Kwallŭk's Testimony Concerning the Date of Buddhism's Introduction to Paekche," in: H.H. Sørensen, ed., Religions in Traditional Korea, Copenhagen, 1995.

Bouchez, D., "La langue d'origine du roman coréen Rêve de neuf nuages," BÉFEO 82, 1995, 111–141.

Bouchez, D., "Buddhism and Neo-Confucianism in Kim Manjung's Random Essays," in: W.T. de Bary & J.K. Haboush, eds., The Rise of Neo-Confucianism in Korea, New York, 1985, 445–472.

Buswell, R.E. Jr., The Korean Approach to Zen: The Collected Works of Chinul, Honolulu, 1983.

Buswell, R.E. Jr., & D.S. Lopez Jr., eds., The Princeton Dictionary of Buddhism, Princeton, 2013.

Buzo, A., & T. Prince, eds. & trans., Kyunyŏ-jŏn: The Life, Times and Songs of a Tenth-Century Korean Monk, Broadway, 1993.

Chang, Hyohyŏn, Kuunmong (구운몽; Nine Cloud Dream), Seongnam, 2008.

Cho, Dong-il (Cho Tongil), Cho Dong-il's History of Korean Literature, London, 2013.

Cho, Dongil (Cho Tongil), & D. Bouchez, Histoire de la littérature coréenne des origines à 1919, Paris, 2002.

Cho, Eunsu, "Re-thinking Late 19th Century Chosŏn Buddhist Society," AK 6/2, 2003, 87–109.

Cho, P'yŏnghwan, Han'guk kojŏn siga ŭi pulgyo munhwa suyong yangsang (한국 고전시가의 불교문화 수용양상; Aspects of the Reception of Buddhist Culture in the Classical Poetry of Korea), Paju, 2011.

Cho, Tongil (Cho Dongil), Han'guk munhak t'ongsa (한국문학통사; Comprehensive History of Korean Literature), 6 vols., Seoul, 4 2005.

Ch'oe, Pyŏnghŏn, et al., Han'guk pulgyosa yŏn'gu immun (한구불교사 연구 입문; Introduction to the Study of the History of Korean Buddhism), 2 vols., Paju, 2013.

Choi, Joon-sik, Buddhism: Religion in Korea, Seoul, 2007.

Chŏng, Chaeho, "Naong chak kasa-ŭi chakka sibi," (懶翁作歌辭의 作家 是非; The Controversy about the Authorship of the Kasa Attributed to Naong), HY 19, 2003, 137–181.

Chung, Byung-jo, History of Korean Buddhism, Seoul, 2007.

Cleary, T., trans., The Flower Ornament Scripture: Translation of the Avatamsaka Sūtra, 3 vols., Boulder, 1987.

Grayson, J.H., Korea: A Religious History, New York, 2002.

Grayson, J.H., Early Buddhism and Christianity: A Study in the Emplantation of Religion, Leiden, 1985.

Han, Pogwang, Sinang kyŏlsa yŏn'gu: Manil yŏmbul kyŏlsa-ŭi inyŏm-gwa silch'ŏn (仰結社研究: 萬日念佛結社의 理念과 實踐; A Study of Religious Associations: The Thought and Practice of 10,000-day Yŏmbul Associations), Seongnam, 2000.

Im, Kijung, Pulgyo kasa yŏn'gu (불교가사연구; A Study of Buddhist Kasa), Seoul, 2001.

Im, Kijung, ed., Pulgyo kasa wŏnjŏn yŏn'gu (불교가사원전연구; A Study of the Original Texts of Buddhist Kasa), Seoul, 2000.

Inoue, H., "The Reception of Buddhism in Korea and Its Impact on Indigenous Culture," in: L. Lancaster & C.S. Yu, eds., Introduction of Buddhism to Korea: New Cultural Patterns, Berkeley, 1989, 29–78.

Kaminishiki, I., Explaining Pictures: Buddhist Propaganda and Etoki Storytelling in Japan, Honolulu, 2006.

Kim, Chinyŏng, Pulgyo tamnon-gwa kojŏnsŏsa (불교담론과 고전거사; Buddhist Discourse and Classical Narratives), Seoul, 2012.

Kim, Chinyŏng, "Pulchŏn-gwa kososŏr-ŭi sanggwansŏng" (불전과 고소설의 상관성; The Interrelations of Buddhist Scriptures and Pre-modern Fiction), ŎY 33, 2000, 203–234.

Kim, Chongjin, Pulgyo kasa-ŭi kyebohak: Kŭ munhwasajŏk t'amsaek (불교가사의 계보학: 그 문화사적 탐색; The Genealogy of Buddhist Kasa: A Culture-Historical Investigation), Seoul, 2009.

Kim, Chongjin, "1850 nyŏndae pulsŏ kanhaeng undong-gwa pulgyo kasa: Namho Yŏnggi-rŭl chungsim-ŭro" (1850 년대 불서간행운동과 불교가사: 남호영기를 중심으로; The Movement for the Publication of Buddhist Scriptures of the 1850s and Buddhist Kasa), HMY 14, 2004a, 109–140.

Kim, Chongjin, "'Kwangdae moyŏn'ga' ŭi ch'angjak paegyŏng-gwa munhakchŏk t'ŭksŏng" (광대모연가의 창작배경과 문학적 특성; The Background of the Composition of "Kwangdae moyŏn'ga" and Its Literary Characteristics), HSY 16, 2004b, 219–248.

Kim, Chongjin, Pulgyo kasa ŭi yŏnhaeng-gwa chŏnsŭng (불교가사의 연행과 전승; The Performance and Transmission of Buddhist Kasa), Seoul, 2002.

Kim, Daeyeol, "The Social and Cultural Presence of Buddhism in the Lives of Confucian Literati in Late Chosŏn: The Case of Tasan," SJKS 25/2, 2012, 213–241.

Kim, Hunggyu, Understanding Korean Literature, Armonk, 1997.

Kim Manjung (Kim Man-Choong), The Cloud Dream of the Nine, London, 1922; http://www.eldritchpress.org/kim/cloud9.html.

Kim, Pyŏngguk, Sŏp'o Kim Manjung ŭi saengae wa munhak (서포 김만중의 생애와 문학; Life and Literature of Sŏp'o Kim Manjung), Seoul, 2001.

Ko, Un, What? 108 Zen Poems, Berkeley, 2008.

Ko, Un, Little Pilgrim: A Buddhist Novel, Berkeley, 2005.

Ko, Yŏngsŏp, Han'guk pulgyosa yŏn'gu (한국불교사연구; Studies in Korean Buddhist History), Paju, 2012.

Ko, Young-seop, & Hwang Nam-Ju, eds., Korean-English Buddhist Dictionary with Sanskrit and English Equivalents, Seoul, 2010.

Lancaster, L.R., "Maitreya in Korea," KJ 29/11, 1989, 4–17.

Lancaster, L.R., The Korean Buddhist Canon: A Descriptive Catalogue, Berkeley, 1979.

Ledyard, G., The Korean Language Reform of 1446, Seoul, 1998.

Lee, Jung-Shim, "Buddhist Writers in Colonial Korea: Rethinking Korean Literature, Religion and History during the Colonial Period, 1910–1945," diss., Leiden University, 2013.

Lee, Peter H., ed., A History of Korean Literature, Cambridge UK, 2003.

Lee, Peter H., Studies in the Saenaennorae, Rome, 1959.

Lee, Younghee, "A Buddhist Reconquest of Korea? Namho Yŏnggi and 'Changan kŏlsikka,'" JKR 3/1, 2012, 85–103.

Lee, Younghee, "Hell and Other Karmic Consequences: A Buddhist Vernacular Song," in: R.E. Buswell Jr., ed., Religions of Korea in Practice, Princeton, 2007a, 100–111.

Lee, Younghee, "Waiting for the Sun to Rise: Ch'imgoeng and Late Chosŏn Buddhism," SJEAS 7/1, 2007b, 69–86.

Lee, Younghee, "Gender Specificity in Late-Chosŏn Buddhist Kasa," SJEAS 6/1, 2006, 61–88.

Mair, V., Paintings and Performance: Chinese Picture Recitation and Its Indian Genesis, Honolulu, 1998.

Myŏngyŏn (明衍), Yŏmbul pogwŏnmun (念佛普勸文), eds. & trans. Chŏng Uyŏng (정우영) & Kim Chongjin (김종진), HHPC 9, Seoul, 2012.

Oh, Bonnie B.C., "Kim Iryŏp's Conflicting Worlds," in: Young-Key Kim-Renaud, ed., Creative Women of Korea, London, 2004, 175–191.

Olof, A.M., trans. & ed., The Wŏrinch'ŏn'gangjigok: Song of the Moon Reflected on a Thousand Rivers, London, 2009.

Olof, A.M., "The Story of Prince Golden Calf and Tale Type 707: A Translation and Comparison," in: R.E. Breuker, ed., Korea in the Middle: Korean Studies and Area Studies: Essays in Honour of Boudewijn Walraven, Leiden, 2008, 260–286.

Olof, A.M., " 'Boddhisattva Never Despise': Chapter 20 of the Lotus Sutra in the Sŏkpo-sangjŏl and the Wŏrin sŏkpo,' in: E. de Poorter, ed., As the Twig is Bent… Essays in Honour of Frits Vos, Amsterdam, 1990, 127–153.

Olof, A.M., "Sŏkka Yŏrae sipchi haengnok: An Attempt to Find Its Place in Buddhist Literature," in: D. Bouchez et al., eds., Twenty Papers on Korean Studies Offered to Professor W.E. Skillend, CÉC 5, 1989, 201–217.

Olof, A.M., "The Story of Prince Allakkuk: Wŏrin Sŏkpo vol. 8," KJ 23/1, 1983, 13–20.

Orzech, C.D., et al., eds., Esoteric Buddhism and the Tantras in East Asia, HOS 4/24, Leiden, 2011.

Park, Jin Y., "Gendered Response to Modernity: Kim Iryŏp and Buddhism," in: Jin Y. Park, ed., Makers of Modern Korean Buddhism, Albany, 2010.

Rutt, R., & K. Chong-un, trans., Virtuous Women: Three Masterpieces of Traditional Korean Fiction, Seoul, 1974.

Sasse, W., & J.-H. Ahn, Der Mond gespiegelt in tausend Flüssen: Das Leben des Buddha Gautama in Verse gesetzt im Jahre 1447 von König Sejong, Seoul, 2002.

Son, Chint'ae, Chōsen shinka ihen (朝鮮神歌遺編; Remnants of Korean Sacred Songs), Tokyo, 1930.

Skillend, W.E., Kodae sosŏl: A Survey of Korean Traditional Style Popular Novels, London, 1986.

Walraven, B., "The Creation of the World and Human Suffering," in: R.E. Buswell Jr., ed., Religions of Korea in Practice, Princeton, 2007a, 244–258.

Walraven, B., "A Re-examination of the Social Basis of Buddhism in Late Chosŏn Korea," SJKS 20/1, 2007b, 1–20.

Walraven, B., "Eighteenth-century Buddhist Beliefs and Practice in Yŏmbul pogwŏnmun," in: Proceedings 2007 AKSE Conference, Dourdan, 2007c.

Walraven, B., Songs of the Shaman: The Ritual Chants of the Korean Mudang, London, 1994.

Walraven, B., "The Root of Evil: As Explained in Korean Shaman Songs," in: D. Bouchez et al., eds., Twenty Papers on Korean Studies Offered to Professor W.E. Skillend, CÉC 5, Paris, 1989, 351–369.

Walraven, B., De redder der armen, Amsterdam, 1980 (Dut.).

Yi, Chino (李晉吾), Han'guk pulgyo munhag-ŭi yŏn'gu (韓國 佛教文學의 研究; A Study of Korean Buddhist Literature), Seoul, 1997.

Yi, Sangbo, Han'guk pulgyo kasa chŏnjip, Seoul, 1980.

Yu, Hosŏn (유호선), Chosŏn hugi kyŏnghwa sajŏg-ŭi pulgyo insik-kwa pulgyo munhak (조선후기 경화사족의 불교 인식과 불교문학; Late Chosŏn Perceptions of Buddhism by Members of the Capital Elite and Buddhist Literature), Paju, 2006.

BOUDEWIJN WALRAVEN
YOUNGHEE LEE

Korean B

In Korea before the 20th century, had a prestige that far surpassed th ular. This was because only literary as literature, because literary Chine franca of East Asia, and because al for Korean Buddhism were in Chi were also imported from China.

Belles Lettres

Short Poetry

Virtually no short Korean Buddhist survives from before the poems (崔致遠; b. 857), which were n pieces sent to monks or about th dhist sites (Ch'oe Chun'ok, vol. I, 1982, 46–55, 61–62). These inspired 1392) monks and laymen to write The first poetry initially composed vive in numbers was the poetry w (義天; 1055–1101). They were most trinal, or lyrical poems. This tend by his pupils, as well as by seve Ch'ŏnt'ae (天台; Chn. Tiantai) sch 了世; 1163–1245) and Ch'ŏnin (天 2012, 9).

These poems appeared mainly literary collections of verse and Chan [禪] ŏrok/Chn. yulu [語錄], of which just over a hundred ar Taegak kuksa munjip of Ŭich'ŏn chip of Kyŏnghŏ Sŏng'u (1849–191
Of these collections, 10 come from 4 from the early Chosŏn (朝鮮; 13 invasion of 1592), 13 from the in its immediate aftermath, and 7 1592–1910.

This increasing production includes much poetry and "teac related to the growing dominanc Of the ten munjip of the Koryŏ, t and seven are Sŏn in origin, b the later collections were by Sŏn ration for the writing of Sŏn po sive Sŏnmun yŏmsong chip (禪門

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill sattva Never Despise': Chapter 20 of the Sŏkpo-sangjŏl and the Wŏrin sŏkpo," in:

As the Twig is Bent . . . Essays in Honour rdam, 1990, 127–153. ŏrae sipchi haengnok: An Attempt to uddhist Literature," in: D. Bouchez et al., s on Korean Studies Offered to Professor 5, 1989, 201–217.
of Prince Allakkuk: Wŏrin Sŏkpo vol. 8,"
).
ds., Esoteric Buddhism and the Tantras in 4, Leiden, 2011.
ed Response to Modernity: Kim Iryŏp n: Jin Y. Park, ed., Makers of Modern Albany, 2010.
-un, trans., Virtuous Women: Three Mas- onal Korean Fiction, Seoul, 1974.
, Der Mond gespiegelt in tausend Flüsse.
dha Gautama in Verse gesetzt im Jahre ng, Seoul, 2002.
n shinka ihen (朝鮮神歌遺編; Rem-cred Songs), Tokyo, 1930.
e sosŏl: A Survey of Korean Traditional ls, London, 1986.
eation of the World and Human Suffer-ell Jr., ed., Religions of Korea in Practice, 44–258.
examination of the Social Basis of Budsŏn Korea," SJKS 20/1, 2007b, 1–20. enth-century Buddhist Beliefs and Prac-gwŏnmun," in: Proceedings 2007 AKSE an, 2007c.
of the Shaman: The Ritual Chants of the
ondon, 1994.
Root of Evil: As Explained in Korean
: D. Bouchez et al., eds., Twenty Papers
Offered to Professor W.E. Skillend, CÉC 5, 9.
er der armen, Amsterdam, 1980 (Dut.).
), Han'guk pulgyo munhag-ŭi yŏn'gu 의 研究; A Study of Korean Buddhist 1997. ulgyo kasa chŏnjip, Seoul, 1980.
Chosŏn hugi kyŏnghwa sajŏg-ŭi pulgyo munhak (조선후기 경화사족의 불교
; Late Chosŏn Perceptions of Buddhism
e Capital Elite and Buddhist Literature),

BOUDEWIJN WALRAVEN
YOUNGHEE LEE

Korean Buddhist Literature in Chinese

In Korea before the 20th century, literary Chinese had a prestige that far surpassed the Korean vernacular. This was because only literary Chinese counted as literature, because literary Chinese was the lingua franca of East Asia, and because all the source texts for Korean Buddhism were in Chinese. Most genres were also imported from China.

Belles Lettres

Short Poetry

Virtually no short Korean Buddhist poetry in Chinese survives from before the poems of Ch'oe Ch'iwŏn (崔致遠; b. 857), which were mostly occasional pieces sent to monks or about the beauty of Buddhist sites (Ch'oe Chun'ok, vol. I, 1982, 636; vol. II, 1982, 46–55, 61–62). These inspired Koryŏ (高麗; 918–1392) monks and laymen to write Buddhist poetry. The first poetry initially composed in Chinese to survive in numbers was the poetry written by Ŭich'ŏn (義天; 1055–1101). They were mostly occasional, doctrinal, or lyrical poems. This tendency was followed by his pupils, as well as by several monks of the Ch'ŏnt'ae (天台; Chn. Tiantai) school, such as Yose (了世; 1163–1245) and Ch'ŏnin (天因; 1205–1248; Lee, 2012, 9).

These poems appeared mainly in munjip (文集), literary collections of verse and prose (incl. Sŏn/Chan [禪] ŏrok/Chn. yulu [語錄], collected sayings), of which just over a hundred are known from the Taegak kuksa munjip of Ŭich'ŏn until the Kyŏnghŏ chip of Kyŏnghŏ Sŏng'u (1849–1912; Lee, 2012, 23–51). Of these collections, 10 come from the Koryŏ period, 4 from the early Chosŏn (朝鮮; 1392 to the Japanese invasion of 1592), 13 from the invasion period and its immediate aftermath, and 74 from the period 1592–1910.

This increasing production of munjip, which includes much poetry and "teaching literature," is related to the growing dominance of Sŏn in Korea. Of the ten munjip of the Koryŏ, three are Ch'ŏnt'ae, and seven are Sŏn in origin, but virtually all of the later collections were by Sŏn monks. The inspiration for the writing of Sŏn poetry was the massive Sŏnmun yŏmsong chip (禪門拈頌) by Chin'gak Hyesim (眞覺慧諶; 1178–1234) and its commentary by his disciple Kagun (覺雲), the Sŏnmun yŏmsong sŏrhwa (禪門拈頌說話). Hyesim was a disciple of Pojo Chinul (普照知訥; 1158–1210), who introduced kanhwa (Chn. kanhua [看話]), the Sŏn meditation on the point or key word of a kongan (Chn. gong'an [公案]) from Song-dynasty China. The kongan or "public case" is a short, puzzling dialogue meant to halt conceptualization. The most famous kongan is the short form of the reply by Zhaozhou, "No (mu [無])," to the question, "Does a dog have the buddha nature?" These kongan and their evaluations often took poetic form (Kim, 2012).

Hyesim, the first Korean monk to leave an ŏrok, also left a collection of Sŏn poems. The characteristics of Sŏn poetry are the themes of enlightenment, of contemplating nature as one with oneself, and of nature as the dharmakāya. Typical symbols are the mountain for the dharmakāya, water for the purity of the mind, and the moon for the enlightened mind. Such poetry continues to be written till the present (In, 1983, 269–270; Lee, 2012, 14–18).

Long Verse

The most common form of long verse is made up of a series of linked quatrains on a topic or to a set rhyme, or in response to another poet, or praises of a sūtra. The praises began with Wŏnhyo (元曉; 617–686) and Ŭisang (義湘; 625–702) and were continued by Kyunyŏ (均如; 923–973), Ch'ŏnin, Hyesim, and Kihwa (己和; 1376–1433; Lee, 2012, 83–84).

Long Sŏn poems celebrate the life of the author in an isolated hermitage where he is not bound by monastic rules. The first was by Hyesim, and it was soon followed by similar poems by Ch'ungji (冲止; 1226–1292), Paegun Kyŏnghan (白雲景閑; 1299–1375), and his contemporaries. In the Chosŏn period, Chiŭn (智訔; fl. 1481), Kihwa, Hŏŭng Pou (虛應普雨; 1515–1565), and Sŏsan Hyujŏng (西山休靜; 1520–1604) also wrote such songs. T'aenŭng (太能; 1562–1649) wrote about the enlightenment process of a mountain monk. Hyŏnp'yŏn (懸辯; 1616–1684) wrote a number of long, sometimes irregular poems on topics such as rebuilding monastery halls. Ŭisun (意恂; 1786–1866) wrote on topics like planting bamboo as a teaching means. The last such long poem is the Sun'gye Sŏnsa nonga ka

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

(淳溪禪師弄我歌; Songs of Sŏn Master Sun'gye Playing with the Self), written in 1927 (Whitfield & Park, 2012, 85–86, 117–118; Han'guk Pulgyo Chŏnsŏ [HPC], vol. XII, 1979–2000, 830–850).

The third theme of long verse was devotion to a buddha or bodhisattva. The Yogācāra monk Hyeyong (惠永; 1228–1294) wrote the Paegŭi hae (白衣解; Interpretation of the White-Clothed), a mixture of prose, verse, and mantra in devotion to Avalokiteśvara (Kor. Kwanŭm [觀音]; HPC, vol. VI, 1979–2000, 411–417), which is also a repentance text. The longest and most important of this type of devotional poetry is the Sŏkka yŏrae haengjŏk song (釋迦如來行蹟頌; Hymns of the Deeds of the Tathāgata Śākyamuni) of 1328 by Unmuk (雲默) of the Ch'ŏnt'ae school (HPC, vol. VI, 1979–2000, 484–539). It is made up of 776 verses on the life of the Buddha, plus 64 verses encouraging the practice of the precepts. The verses have an autocommentary. A summary of the autocommentary was published in 1529 (HPC, vol. VII, 1979–2000, 759–766).

The final use of the long poetic forms was for songs that advocated the yŏmbul (Chn. nianfo [念佛]), the recitation or mindfulness of the (name of a) buddha. Discussion of yŏmbul and rebirth of sentient beings began in the very last years of the Koryŏ, and later Pou (普雨; 1515–1565) wrote the Kwŏnnyŏm yorok (勸念要錄; Essential Records on the Encouragement of Yŏmbul; HPC, vol. VII, 1979–2000, 609–614). Around the same time, several texts on the yŏmbul ritual were published that contained gāthā verses. Haeil (海日; 1541–1609) wrote several poems about yŏmbul and monks who specialized in it. Yŏmbul became an important topic from the time of Sŏngch'ong (性聰; 1631–1700), who wrote a long verse praising the Pure Land (HPC, vol. VIII, 1979–2000, 512–518). Thereafter a number of long poems on yŏmbul and rebirth of believers in the Pure Land were written. This popular belief in the Pure Land was not always shared by the more literate monks, who tended toward Sŏn, and so the Pure Land texts were not often written in literary Chinese.

Teaching Literature

The earliest teaching literature is Wŏnhyo's Palsim suhaeng chang (發心修行章; Awaken Your Mind and Practice), which advises monks to practice and avoid being caught up in worldly concerns (Haeju & Muller, 2012, 48–49). It was imitated by Chinul in his Kye ch'osimhagin mun (誡初心學人文; Admonitions to Neophytes) of 1205 (Buswell, 2012, 195–203). This was used in 1397, on the orders of the Chosŏn dynasty, as a set of basic rules for monasteries. Likewise, Wŏnhyo's text was included by Sŏlche Wŏldam (雪霽月潭; 1623–1704) in the curriculum for novice monks. Unmuk wrote Kyŏngch'aek (警策; Warning Whip), a warning against wasting donations. Yaun (野雲; also known as Kagu [覺牛]), a disciple of Naong (懶翁; 1320–1376), wrote Cha'gyŏng mun (自警文; Watch Yourself) about restraining desires and conduct. This was later combined with the texts of Wŏnhyo and Chinul as a textbook for postulants (Han, 1974; McBride, 2012, 399–422).

The Hwaŏm ilsŭng pŏpkyedo (華嚴一乘法界圖; Seal-Diagram Symbolizing the Dharma of the One Vehicle of the Avataṃsaka) by Ŭisang is a combination of diagram, verse, and autocommentary. This text attracted a number of commentaries from the Silla period (57 BCE–935 CE) through to the mid-Chosŏn period; it was chanted and used as a talisman. Ŭisang used it to teach his many disciples, and it inspired a number of dialogue texts related to its doctrines. There were also imitations (Haeju, 2012, 29; Jung, vol. V, 2012b, 7–13). A guide to Ch'ŏnt'ae/Tiantai doctrine, the Ch'ŏnt'ae sa'gyoŭi (天台四教儀; Outline of the Ch'ŏnt'ae Fourfold Teachings), written by Ch'egwan (諦觀; d. 970), was known throughout East Asia (Muller, 2012a, 299–394). Much later, Kim Taehyŏn (金大鉉; d. 1870) wrote an outline of the meditation practices and studies of the Tiantai founder, Zhiyi (538–597) – the Sŏnhak immun (禪學入門; HPC, vol. X, 1979–2000, 894–927).

Teaching materials were more often written in the Koryŏ period. Some of the writings of Ŭich'ŏn (1055–1101), such as compositions on beginning lectures (p'alsa [發辭]) and instructions, gave background to the texts discussed and advice to readers (McBride, trans., 2012, 321–334). The tendency for a monk's works to be posthumously published in Sŏn munjip became a major form of publication. Sŏn prioritized teaching materials such as records of dialogues between students and masters, selected succinct portions of which became fixed as kongan and then the key points of which became objects of intense focus as hwadu (話頭), a practice introduced by Chinul. A hwadu or "point of the story" is a keyword or phrase from a kongan, such as Zhaozhou's mu (see above on kongan). A number of Chinul's works were primarily meant for teaching purposes, encouraging practice and justifying it doctrinally (Buswell, 2012, 19–20, 25, 27, 31, 90–107).

Chinul also pioneered various forms of sermon (Buswell, 2012, 30–32). Hyesim's ŏrok contains the 1397, on the orders of the Chosŏn et of basic rules for monasteries. yo's text was included by Sŏlche 潭; 1623–1704) in the curriculum

s. Unmuk wrote Kyŏngch'aek (警策; a warning against wasting dona-
; also known as Kagu [覺牛]), a dis-懶翁; 1320–1376), wrote Cha'gyŏng Vatch Yourself) about restraining luct. This was later combined with hyo and Chinul as a textbook for 1974; McBride, 2012, 399–422). lsŭng pŏpkyedo (華嚴一乘法界圖; mbolizing the Dharma of the One atamsaka) by Ŭisang is a combina-verse, and autocommentary. This umber of commentaries from the BCE–935 CE) through to the mid-t was chanted and used as a talis-l it to teach his many disciples, and ber of dialogue texts related to its were also imitations (Haeju, 2012, 2012b, 7–13). A guide to Ch'ŏnt'ae/the Ch'ŏnt'ae sa'gyoŭi (天台四教義; 'ŏnt'ae Fourfold Teachings), writ-(諦觀; d. 970), was known through-uller, 2012a, 299–394). Much later, 大鉉; d. 1870) wrote an outline of ractices and studies of the Tiantai 38–597) – the Sŏnhak immun (禪學 , 1979–2000, 894–927).
erials were more often written in . Some of the writings of Ŭich'ŏn as compositions on beginning lec-辭]) and instructions, gave back-ts discussed and advice to readers 2012, 321–334). The tendency for a be posthumously published in Sŏn a major form of publication. Sŏn ing materials such as records of en students and masters, selected of which became fixed as kongan points of which became objects as hwadu (話頭), a practice intro-
. A hwadu or "point of the story" phrase from a kongan, such as (see above on kongan). A num-works were primarily meant for s, encouraging practice and justily (Buswell, 2012, 19–20, 25, 27, 31, oneered various forms of sermon –32). Hyesim's ŏrok contains the first Korean example of this genre, such as formal and informal sermons, instructions to the assembly, dharma talks, letters, and even cremation orations. All these were types of sermon, only differentiated by the occasion, audience, and delivery. Many other minor forms came out of the kongan collections, forms like the "substitute words" (taeŏ [代語]), citations of cases, or "separate replies" (pyŏl [別]), and the "capping phrases" (ch'agŏ [着語]). Most of these sayings and sermons are free flowing and full of wit and repartee, or they use swear words and literary allusions. They often refer to enlightenment events of past masters or use gestures and props such as a staff to make their point. This type of literature continued to be written right through to the present and constitutes a large portion of all Korean Buddhist literature (Jorgensen, 2012b, 59, 100, 136, 419).

There are several other forms of Sŏn teaching literature, such as Hyesim's advice on eliminating faults from the practice of the hwadu and compilations of circular and other symbols by Chigyŏm (至謙; 1145–1229) and Iryŏn (一然; 1206–1289). Ch'ŏnch'aek (天頙; 1206–1293) is credited with the Sŏnmun pojang nok (禪門寶藏錄) of 1293, a collection of cases and stories to demonstrate the difference between Sŏn and the doctrinal schools, and the Sŏnmun kang'yo chip (禪門綱要集), which deals with the essentials of the teachings of two Sŏn lineages as encapsulated in a series of three set phrases. These three phrases are claimed to be the same as the three sets of śamatha and vipaśyanā (Kor. chigwan [止觀]; two kinds of meditation: calming and discernment) of Zhiyi. Ch'ŏnch'aek's works allegedly sparked a series of increasingly technical writings such as the Sŏn'gyo ch'ongp'an mun (禪教摠判文; Overall Distinction of Sŏn and Doctrine) published in 1607. It dealt with circle diagrams, categories of Buddhism, three types of Sŏn lineages, and the various phrases or sentences used by these lineages as teaching devices (Kim, 1994, 208–211, 234–236, 397–404). A similar text by Chasu (子秀; 1664–1737) looked at various ranks or stages of enlightenment and three types of enlightenment (HPC, vol. IX, 1979–2000, 442–458). Chian (志安; 1664–1729) wrote Sŏnmun ojong kang'yo (禪門五宗綱要; Essentials of the Five Lineages of Sŏn; Kim, 1994, 380–382). In the late Chosŏn period, this categorization of types of Sŏn and their correlation with stages of enlightenment developed into an intense debate, beginning with the Sŏnmun sugyŏng (禪門水鏡; Hand-Mirror of Sŏn Literature) by Paekp'a (白坡; 1767–1852), which elaborates on such verses, images, and items of Sŏn legend. He tried to create a hierarchy of types of Sŏn. This led to a series of refutations and essays, the last written in 1930.

Another kind of Sŏn literature is the compilation of abstracts of dialogues that have led to enlightenment. An example is Kyŏnghan's Pulcho chikchi simch'ae ch'oryo (佛祖直指心體要節; The Essential Passages Directly Pointing at the Essence of the Mind; Jorgensen & Cho, 2005). Abstracts from the Sŏnmun yŏmsong chip sŏrhwa (禪門拈頌集說話) were made by Iryŏn and by Kwiam (龜庵) around 1249 (Tongguk, 1976, 134, 140; HPC, vol. XI, 1979–2000, 368c). The Yŏmsong sŏrhwa chŏllok (拈頌説話節録) by Chi'ŏm (智嚴; 1464–1534) adds to the commentary on selected kongan (HPC, vol. VII, 1979–2000, 388–528). Ŭisun also wrote Sŏnmun yŏmsong sŏnyo sŏ (禪門拈頌選要疏; Commentary on Selected Essentials from the Hymns of the Sŏn School), drawing on 40 cases from the Sŏnmun yŏmsong chip sŏrhwa (Lee, 2002, 98–105). Another abstract was the T'ongnok ch'waryo (通錄撮要), with a postface by Pyŏksong Chiŏm (碧松智嚴; 1464–1534) of 1529. It is a summary of the Zuyuan tongyao (祖源通要; Essentials of the Patriarchal Sources), a compilation by the 12th-century Chan monk, Gongchen (拱辰). This provided the biographies of the Chan patriarchs and teachers, including enlightening dialogues. At the end, the T'ongnok ch'waryo has the hagiographies of 34 Silla Sŏn masters (most are only listed by name), plus that of Naong (Ko, 1987, 207–231).

Two other genres that appear regularly in the munjip are letters and "encouragement of good." The first extant letters are those written by Ŭich'ŏn (1055–1101) to Chinese masters and rulers. These letters were kept because they were historically important or contained doctrine, or they were examples of style (HPC, vol. IV, 1979–2000, 542–547, 569–583). Hyesim wrote letters to powerful lay believers or other monks, often outlining his views on doctrine and practice in advice. Some of these letters may have been modeled on the Dahui shu (大慧書; Letters of Dahui), letters written to laypeople by Dahui Zonggao (大慧宗杲; 1089–1163), for the Dahui shu inspired Hyesim's master Chinul to introduce kanhwa practice (HPC, vol. VI, 1979–2000, 40–47; Jorgensen, 2012b, 175–196). Ch'ŏnch'aek and Naong wrote a number of long letters discussing Buddhist history and doctrine or the coexistence of Confucianism and Buddhism, as well as letters of instruction (Jorgensen, 2012b, 474–481, 496–497). Such letters dry up until Sŏsan Hyujŏng wrote letters to other monks and students encouraging them to practice (HPC, vol. VII, 1979–2000, 719–732; Jorgensen, 2012a, 322–337, 343–364). Sŏsan's students and lineage heirs wrote many letters, and they became a feature of most collections (munjip) thereafter (e.g. HPC, vol. VIII, 1979–2000, 30–31, 66–67, 124–126).

The kwŏnsŏn mun (勸善文), or kwŏn'yŏn mun (勸緣文), appear in most collections from the time of Pou (1515–1565). These are literally "texts encouraging good" or "texts encouraging links (with Buddhism or good karma)." They were written to encourage people to donate money to rebuild a monastery because works like bridges and monasteries brought benefit to the country and blessings to the donor (HPC, vol. VII, 1979–2000, 581–582). Sŏsan wrote several mo'yŏn mun (募緣文), encouraging donations (HPC, vol. VII, 1979–2000, 714–715). Sŏsan's pupils continued this practice, and thereafter these texts appear in the majority of munjip up to the last century (see e.g. HPC, vol. VIII, 1979–2000, 123, 174–182).

Occasionally, munjip collections, beginning with that of Ŭich'ŏn (1055–1101) also include memorials (p'yo [表]) or reports (sŏ [疏]) to the throne or superiors and prefaces and postfaces to books and other texts. Scholarly apparatuses include catalogues, the first by Ŭich'ŏn (HPC, vol. IV, 1979–2000, 679–697) and the last by Pojŏng (寶鼎; 1861–1930) (HPC, vol. XII, 1979–2000, 435–510), and genealogies, mostly of Sŏn lineages, beginning with the tables by Muhak Chach'o (無學自超; 1327–1405; HPC, vol. XII, 1979–2000, 435–510) and ending with Hyŏngjun (炯竣) and his Haedong Pulcho wŏllyu (海東佛祖源流) in 1978.

Biography and Hagiography

A deceased monk's disciples compiled an account of conduct (haengjang [行狀]) or record of deeds (haengjŏk [行蹟]), which was often chronological and detailed, and then they prevailed on an eminent layman to compose the stele or stūpa inscription (pimun [碑文]) in elaborate prose, often replete with allusions, followed by the "inscription" (myŏng [銘]) in verse. The initial part in prose was called the "preface" (sŏ [序]) and usually gave a summary of the type of Buddhism that the subject taught and then a narrative of the biography.

There are approximately 340 individual hagiographies in epigraphic form of clerics who died before 1910 (Jikwan, 2012, 8). Moreover, haengjang and haengjŏk are found in various munjip, approximately 80 in total, nearly all from the Chosŏn period. Haengjang were less prestigious than the stele inscriptions. In the very Confucian Chosŏn period, there are more haengjang than inscriptions, because not all monks could attract the agreement of a lay literatus to compose the inscription, or the funds needed.

Sometimes the accounts of conduct were summarized and placed in a collection of hagiographies, the yŏlchŏn (列傳) or "connected biographies," which adopted chronological order or classifications of saintly exemplars. There are six collections of hagiographies in the yŏlchŏn genre. One is not extant, and one, the Samguk yusa (三國遺事) by Iryŏn, is a collection of mirabilia and "history" in which some hagiographies are found (Finch, 2012, 179–576).

A third type of hagiography was the chŏn (傳), which were often meant to be incorporated into a collection of biographies. In the Silla period, a considerable number of these individual biographies were composed. These have not survived (Kim, 1992, 49–52). The chŏn focused on the activities of the monk, though still as an exemplar.

The first partially extant collection is the Haedong kosŭng chŏn (海東高僧傳; Lives of Eminent Korean Monks) by Kakhun (覺訓), compiled on royal command in 1215 (Lee, 1969). The Tongguk sŭngni rok (東國僧尼錄; Records of the Monks and Nuns of Korea) is an anonymous collection of 67 entries on monks and one entry on a Silla nun. It is a post mid-Chosŏn text using unusual categories of monks and nuns, such as "rebellious monks" and "evil monks," which shows that this book was colonized by anti-Buddhist Neo-Confucian ideas. The Samguk yusa by Iryŏn recorded local legends and interviews and also included monastic records. Many miracle tales are included, while the biographies range from the more sober chŏn to the miraculous (Jung, vol. X, 2012a, 42). The Tongsa yŏlchŏn (東師列傳; Linked Biographies of Eastern Masters), written by Kagan (覺岸) in 1884, contains biographies from that of Ado, traditionally thought to have first introduced Buddhism into Korea, through to that of Hoegwang (晦光; 1840–1933), a controversial monk who collaborated with the Japanese colonialists; it includes 198 biographies. Lastly, the Chogye kosŭng chŏn (曹溪高僧傳) by Pojŏng is a compilation of 97 biographies of members of the Chogye lineages beginning with Chinul. The text dates from 1930 (Kim, 1994, 410–412; Jorgensen, 1997, 219–260).

There are a few exceptional hagiographies, such as that of Kyunyŏ by Hyŏngnyŏn Chŏng (赫連挺) of 1075, which is arranged thematically rather than

---

chronologically as is usually the c 38; McBride & Vermeersch, 2012, the Chinmuk Sŏnsa yujŏkko (震默 Ŭisun, which is based on interviews tual sources and adds scriptural citat 116–121). Autobiographies are rare and Korean traditions. Four were Korean monks Wŏlp'a Taeyul (月 HPC, vol. IX, 1979–2000, 675–676), 隱有璣; 1707–1785; HPC, vol. IX, 1 and Yŏndam Yuil (蓮潭有一; 1720–1 1979–2000, 283–286), and a letter w to No Susin (盧守愼; 1515–1590), det try, childhood, and early career (J 322–334). There are also a number raphies. Hyesim wrote two parodie raphies (HPC, vol. VI, 1979–2000, 89 Ŭngyun (鏡巖應允; 1743–1804) wr too veiled criticism of Neo-Conf clearly aware of the problems of b described these in his essay on the Chacho (HPC, vol. X, 1979–2000, 447

Narratives/Dramatic Work

The first novella (sosŏl [小說]) wa the Pusŏl chŏn (浮雪傳; Tale of found in the Yŏnghŏ chip (暎虛集 1541–1609). Pusŏl was a monk who so lived the life of a layman but still he died, his former comrades cre they obtained śarīra (relics) from t sign of sanctity), and so built a stū transgression of the precepts an son by Pusŏl resemble the tale of V eral others found in the Samguk 58–59, 64).

Another avenue for the creat novellas was the imitation of Sŏlcham (雪岑; the monastic nan [金時習]; 1435–1493) wrote suc his Kŭm'o sinhwa (金鰲神話; New T Kŭmo) and Sassi Namjŏng-gi (謝氏 Journey to the South). Although a affairs, these novellas are thread ideas of causation, the transienc hells, the afterlife and spirits, and Evon, forthcoming). These theme Kuunmong (九雲夢; Nine-Cloud Manjung (金萬重; 1637–1692), a lo literary Chinese. It tells of a monk's bureaucratic success and a family.

total, nearly all from the Chosŏn jang were less prestigious than the ons. In the very Confucian Chosŏn re more haengjang than inscriptions, l monks could attract the agreement ıs to compose the inscription, or the he accounts of conduct were summad in a collection of hagiographies, the or "connected biographies," which ological order or classifications of ars. There are six collections of hagie yŏlchŏn genre. One is not extant, mguk yusa (三國遺事) by Iryŏn, is a irabilia and "history" in which some re found (Finch, 2012, 179–576). of hagiography was the chŏn (傳), en meant to be incorporated into a graphies. In the Silla period, a con-er of these individual biographies

l. These have not survived (Kim, e chŏn focused on the activities of h still as an exemplar. ally extant collection is the Haedong 東高僧傳; Lives of Eminent Korean un (覺訓), compiled on royal com-ee, 1969). The Tongguk sŭngni rok cords of the Monks and Nuns of nymous collection of 67 entries on ntry on a Silla nun. It is a post mid-g unusual categories of monks and bellious monks" and "evil monks," t this book was colonized by anti-nfucian ideas. The Samguk yusa l local legends and interviews and nastic records. Many miracle tales le the biographies range from the to the miraculous (Jung, vol. X, ongsa yŏlchŏn (東師列傳; Linked stern Masters), written by Kagan ontains biographies from that of thought to have first introduced rea, through to that of Hoegwang a controversial monk who col-Japanese colonialists; it includes Lastly, the Chogye kosŭng chŏn ojŏng is a compilation of 97 biog-rs of the Chogye lineages begin-The text dates from 1930 (Kim, ensen, 1997, 219–260).
exceptional hagiographies, such by Hyŏngnyŏn Chŏng (赫連挺) ranged thematically rather than chronologically as is usually the case (Kim, 1992, 38; McBride & Vermeersch, 2012, 406–438), and the Chinmuk Sŏnsa yujŏkko (震默禪師遺蹟考) by Ŭisun, which is based on interviews rather than textual sources and adds scriptural citations (Lee, 2002, 116–121). Autobiographies are rare in the Chinese and Korean traditions. Four were written by the Korean monks Wŏlp'a Taeyul (月波兌律; 1695–?; HPC, vol. IX, 1979–2000, 675–676), Hoŭn Yugi (好隱有璣; 1707–1785; HPC, vol. IX, 1979–2000, 727), and Yŏndam Yuil (蓮潭有一; 1720–1799; HPC, vol. X, 1979–2000, 283–286), and a letter was sent by Sŏsan to No Susin (盧守慎; 1515–1590), detailing his ancestry, childhood, and early career (Jorgensen, 2012a, 322–334). There are also a number of pseudo biographies. Hyesim wrote two parodies of monk biographies (HPC, vol. VI, 1979–2000, 891), and Kyŏngam Ŭngyun (鏡巖應允; 1743–1804) wrote one, a none too veiled criticism of Neo-Confucians. He was clearly aware of the problems of biography, as he described these in his essay on the deeds of Muhak Chacho (HPC, vol. X, 1979–2000, 447–450).

---

Narratives/Dramatic Works

The first novella (sosŏl [小說]) was a "biography," the Pusŏl chŏn (浮雪傳; Tale of Layman Pusŏl), found in the Yŏnghŏ chip (暎虛集) of Haeil (海日; 1541–1609). Pusŏl was a monk who fell in love and so lived the life of a layman but still practiced. After he died, his former comrades cremated him, and they obtained śarīra (relics) from the ashes (a clear sign of sanctity), and so built a stūpa for him. The transgression of the precepts and fathering of a son by Pusŏl resemble the tale of Wŏnhyo and several others found in the Samguk yusa (Kim, 1992, 58–59, 64).

Another avenue for the creation of Buddhist novellas was the imitation of Chinese models. Sŏlcham (雪岑; the monastic name of Kim Sisŭp [金時習]; 1435–1493) wrote such imitations in his Kŭm'o sinhwa (金鰲神話; New Tales from Mount Kŭmo) and Sassi Namjŏng-gi (謝氏南征記; Lady Sa's Journey to the South). Although about tragic love affairs, these novellas are threaded through with ideas of causation, the transience of life, rebirth, hells, the afterlife and spirits, and dream (Yi, 1972; Evon, forthcoming). These themes reappear in the Kuunmong (九雲夢; Nine-Cloud Dream) by Kim Manjung (金萬重; 1637–1692), a long text written in literary Chinese. It tells of a monk's dream of having bureaucratic success and a family. When he wakes, he becomes a fervent practitioner of Buddhism. Influenced by Tang-dynasty Chinese novellas of a life within a dream, the underlying philosophy is of the futility of the pursuit of fame, career, wealth, and women, and it emphasizes transience, rebirth, and emptiness (Chong, 1974; Evon, forthcoming).

Mirabilia connected with faith in a sūtra used to encourage practice by lay believers are found in the Haedong chŏnhong nok (海東傳弘錄; Records of Transmissions in Korea) compiled by Ch'ŏnch'aek. Later, Yowŏn (了圓; c. 1330s–1340s) used Ch'ŏnch'aek's work in his Pŏphwa yŏnghŏm chŏn (法華靈驗傳; Korean Traditions of the Miracles of the Lotus Sūtra) for 8 out of 117 tales connected to faith in the Lotus Sūtra (Kim, 1994, 247–248). The Kwŏnnyŏm yorok attributed to Pou contains 11 tales of the miraculous benefits of yŏmbul (here it means chanting the name of Amitābha; HPC, vol. VII, 1979–2000, 609–614). Sŏngch'ong (性聰; 1631–1700) compiled the Sagyŏng chihŏmgi (四經持驗紀; Records of the Miracles Associated with Keeping the Four Sūtras) in 1686 (HPC, vol. VIII, 1979–2000, 518–552).

Local Literature

Records (ki [記]) or "histories" (yŏn'gi [緣起]) of monasteries or objects such as statues and stūpas date back to early Korean history. The early examples of monastic gazetteers (saji [寺誌] or sajŏk [史蹟]) have been destroyed. However, stele inscriptions celebrating the foundation or reconstruction of monasteries or even the erection of statues have survived, and 564 such inscriptions, records, and gazetteers are known (Tongguk, 1976, 303–353; Hŏ, 1986, 793–794).

Gazetteers describe the history or legends of a monastery, its buildings and statues, and the persons associated with the monasteries. They may include copies of inscriptions and lists of landholdings and donations, even poems about the site (Hŏ, 1986, 790).

The earliest surviving gazetteers were written by Haean (海眼; 1567–?). Haean filled out the record of the monastery with general histories of Buddhism and biographies. A series of gazetteers appeared from Haean's time until early 19th century, when the monastic gazetteer proper began with Chŏng Yagyong (丁若鏞; 1762–1836). Many of these monastic gazetteers set the local inside the Buddhist cosmos or history. Chŏng Yagyong eschewed the the cosmological and general historical approach for the immediately local. Most monastic gazetteers following his example were written in the late Chosŏn or under Japanese colonial rule (Hŏ, 1986, 795–797, 804–807, 825; Jorgensen, 2008, 88–92; Han'guk munhŏn yŏng'guso, 1977–1989).

Hyesim wrote several ki (records) or rhymed inscriptions (myŏng) for donated items and bells, with a few lines of factual introduction (preface or sŏ) and several lines of verse (HPC, vol. VI, 1979–2000, 65–67). There were very few "records" of buildings and the like written by Koryŏ monks. This was largely the domain of lay literati. No more by monks appear until the mid-Chosŏn, when Pou (1515–1565) and Sŏsan wrote a number (HPC, vol. VII, 1979–2000, 578–581, 705–708, 715–718). Most munjip from the early 17th century till now contain a number of such local records.

Some monks wrote on their travels to certain monasteries and mountain districts. These were written by Ch'ŏnin (HPC, vol. VI, 1979–2000, 884–885), Ch'ŏnch'aek (HPC, vol. VI, 1979–2000, 206–208; Whitfield, 2012, 242n212), Haeil, and Myŏngch'al (明察; 1640–1708). Myŏngch'al wrote of his travels in verse (HPC, vol. VIII, 1979–2000, 42–44), possibly in imitation of Sŏlcham (Kim Sisŭp)'s Maewŏl-dang si sayu rok (梅月堂詩四遊錄; Record of Maewŏl-dang's Poetic Tour of Four Regions). The last in this vein was Yu Kŭmgang nok (遊金剛録; Records of Travels in the Kŭmgang Mountains) by Pŏpchong (法宗; 1670–1733; HPC, vol. VIII, 1979–2000, 518–527).

There are two short books surveying the monasteries of Korea: the Karam ko (伽藍考; Studies of Monasteries) by the Confucian geographer Sin Kyŏngjun (申景濬; 1712–1781) and the Pŏmu ko (梵宇攷; Studies of Buddhist Buildings) commissioned by King Chŏngjo (正祖) in 1799 (Tongguk, 1976, 303; Sin Kyongjun, 1989).

There are only three records of trips to foreign countries. Hyech'o's (慧超) travels to India (往五天竺國傳; Wang och'ŏnch'ukguk chŏn; Memoirs of a Pilgrimage to Five Indian Kingdoms) between 723 and 728 were not known in Korea until modern times (Jung, vol. X, 2012a, 7–29; Wegehaupt, 2012, 71–174). Yujŏng (惟政; 1544–1610) was sent to Japan as a chief treaty negotiator. An account of his activities and negotiations, the Song'un Taesa bunch'ung sŏnam nok (松雲大師奮中舒難録; Record of Unfolding Difficulties in the Midst of the Determination of Great Master Song'un; HPC, vol. VIII, 1979–2000, 79–113) was compiled by Sin Yuhan (申維翰; 1681–?). Hyŏnjŏng (賢正)'s Ilbon p'yohae nok (日本漂海錄; Record of Being Blown across the Sea to Japan) tells the story of his travels to Japan in 1817 when the boat on which he was transporting Buddha images was blown off course (HPC, vol. X, 1979–2000, 710–718).

Philosophical Literature

Wŏnhyo wrote two essays on logic: one dealing with its use in reconciling different opinions and one on faults in syllogisms. He also wrote the Ijang ŭi (二障義; Doctrine of the Two Hindrances), which deals with the two obstructions to enlightenment (Muller & Jung, 2012, 14–15, 19; Kim, 1994, 49–51). All later Silla works on logic after the time of Wŏnhyo, such as those by Kyŏnghŭng (憬興; fl. 681), Dojŭng (道證; fl. 692), and Taehyŏn (太賢; fl. 750s; Kim, 1994, 145–147), have been lost, for by the early Koryŏ, attention had shifted to Hwaŏm (華嚴) and Sŏn, which do not rely on logic but rather on paradox, faith, and intuition. Strictly logical and philosophical texts were no longer written after the time of Taehyŏn.

Hwaŏm and Sŏn concentrated on becoming enlightened. In Silla, Kyŏndŭng (見燈; n.d.) wrote his Hwaŏm Ilsŭng sŏngbul myoŭi (華嚴一乘成佛妙義; The Marvelous Meaning of Becoming Buddha of the One Vehicle of Hwaŏm) about whether everyone can become Buddha in terms of the stages of the bodhisattva career, practice, and theory (Kim, 1994, 145–147).

When Kihwa defended Buddhism against Confucian attacks, we again find "philosophical" treatises or apologies. He argued in Hyŏnjŏng ron (顯正論; Exposition of the Correct) that the mind in essence is pure and only deluded in function. He discussed the relation of the nature (song [性]) of the mind with sentience or feelings (chŏng [情]), which are deluded. He applied the laws of causation and attempted to show that Buddhism is deeper than Confucianism metaphysically and morally (Muller, 2012b, 446–506). The YuSŏk chirŭi non (儒釋質疑論; Questions about Confucianism and Buddhism), possibly by Kihwa, defended Buddhist positions against Confucian misunderstandings. There is discussion here of metaphysics, causation, change, and the relation of mind and nature (Kim, 1994, 293–295).

Brief essays on Confucian topics such as nature and fate, humaneness and righteousness, the nature of awareness in relation to the supreme ultimate and the five-elements (ohaeng [五行]) theories, as well as Buddhist topics such as the tathāgatagarbha (yoraejang [如來藏], the "womb of the Thus Come One" – the idea of an underlying pure potential for enlightenment or becoming Buc tion of samādhi and prajñā, wer 1680s to the 1730s (Kim, 1994, 37 philosophical concerns appear that sent by Yŏndam Yuil to a doubts about Buddhist causatio vol. X, 1979–2000, 280–283). Hy 1811) wrote a dialogue about the and on the constituents of exis ity (HPC, vol. X, 1979–2000, 702 such essays were written in the l until Kim Taehyŏn (金大鉉; d. 1 mong swaeŏn (述夢鎖言), which (Jorgensen, 1999, 515–552).

---

Ritual Texts

Orations

Orations (so [疏]; this characte ings – oration, report, and comn mia and liturgies in highly learne appropriate for address to roya and eminent monks. They were occasions such as the birthdays o saries of the Buddha, and so on.
recorded were by Ŭich'ŏn (McBri Orations by Ch'ŏnin and Ch'ŏnch ceremonies such as the "feast o (suryukchae; 水陸齋) or for assen and laity (pŏpsŏk; [法席]; HPC, 205–206; vol. XII, 1979–2000, 36–3 1226–1290) wrote a number of installation of abbots and their a vol. VI, 1979–2000, 404–408). Seve the late Koryŏ period. There is a late 14th-century orations and the when Pou (1515–1565) wrote a orations, including for parents (H 2000, 582–594). However, as B increasingly estranged from the cracy, more were written for sp or for teachers and laypeople. Ora nearly all collections of a monk's to the 20th century (see e.g. HPC, 582–594; vol. VIII, 1979–2000, 19–

Funerary Texts

The first extant eulogy (chemu deceased was by Ŭich'ŏn, which when he made offerings to his late when the boat on which he was ia images was blown off course 000, 710–718).

Literature

o essays on logic: one dealing ciling different opinions and one ns. He also wrote the Ijang ŭi (二 e Two Hindrances), which deals ctions to enlightenment (Muller 19; Kim, 1994, 49–51). All later after the time of Wŏnhyo, such ŭng (憬興; fl. 681), Dojŭng (道證; n (太賢; fl. 750s; Kim, 1994, 145– for by the early Koryŏ, attention m (華嚴) and Sŏn, which do not her on paradox, faith, and intuand philosophical texts were no the time of Taehyŏn.
n concentrated on becoming a, Kyŏndŭng (見燈; n.d.) wrote ŏngbul myoŭi (華嚴一乘成佛妙 leaning of Becoming Buddha of Hwaŏm) about whether everydha in terms of the stages of the practice, and theory (Kim, 1994, ended Buddhism against Confu-in find "philosophical" treatises gued in Hyŏnjŏng ron (顯正論; rrect) that the mind in essence uded in function. He discussed nature (song [性]) of the mind elings (chŏng [情]), which are d the laws of causation and that Buddhism is deeper than physically and morally (Muller, YuSŏk chirŭi non (儒釋質疑論; fucianism and Buddhism), posnded Buddhist positions against rstandings. There is discussion s, causation, change, and the nature (Kim, 1994, 293–295). onfucian topics such as nature s and righteousness, the nature tion to the supreme ultimate, ts (ohaeng [五行]) theories, as ics such as the tathāgatagarbha

, the "womb of the Thus Come n underlying pure potential for enlightenment or becoming Buddha) and the relation of samādhi and prajñā, were written from the 1680s to the 1730s (Kim, 1994, 372–379). Sometimes philosophical concerns appear in letters, such as that sent by Yŏndam Yuil to a governor who had doubts about Buddhist causation and karma (HPC, vol. X, 1979–2000, 280–283). Hyejang (惠藏; 1772–1811) wrote a dialogue about the Confucian classics and on the constituents of existence and morality (HPC, vol. X, 1979–2000, 702–707). A series of such essays were written in the late Chosŏn period until Kim Taehyŏn (金大鉉; d. 1870) wrote the Sulmong swaeŏn (述夢鎖言), which dealt with dreams (Jorgensen, 1999, 515–552).

---

Ritual Texts

Orations

Orations (so [疏]; this character has three meanings – oration, report, and commentary) are encomia and liturgies in highly learned, ornate language appropriate for address to royalty, high officials, and eminent monks. They were written for specific occasions such as the birthdays of the king, anniversaries of the Buddha, and so on. The first orations recorded were by Ŭich'ŏn (McBride, 2012, 408–430). Orations by Ch'ŏnin and Ch'ŏnch'aek were also for ceremonies such as the "feast of water and land" (suryukchae; 水陸齋) or for assemblies of monastics and laity (pŏpsŏk; [法席]; HPC, vol. VI, 1979–2000, 205–206; vol. XII, 1979–2000, 36–39). Ch'ungji (冲止; 1226–1290) wrote a number of orations for the installation of abbots and their anniversaries (HPC, vol. VI, 1979–2000, 404–408). Several were written in the late Koryŏ period. There is a gap between these late 14th-century orations and the 16th-century ones, when Pou (1515–1565) wrote a number of similar orations, including for parents (HPC, vol. VII, 1979–2000, 582–594). However, as Buddhism became increasingly estranged from the court and bureaucracy, more were written for specific monasteries or for teachers and laypeople. Orations are found in nearly all collections of a monk's writings through to the 20th century (see e.g. HPC, vol. VII, 1979–2000, 582–594; vol. VIII, 1979–2000, 19–22, 166–167).

Funerary Texts

The first extant eulogy (chemun [祭文]) for the deceased was by Ŭich'ŏn, which was likely read when he made offerings to his late master (McBride, 2012, 431–436). Ch'ungji also wrote eulogies for his late teachers and for eminent officials (HPC, vol. VI, 1979–2000, 395–397), and Ch'ŏnin wrote a eulogy for when a stūpa was erected, and the bones of the deceased master were installed (HPC, vol. VI, 1979–2000, 886–887). Late Koryŏ Sŏn monks used funerals of monks as opportunities to teach Sŏn (see e.g. Jorgensen, 2012b, 441–445, 489–493). Kihwa wrote a series of eulogies, in the style of kongan [公案], for use at funerals with Confucian overtones of welcoming and farewelling the soul, and for royal family members. Sŏsan wrote a eulogy for his parents. He sent his older brother to offer the libation and read this text (Jorgensen, 2012a, 338–342). After this time, eulogies for parents and the crushing of the bones of the cremated masters became dominant topics of eulogies.

Pou (1515–1565) devised a Buddhist ritual based on the Confucian notion of welcoming the soul (yŏnghon; 靈驗) for members of the royal family and officials (HPC, vol. VII, 1979–2000, 599–609). These yŏnghon texts probably developed into the Taech'al samyŏngil yŏnghon sisik ŭimun (大刹四明日迎魂施食儀文; Text of the Ritual of Welcoming Back the Spirits with Food in Great Monasteries on the Four Bright Days). This was a rite held at requests by the laity to benefit the souls of ancestors who returned to family graves at ch'usŏk (秋夕), a Confucian ancestral-worship festival. Related to this, and appearing around the same time, were the rituals invoking the buddhas and the kings of the hells to help the soul of the deceased obtain a better rebirth (Sørensen, 1991, 196–197).

Confucian influence on Buddhist funerary rituals occurred in the generations following Sŏsan. The first example was the Sŏngmun karye ch'o (釋門家禮抄; Excerpts of the Family Rites of Buddhism) by Chinil (眞一), published in 1659 (Sørensen, 1991, 187–188). The Confucian influence can be seen in the text titles, the generational organization of the ancestral tablets, the offerings, and the mourning garments (obok [五服]). A related text written by Kaksŏng (覺性; 1575–1660) contains procedures for funerals with Confucian elements (Sørensen, 1991, 187; HPC, vol. VIII, 1979–2000, 237–242).

Texts on cremation (tabimun [茶毘文]) were first published in 1542. They outline the procedures and show no Confucian input (Sørensen, 1991, 193). Paekp'a wrote an explanation of the procedures (Tabi sŏl [茶毘說]), explaining what the actions symbolize (HPC, vol. XII, 1979–2000, 253–258).

Repentance/Confession Texts

The earliest repentance text, the Taesŭng yukchŏng ch'amhoe (大乘六情懺悔; The Mahāyāna Repentance for Indulgence in the Six Faculties) gives instruction on understanding that all sensory phenomena are illusory (Haeju & Muller, 2012, 49; Muller, 2012c, 269–280). Ch'ungji wrote a repentance text invoking the Indian, Chinese, and Korean Sŏn patriarchs. The penitent makes offerings, vows to remove sins, and vows to spread Buddhist teachings even into the hells (HPC, vol. VI, 1979–2000, 397). This may have developed into the Sŏnmun chosa yech'am mun hwajang sŏ (禪門祖師禮懺文華藏序; Text of the Flower Store Book Ritual of Repentance of Patriarchs and Teachers of Sŏn), published before 1660. A version is included in the Ch'ŏnji myŏngyang suyukchaeŭi pŏm'ŭm sanbochip (天地冥陽水陸齋儀梵音刪補集) by Chihwan (智還), dated 1721, which gives ritual instructions on incense burning and so on and a chant for each patriarch (Sørensen, 1991, 189–190; HPC, vol. XI, 1979–2000, 491–493).

Cho'gu (祖丘; fl. 1394) wrote the Chabi toryang ch'ambŏp chiphae (慈悲道場懺法集解; Collected Interpretations of the Method of Repentance of the Bodhimaṇḍa of Compassion) on the grounds that abuse of the dharma is a sin, and chanting texts without understanding them is an abuse of the dharma (HPC, vol. XII, 1979–2000, 45–155). Myŏng'an (明眼) compiled the Hyŏnhaeng pŏphoe yech'am ŭisik (現行法會禮懺儀式; The Regulation for the Conduct and Practice of the Dharma Assembly When Holding the Ritual of Repentance) of 1709. It includes taking the eight precepts, bowing to the Buddha in repentance, the burning of marks onto the arms, and vows (Sørensen, 1991, 176–177).

Vow and Prayer Ritual Texts

The first of these texts is the Paekhwa toryang parwŏn mun (白花道場發願文; Text of Making Vows at the White Lotus Bodhimaṇḍa) by Ŭisang. It asks for protection and assistance from Avalokiteśvara (Sørensen, 1991, 183; McBride, 2012, 503–504). A brief commentary to this was written by Ch'ewŏn (體元; c. 1280–d. after 1338; McBride, 2012, 497–569). Belief in Avalokiteśvara continues to the present, with a "revival" society starting in 1872 on Mount Samgak near Seoul composing its own texts. There were also vows invoking Amitābha (HPC, vol. XI, 1979–2000, 776–825). Ch'ŏnch'aek wrote a Kwŏnsong Mida'gyŏng wŏnmun (勸誦彌陀經願文; Encouragement to Chant the Vow Text of Amitābha's Sūtra) in order for its chanters to be reborn in the Pure Land (HPC, vol. I, 1979–2000, 209–210).

Prayer texts are not as common. In the eulogy (chemun [祭文]) genre, Myŏngch'al wrote a brief prayer for rain (HPC, vol. IX, 1979–2000, 156), as did Sasŏng (師誠; c. 1836–1910) (HPC, vol. XI, 1979–2000, 584). Ilsŏn (一禪; 1533–1608) wrote a prayer to Avalokiteśvara (Kwan'ŭm kido mun; 觀音祈禱文; HPC, vol. VIII, 1979–2000, 31–32), and King Chŏngjo (r. 1777–1800) wrote a gāthā making offerings to the Buddha and praying for blessings in 1796 (HPC, vol. XII, 1979–2000, 231–233).

Dhāraṇī and Mantra

In the late Koryŏ period, chanted texts such as dhāraṇī and mantra became more popular as interest rose in esoteric Buddhism. However, separate collections of these Koryŏ *dhāraṇī*s and mantras have not survived, with one exception: the 1218 Pŏmsŏ ch'ŏngji chip (梵書摠持集; Collection of Dhāraṇī in Sanskrit Script; Sørensen, 1991, 169–171, 184). This became the model for the Chin'ŏn chip (眞言集; Mantra Collection) of 1569, which was used in Sŏn. This latter was summarized in 1795 as the Chin'ŏn yoch'o (眞言要抄). Another collection of *dhāraṇī*s and mantras was printed in 1483, and others soon followed, including dhāraṇī texts with Avalokiteśvara as the object (Sørensen, 1991, 170–171, 181–182). Other texts on this bodhisattva, such as songs, appeared in the late Chosŏn period and early 20th century (Sørensen, 1991, 175–176, 178, 198).

Manuals for Ritual Procedures

An instruction on a single ritual procedure, the brief T'usarye (投師禮; Rite of Submitting to a Master), was written in verse by Ŭisang (HPC, vol. XI, 1979–2000, 43–44). Very little of the Koryŏ literature on ritual procedures has survived. The Ch'ŏnji myŏngyang suryuk chammun (天地冥陽水陸雜文; Miscellaneous Texts on the Ritual of Heaven and Earth, Day and Night, Water and Land Feasts), based on a text of 1342, was first published in 1492. Performance of this ritual magically feeds and releases spirits that wander in limbo (Sørensen, 1991, 174–175). This was followed by summaries and other versions. Later, these rituals were mixed with the ritual of the veneration of the Sŏn patriarchs (Sørensen, 1991, 165–166, 186).

The first manual of multiple ritual procedures, the Chakpŏp chŏlch'a (作法節次), belongs to the 15th or 16th century (Sørensen, 1991, 166–167). Pou (1515–1565) then wrote instructions on the rationale

---

for ritual practices, on how ritual sh panied by contemplation and not j cal (Sørensen, 1991, 192). Sŏsan several texts on the Sŏn ritual used (Sørensen, 1991, 189, 195; HPC, vol.
737–749). Almost immediately the pendium of specific ritual texts, t (諸般文), was first published in 1610 167–168). From the 17th century, the cations of ritual procedures for dail 1991, 177–178, 191–192). Others dea rituals, such as the Avataṃsaka ritu of the eyes of statues or the addin bags that were placed inside sta 1991, 168–169, 171–172, 176). Manuals methods of chanting, including to were compiled in the 17th century 180–181; HPC, vol. XII, 1979–2000 Chakpŏp kwigam (作法龜鑑) by F commentaries on many rituals a comprehensive collection (Sørense vol. X, 1979–2000, 552–609).

Bibliography

Buswell, R.E., Jr., Chinul: Selected Work 2012.
Ch'oe Chun'ok, Kug'yŏk Kounsŏnsaeng m 1982.
Chong Kyubok, Kuunmong yŏn'gu, Seoul, Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, Committee of Korean Buddhist Thou 2012.
Evon, G., "Literary Chinese, the Korea Literary Genre in 17th-Century Korea," Finch, M., trans., "Samguk Yusa," in: R. W Buddhist Culture: Accounts of a Pilgr and Eminent Monks, CWKB 10, Seoul, 2 Haeju, V., "Introduction: A Brief History gram Symbolizing the Dharma Realm and Its Variorums," in: R.D. McBride, ed Works, CWBK 4, Seoul, 2012, 3–96.
Haeju, V., & A.C. Muller, "Introduction," Wonhyo: Selected Works, CWKB 1, Seou Han Chŏngsŏp, trans., Ch'o palsim cha'gy Han'guk Pulgyo Chŏnsŏ (= HPC), 12 vols., Han'gukhak munhŏn yŏn'guso, Han'guk s
Seoul, 1977–1989.
Hŏ Hŭngsik, Koryŏ Pulgyosa yŏn' gu, Seo
In Kwŏnhwan, Koryŏsidae Pulgyosi ŭi yŏ Jikwan, V., "Introduction," in: J. Jorgen of Stele Inscriptions of Eminent Korea
Seoul, 2012, 3–33.
Jorgensen, J., trans., Hyujeong: Selecte Seoul, 2012a.

ters to be reborn in the Pure Land -2000, 209–210).
re not as common. In the eulogy genre, Myŏngch'al wrote a brief PC, vol. IX, 1979–2000, 156), as did 836–1910) (HPC, vol. XI, 1979–2000, ; 1533–1608) wrote a prayer to Kwan'ŭm kido mun; 觀音祈禱文; 9–2000, 31–32), and King Chŏngjo rote a gāthā making offerings to praying for blessings in 1796 (HPC, o, 231–233).

antra

ŏ period, chanted texts such as tra became more popular as inter-ric Buddhism. However, separate ese Koryŏ dhāraṇīs and mantras d, with one exception: the 1218 chip (梵書摠持集; Collection of rit Script; Sørensen, 1991, 169–171, e the model for the Chin'ŏn chip Collection) of 1569, which was latter was summarized in 1795 as 'o (眞言要抄). Another collection mantras was printed in 1483, and wed, including dhāraṇī texts with the object (Sørensen, 1991, 170–171, exts on this bodhisattva, such as n the late Chosŏn period and early ensen, 1991, 175–176, 178, 198).

ual Procedures

n a single ritual procedure, the 師禮; Rite of Submitting to a itten in verse by Ŭisang (HPC, , 43–44). Very little of the Koryŏ al procedures has survived. The ng suryuk chammun (天地冥陽 llaneous Texts on the Ritual of , Day and Night, Water and Land a text of 1342, was first published nce of this ritual magically feeds ts that wander in limbo (Sørensen, is was followed by summaries and ter, these rituals were mixed with veneration of the Sŏn patriarchs 5–166, 186).
al of multiple ritual procedures, lch'a (作法節次), belongs to the ry (Sørensen, 1991, 166–167). Pou wrote instructions on the rationale for ritual practices, on how ritual should be accompanied by contemplation and not just be mechanical (Sørensen, 1991, 192). Sŏsan Hyujŏng wrote several texts on the Sŏn ritual used when preaching (Sørensen, 1991, 189, 195; HPC, vol. VII, 1979–2000, 737–749). Almost immediately thereafter, a compendium of specific ritual texts, the Cheban mun (諸般文), was first published in 1610 (Sørensen, 1991, 167–168). From the 17th century, there are also publications of ritual procedures for daily use (Sørensen, 1991, 177–178, 191–192). Others dealt with specific rituals, such as the Avataṃsaka ritual or the dotting of the eyes of statues or the adding of "intestines," bags that were placed inside statues (Sørensen, 1991, 168–169, 171–172, 176). Manuals of the rules and methods of chanting, including tone and rhythm, were compiled in the 17th century (Sørensen, 1991, 180–181; HPC, vol. XII, 1979–2000, 156–187). The Chakpŏp kwigam (作法龜鑑) by Paekp'a includes commentaries on many rituals and is the most comprehensive collection (Sørensen, 1991, 167; HPC, vol. X, 1979–2000, 552–609).

---

Bibliography

Buswell, R.E., Jr., Chinul: Selected Works, CWKB 2, Seoul, 2012.

Ch'oe Chun'ok, Kug'yŏk Kounsŏnsaeng munjip, 2 vols., Seoul, 1982.

Chŏng Kyubok, Kuunmong yŏn'gu, Seoul, 1974.

Collected Works of Korean Buddhism, publ. Compilation Committee of Korean Buddhist Thought, 13 vols., Seoul, 2012.

Evon, G., "Literary Chinese, the Korean Vernacular, and Literary Genre in 17th-Century Korea," forthcoming.

Finch, M., trans., "Samguk Yusa," in: R. Whitfield, ed., Korean Buddhist Culture: Accounts of a Pilgrimage, Monuments, and Eminent Monks, CWKB 10, Seoul, 2012, 179–576.

Haeju, V., "Introduction: A Brief History of Ŭisang's Seal Diagram Symbolizing the Dharma Realm of the One Vehicle and Its Variorums," in: R.D. McBride, ed., Hwaŏm I: Selected Works, CWBK 4, Seoul, 2012, 3–96.

Haeju, V., & A.C. Muller, "Introduction," in: A.C. Muller, ed., Wonhyo: Selected Works, CWKB 1, Seoul, 2012, 5–52.

Han Chŏngsŏp, trans., Ch'o palsim cha'gyŏng, Seoul, 1974.

Han'guk Pulgyo Chŏnsŏ (= HPC), 12 vols., Seoul, 1979–2000.

Han'gukhak munhŏn yŏn'guso, Han'guk saji ch'ongsŏ, 14 vols., Seoul, 1977–1989.

Hŏ Hŭngsik, Koryŏ Pulgyosa yŏn' gu, Seoul, 1986.

In Kwŏnhwan, Koryŏsidae Pulgyosi ŭi yŏn'gu, Seoul, 1983.

Jikwan, V., "Introduction," in: J. Jorgensen, ed., Anthology of Stele Inscriptions of Eminent Korean Monks, CWKB 12, Seoul, 2012, 3–33.

Jorgensen, J., trans., Hyujeong: Selected Works, CWKB 3, Seoul, 2012a.

Jorgensen, J., trans., Seon Dialogues, CWKB 8, Seoul, 2012b.

Jorgensen, J., "Ssanggye-sa and Local Buddhist History: Propaganda and Relics in a Struggle for Survival, 1850s–1930s," SJKS 1/1, 2008, 87–127.

Jorgensen, J., "The Sulmong swaeon by Layman Wolchang," in: Ch'ŏn Ŭndŏk Ch'ongmuwŏnjang hwagap ki'nyŏm nonchong kanhaeng wiwŏnhoe, eds., Ch'ŏn Ŭndŏk Ch'ongmuwŏnjang hwagap ki'nyŏm Pulgyohak nonchong, Seoul, 1999, 515–552.

Jorgensen, J., "Korean Buddhist Historiography: Lessons from the Past for the Future," BY 14, 1997, 219–260.

Jorgensen, J., & Eun-su Cho, trans., The Essential Passages that Directly Point at the Essence of the Mind, Reverend Baegun (1299–1375), Seoul, 2005.

Jung Byung-Sam, "Introduction," in: R. Whitfield, ed., Korean Buddhist Culture: Accounts of a Pilgrimage, Monuments, and Eminent Monks, CWKB 10, Seoul, 2012a, 3–66.

Jung Byung-Sam, "The History of Hwaŏm Thought in Silla: An Introduction," in: R.D. McBride II, ed., Hwaŏm, vol. II: Selected Works, CWKB 5, Seoul, 2012b, 3–33.

Kim Sŭngho, Han'guk sŭngjŏn munhak ŭi yŏn'gu, Seoul, 1992.

Kim Yŏngt'ae, Han'guk Pulgyo kojŏn myŏngch'o ŭi segye, Seoul, 1994.

Kim Young-Wook, "Introduction," in: J. Jorgensen, ed., Gongan Collections I, CWKB 7/1, Seoul, 2012, 5–22.

Ko Ikchin, Han'guk ch'ansul Pulsŏ ŭi yŏn'gu, Seoul, 1987.

Kwŏn Sangno, Han'guk sach'al chŏnsŏ, 2 vols., Seoul, 1979.

Lee, Jin-oh, "Introduction," in: R. Whitfield & Y.-E. Park, eds., Seon Poems: Selected Works, CWKB 9, Seoul, 2012, 5–51.

Lee, P.H., Lives of Eminent Korean Monks: The Haedong Kosŭng Chŏn, HYIS 25, Cambridge MA, 1969.

Lee, Y.H., Ch'oŭi Ŭisun: A Liberal Sŏn Master and an Engaged Artist in Late Chosŏn Korea, Fremont, 2002.

McBride, R.D., II, "Watch Yourself!" in: A.C. Muller, ed., Doctrinal Treatises: Selected Works, CWKB 6, 2012, 399–422.

McBride, R.D., II, & S. Vermeersch, trans., "Kyunyŏ's Account of Conduct," in: R.D. McBride II, ed., Hwaŏm, vol. I: The Mainstream Tradition, CWKB 4, Seoul, 2012, 406–438.

Muller, A.C., trans., "Outline of the Tiantai Fourfold Teachings," in: A.C. Muller, ed., Doctrinal Treatises: Selected Works, CWKB 6, Seoul, 2012a, 299–394.

Muller, A.C., trans., "The Exposition of the Correct," in: A.C. Muller, ed., Doctrinal Treatises: Selected Works, CWKB 6, Seoul, 2012b, 446–506.

Muller, A.C., trans., "The Mahāyāna Repentance for Indulgence in the Six Faculties," in: A.C. Muller, ed., Wonhyo: Selected Works, CWKB 1, Seoul, 2012c, 269–280.

Muller, A.C., & Jung Byung-Sam, "Introduction: Yogācāra Studies in the Silla," in: A.C. Muller, ed., Doctrinal Treatises: Selected Works, CWKB 6, Seoul, 2012, 3–19.

Muller, A.C., & C. Nguyen, Wŏnhyo's Philosophy of Mind, forthcoming.

Sin Kyongjun, "Karam ko," PH 26, 1989, 334–407.

Sørensen, H., "A Bibliographical Survey of Buddhist Ritual Texts from Korea," CEA 6, 1991, 159–200.

Tongguk Taehakkyo Pulgyo munhwa yŏn'guso, Han'guk Pulgyo ch'ansul munhŏn ch'ongnok, Seoul, 1976.

Wegehaupt, M., trans., "Memoirs of a Pilgrimage to the Five Indian Kingdoms," in: R. Whitfield, ed., Korean Buddhist Culture: Accounts of a Pilgrimage, Monuments, and Eminent Monks, CWKB 10, Seoul, 2012, 69–174.

Whitfield, R., & Y.-E. Park, eds., Seon Poems: Selected Works, CWKB 9, Seoul, 2012.

Yi Chaeho, trans., Kŭm'o sinhwa, Seoul, 1972.

Yi Chigwan, Han'guk kosŭng pimun ch'ongjip, Seoul, 2000.

Yi Chigwan, Kyogam yŏkchu yŏktae kosŭng pimun, 6 vols. Seoul, 1993–1998.

John Jorgensen

kosŭng pimun ch'ongjip, Seoul, 2000. yŏkchu yŏktae kosŭng pimun, 6 vols.,

JOHN JORGENSEN

Dramatic Works

Dramatic Works: South Asia

The dramatic works of Indian Buddhism belong to the general tradition of Indian drama, which forms a part of Indian kāvya literature in a broader sense – that is, literature as a form of fine art created for a learned audience (for an introduction to kāvya literature, see Lienhard, 1984; Warder, 1989). In contrast to religious scriptures (āgama); epic histories (itihāsa; not: poetry on historiographical topics); or technical writings (śāstra) on philosophy, science, and so on, this special kind of belles lettres conforms primarily to aesthetic and stylistic principles that were laid down in treatises on poetics. According to the earliest Indian work on dramaturgy, the Nāṭyaśāstra (Compendium of Dramaturgy; Kane, 1971, 10–63; Srinivasan, 1980; Rocher, 1981; Bansat-Boudon, 1992; trans. Ghosh, 1967; 1961), which consists of various parts of different ages (finalized as a compilation in the 8th cent. CE at the latest), a drama is characterized by certain formal elements such as the setting and the theatrical technique (prologue, division into acts, interludes, entries and exits, stage directions, etc.), the alternate use of prose and verse, a fixed repertory of characters (hero, jester, etc.), and rules for the construction of plays and the development of the plot. Of special poetological importance is an established set of specific aesthetic experiences (rasa) that comprise the tasting of eight or nine basic human emotions. Another distinctive feature of Indian drama is the use of different languages (Sanskrit and various literary Middle Indic languages [Prakrits]) by different characters (for an introduction to Sanskrit drama, see Lévi, 1890; Konow, 1920; Renou, 1963; Marasinghe, 1989; Raghavan, 1993).

As far as we can judge from the few, in part fragmentarily transmitted, examples, literary Buddhist dramas seem to follow these poetic standards quite strictly, and thus do not differ from non-Buddhist Indian plays in this respect. The specific feature of Buddhist drama – and of Buddhist kāvya literature in general – is the pursuit of particular aims, namely the poetic display and revelation of Buddhist truths in a format that should be appealing to the taste of educated Buddhist and non-Buddhist contemporaries. A frequently quoted paradigmatic formulation of this goal is found in the two concluding stanzas of Aśvaghoṣa's epic poem Saundarananda (18.63–64; see Salomon, 2009, 189–192; Steiner, 2010, 93–95). Further significant self-explanations of literary aims are expressed, for example, in the same author's Buddhacarita (28.74), in the third introductory stanza of Āryaśūra's Jātakamālā (probably 4th cent. CE), and in the penultimate stanza of Candragomin's play Lokānanda, which runs as follows:

> May all living beings rejoice in hearing the holy Dharma – may it provide for them the joy and delight of a festival never ending! May the desires of the Lord of Death, which have long waxed ever stronger, be without fruit and of no avail! May the radiance of the moon, (as well as that of Candragomin, the author of the play; candra = "moon"), which is cool and rich in blessings through its display of words and tales of holy sages, showering down the nectar of tranquility, bring success! (LokĀn. 5.48 = ŚiṣLe. 116; trans. Hahn, 1999, 131)

We do not know anything with certainty about the origin of Indian literary drama. The earliest specimens that have come down to us (from the 1st or 2nd cent. CE?) are already fully fledged dramatic pieces of the later standard types, which seem to point to a longer prehistory of dramatic literature. At least it is clear that the ancient Buddhist community was aware of popular showpieces (in D I.6,11–12, we find listed dancing, singing, instrumental music, and shows; naccaṃ gītaṃ vāditaṃ pekkhaṃ), which were condemned by the early Buddhist tradition. In the Vinayavibhaṅga of the Mūlasarvāstivādins (around 400 CE?), we come across a story in which an actor performed the life of the Buddha; this provoked a rival play staged by Buddhist monks and nuns, which later was prohibited by the Buddha (see Lévi, 1890, 319–320; Lüders, 1911a, 18–19; Panglung, 1981, 142–143). Whether the factual existence of relatively early Buddhist plays is the result of a reappraisal of drama in certain circles on certain grounds (connoisseurship, Buddhist education, or attraction for non-Buddhists), or rather is related to the refined literary character of the pieces in contrast to more spectacular or coarse types of performances, or both, is difficult to say. Be that as it may, the earliest preserved literary dramas of India are Buddhist, although we cannot rule out the possibility that this might be due to random circumstances of transmission. Basically, we do not know which part Buddhists played in the general production and development of literary dramas, although it is clear that they at least participated in this literary field both very early and at a high level. It is to be remarked as well that no Chinese translation, and only two Tibetan translations (Lokānanda and Nāgānanda), of Indian Buddhist dramas are available.

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

The sparse remnants of what seems to be three Buddhist plays (Lüders, 1911a; 1911b; for a literary analysis, see Warder, 1974, 142–152) are contained in a few fragments of two palm-leaf manuscripts from eastern Turkestan, one of which dates from the year 264, 270, or 340 CE, according to a recent radiocarbon dating (see Hartmann, 2006, 246n5; 2007, 252n9). Among these dramas is the originally nine-act play Śāriputraprakaraṇa (The Śāriputra Drama) by Aśvaghoṣa, the famous author of the two epic poems Buddhacarita and Saundarananda. Aśvaghoṣa was a Brahman convert to Buddhism and lived perhaps in the 1st or 2nd century CE. In the fragmentarily preserved final scene of the Śāriputraprakaraṇa, the admission of two leading disciples of the Buddha, namely Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana, to the Buddhist order is depicted. As is standard later practice, the piece is composed in a mixture of prose and verse and makes use of different literary Prakrits for certain characters. The hero Śāriputra is accompanied by a jester (vidūṣaka). As a "high" (uttama) character, the Buddha speaks Sanskrit, which is in accordance with Indian dramaturgical theory.

It is not certain, but it is at least probable, that the two other dramas contained in these fragments, the titles of which are unknown, also are from the pen of Aśvaghoṣa. The Sanskrit-speaking characters of the second play are mostly allegorical: Buddhi ("Intelligence"), Dhṛti ("Firmness"), and Kīrti ("Fame") talk to one another, among other things about their mutual relationship. In later Indian drama, we come across allegorical figures in one of the "Trivandrum plays" (so called after the place of publication of the first editions; see Steiner 1997a, 265–281), namely in the second act of the Bālacarita (The Adventures of the Boy [Kṛṣṇa]; perhaps 7th cent. CE or much later; in a dream of King Kaṃsa), but the first completely allegorical play is the 11th-century CE Prabodhacandrodaya (Rise of the Moon of Awakening) of Kṛṣṇamiśra (possibly a revision of a Buddhist allegorical play that deals with the victory of King "Discrimination" over his adversary "Delusion"; Warder, 1992, 544–558; ed. & trans. Kapstein, 2009). Owing to its fragmented transmission, the story of the third play remains unclear. Its two protagonists are a Buddhist monk and a courtesan (gaṇikā), and among the other characters are a jester (vidūṣaka), a rogue (duṣṭa), again Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana, and a variegated abundance of persons of middle and low rank. The author seems to have pursued the objective of propagating Buddhist convictions without abstaining from humorous scenes in the play.

We know of another drama by Aśvaghoṣa thanks to a remark in the dialectical work Vādanyāya, in which its author, the Buddhist philosopher Dharmakīrti (c. 7th cent. CE), mentions an otherwise unknown and now lost Rāṣṭrapālanāṭaka (The Drama Rāṣṭrapāla) by the "venerable Aśvaghoṣa" (bhadantāśvaghoṣa; Much, 1991, 19). Judging from the title, it might have been a dramatized version of the well-known story of Rāṣṭrapāla (e.g. see M II.54–74, sūtra no. 82: Raṭṭhapālasutta "Discourse with Raṭṭhapāla"; trans. Horner, 1957, 250–267), who wished to be admitted to the Buddhist order (for further details, see Warder, 1974, 150–152; partly criticized by Steiner, 1997b, 616–621). It is conspicuous that the Buddhist convert Aśvaghoṣa seems to have been especially fond of conversion stories.

The archaic Prakrits found in these fragments are of special linguistic interest, since they represent pre-stages of the standardized forms of the later plays. The basic Prakrit of Aśvaghoṣa's dramas appears to be an earlier form of Shauraseni (ancient language of Mathura), spoken by the jester and the courtesan, among others, whereas the rogue uses a kind of old Magadhi (ancient language of eastern India). Furthermore, an early form of Ardhamagadhi (language of the Jaina canon) is also found in the plays, which, in comparison to Magadhi, apparently indicates the higher status of a character. Elsewhere in Indian drama, one encounters this kind of Prakrit probably only in the "Trivandrum play" Karṇabhāra (Karṇa's Task; perhaps 7th cent. CE or much later), where it is spoken by the god Indra (see Esposito, 2004, 37–38). Maharashtri (ancient language of Maharashtra), the lyrical Prakrit par excellence, is lacking entirely.

The few Prakrit passages of a single palm-leaf fragment of a play from Afghanistan, which was discovered only recently (edited and translated by Hartmann, 2006; 2007; reedited and retranslated by Franco & Schlingloff, 2011–2012), seem to point to a similar date of origin, when compare as the one of the fragments from east The text shows characteristics of a proper, namely the alternation of p the use of Sanskrit and Prakrit, the a jester, and the application of stag contrast to the Central Asian fragm the stage directions relating to P persons are given in Prakrit, the sta the Afghanistan fragment seem to ha lated exclusively in Sanskrit, which i with the uniform practice of later the content of the piece cannot be in detail, it can be roughly surmise Schlingloff, 2011–2012, 20–23). Appar decided to renounce the world and t dhist monk. In the fragmentarily p there is a discussion about his suc the king, the attendant persons are king's son, the jester, two men, and is designated as pratī. Pratī here is an abbreviation of pratīhārī, fem (Empfangsdame, receptionist, acco & Schlingloff, 2011–2012), but rath male doorkeeper, since the charac skrit (comp. the Sanskrit-speaking beginning of act 4 of Harṣadeva's Nā

---

The first Buddhist drama that ha entirety is Candragomin's Lokāna World), albeit only in a rather poor hardly understandable Tibetan tr early 14th century CE (critically e lated into German by Hahn, 1974; a lation followed in Hahn, 1987; a lit found in Warder, 1977, 66–74), w incorporated into the Tanjur, for it in Bu ston's catalogue (finalized i 1974, 31). Except for 11 Sanskrit st 1977), the Sanskrit and Prakrit orig lost. The author's identity and da death have been the topic of consi and controversy, but most argume to the following conclusion (see 45–49; Steiner, 1997a, 32–41; for a d Oberlies, 1989, 17–20; 1996, 266n2).

The playwright informs us i of the Lokānanda of his having skrit grammar that is "easy, clea (LokĀn. 1.c), which are exactly ascribed to the Cāndravyākaraṇa introductory auspicious stanza; w tify the playwright and grammaria lived in the mid-5th century CE.

at deals with the victory of King over his adversary "Delusion";
-558; ed. & trans. Kapstein, 2009). mented transmission, the story of ains unclear. Its two protagonists nk and a courtesan (gaṇikā), and haracters are a jester (vidūṣaka), a in Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana, abundance of persons of middle author seems to have pursued the gating Buddhist convictions with-m humorous scenes in the play. other drama by Aśvaghoṣa thanks he dialectical work Vādanyāya, thor, the Buddhist philosopher th cent. CE), mentions an other-d now lost Rāṣṭrapālanāṭaka (The
a) by the "venerable Aśvaghoṣa" ṣa; Much, 1991, 19). Judging from have been a dramatized version n story of Rāṣṭrapāla (e.g. see
o. 82: Raṭṭhapālasutta "Discourse trans. Horner, 1957, 250–267), who tted to the Buddhist order (for fur-Varder, 1974, 150–152; partly criti-997b, 616–621). It is conspicuous convert Aśvaghoṣa seems to have nd of conversion stories. akrits found in these fragments uistic interest, since they repref the standardized forms of the sic Prakrit of Aśvaghoṣa's dramas arlier form of Shauraseni (ancient ra), spoken by the jester and the others, whereas the rogue uses a dhi (ancient language of eastern re, an early form of Ardhamaga-e Jaina canon) is also found in the mparison to Magadhi, apparently er status of a character. Elsewhere ne encounters this kind of Prakrit e "Trivandrum play" Karṇabhāra haps 7th cent. CE or much later), by the god Indra (see Esposito, harashtri (ancient language of lyrical Prakrit par excellence, is t passages of a single palm-leaf y from Afghanistan, which was cently (edited and translated by 007; reedited and retranslated by off, 2011–2012), seem to point to a similar date of origin, when compared linguistically, as the one of the fragments from eastern Turkestan. The text shows characteristics of a literary drama proper, namely the alternation of prose and verse, the use of Sanskrit and Prakrit, the appearance of a jester, and the application of stage directions. In contrast to the Central Asian fragments, in which the stage directions relating to Prakrit-speaking persons are given in Prakrit, the stage directions in the Afghanistan fragment seem to have been formulated exclusively in Sanskrit, which is in accordance with the uniform practice of later plays. Though the content of the piece cannot be reconstructed in detail, it can be roughly surmised (see Franco & Schlingloff, 2011–2012, 20–23). Apparently a king has decided to renounce the world and to become a Buddhist monk. In the fragmentarily preserved scene, there is a discussion about his succession; besides the king, the attendant persons are a minister, the king's son, the jester, two men, and a character who is designated as pratī. Pratī here is presumably not an abbreviation of pratīhārī, female doorkeeper (Empfangsdame, receptionist, according to Franco & Schlingloff, 2011–2012), but rather of pratīhāra, male doorkeeper, since the character speaks Sanskrit (comp. the Sanskrit-speaking pratīhāra at the beginning of act 4 of Harṣadeva's Nāgānanda).

The first Buddhist drama that has survived in its entirety is Candragomin's Lokānanda (Joy for the World), albeit only in a rather poor and sometimes hardly understandable Tibetan translation of the early 14th century CE (critically edited and translated into German by Hahn, 1974; an English translation followed in Hahn, 1987; a literary analysis is found in Warder, 1977, 66–74), which was swiftly incorporated into the Tanjur, for it is already listed in Bu ston's catalogue (finalized in 1322 CE; Hahn, 1974, 31). Except for 11 Sanskrit stanzas (see Hahn, 1977), the Sanskrit and Prakrit original seems to be lost. The author's identity and dates of birth and death have been the topic of considerable research and controversy, but most arguments seems to lead to the following conclusion (see Hahn, 1992; 1993, 45–49; Steiner, 1997a, 32–41; for a different view, see Oberlies, 1989, 17–20; 1996, 266n2).

The playwright informs us in the prologue of the Lokānanda of his having authored a Sanskrit grammar that is "easy, clear, and complete" (LokĀn. 1.c), which are exactly the attributes ascribed to the Cāndravyākaraṇa grammar in its introductory auspicious stanza; we may thus identify the playwright and grammarian as Candra who lived in the mid-5th century CE.

Candragomin (or Candradāsa) is also the author of the Śiṣyalekha (Letter to a Disciple), which shares nine stanzas with the Lokānanda and is still available in its original Sanskrit (edited and translated by Hahn, 1999), and also probably of other works, like the Deśanāstava (Hymn in the Form of a Confession; see Hahn, 1993, 45–49).

The Lokānanda is a dramatization of the legend of Prince Maṇicūḍa that exists in different versions in Sanskrit and a language used in Nepal, Newari (for details, see Hahn, 1974, 13–24; Hanisch, 2008, 200–208). One of the versions, the Maṇicūḍajātaka by Sarvarakṣita (who belonged to the Sāṃmitīya school; see Hanisch, 2008, 200–208), is composed in an exceptional mixture of pure Sanskrit and a special kind of Middle Indic (the text has been diplomatically transcribed by Hanisch, 2008, 212–250). It is not clear, however, on which literary source the Lokānanda is based. M. Hahn (1974, 21–22) tends to trace it back to Guṇāḍhya's lost Bṛhatkathā (The Great Story), a famous collection of narratives written in the Middle Indic language Paishaci (von Hinüber, 2001, §§ 51, 101; Aklujkar, 2001; Tsuchida, 2002; 2003; 2007), which seems to be possible in principle, but is unprovable, if not improbable, for the legend is not available in the later adaptations of the Bṛhatkathā (comp. Steiner, 1997a, 25–28). At least we may surmise that Candragomin's play goes back to a Middle Indic version of the legend (see Steiner, 2002, 208). It seems the playwright has made original inventions and alterations in a skillful manner by using dramaturgical and literary kāvya techniques (see Hahn, 1974, 16–20; Warder, 1977, 68–71). According to the late-7th-century-CE report of the Chinese pilgrim Yìjìng (635–713 CE), "people all sing and dance to it [i.e. the Lokānanda] throughout the five countries of India" (trans. Takakusu, 1896, 164).

The first three acts of the Lokānanda tell, in the form of a love story, how Prince Maṇicūḍa becomes acquainted with his wife-to-be Padmāvatī and how he finally marries her in spite of his resolve to turn away from worldly life. In the remaining two acts, his excessive generosity is depicted, which at first seems to destroy his kingdom, his family, and his own life, but of course, everything comes out well in the end. Candragomin seems to have used the secular form of a literary drama in order to transmit Buddhist messages, especially the idea of the "perfection of generosity" (dānapāramitā), which is the objective of the play. The protagonist has to marry and become a king first, just so that he can give everything away at a later time, including his wife, his children, and his own life, and thus perform the greatest sacrifice possible.

The hero, a true bodhisattva (4.37; 5.49), is determined "to care about the welfare of others" (2.22; this and the following translations are by Hahn, 1987). To him, the "pleasures of the senses are like poison" (2.19); in fact they are even worse than poison, for the "poison's bane is perilous but in a single round of existence, while sensual pleasures poison a being in the incarnation to come as well" (2.20). The phenomenal world is transitory, and all beings in it "are subject to impermanence and change" (2.8). Existence is nothing but instantaneous cessation: "The stream of palpable things is likewise ruptured and cut through in each and every moment, and all human beings step into this stream as peacocks into a fountain" (2.10). A "person supported by the teachings of non-duality has rendered harmless the weapons of the God of Love"; he is just like "the cool waters of a lake" growing "clear when all motion within it has subsided" (5.12). "The happiness of meditation cools and refreshes the spirit", whereas "the pleasures of senses render the spirit feeble and faint" (5.13). Although Maṇicūḍa considers matrimony nothing but "an incurable disease," the cause of "distraction of mind and an end of equanimity," "a dangerous enemy of mental concentration," and "the source of suffering" (2.12), he finally agrees to his marriage because he is ready to offer his own body for the benefit of others, in this case for the good of the lovesick Padmāvatī: "I am filled with compassion, I will sacrifice my very self for her sake" (3.20). Therefore, his being married does not contradict his constant mental tranquility, which is accompanied by compassion as well as by complete freedom from worldly interests. It seems hardly incidental that in the second prefatory stanza (1.2), right at the beginning of the text, Māra's daughters try to provoke the Buddha by addressing him ironically: "you were once so blissfully embraced by your wife Yaśodharā – in your great compassion should you not also show toward us a similar equanimity?" In the very same stanza, the four "immeasurable factors" (apramāṇa) – "loving kindness" (maitrī), "sympathetic joy" (muditā), "compassion" (karuṇā), and "equanimity" (upekṣā) – are mentioned en passant (Seyfort Ruegg, 1977, 553); by using these words both in their common sense and in their technical meaning in line with meditation practice, the author turns these lines into a highly programmatic statement.

The following stanza may serve as a representative depiction of the selfless attitude of the hero:

> The sun, drawn by tireless steeds, crosses the heavens, giving light to man, and the "Bearer of Treasures," this earth, constantly bears its burden of human beings, without counting their numbers. In all of this there is no scintilla of selfishness: It is precisely the nature of great men that their sole and distinguishing trait of character is this desire for the benefit and happiness of other human beings. (LokĀn. 2.23 = ŚiṣLe. 102; trans. Hahn, 1999, 121)

The other drama that has been translated into Tibetan and is included in the Tanjur is the Nāgānanda (Joy of the Serpents), whose author Harṣa (Harṣavardhana or Harṣadeva) reigned as king in northern India from 606 to 647 CE (for the life and work of Harṣa, see Ettinghausen, 1906; Jackson & Ogden, 1923; Devahuti, 1998). He also composed two other plays (Priyadarśikā and Ratnāvalī, both named after their heroines), several hymns (stotra; see Hahn, 1996; Steiner, 1997a, 44–49, 209–211), and a work on grammatical gender (liṅgānuśāsana; see Steiner, 1997a, 41–44). His ancestors and his father were worshippers of Śiva and Sūrya (the Sun), whereas his elder brother and his sister adhered to Buddhism. Harṣa himself paid obeisance to all three alike but apparently tended toward Buddhism in his later life (comp. Jackson & Ogden, 1923, xxxi–xxxiii).

The Sanskrit and Prakrit text of the Nāgānanda is available in various versions (for details, see Steiner, 1997a, 19–22). Among them, the recension of a Nepalese palm-leaf manuscript (see Hahn, 1981), dated 1155/1156 CE, as well as the Sanskrit and Prakrit version underlying the precise Tibetan rendering of probably the late 13th century CE, seems to be the closest to the putative original. Both versions divide the piece into six instead of five acts; which probably reflects the original arrangement (see Steiner, 1991). The title Nāgānanda is clearly reminiscent of the Lokānanda, whose three prefatory stanzas were imitated by Harṣadeva. The original first stanza of the Nāgānanda, however, is only available in the Tibetan translation (see Hahn, 1970; Steiner, 1997a, 49–76; for a literary analysis of the whole play, see Warder, 1983, 52–64).

The subject of the drama is the story of Jīmūtavāhana, a vidyādhara prince (semidivine being living in the sky), which is also found in the Bṛhatkathāmañjarī (Cluster of Blossoms of the Great Story; 11th cent.) and in the Kathāsaritsāgara (Ocean Whose Rivers Are Stories; 11th cent. CE). Though there are differing views on the details, it is generally accepted that Harṣadeva's source was G lost Bṛhatkathā (see Bosch, 1914; Shiba Steiner, 1997a, 127–130), as is also the ca two other plays. However, M. Zin (200 that the story did not belong to the Bṛha lection originally and that the available the tale are imperfect and defective in the drama. We hear in the prologue that related to a Vidyādharajātaka (Story of t Life of the Bodhisattva as a Vidyādhar according to R. Steiner (1997a, 129), mig dhist variant of the name Vidyādharaka the Vidyādhara) putatively used in the according to M. Zin (2002, 160), it is eit of a lost Buddhist story (likewise Ward or merely a hint to the underlying moti sattva's self-sacrifice (similarly Konow,

---

After invoking the Buddha in the pr zas, it is told in the first three acts how Jī falls deeply in love with the princess Ma after some intricacies, finally marries h for the genre, act 3 contains a burlesqu ous scene in which a drunkard plays role. In the second half of the drama, t fices himself to Garuḍa, the vehicle (vāh and the archenemy of the snakes, in or the death of a serpent deity (nāga) chosen as Garuḍa's victim of the day. he succeeds in convincing Garuḍa of t of his cruel conduct (the slaying of s possibly implies a criticism of Viṣṇu tions. The goddess Gaurī, sent for revives Jīmūtavāhana, and even the previously killed by Garuḍa are resus

Like the hero of the Lokānanda, is designated as a bodhisattva in the in some narrative versions of the sto 1997a, 128n4–5); he bears the char mahāpuruṣa, a great person (1.15; numbering of the verses according t a concordance of the different vers Steiner, 1997a, 314–315). Like Maṇicū to renounce his life altogether out of creature" (2.10; comp. also 3.17). His a "By the merit I have accrued toda a snake through the gift of my own birth may I in this very way acquire to help others" (4.25). His final teach the following:

> Always refrain from taking life, an > for what you have done in the p > fearlessness among all beings, buil > drawn by tireless steeds, crosses the > giving light to man, and the "Bearer of > " this earth, constantly bears its burden > beings, without counting their num-> l of this there is no scintilla of selfish-> precisely the nature of great men that > and distinguishing trait of character is > for the benefit and happiness of other > ings. (LokĀn. 2.23 = ŚiṣLe. 102; trans.

> , 121)

rama that has been translated into l is included in the Tanjur is the (Joy of the Serpents), whose author avardhana or Harṣadeva) reigned as ern India from 606 to 647 CE (for the life Harṣa, see Ettinghausen, 1906; Jackson 23; Devahuti, 1998). He also composed ays (Priyadarśikā and Ratnāvalī, both their heroines), several hymns (stotra; 96; Steiner, 1997a, 44–49, 209–211), and mmatical gender (liṅgānuśāsana; see , 41–44). His ancestors and his father ppers of Śiva and Sūrya (the Sun), lder brother and his sister adhered to arṣa himself paid obeisance to all three arently tended toward Buddhism in comp. Jackson & Ogden, 1923, xxxii– it and Prakrit text of the Nāgānanda is rious versions (for details, see Steiner, Among them, the recension of a Nepf manuscript (see Hahn, 1981), dated s well as the Sanskrit and Prakrit ver-ng the precise Tibetan rendering, of ate 13th century CE, seems to be the utative original. Both versions divide six instead of five acts, which probe original arrangement (see Steiner, Nāgānanda is clearly reminiscent of , whose three prefatory stanzas were arṣadeva. The original first stanza of a, however, is only available in the ation (see Hahn, 1970; Steiner, 1997a, erary analysis of the whole play, see 2–64).

t of the drama is the story of a vidyādhara prince (semidivine the sky), which is also found in the jarī (Cluster of Blossoms of the Great ) and in the Kathāsaritsāgara (Ocean Are Stories; 11th cent. CE). Though ng views on the details, it is generally accepted that Harṣadeva's source was Guṇāḍhya's lost Bṛhatkathā (see Bosch, 1914; Shibazaki, 1996; Steiner, 1997a, 127–130), as is also the case with his two other plays. However, M. Zin (2002) assumes that the story did not belong to the Bṛhatkathā collection originally and that the available versions of the tale are imperfect and defective imitations of the drama. We hear in the prologue that the play "is related to a Vidyādharajātaka (Story of the Previous Life of the Bodhisattva as a Vidyādhara)," which, according to R. Steiner (1997a, 129), might be a Buddhist variant of the name Vidyādharakathā (Story of the Vidyādhara) putatively used in the Bṛhatkathā; according to M. Zin (2002, 160), it is either the title of a lost Buddhist story (likewise Warder, 1983, 52) or merely a hint to the underlying motif of a bodhisattva's self-sacrifice (similarly Konow, 1920, 76).

After invoking the Buddha in the prefatory stanzas, it is told in the first three acts how Jīmūtavāhana falls deeply in love with the princess Malayavatī and, after some intricacies, finally marries her. Unusually for the genre, act 3 contains a burlesque and humorous scene in which a drunkard plays a prominent role. In the second half of the drama, the hero sacrifices himself to Garuḍa, the vehicle (vāhana) of Viṣṇu and the archenemy of the snakes, in order to prevent the death of a serpent deity (nāga) who has been chosen as Garuḍa's victim of the day. As he is dying, he succeeds in convincing Garuḍa of the wickedness of his cruel conduct (the slaying of snakes), which possibly implies a criticism of Viṣṇu-related traditions. The goddess Gaurī, sent for by Malayavatī, revives Jīmūtavāhana, and even the nāgas that were previously killed by Garuḍa are resuscitated.

Like the hero of the Lokānanda, Jīmūtavāhana is designated as a bodhisattva in the play as well as in some narrative versions of the story (see Steiner, 1997a, 128n4–5); he bears the characteristics of a mahāpuruṣa, a great person (1.15; translation and numbering of the verses according to Skilton, 2009; a concordance of the different versions is found in Steiner, 1997a, 314–315). Like Maṇicūḍa, "he is ready to renounce his life altogether out of pity for another creature" (2.10; comp. also 3.17). His aim is as follows: "By the merit I have accrued today by protecting a snake through the gift of my own body, in every birth may I in this very way acquire a body in order to help others" (4.25). His final teaching to Garuḍa is the following:

> Always refrain from taking life, and feel remorse for what you have done in the past. Promoting fearlessness among all beings, build up with effort a constant flow of merit, whereby this misfortune obtained from harming a measured number of beings is drowned and does not fruit, like a grain of salt thrown into a lake whose waters are boundless and unfathomable. (Nāgānanda 5.25)

Jīmūtavāhana is against "the savagery of killing living beings on account of the kingdom" (3.17): "I don't feel that anything is my enemy other than mental defilements," he says (prose after 3.17).

In contrast to the Lokānanda, mental tranquility or inner equanimity do not seem to play a major role in the Nāgānanda, if any. Jīmūtavahana's marriage is not a sacrifice at all, since he is ardently in love. He finds that "there's no fault in looking at young ladies" (prose after 1.15), and we hear him "sighing longingly" (stage direction before 1.19). His inner firmness is lost: "With my heart on a woman, I cannot bear the flower darts shot by limbless Cupid, so how can I claim to you today that I am firm?" (2.4). It is remarkable that even his self-sacrifice has a quasi-erotic component, for the sensual pleasure that he has experienced together with his beloved wife is even boosted by the abandoning of his body: "I don't think Malayavatī when she is wet with the juice of sandal from Malaya, has given me such pleasure as the touch of this slaughter stone that wins me what I crave" (4.22). Symbolically, this is in line with Jīmūtavāhana's use of his own red wedding garment in order to outwit Garuḍa, who mistakes it for the victim's likewise red sign. Śaṅkhacūḍa, the nāga who is designated to be the victim, is another heroic and noble character of the play. Apparently, he is not a Buddhist but an adherent of Śiva (see Pellegrini, 1995–1996). For him, too, the world of existence is transient: "impermanence is always the first to cuddle the new-born," so "what then is the reason for grief?" (4.8).

The Chinese pilgrim Yìjìng reports on the Nāgānanda that Harṣadeva "versified the story of the Bodhisattva Jīmūtavāhana" and "had it performed by a band accompanied by dancing and acting, and thus popularised it in his time" (trans. Takakusu, 1896, 163–164). This play also belongs to the repertoire of the still living tradition of the classical Sanskrit dance theatre of the South Indian Kerala stage called kūṭiyaṭṭam (see Unni, 1989, 31–62; Moser, 2008).

Only recently, a fragment of a dramatized version of the popular Buddhist legend of Prince Sudhana and the kinnarī Manoharā (see Straube, 2006; 2007) has been edited and translated by C. Dezső (2014). It consists of four damaged folios of an incomplete Nepalese palm-leaf manuscript and contains most of an interlude in Sanskrit and a small part of the following act. According to C. Dezső, the play "was probably written at the end of the eleventh century in Bengal by a Buddhist scholar called Śāntākaragupta" (Dezső, 2014, 73).

Bibliography

Aklujkar, M., "Was a Full Recension of the Bṛhatkathā Available in Nepāla in the 19th Century?" JNRC 12, 2001, 1–4.

Bansat-Boudon, L., Poétique du théâtre indien, Lectures du Nāṭyaśāstra, Paris, 1992.

Bosch, F.D.K., "De Legende van Jīmūtavāhana in de Sanskrit-Literatuur," diss., Leiden University, 1914.

Devahuti, D., Harsha: A Political Study, Delhi, 1970, 3 1998.

Dezső, C., "Inspired Poetry: Śāntākaragupta's Play on the Legend of Prince Sudhana and the Kinnarī," IIJ 57, 2014, 73–104.

Esposito, A.A., Cārudatta. Ein indisches Schauspiel, DTS 4, Wiesbaden, 2004.

Ettinghausen, M.L., Harṣa Vardhana: Empereur et poète de l'Inde septentrionale, London, 1906.

Franco, E., & D. Schlingloff, "Zu dem buddhistischen Schauspielfragment aus Afghanistan," WZKS 54, 2011–2012, 19–33.

Ghosh, M., The Nāṭyaśāstra: A Treatise on Ancient Indian Dramaturgy and Histrionics, Ascribed to Bharata-muni, vol. I (chs. 1–27), BInd 272, Calcutta, 1951, 2 1967; vol. II (chs. 28–36), BInd 272, Calcutta, 1961.

Hahn, M., Invitation to Enlightenment: Letter to the Great King Kaniṣka by Mātṛceṭa: Letter to a Disciple by Candragomin, Berkeley, 1999.

Hahn, M., "The *Mārajitstotra by Harṣadeva: A Third Version of the Nāndī of the Nāgānanda?" in: F. Wilhelm, ed., Festschrift für Dieter Schlingloff, Reinbeck, 1996, 109–126.

Hahn, M., "Notes on Buddhist Sanskrit Literature, Chronology and Related Topics," in: E. Mayeda, ed., Studies in Original Buddhism and Mahāyāna Buddhism in Commemoration of Late Professor Fumimaro Watanabe, vol. I, Kyoto, 1993, 31–58.

Hahn, M., "Über den indirekten Beweis bei literaturhistorischen Fragestellungen," WZKS 36, 1992, 91–103.

Hahn, M., Joy for the World: A Buddhist Play by Candragomin: Translated with an Introduction and Notes, Berkeley, 1987.

Hahn, M., "Zu einer Neuedition von Harṣadevas Nāgānanda," WZKS 25, 1981, 131–137.

Hahn, M., "Strophen des Candragomin in der indischen Spruchliteratur," IIJ 19, 1977, 21–30.

Hahn, M., Candragomins Lokānandanāṭaka. Nach dem tibetischen Tanjur herausgegeben und übersetzt, AF 39, Wiesbaden, 1974.

Hahn, M., "Ist ein Vers der Nāndī in Harṣadevas Nāgānanda verloren gegangen?" WZKS 14, 1970, 39–45.

Hanisch, A., "Sarvarakṣita's Maṇicūḍajātaka: Reproduction of the Codex Unicus with Diplomatic Transcript and Palaeographic Introduction to the Bhaikṣukī Script," in: F. Sferra, ed., Sanskrit Texts from Giuseppe Tucci's Collection Part I, MB 1, Rome, 2008, 195–342.

Hartmann, J.-U., "Ein Schauspielfragment aus Afghanistan," in: K. Klaus & J.-U. Hartmann, eds., Indica et Tibetica. Festschrift für Michael Hahn, WSTB 66, Vienna, 2007, 249–258.

Hartmann, J.-U., "A Fragment of a Play," in: J. Braarvig et al., eds., Manuscripts in the Schøyen Collection, BM 3, Oslo, 2006, 245–249.

Hinüber, O. von, Das ältere Mittelindisch im Überblick, ÖAW.PHKS 467, VKSKS 20, Vienna, 2 2001.

Horner, I.B., trans., The Collection of the Middle Length Sayings (Majjhima-Nikāya), vol. II, London, 1957, repr. 1975.

Jackson, A.V.W., & C.J. Ogden, "Introduction," in: G.K. Nariman et al., eds., Priyadarśikā: A Sanskrit Drama by Harsha, CUIIS 10, New York, 1923, xxvii–cxi.

Kane, P.V., History of Sanskrit Poetics, Delhi, 4 1971.

Kapstein, M., ed. & trans., The Rise of Wisdom Moon by Kṛṣṇamiśra, CSL 52, New York, 2009.

Konow, S., Das indische Drama, GIAP 2/2D, Berlin, 1920.

Lévi, S., Le Théâtre indien, Paris, 1890, 2 1963.

Lienhard, S., A History of Classical Poetry: Sanskrit – Pali – Prakrit, HIL 3/1, Wiesbaden, 1984.

Lüders, H., Bruchstücke buddhistischer Dramen, KST 1, Berlin, 1911a, 2 1979.

Lüders, H., "Das Śāriputraprakaraṇa, ein Drama des Aśvaghoṣa," SPAW, Berlin, 1911b, 388–411; repr. in: H. Lüders, Philologica Indica, Göttingen, 1940, 190–213.

Marasinghe, E.W., The Sanskrit Theatre and Stagecraft, SGDOS 78, Delhi, 1989.

Moser, H., Naṅṅyār-Kūttu – ein Teilaspekt des Sanskrittheaterkomplexes Kūṭiyāṭṭam, Historische Entwicklung und performative Textumsetzung, DTS 6, Wiesbaden, 2008.

Much, T., Dharmakīrti's Vādanyāyaḥ, Teil 1, Sanskrit-Text, ÖAW.PHKS 581, VKSKS 25, Vienna, 1991.

Oberlies, T., "Das zeitliche und ideengeschichtliche Verhältnis der Cāndra-Vṛtti zu anderen V(ai)yākaraṇas (Studien zum Cāndravyākaraṇa III)," StII 20, 1996, 265–317.

Oberlies, T., Studie zum Cāndravyākaraṇa. Eine kritische Bearbeitung von Candra IV.4.52–148 und V.2, ANIST 38, Stuttgart, 1989.

Panglung, J.L., Die Erzählstoffe des Mūlasarvāstivāda-Vinaya, SPBMS 3, Tokyo, 1981.

Pellegrini, A., "Is Śaṅkhacūḍa a Hindu Hero? (A Note on the Nāgānanda)," IT 21–22, 1995–1996, 249–262.

Raghavan, V., Sanskrit Drama: Its Aesthetics and Production, Madras, 1993.

Renou, L., "La recherche sur le théâtre indien depuis 1890," in: S. Lévi, Le Théâtre indien, Paris, 2 1963, ix–xxxii.

Rocher, L., "The Textual Tradition of the Bhāratīyanāṭyaśāstra: A Philological Assessment," WZKS 25, 1981, 107–130.

Salomon, R., "Aśvaghoṣa's Saundarananda IV–VI: A Study in the Poetic Structure of Buddhist kāvya," IIJ 52, 2009, 179–196.

Seyfort Ruegg, D., "Candragomins Lokānandanāṭaka by Michael Hahn," JAOS 97, 1977, 552–554.

Shibazaki, M., "Jīmūtavāhana monogatari – Bṛhatkathā kei denshô wo chûshin ni" (The Jīmūtavāhana Legend – Main Focus [of the Article]: Transmission of the Bṛhatkathā), BB/JBC 35, 1996, 79–97.

Skilton, A., ed. & trans., "How the Nāgas Harṣa and "The Shattered Thighs" by York, 2009.

Srinivasan, S.A., On the Composition of the Reinbeck, 1980.

Steiner, R., "Truth under the Guise of P
'Life of the Buddha,'" in: L. Covill et al.
Lives Imagined: Biography in Buddhist 2010, 89–121.

Steiner, R., "Zum ursprünglichen Titel Geschichte," in: D. Dimitrov et al., eds., Indian and Tibetan Studies, WSTB 53, Vie

Steiner, R., Untersuchungen zu Harṣa und zum indischen Schauspiel, IeT 31, 1997a.

Steiner, R., "Standard Works on India Critique," in: P. Kieffer-Pülz & J.-U Bauddhavidyāsudhākaraḥ: Studies in Bechert on the Occasion of His 65th Birt tal-Odendorf, 1997b, 615–623.

Steiner, R., "Zur Akteinteilung von Harṣa BÉI 9, 1991, 203–216.

Straube, M., "Die Adaptation Sudhanakinnaryavadāna im Bhadr
K. Klaus & J.-U. Hartamann, eds., Ind schrift für Michael Hahn, Zum 65. Ge Vienna, 2007, 521–538.

rit Texts from Giuseppe Tucci's Collec-me, 2008, 195–342.
Schauspielfragment aus Afghanistan," Iartmann, eds., Indica et Tibetica. Fest- ahn, WSTB 66, Vienna, 2007, 249–258. agment of a Play," in: J. Braarvig et al., the Schøyen Collection, BM 3, Oslo, ltere Mittelindisch im Überblick, ÖAW.

, Vienna, 2 2001.
e Collection of the Middle Length Say-ya), vol. II, London, 1957, repr. 1975.
Ogden, "Introduction," in: G.K. Nariadarśikā: A Sanskrit Drama by Harsha, 1923, xxvii–cxi.
nskrit Poetics, Delhi, 4 1971.
rans., The Rise of Wisdom Moon by
New York, 2009.
Drama, GIAP 2/2D, Berlin, 1920.
en, Paris, 1890, 2 1963. of Classical Poetry: Sanskrit – Pali – sbaden, 1984.
buddhistischer Dramen, KST 1, Berlin, aprakaraṇa, ein Drama des Aśvaghoṣa," 388–411; repr. in: H. Lüders, Philologica 40, 190–213.

e Sanskrit Theatre and Stagecraft, 39. ttu – ein Teilaspekt des Sanskrittheāṭṭam, Historische Entwicklung und setzung, DTS 6, Wiesbaden, 2008.
's Vādanyāyaḥ, Teil 1, Sanskrit-Text, KS 25, Vienna, 1991.
he und ideengeschichtliche Verhältis nderen V(ai)yākaraṇas (Studien zum )," StII 20, 1996, 265–317.
m Cāndravyākaraṇa. Eine kritische ndra IV.4.52–148 und V.2, ANIST 38, hlstoffe des Mūlasarvāstivāda-Vinaya, acūḍa a Hindu Hero? (A Note on the 22, 1995–1996, 249–262.

Drama: Its Aesthetics and Production, e sur le théâtre indien depuis 1890," indien, Paris, 2 1963, ix–xxxii.

Tradition of the Bhāratīyanāṭyaśāstra:
ment," WZKS 25, 1981, 107–130.
's Saundarananda IV–VI: A Study in the uddhist kāvya," IIJ 52, 2009, 179–196. andragomins Lokānandanāṭaka by 97, 1977, 552–554. āhana monogatari – Bṛhatkathā kei
i" (The Jīmūtavāhana Legend – Main ]: Transmission of the Bṛhatkathā), 7.

Skilton, A., ed. & trans., "How the Nāgas Were Pleased" by Harṣa and "The Shattered Thighs" by Bhāsa, CSL, New York, 2009.

Srinivasan, S.A., On the Composition of the Nāṭyaśāstra, StII 1, Reinbeck, 1980.

Steiner, R., "Truth under the Guise of Poetry: Aśvaghoṣa's 'Life of the Buddha,'" in: L. Covill et al., eds., Lives Lived, Lives Imagined: Biography in Buddhist Traditions, Boston, 2010, 89–121.

Steiner, R., "Zum ursprünglichen Titel der 'Rūpyāvatī'-Geschichte," in: D. Dimitrov et al., eds., Śikhisamuccayaḥ: Indian and Tibetan Studies, WSTB 53, Vienna, 2002, 203–210.

Steiner, R., Untersuchungen zu Harṣadevas Nāgānanda und zum indischen Schauspiel, IeT 31, Swisttal-Odendorf, 1997a.

Steiner, R., "Standard Works on Indian Literature – A Critique," in: P. Kieffer-Pülz & J.-U. Hartmann, ed., Bauddhavidyāsudhākaraḥ: Studies in Honour of Heinz Bechert on the Occasion of His 65th Birthday, IeT 30, Swisttal-Odendorf, 1997b, 615–623.

Steiner, R., "Zur Akteinteilung von Harṣadevas Nāgānanda," BÉI 9, 1991, 203–216.

Straube, M., "Die Adaptation von Kṣemendras Sudhanakinnaryavadāna im Bhadrakalpāvadāna," in: K. Klaus & J.-U. Hartamann, eds., Indica et Tibetica. Festschrift für Michael Hahn, Zum 65. Geburtstag, WSTB 66, Vienna, 2007, 521–538.

Straube, M., Prinz Sudhana und die Kinnarī. Eine buddhistische Liebesgeschichte von Kṣemendra. Texte, Übersetzung, Studie, IeT 46, Marburg, 2006.

Takakusu, J., trans., A Record of the Buddhist Religion as Practised in India and the Malay Archipelago (A.D. 671–695) by I-tsing, Oxford, 1896.

Tsuchida, R., "On the Textual Division of the Original Bṛhatkathā," IBK 14, 2007, 1–24.

Tsuchida, R., "On the Narrative Structure of the Kashmiri Versions of the Bṛhatkathā," in: Buddhist and Indian Studies in Honour of Sodo Mori, ed. Publication Committee, Hamamatsu, 2003, 449–474.

Tsuchida, R., "Über die direkte Quelle für die kaschmirischen Versionen der Bṛhatkathā," IT 28, 2002, 211–250.

Unni, N.P., "Nāgānanda: A General Introduction," in: G. Sastri, ed., The Nāgānanda of Śrīharṣadeva with the Vimarśinī Commentary of Śivarāma, Delhi, 1989, 1–62.

Warder, A.K., Indian kāvya Literature, vols. II–VI, Delhi, 1974–1992.

Zin, M., "Das Drama Nāgānanda und der Ursprung der Jīmūtavāhana-Legende," StII 23, 2002, 143–164.

ROLAND STEINER

Dramatic Works: Central Asia

The Buddhists have from early on understood the power of performing arts for religious edification and conversion, in spite of clear statements in canonical Vinaya texts that forbid song, music, dance, declamation, and other "profane" amusements (Lévi, 1890). Several legends report the existence of dramas already in Buddha's time. The Lalitavistara (3rd cent. CE) counts in chapter 12 the knowledge of the dramatic arts among the skills of the Bodhisattva. The Avadānaśataka, a collection of Buddhist legends (translated into Chinese in the 3rd cent. CE, and earlier by two centuries), reports the performance of a bauddhaṃ nāṭakam ("a Buddhist drama") at the time of Krakucchanda, a former buddha (Lévi, 1890, 319–322). As a matter of fact, the earliest Indian plays known to us, albeit by fragments, are Buddhist dramas found in Greater Gandhara and Central Asia. It is then certain that the expansion of Buddhism from India toward northern countries went together with the composition and practice of dramatic art, among other literary genres of the Indian tradition.

The first and the best-known author of Buddhist drama is Aśvaghoṣa (2nd cent. CE), a versatile poet who enjoyed high reputation as a scholar in doctrinal and philosophical matters as well. Besides his two Buddhist epics in kāvya style, the Buddhacarita and the Saundarananda, he composed plays that document his mastery of Indian poetics, stemming from his education as a learned Brahman (Lienhard, 1984, 164–169). The fragments of a composite manuscript on palm leaves in Kushana script, found in Kizil (near Kucha, an oasis on the northern range of the Taklamakan Desert, in present-day Xinjiang, China), contain the Śāriputraprakaraṇa by Aśvaghoṣa as well as parts of two other plays by the same author or by contemporary poets of his school: an allegorical drama featuring the figures of Buddhi ("Wisdom"), Kṛti ("Fame"), and Dhṛti ("Firmness") and a drama featuring a Buddhist monk and a harlot as the main characters. The first play, which has nine acts (aṅka), deals with the events and debates that led up to the conversion of Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana by the Buddha. These fragments (Lüders, 1911) show all the characteristics and conventions of the later classical drama: alternation of prose and verse (in various meters), typical and numerous supporting roles, the use of different Prakrits as specialized for different minor characters, in contrast with Sanskrit for the main characters (Konow, 1920, 50–51; Keith, 1924, 80–90). The recourse to allegory anticipates much later plays. In addition, it is recorded by Chinese and Sanskrit sources (Lévi, 1928, 199–204; Johnston, 1938) that Aśvaghoṣa composed one more play, entitled Rāṣṭrapālanāṭaka, an adaptation of the famous tale (known in Pali as the Raṭṭhapālasutta of the Majjhimanikāya) of a young prince who became a monk against the wish of his parents.

The second major author is Candragomin (active mid-5th cent. CE), perhaps identical with the better-known grammarian, who wrote a Buddhist play, the Lokānandanāṭaka, which is completely preserved, albeit in a very late and inaccurate Tibetan translation (Konow, 1920,73; Hahn, 1974; 1987). This drama is based on the story (which is known also as an avadāna (exploit, or noble deed) of King Maṇicūḍa, who accomplishes in various encounters the perfections of generosity and universal compassion. The style of the text shows a clear influence of the famous poet Kālidāsa (early 5th cent. CE), who was inspired by the Brahmanic tradition and the repertoire of the Sanskrit epics.

This evidence has recently been confirmed by the identification of a play among the fragments of Buddhist manuscripts found in Afghanistan and now in the Schøyen collection. This play is documented so far by a fragment consisting of the right part of a single palm leaf that corresponds approximately to one-third of the original (first edition by Hartmann, 2007). It is written in a late variety of the Gupta script, perhaps to be dated to the 5th or 6th century CE. The play itself is unknown, as is its author. It shows a mixture of prose and verse as well as of languages - Sanskrit and Prakrits. The fragment contains a typical scene that takes place in a royal palace, featuring a king who converses with his devoted minister and friend, while other characters, among them a jester (vidūṣaka) and the female usher (pratīhārī), make speeches and entrances. The main character has been identified with Puṣkara(sārin), a king known from Buddhist literature who decides to abandon his royal power and to become a wandering monk after having met the Buddha (for a revised edition,

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

---

translation, and commentary, see Fr gloff, 2012).

All these materials, however scan intimate acquaintance of educated the techniques and poetics of Indian as the first centuries of the Commo other literary genres, Buddhists aspect of Indian culture for the pub along the roads that led from Great the Tarim Basin. However, one ma the earliest manuscripts of dramas Prakrits are all on palm leaves. As fo of dramas by Aśvaghoṣa (or by his s Kizil, it is clear that they have been sumably from Gandhara. By contr ous Sanskrit manuscripts found in Tarim Basin, and written in the Brahmi script, are normally writte fact, the identified texts of this indig Central Asian materials do not cont of dramatic literature. Consequentl the conclusion that the plays that fragments were enjoyed by Buddhi Basin as a literary genre of Indian or mere reading, and that they were ne (Hartmann, 2007, 249).

Some light can be shed on t Tocharian materials. In the diffe of manuscripts written in the two guages (Tocharian A and B), which in Buddhist sites nearby Sanskrit substantial number of pieces has b belonging to the dramatic genre. Th significant since Tocharian manus elaborated on and copied in paral manuscripts by monks who had education, and even in the same Tocharian canonical literature be the Sarvāstivāda school, as do th of the same period (4th–8th cent ground of Tocharian literary texts northern branch of the Silk Road w in Indian culture.

What follows is a review of th dence for Buddhist dramas. Since of texts, or of parts of texts, have be resort to internal criteria. The mos tions of the dramatic character of a series of fragments, are the followi

1. the mention in the title o nāṭak, borrowed from Sansk
2. the indication of specific div

Asia

akrits as specialized for different in contrast with Sanskrit for the Konow, 1920, 50–51; Keith, 1924, rse to allegory anticipates much lition, it is recorded by Chinese es (Lévi, 1928, 199–204; Johnston, ṣa composed one more play, enti-aka, an adaptation of the famous li as the Raṭṭhapālasutta of the of a young prince who became a wish of his parents. or author is Candragomin (active perhaps identical with the better-n, who wrote a Buddhist play, the which is completely preserved, e and inaccurate Tibetan transla-73; Hahn, 1974; 1987). This drama ory (which is known also as an or noble deed) of King Maṇicūḍa, in various encounters the persity and universal compassion. xt shows a clear influence of the āsa (early 5th cent. CE), who was hmanic tradition and the reper-t epics.
s recently been confirmed by the lay among the fragments of Budfound in Afghanistan and now lection. This play is documented t consisting of the right part of a at corresponds approximately to ginal (first edition by Hartmann, a late variety of the Gupta script, d to the 5th or 6th century CE. known, as is its author. It shows nd verse as well as of languages –
ts. The fragment contains a typiplace in a royal palace, featuring es with his devoted minister and characters, among them a jester female usher (pratīhārī), make ances. The main character has h Puṣkara(sārin), a king known ature who decides to abandon d to become a wandering monk e Buddha (for a revised edition, translation, and commentary, see Franco & Schlingloff, 2012).

All these materials, however scant, testify to the intimate acquaintance of educated Buddhists with the techniques and poetics of Indian drama as early as the first centuries of the Common Era. Besides other literary genres, Buddhists cultivated this aspect of Indian culture for the public of the cities along the roads that led from Greater Gandhara to the Tarim Basin. However, one may wonder why the earliest manuscripts of dramas in Sanskrit and Prakrits are all on palm leaves. As for the fragments of dramas by Aśvaghoṣa (or by his school) found in Kizil, it is clear that they have been imported, presumably from Gandhara. By contrast, the numerous Sanskrit manuscripts found in the oases of the Tarim Basin, and written in the north Turkestan Brahmi script, are normally written on paper. In fact, the identified texts of this indigenous corpus of Central Asian materials do not contain any instance of dramatic literature. Consequently, one may draw the conclusion that the plays that survived only as fragments were enjoyed by Buddhists of the Tarim Basin as a literary genre of Indian origin designed for mere reading, and that they were never put on stage (Hartmann, 2007, 249).

Some light can be shed on this question by Tocharian materials. In the different collections of manuscripts written in the two Tocharian languages (Tocharian A and B), which have been found in Buddhist sites nearby Sanskrit manuscripts, a substantial number of pieces has been identified as belonging to the dramatic genre. This is all the more significant since Tocharian manuscripts have been elaborated on and copied in parallel with Sanskrit manuscripts by monks who had received similar education, and even in the same monasteries. The Tocharian canonical literature belongs mostly to the Sarvāstivāda school, as do the Sanskrit texts of the same period (4th–8th cents. CE). The background of Tocharian literary texts composed on the northern branch of the Silk Road was clearly rooted in Indian culture.

What follows is a review of the Tocharian evidence for Buddhist dramas. Since most colophons of texts, or of parts of texts, have been lost, one has to resort to internal criteria. The most decisive indications of the dramatic character of a fragment, or of a series of fragments, are the following:

1. the mention in the title of Tocharian A/B nāṭak, borrowed from Sanskrit nāṭaka (play);
2. the indication of specific divisions of the text;
3. the mention of typical figures of Indian drama, as in the Sanskrit/Prakrit fragments mentioned above; and
4. the presence of stage directions.

The first indication is rather rare. Besides Nandacaritanāṭak* (A 127[= THT 760]a2; in a partly preserved colophon), which points probably to a dramatic version of the story of Nanda (otherwise known through the Saundarananda, the epic poem of Aśvaghoṣa), nāṭak is found only in the colophons of chapters of the Maitreyasamitināṭaka (see below). The title of this work has been borrowed as Tocharian A Maitreyasamitināṭak*, which occurs in the locative case, Maitreyasamitināṭkaṃ, in the colophons of the text.

As for the divisions of the text, the Tocharian A term nipāt (Skt. nipāta, act; Pal. nipāta, section [of a literary work]) is used, as well as Tocharian A/B praveśak (interlude; Skt. praveśaka). The ends of these sections are marked by the sentence "the interlude has come to an end" (Toch. B āra/ Toch. A ār; matching Skt. samāptaḥ) or by the note "all [persons] went out [from the stage]," (Toch. B lateṃ poñc/Toch. A lcär poñś; matching Skt. niṣkrāntāḥ sarve). At the beginning of a scene, and typically at the beginning of an act, the place of the action is duly mentioned by the phrase "now this speech ought to be understood [as taking place] in the city of…"

Typical Indian theatrical characters (see Konow, 1920, 13–16) do appear: vidūṣaka (jester; Toch. B vidūṣake), pratīhārī (female doorkeeper or usher; Toch. B plaktukäñña, an indigenous word), amātya (minister; Toch. B amāc/Toch. A āmāś), kañcukīya (chamberlain, attendant in a harem; Toch. B kañcuki/Toch. A kāñcuki), and so forth. Since usually several scenes take place in a royal court, one meets also the typical figures of king, queen, chaplain, and female servants. Quite significant is the usage of the Sanskrit term nāyaka (hero; Toch. B nāyake) to refer to the Bodhisattva as the main character of a play. Some scenes, such as the interludes mentioned above, take place in heaven, where several gods chat with one another and comment from above on the actions of humans.

The stage directions are mostly related to the entrance of some character, whom the person present on stage sees "from afar"; sometimes, it is said that the characters on stage point to someone who is supposed to be at some distance, while not yet taking part in the dialogue. In several instances, some character is said to "speak to oneself," thus introducing a monologue. One does find the Tocharian A/B term abhinai (acting, expressive pantomime; Skt. abhinaya), denoting a sentiment (Konow, 1920, 6), but there is no further description of the type of gestures that may have accompanied the entrance or the speech of a character. There is also mention of music played by several instruments (drums, gong, lute, flute, etc.), but it remains uncertain if this refers to the music that was effectively played during the performance, as an arrangement connected with the singing of verses, or rather to the literary convention of the celestial orchestra that is supposed to accompany all wonderful events, manifesting the joy and delight of divine beings in the heavenly abodes.

The combination of all these criteria makes it possible to identify several fragments or series of fragments as containing dramatic texts. In addition to the Maitreyasamitināṭaka in Tocharian A, there are dramatic adaptations of several legends: the Araṇemijātaka (Toch. A/B; restitution and translation by Schmidt, 2001), the Subhāṣitagaveṣinjātaka (Toch. B), and fragments of other dramas featuring characters of various stories (THT 514–520).

Two significant texts are known from several leaves (or fragments of leaves), for which one can tentatively restore titles (Pinault, 1984; 2007, 205): the *Bauddhanāṭaka (Toch. B), which contains the great departure (mahābhiniṣkramaṇa) of the Bodhisattva, and the Supriyanāṭaka* (Toch. B). The latter, written in standard Tocharian B, tells the edifying story of Supriya, who receives the talismans of a cakravartin but who gradually abandons the privileges of his royal status. Although the name of the hero is identical to that of the main character of the story told in chapter 8 of Divyāvadāna, the merchant's son Supriya, and of other stories, no parallel has been identified so far for the episodes that can be restored. The former, written in the archaic variant of Tocharian B, is about the great departure of the Bodhisattva from the city of Kapilavastu. One can identify therein the classical scenes from the life of the young Śākyamuni, who goes through the familiar episodes described in many other texts – the discussion between the sage Asita and Śākyamuni's father, his last night in the harem of the palace, his decision to leave his princely life, his departure with the charioteer Chandaka, their passing by night through the gates of the city, his farewell to Chandaka and to his horse, the horse running back to the city, the grief of his wife, and so forth. The Bodhisattva, however, does not bear a personal name; he is referred to by the title of hero (Toch. B nāyake), and the jester, being his companion, appears in several scenes in addition to the well-known characters of the legend.

Despite this strong impact of the Indian tradition, which led to the adaptation of the traditional Buddhist story to the dramatic conventions, the parallel Buddhist texts are purely narrative, not dramatic. In principle, one cannot rule out the previous existence of a dramatized biography of Śākyamuni in Sanskrit or even in Prakrit, which would have been the model for this text. While the writing and copying of Tocharian Buddhist dramas in accordance with Indian classical techniques is ascertained, it is impossible to provide a definitive list of Tocharian dramatic texts, partly because of the fragmentary nature of the manuscripts. As an additional formal marker indicating that a text might be a drama, W. Winter (1955, 28–34) has made a case for the shift from past to present tense within a text. According to this theory, every action that could be easily enacted on stage was described by verbs in the present tense, whereas the other main events of the story were told by verbs in the preterit by a narrator accompanying the performance. This hypothesis has been however falsified, because the shift to present tense can be attributed at least in part to the vivid description of an action, singled out and highlighted amid the whole narrative context (Thomas, 1973). In addition, the great majority of the verbs that occur in the present tense in narratives are verbs of speaking or of uttering a thought, and introduce a direct speech that is often – but not always – reported in verse. One may conclude that this conventional introduction of direct speech by a single verb (Toch. B weṣṣäṃ/Toch. A träṅkäṣ, "he/she says"; Toch. B weskeṃ/Toch. A träṅkiñc, "they say") is imitative of a late Buddhist storytelling style (von Simson, 1985, 80), which is characterized by the simplicity of dialogue. Verbs in the present tense are then due to the calque of Sanskrit kathayati or kathayanti ("he/she says"; "they say"). One can give a similar account of the introduction of private thought, when a character speaks to oneself. The conventions of narrative texts have been taken over by those of dramatic texts in the instances of dialogue or monologue.

These dramatic texts show the typical alternation of prose and verse, which is also an imitation of Indian techniques, although the variation of languages (Sanskrit for the main characters and diverse Prakrits for other characters) has not been retained, since the entirety of each text is in standard literary Tocharian. The verse parts are often, but not systematically, reserved for speeches; they may also be intended for describing some scenes or actions with more details, or for some events. Several different mete single episode of a given work, espec cessive speeches of the various cha internal evidence that these verses to be sung: they are sometimes a the mention of "song" (Toch. B ken Unfortunately, the music itself ha served, but there is indirect eviden music, especially from Kucha, whic favored in the Chinese court from th onward (Liu, 1969, 99–108, 201–20 meters have names partly borrowe but these do not refer precisely to Sanskrit or Prakrit traditions. The arian metrics are still debated, b principles are different from thos rics, except that the stanzas are into four pādas (lines) The rhythm be based on the alternation of syl caesuras between sequences of definite numbers of syllables p structuring role. Since verses with of syllables and the same caesuras names, one may infer that those ally to different tunes, but they are known kind of Indian music.

Be this as it may, the alterna verse cannot be taken as an indi matic character of a text (agains 34), because it is commonly fou ian adaptations of Buddhist n According to Indian poetics, s termed miśra (mixed; alternati "prosimetric"), because they us in alternation. To these genres proper and the narrative called 1984, 47, 265–273). In Buddhis as well as prosimetric narratives immense repertoire of Buddhist and jātakas. Famous collections skrit have been composed with campū style, for instance, the Dṛṣṭapaṅktiḥ by Kumāralāta ( and the works bearing the title Jā of Birth Stories) or Bodhisattvā land of Noble Deeds of the Bod authors, to wit, Āryaśūra, Saṅg and Gopadatta (3rd–6th cents. further references, see Hahn, 2 clear that such collections of leg sions, as designed for different a widely in the whole of Central anion, appears in several scenes in vell-known characters of the legend.

trong impact of the Indian tradition, e adaptation of the traditional Bud-e dramatic conventions, the parallel re purely narrative, not dramatic. In nnot rule out the previous existence biography of Śākyamuni in Sanskrit t, which would have been the model ile the writing and copying of Toch-dramas in accordance with Indian ques is ascertained, it is impossible finitive list of Tocharian dramatic cause of the fragmentary nature of
s. As an additional formal marker a text might be a drama, W. Win-) has made a case for the shift from ense within a text. According to this tion that could be easily enacted on ibed by verbs in the present tense, er main events of the story were told preterit by a narrator accompanying
e. This hypothesis has been however se the shift to present tense can be ast in part to the vivid description ngled out and highlighted amid the e context (Thomas, 1973). In addiajority of the verbs that occur in the n narratives are verbs of speaking or ught, and introduce a direct speech t not always – reported in verse. One hat this conventional introduction n by a single verb (Toch. B weṣṣäṃ/ iṣ, "he/she says"; Toch. B weskeṃ/ ic, "they say") is imitative of a late elling style (von Simson, 1985, 80), terized by the simplicity of dialogue.
sent tense are then due to the calque hayati or kathayanti ("he/she says"; e can give a similar account of the private thought, when a character lf. The conventions of narrative texts n over by those of dramatic texts in dialogue or monologue.
atic texts show the typical alternand verse, which is also an imitation niques, although the variation of skrit for the main characters and for other characters) has not been the entirety of each text is in stanocharian. The verse parts are often, atically, reserved for speeches; they tended for describing some scenes or actions with more details, or for commenting on some events. Several different meters are used for a single episode of a given work, especially for the successive speeches of the various characters. There is internal evidence that these verses were composed to be sung: they are sometimes accompanied by the mention of "song" (Toch. B kene/Toch. A kaṃ). Unfortunately, the music itself has not been preserved, but there is indirect evidence for Tocharian music, especially from Kucha, which was reportedly favored in the Chinese court from the 4th century CE onward (Liu, 1969, 99–108, 201–209). The different meters have names partly borrowed from Sanskrit, but these do not refer precisely to meters known by Sanskrit or Prakrit traditions. The patterns of Tocharian metrics are still debated, but the governing principles are different from those of Indian metrics, except that the stanzas are divided normally into four pādas (lines) The rhythm does not seem to be based on the alternation of syllable length. The caesuras between sequences of words that make definite numbers of syllables play apparently a structuring role. Since verses with the same number of syllables and the same caesuras can bear different names, one may infer that those names refer actually to different tunes, but they are not related to any known kind of Indian music.

Be this as it may, the alternation of prose and verse cannot be taken as an indication of the dramatic character of a text (against Winter, 1955, 28, 34), because it is commonly found in the Tocharian adaptations of Buddhist narratives as well. According to Indian poetics, several genres are termed miśra (mixed; alternatively translated as "prosimetric"), because they use prose and verse in alternation. To these genres belong the drama proper and the narrative called campū (Lienhard, 1984, 47, 265–273). In Buddhist literature, plays as well as prosimetric narratives are based on the immense repertoire of Buddhist legends, avadānas, and jātakas. Famous collections of legends in Sanskrit have been composed with much skill in the campū style, for instance, the Kalpanāmaṇḍitikā Dṛṣṭapaṅktiḥ by Kumāralāta (mid-2nd cent. CE) and the works bearing the title Jātakamālā (Garland of Birth Stories) or Bodhisattvāvadānamālā (Garland of Noble Deeds of the Bodhisattva) by several authors, to wit, Āryaśūra, Saṅghasena, Haribhaṭṭa, and Gopadatta (3rd–6th cents. CE; for a survey and further references, see Hahn, 2010, 465–468). It is clear that such collections of legends in various versions, as designed for different audiences, circulated widely in the whole of Central Asia, as testified by their translation into Chinese and/or Tibetan. The stock of these legends is found in the literature of both Tocharian languages, because the storytelling was able to instruct laypeople and to urge their support of the Buddhist faith. The transposition of the techniques of Sanskrit literature into Tocharian was bound to the borrowing of narrative matter. Since most Tocharian manuscripts are fragmentary, it is nearly impossible to decide if an isolated fragment containing a Buddhist legend belongs to a purely campū text or to a dramatized narrative, if none of the four criteria mentioned above is present.

The success of the dramatic transposition of Buddhist narratives was likely due to its being such an efficient means of religious propaganda. But the reciting of such texts could have also been an efficient vehicle of teaching, along with the recitation of purely didactic texts. It is striking that these narrative texts themselves contain much doctrine, which is often pronounced by one of the characters of the story, the Buddha or a bodhisattva. The shift from narration with dialogue to homily is common. These narratives thus have a strong educational component and can therefore be conceived of as narratives to be recited aloud and taught to lay Buddhists. We should not, however, straightaway conclude that we have to do with theatrical performances, which implies the production of a text on the stage, featuring several actors playing the different characters. Rather, most Tocharian narrative texts contain markers that are typical for the art of storytelling, and that in part imitate Indian practice with the use of interrogative adverbs and phrases such as "what then?," "how then?," "why?," and "in which manner?" Such markers are found in Tocharian prosimetric texts introducing verse portions (Pinault, 1989, 204–212). Furthermore, they recall almost identical expressions typical of the Chinese bianwen (transformation text, according to the literal translation) genre, documented in texts from Dunhuang dated between the 8th and the 10th century CE. These prosimetric texts represent the first vernacular narratives in Chinese, which are based on popular storytelling with painted pictures, originally of Buddhist content. The rhetorical questions used as verse-introductory markers are devised to attract the attention of the audience on a painted image on which the storyteller comments in sung verse (see Mair, 1988). The source of this genre is certainly to be found in Central Asia, as surmised already by S. Lévi (1925) about the Chinese text Xianyu jing (Sūtra of the Wise and the Fool), which is based on a collection of Buddhist tales said to have been recorded in the mid-5th century CE by Chinese monks in Khotan. This art of public storytelling ought to be kept typologically distinct from theater, although it was practiced as public performance (Mair, 2013). A likely scenario is that the Indian campū genre developed in the Tarim Basin as public storytelling in order to disseminate the Buddhist faith and that it eventually gave rise to the Chinese bianwen. The missing link of this process would then be preserved by the corpus of Tocharian narrative texts in mixed form. Rather than as "dramatic narrative" (Mair, 2013, 106), it would be more exact to designate this genre as "prosimetric narrative in performance." The success of the performing arts in the oases north of the Taklamakan Desert, and especially in the Kucha region, during the second half of the 1st millennium CE is attested by the accounts of Chinese pilgrims and officials, who recorded the importance of music, dance, and theater among the indigenous people. They also mention masked dances during festivals (Liu, 1969, 10, 67, 92, 170–171, 245). Unfortunately, these reports are not so precise as to allow us to ascertain the regular performance of Buddhist dramas on stage, which can be considered likely on more general grounds.

The Maitreyasamitināṭaka (Drama about the Meeting with Maitreya) in Tocharian A is a special case – first because of its huge size, and second because of its popularity, since it is recorded in at least five different manuscripts (see Pinault, 1999). Furthermore, the text has been translated into Old Turkic (Uighur) under the title Maitrisimit nom bitig (Text of the Law [= Sūtra] about Maitrisimit [i.e. maitreyasamiti ("meeting with Maitreya")]; see Geng Shimin & Klimkeit, vol. I, 1988, 1–9; Elverskog, 1997, 139–145; for an updated bibliography, see Geng Shimin, Laut & Pinault, 2004, 347–349, 366–369). The Tocharian A text is divided into 27 acts, preceded by a short preface, corresponding to the 27 Old Turkic chapters (ülüš), which are preceded by a lengthy prologue (yükünč); the colophons of some chapters of the Old Turkic text mention Uighur donors. Each act/chapter has a title that corresponds to a major event in the narrative. In the Tocharian A text, these titles are borrowed from Sanskrit, whereas in the Old Turkic text they have been systematically translated.

The Old Turkic text is known in two versions, which are nearly identical. The first (c. 9th or 10th cent. CE) is known from leaves, complete or fragmentary, found in the Turfan region, mostly in Sengim, besides a minority found in Murtuk. The second (11th cent. CE) is known from materials found in the Hami area. These two versions are traced back to an 8th century CE archetype, translated from the Tocharian A text in the region of Yanqi (ancient Agni; also known as Karashahr). The Old Turkic text is definitely based on the Tocharian A text, without any intermediary, and the Tocharian A text itself was composed in the same region but as a compilation of several older Sanskrit texts. The final stage of the preparation of the Tocharian A text is probably not too far removed in time from that of the Old Turkic text.

One may surmise that the popularity of this text among the local lay-followers of Buddhism led members of the Uighur nobility – who were supporters of Buddhism – to sponsor the copying and translation of this very long text. This was also part of their strong commitment to celebrating the cult of Maitreya, the future buddha (Röhrborn, 2004).

The plot of this text can be roughly divided into three parts:

1. the career of Maitreya as a Brahman student at the time of the Buddha Śākyamuni, his entry into the Buddhist order, and the prophecy (vyākaraṇa) of future Buddhahood bestowed on him, as a Buddhist monk, by Śākyamuni;
2. the rebirth of Maitreya as son of a Brahman in a future golden age, in the wonderful city of Ketumatī, where he accomplishes all the standard steps of the career of a bodhisattva, renounces the worldly life, and leaves the city of his parents; and
3. his venturing, having reached enlightenment (bodhi), the typical career of a buddha, converting his father, the king, the queen, and all the people that he meets.

With his crowd of disciples, he discovers the disciple Kāśyapa, who has remained sitting in deep meditation inside a mountain since the time of Śākyamuni and who transmits to Maitreya a message from the first Buddha, Śākyamuni. Several chapters are devoted to Maitreya's commenting on the horrifying display of punishments that various categories of sinners suffer in different hells, with the aim to convert more people. Before his parinirvāṇa, he delivers a prophecy of future buddhahood to King Siṃha, who has himself become a monk, and also converts his own mother, who has died shortly after his birth.

In addition to the narrative itself, the text conveys many teachings about the main points of the Buddhist doctrine, and is obviously inspired by didactic trends, so that the whole work amounts to a popular encyclopedia of the Sarvāstivādin school. The Old Turkic text follows the Tocharian A text strictly with regard to the structure of the episodes, the succession of narrative parts and sp forth. There are of course stylistic fea the Old Turkic version, but there are ferences between the texts. First, the is wholly in prose, while the Tocharia the usual interchange of prose and ve Old Turkic text has left out most of tions. In addition, the Indian backg more prevalent in the Tocharian A te of Sanskrit origin that were understa learned Buddhists have been transla ally or freely, in the Old Turkic tex Maitrisimit nom bitig cannot be se one can surmise that the text was pe lic during a Buddhist festival, much bianwen. In fact, the Old Turkic tex the notion of a "performance" or " related to a feast celebrating Maitrey & Klimkeit, vol. I, 1988, 7). But th not be understood as referring to tion (Röhrborn, 1994). Such a "sh precisely in the display of picture events, for instance the scenes th hells or in heavenly spheres. This to the model of "drama" with rega arian A text. Except for the prese drama (nāṭaka) in the title of the wo dimension is rather superficial an mention of entrance and departure the presence of interludes, and to th place of the action. Therefore, one order to enhance its literary prestig tionable features of Indian dramati been added to an original text whic mentally different from any campū public recitation. In other words, two successive versions of the text narrative in prose and verse and t elaborated, recast as a heroic dram of the Maitrisimit nom bitig was mo mer version.

---

This leads us back to the issue of of Buddhist dramatic literature in is, literary compositions that were formance on stage. On the one h deny that Tocharian writers kne ponents of Indian dramaturgy. A works are effectively composed terns, although they do not seem from dramas composed previously though no such work is extant, on the possibility that some dramas b

CE archetype, translated from the t in the region of Yanqi (ancient as Karashahr). The Old Turkic text d on the Tocharian A text, without , and the Tocharian A text itself the same region but as a compila-der Sanskrit texts. The final stage n of the Tocharian A text is probmoved in time from that of the Old ise that the popularity of this text l lay-followers of Buddhism led Uighur nobility – who were supism – to sponsor the copying and very long text. This was also part mmitment to celebrating the cult ture buddha (Röhrborn, 2004). text can be roughly divided into

f Maitreya as a Brahman student Buddha Śākyamuni, his entry into r, and the prophecy (vyākaraṇa) hood bestowed on him, as a Budkyamuni;
f Maitreya as son of a Brahman in a in the wonderful city of Ketumatī, lishes all the standard steps of the attva, renounces the worldly life, of his parents; and g, having reached enlightenment l career of a buddha, converting g, the queen, and all the people of disciples, he discovers the dis-o has remained sitting in deep a mountain since the time of o transmits to Maitreya a message dha, Śākyamuni. Several chapters itreya's commenting on the hor-unishments that various categoer in different hells, with the aim eople. Before his parinirvāṇa, he y of future buddhahood to King imself become a monk, and also other, who has died shortly after e narrative itself, the text conveys out the main points of the Bud-is obviously inspired by didactic whole work amounts to a popu-f the Sarvāstivādin school. The ows the Tocharian A text strictly structure of the episodes, the succession of narrative parts and speeches, and so forth. There are of course stylistic features proper to the Old Turkic version, but there are two main differences between the texts. First, the Old Turkic text is wholly in prose, while the Tocharian A text shows the usual interchange of prose and verse. Second, the Old Turkic text has left out most of the stage directions. In addition, the Indian background is much more prevalent in the Tocharian A text; all elements of Sanskrit origin that were understandable only by learned Buddhists have been translated, either literally or freely, in the Old Turkic text. Although the Maitrisimit nom bitig cannot be seen as a drama, one can surmise that the text was performed in public during a Buddhist festival, much in the way of a bianwen. In fact, the Old Turkic text itself contains the notion of a "performance" or "show" (körünč) related to a feast celebrating Maitreya (Geng Shimin & Klimkeit, vol. I, 1988, 7). But this term should not be understood as referring to a stage production (Röhrborn, 1994). Such a "show" can consist precisely in the display of pictures of wonderful events, for instance the scenes that take place in hells or in heavenly spheres. This might also apply to the model of "drama" with regard to the Tocharian A text. Except for the presence of the word drama (nāṭaka) in the title of the work, the dramatic dimension is rather superficial and limited to the mention of entrance and departure of characters, to the presence of interludes, and to the mention of the place of the action. Therefore, one may wonder if, in order to enhance its literary prestige, these unquestionable features of Indian dramatic technique have been added to an original text which was not fundamentally different from any campū text designed for public recitation. In other words, one may imagine two successive versions of the text: the first a mere narrative in prose and verse and the second, more elaborated, recast as a heroic drama. The archetype of the Maitrisimit nom bitig was more akin to the former version.

This leads us back to the issue of the very existence of Buddhist dramatic literature in Central Asia, that is, literary compositions that were designed for performance on stage. On the one hand, one cannot deny that Tocharian writers knew all basic components of Indian dramaturgy. Accordingly, some works are effectively composed after Indian patterns, although they do not seem to be translated from dramas composed previously in Sanskrit. Even though no such work is extant, one cannot exclude the possibility that some dramas by Aśvaghoṣa or by poets of his school had been translated in Tocharian B, at least in part, and that these translations served as a model for the indigenous composition of dramas. On the other hand, one may consider the plots offered by the very rich literature of *jātaka*s and *avadāna*s, which were widely read and translated, to have been used in alternative ways by Tocharian writers, either as campū designed to be read in small circles or as campū adapted as to be recited and taught in public, which ultimately evolved into the bianwen genre. There is not such a large gap between this genre of performance designed for lay Buddhists and the refurbishing of the same narrative and prosimetric material into a drama, that is, a theater piece in the Indian proper way. Moreover, one can point out the manifold representation of legends and of the episodes of the Buddha's life in paintings found in Buddhist shrines, especially in the caves of Kizil (see Yaldiz, 1987, 28–87). These paintings display a repertoire of edifying tales, *jātaka*s and *avadāna*s, which, in a parallel fashion, were written in Tocharian manuscripts of the same epoch. Since these caves were certainly used in part as centers of teaching for monks and pilgrims, one can speculate that the Tocharian campū texts were composed in this milieu to be recited aloud in front of these paintings. This hypothesis would establish a link between storytelling and pictures in the vibrant period of Tocharian Buddhism.

In the guise of a provisory conclusion, it would be too rash to conclude that Buddhist dramas in Central Asia were conceived only for an erudite elite of monks and scholars as texts to be enjoyed through mere reading. On the contrary, the role played by dramatic art in the spread of Buddhist faith would be in accordance with the pervasive Indian influence on all aspects of Buddhist culture, especially in the Kucha region in the western part of the Tocharian area.

Bibliography

Elverskog, J., Uygur Buddhist Literature, SRS 1, Turnhout, 1997.

Franco, E., & D. Schlingloff, "Zu dem buddhistischen Schauspielfragment aus Afghanistan," WZKS 54, 2011–2012, 19–33.

Geng Shimin & H.-J. Klimkeit, Das Zusammentreffen mit Maitreya. Die ersten fünf Kapitel der Hami-Version der Maitrisimit, Wiesbaden, 1988.

Geng Shimin, J.P. Laut & G.-J. Pinault, "Neue Ergebnisse der Maitrisimit -Forschung (I)," ZDMG 154, 2004, 347–369.

Hahn, M., "The Buddhist Contribution to the Indian Belles Lettres," AOH 63, 2010, 455–471.

Hahn, M., Joy for the World: A Buddhist Play by Candragomin, Berkeley, 1987.

Hahn, M., Candragomins Lokānandanāṭaka, Wiesbaden, 1974.

Hartmann, J.-U., "Ein Schauspielfragment aus Afghanistan," in: K. Klaus & J.-U. Hartmann, eds., Indica et Tibetica. Festschrift für Michael Hahn, Vienna, 2007, 249–258.

Johnston, E.H., "The Rāṣṭrapālanāṭaka of Aśvaghoṣa," JGIS 5/2, 1938, 151–153.

Keith, A.B., The Sanskrit Drama in Its Origin, Development, Theory and Practice, London, 1924.

Konow, S., Das indische Drama, GindPh 2/2D, Berlin, 1920.

Lévi, S., Le théâtre indien, Paris, 1890, repr. 1963.

Lévi, S., "Encore Aśvaghoṣa," JA 213, 1928, 193–216.

Lévi, S., "Le Sūtra du Sage et du Fou dans la littérature de l'Asie Centrale," JA 207, 1925, 305–332.

Lienhard, S., A History of Classical Poetry: Sanskrit – Pali – Prakrit, HIL 3/1, Wiesbaden, 1984.

Liu Mau-tsai, Kutscha und seine Beziehungen zu China vom 2. Jh. v. bis zum 6. Jh. n. Chr., 2 vols., Wiesbaden, 1969.

Lüders, H., Bruchstücke buddhistischer Dramen, KPTEKST 1, Berlin, 1911.

Lüders, H., "Das Śāriputraprakaraṇa. Ein Drama des Aśvaghoṣa," SPAW, 1911, 388–411; repr. in: H. Lüders, Philologica Indica. Ausgewählte kleine Schriften. Festgabe zum siebzigsten Geburtstage am 25. Juni 1939, Göttingen, 1940, 190–213.

Mair, V.H., "Maitrisimit and the Narrative Traditions," in: Y. Kasai et al., eds., Die Erforschung des Tocharischen und die alttürkische Maitrisimit, SRS 17, Turnhout, 2013, 105–121.

Mair, V.H., Painting and Performance: Chinese Picture Recitation and Its Indian Genesis, Honolulu, 1988.

Pinault, G.-J., Chrestomathie tokharienne: Textes et grammaire, Leuven, 2008.

Pinault, G.-J., "Concordance des manuscrits tokhariens du fonds Pelliot," in: M. Malzahn, ed., Instrumenta Tocharica, Heidelberg, 2007, 163–219.

Pinault, G.-J., "Restitution du Maitreyasamiti-Nāṭaka en tokharien A: Bilan provisoire et recherches complémentaires sur l'acte XXVI," TIES 8, 1999, 189–240.

Pinault, G.-J., "Une version koutchéenne de l'Aggañña-Sutta," TIES 3, 1989, 149–220.

Pinault, G.-J., "Fragment d'un drame bouddhique en koutchéen," BÉI 2, 1984, 163–191.

Röhrborn, K., "Maitreya-Buddhismus zwischen Hīnayāna und Mahāyāna," in: D. Durkin-Meisterernst et al., eds., Turfan Revisited: The First Century of Research into the Arts and Cultures of the Silk Road, MIAKPh 17, Berlin, 2004, 264–267.

Röhrborn, K., "Die alttürkische Maitrisimit – Textbuch für theatralische Darstellungen?", in: K. Röhrborn & W. Veenker, eds., Memoriae munusculum. Gedenkband für Annemarie von Gabain, Wiesbaden, 1994, 99–103.

Schmidt, K.T., "Die westtocharische Version des Araṇemi-Jātakas in deutscher Übersetzung," in: L. Bazin & P. Zieme, eds., De Dunhuang à Istanbul: Hommage à James Russell Hamilton, SRS 5, Turnhout, 2001, 299–327.

Simson, G. von, "Stil und Schulzugehörigkeit buddhistischer Sanskrittexte," in: H. Bechert, ed., Zur Schulzugehörigkeit von Werken der Hīnayāna-Literatur. Erster Teil (Symposien zur Buddhismusforschung 3/1), Göttingen, 1985, 79–93.

Thomas, W., "Die tocharische Literatur," in: W. Jens, ed., Kindlers Neues Literatur Lexikon, vol. XX, Munich, 1992, 544–547.

Thomas, W., "Zur Bedeutung des Tempuswechsels von Präteritum zu Präsens im Tocharischen," IF 78, 1973, 78–94.

Winter, W., "Some Aspects of 'Tocharian' Drama: Forms and Techniques," JAOS 75, 1955, 26–35; repr. in: W. Winter, Kleine Schriften / Selected Writings, vol. I, Bremen, 2005, 11–20.

Yaldiz, M., Archäologie und Kunstgeschichte Chinesisch-Zentralasiens (Xinjiang), HdO 7/3/2, Leiden, 1987.

Web Sites

A Comprehensive Edition of Tocharian Manuscripts: http://univie.ac.at/tocharian.

GEORGES-JEAN PINAULT

rsion koutchéenne de l'Aggañña-Sutta," 20.

ent d'un drame bouddhique en kout-
, 163–191.

reya-Buddhismus zwischen Hīnayāna n: D. Durkin-Meisterernst et al., eds., The First Century of Research into the f the Silk Road, MIAKPh 17, Berlin, 2004, alttürkische Maitrisimit – Textbuch Darstellungen?", in: K. Röhrborn & lemoriae munusculum. Gedenkband für bain, Wiesbaden, 1994, 99–103.

vesttocharische Version des Araṇemi-r Übersetzung," in: L. Bazin & P. Zieme, à Istanbul: Hommage à James Russell urnhout, 2001, 299–327.

und Schulzugehörigkeit buddhistischer H. Bechert, ed., Zur Schulzugehörigkeit ayāna-Literatur. Erster Teil (Symposien schung 3/1), Göttingen, 1985, 79–93.

charische Literatur," in: W. Jens, ed., ratur Lexikon, vol. XX, Munich, 1992, deutung des Tempuswechsels von Präim Tocharischen," IF 78, 1973, 78–94.

pects of 'Tocharian' Drama: Forms and 75, 1955, 26–35; repr. in: W. Winter, Selected Writings, vol. I, Bremen, 2005, gie und Kunstgeschichte Chinesischiang), HdO 7/3/2, Leiden, 1987.

ition of Tocharian Manuscripts: http:// ian.

GEORGES-JEAN PINAULT

Philosophical Literature

Philosophical Literature: South Asia

Kamalaśīla (740–795 CE?), one of the most outstanding figures in the history of Indian Buddhism, composed and glossed works on logic, epistemology, and Madhyamaka; commented on important Mahāyāna sūtras such as the Vajracchedikā and the Śālistamba; and, besides being versed in Tantra, authored treatises in defense of the view that salvation results from a gradual cultivation process extending over innumerable lifetimes. Mutatis mutandis, the same can be said of the most revered Indian Buddhist authorities, Nāgārjuna, Vasubandhu, and Dignāga, who were first and foremost committed to the "transdisciplinary" scholastic project of harmonizing reasoning (yukti) with faith and scripture (āgama) in order to build a coherent Buddhist view of the world, human understanding, and salvation.

In the absence of any emic category corresponding to the philosophical (in contrast to the narrative, the ritual, the disciplinary, etc.), isolating a distinctly philosophical segment or moment in these authors' scholastic output is methodologically problematic and may look purely arbitrary. Fortunately, (late) Indian Buddhist intellectuals themselves developed doxographical labels suggesting that they regarded Madhyamaka, Yogācāra, Sautrāntika, and Vaibhāṣika literature as reflecting a fairly homogenous intellectual enterprise, the outcome of which they sometimes call mata (religio-philosophical doctrine), providing the expression "philosophical literature" with a convenient if not entirely satisfactory content. Although the present article does not address Ābhidharmika literature, it partly conforms to this doxographical scheme when focusing on the Madhyamaka and the Yogācāra text traditions, but it diverges from it when presenting Buddhist epistemology as a distinct school. Indeed the so-called pramāṇa tradition, at least as far as issues of practice and doctrine are concerned, has never been considered an independent school in its Indic environment. However, dealing with it as a distinct school is not entirely without historical foundation, since the Indian Buddhist monastic curricula, which reflect normative and maybe institutional divisions in terms of genres and disciplines, isolate the hetuvidyā (science of justifications, i.e. logic and dialectics, including epistemology) as an autonomous branch of knowledge.

Mādhyamika literature has been surveyed in D. Seyfort Ruegg's monograph (1981), while for the Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda literature, J. May's article (1971) still provides an excellent overview. J. Powers (1991), J.A. Silk (2001), F. Deleanu (2006), and M. Delhey (2013) provide indispensable bibliographical information, especially on the research carried out by L. Schmithausen and his followers. For the chronology and the literature of the epistemological school, we have the systematic survey by E. Steinkellner and M.T. Much (1995). E. Frauwallner's Die Philosophie des Buddhismus (1956; see also Franco & Preisendanz, 2010) remains one of the best introduction to Indian Buddhist philosophy ever written in a Western language. A very useful survey covering some of the same ground as the present one is found in the Japanese-language volume by K. Tsukamoto, Y. Matsunaga, and H. Isoda (1990). Much Indian Buddhist literature survives, if at all, only in classical translations into Tibetan and Chinese. Therefore, while recent discoveries are making more and more Sanskrit materials available, and there is good reason to expect this trend to continue, at present any survey of Indian Buddhist philosophical literature must also refer extensively to sources preserved in Tibetan and Chinese. Note that the present article does not deal with the origin(s) of Indian Buddhist philosophy (for this topic, see Watanabe, 1983; Bronkhorst, 1999).

Early Mādhyamika Literature

The rise of the Madhyamaka school is intimately connected to the name of Nāgārjuna (c. 200 CE?; see Walleser, 1923; Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 4–5n11; Mabbett, 1998; Walser, 2005, 59–88) and can be located at the confluence of universal emptiness (śūnyatā) as taught in the Prajñāpāramitā sūtras and a reaction to traditional Buddhist dogmatics' tendency to realism and hypostatization. As its name indicates (see Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 1–3; maybe not in use before the 5th cent. CE), the Madhyamaka has gradually tended to understand itself as a middle way (madhyamā pratipad) between the extremes of existence and nonexistence. This middle way is nothing but causality or dependent origination (pratītyasamutpāda),

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

radically reinterpreted in the sense that everything is empty of intrinsic, autonomous existence – not to be mistaken for unqualified nonexistence, hence nihilism, which the Mādhyamikas were frequently accused of, and which, according to another overall interpretation of the Madhyamaka, they indeed endorsed (see Vetter, 1982; Oetke, 1988; 1989; 1996). The scholastic works ascribed to Nāgārjuna testify to a dialectical method consisting in the reductio ad absurdum (prasaṅga) of every possible theoretical posit. Here as elsewhere, the critique is meant as a therapeutic method for defilements and suffering rather than as a self-contained philosophical inquiry.

In stanza 10 of his Madhyamakaśāstrastuti (de Jong, 1962, 51), Nāgārjuna's commentator Candrakīrti (6th–7th cents. CE?) mentions the following eight (categories of) works by Nāgārjuna, though the authenticity of some is disputed (see below):

1. the Sūtrasamuccaya (T. 1653; D 3934/P 5330; see Pāsādika, 1989, 2003; Lindtner, 1982a, 172–178);
2. the Ratnāvalī (T. 1656; D 4158/P 5658; see Hahn, 1982; Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 23–26; Walser, 2005, 271–278);
3. the Saṃstutis (see Lindtner, 1982a, 121–161; Tola & Dragonetti, 1995a, 101–153);
4. the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā (T. 1564; D 3824/P 5224; see Saigusa, 1985; Ye, 2011; de Jong, 1977; Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 9–18; Siderits & Katsura, 2013);
5. the Yuktiṣaṣṭikā (T. 1575; D 3825/P 5225; see Lindtner, 1982a; Scherrer-Schaub, 1991; Tola & Dragonetti, 1995b; Ye, 2013; Li, Kano & Ye, 2014; Li & Ye, forthcoming; Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 19–20);
6. the Vaidalyaprakaraṇa (D 3826, 3830/P 5226, 5230; see Kajiyama, 1965a; Tola & Dragonetti, 1995a);
7. the Śūnyatāsaptati (D 3827/P 5227; see Lindtner, 1982a; Tola & Dragonetti, 1995b; Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 20–21); and
8. the Vigrahavyāvartanī (T. 1631; see Tucci, 1929; D 3828, 3832/P 5228, 5232; see Lindtner, 1982a; Bhattacharya, Johnston & Kunst, 1998; Yonezawa, 2008; Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 21–23).

The fountainhead of all Mādhyamika traditions is the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā. This treatise is composed of 447 (or 449) stanzas distributed into 27 chapters (whose titles vary according to the commentaries), in which Nāgārjuna's dialectics successively apply to the following (list according to Candrakīrti's Prasannapadā):

1. causal conditions (pratyaya);
2. motion (gatāgata);
3. sensory bases (indriya);
4. constituents (skandha);
5. elements (dhātu);
6. defilements (rāgarakta);
7. conditioned being (saṃskṛta);
8. action and agent (karmakāraka);
9. past (pūrva);
10. fire and fuel (agnīndhana);
11. successive lemmas (pūrvāparakoṭi);
12. suffering (duḥkha);
13. conditioned things (saṃskāra);
14. connection (saṃsarga);
15. own being/intrinsic nature (svabhāva);
16. bondage and liberation (bandhanamokṣa);
17. action and retribution (karmaphala);
18. self (ātman);
19. time (kāla);
20. causal complexes (sāmagrī);
21. existence and nonexistence (sambhavavibhava);
22. the Tathāgata;
23. misconceptions (viparyāsa);
24. nobles' truths (āryasatya);
25. nirvāṇa;
26. 12 links in the chain of causation (dvādaśāṅga);
27. false views (dṛṣṭi).

Major breaks in the historical development of Indian Madhyamaka coincide to a large extent with the doctrinal innovations initiated by Mādhyamika philosophers while commenting on the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā. The importance of the work can also be measured by the fact that it has been commented on by non-Mādhyamika intellectuals such as Asaṅga (T. 1565; 順中論義入大般若波羅蜜經), Guṇamati (lost), and Sthiramati (T. 1567; 大乘中觀釋論).

Besides the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā, four more scholastic works have been commonly ascribed to Nāgārjuna by both traditional and modern scholarship: the Śūnyatāsaptati, the Vigrahavyāvartanī, the Vyavahārasiddhi*, and the Yuktiṣaṣṭikā. In Candrakīrti's opinion, the first two are mere appendices to the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā (see Scherrer-Schaub, 1991, xxxvi).

The Śūnyatāsaptati consists of 73 verses and a(n auto)commentary (D 3831/P 5231). It deals with the conventionality and the emptiness of all dharmas; with defilements, action, wrong notions, and nescience; and with the access to the ultihe following (list according to napadā):

ions (pratyaya);
gata);
(indriya); skandha);
ātu);
rāgarakta);
eing (saṃskṛta);
ent (karmakāraka);

agnīndhana);
nmas (pūrvāparakoṭi);
kha);
hings (saṃskāra);
aṃsarga);
trinsic nature (svabhāva);
liberation (bandhanamokṣa);
ribution (karmaphala);

exes (sāmagrī);
nonexistence (sambhavavibhava);
;
ns (viparyāsa); (āryasatya);

chain of causation (dvādaśāṅga); ṛṣṭi).

the historical development of a coincide to a large extent with ations initiated by Mādhyamika ile commenting on the ārikā. The importance of the neasured by the fact that it has on by non-Mādhyamika intelsaṅga (T. 1565; 順中論義入大 ṇamati (lost), and Sthiramati 論). madhyamakakārikā, four more ve been commonly ascribed to traditional and modern scholsaptati, the Vigrahavyāvartanī, dhi, and the Yuktiṣaṣṭikā. In n, the first two are mere appen-adhyamakakārikā (see Scherrer-ati consists of 73 verses and ary (D 3831/P 5231). It deals nality and the emptiness of all ements, action, wrong notions, l with the access to the ultimate. The treatise has been commented on by Candrakīrti in the Śūnyatāsaptativṛtti (D 3867/P 5268; see Erb, 1997) and by Parahitabhadra in the Śūnyatāsaptativivṛti (D 3868/P 5269).

The Vigrahavyāvartanī was written in mixed verses and prose. This important treatise contains "a searching critique of the opponents' own logical and epistemological assumptions, and a demonstration of the validity of the Mādhyamika's theory and method" (Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 21–22; against Nāgārjuna's authorship, see Tola & Dragonetti, 1998).

The lost Vyavahārasiddhi* (Tib. Tha snyad grub pa) is known to us through six stanzas quoted in Śāntarakṣita's Madhyamakālaṃkāravṛtti and explicitly identified by Kamalaśīla (Ichigo, 1985, 213, l. 10). According to Bu ston (1290–1364), the Vyavahārasiddhi* was meant "to show that although there is no own being in the ultimate sense, still worldly transactional convention is justified at the superficial level" (see Lindtner, 1982a, 94, 94n127).

The Yuktiṣaṣṭikā is yet another of Nāgārjuna's treatises dealing with dependent origination. According to C. Lindtner (1982a, 100–101), its argument is that "reality is beyond all ontological and epistemological dualities while the empirical world of origination, destruction, and so on, is illusory and merely due to ignorance." Nāgārjuna's Yuktiṣaṣṭikā has been commented on by Candrakīrti in the Yuktiṣaṣṭikāvṛtti (D 3864/P 5265; see Scherrer-Schaub, 1991).

As suggested by Tibetan classifications, Nāgārjuna's(?) Ratnāvalī belongs to the genre of the epistles dedicated to spiritual edification. This important treatise in five chapters and about 500 verses is especially well known for its chapter 4, which provides ethical and political advice to a (Satavahana?) king. The 9th-century scholar Ajitamitra has provided the Ratnāvalī with a commentary, the Ratnāvalīṭīkā (D 4159/P 5659; see Okada, 1990). Ethical advice to a prince is also the subject matter of Nāgārjuna's famous Suhṛllekha (T. 1672–1674; D 4182, 4496/P 5409, 5682; see Tenzin, 2002; Dietz, 1984, 18–30; 2012), which has been commented on by Mahāmati in his Suhṛllekhaṭīkā (D–/P 5690). In addition to the Suhṛllekha, three works devoted to ethics and royal conduct have been ascribed to Nāgārjuna (Hahn, 1985): the Prajñāśataka (D 4328, 4501/P 5820, 5414; see Hahn, 1990), the Nītiśāstraprajñādaṇḍa (D 4329/P 5821; see Campbell, 1919), and the Nītiśāstrajantupoṣaṇabindu (D 4330/P 5822).

Four works traditionally ascribed to Nāgārjuna but of disputed authenticity deserve to be mentioned here (for yet other works, see Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 28–30; Lindtner, 1982a, 180–248; Buescher, 2008, 26–40).

1. The Vaidalyaprakaraṇa is a treatise consisting of 73 *sūtra*s and a prose commentary dealing with dialectics. As its initial stanza testifies, the Vaidalyaprakaraṇa targets non-Buddhist dialecticians advocating the self and "grinds to little pieces" their 16 categories (comp. Nyāyasūtra 1.1.1). As O.H. Pind (2001) has pointed out, the treatise's indebtedness to Sautrāntika-like ideas makes Nāgārjuna's authorship very unlikely.

2. The Pratītyasamutpādahṛdaya (D 3836, 4553/P 5236, 5467; see Lindtner, 1982a; 1982b) seems to have originally consisted of five stanzas and a commentary of uncertain authorship, the Vyākhyāna (T. 1654; D 3837, 4554/P 5237, 5468). According to C. Lindtner (1982a, 171), the treatise "marks an exegetical attempt to reconcile the traditional twelve-membered formula of dependent origination with the doctrine of emptiness."

3. The Dvādaśamukhaśāstra* (T. 1568; see Aiyaswami Sastri, 1954; Goshima, 2004; 2007; Hermann-Pfandt, 2008, 334) bears on 12 typically Mādhyamika topics (see Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 27–28) in 26 stanzas. The fame of this treatise is due to its being the second of the three authoritative treatises of the East Asian Sanlun (三論) school. This treatise might be a compilation by the (Central Asian?) commentator Qingmu (青目)/*Piṅgal(ākṣ)a or a later compilation by Kumārajīva (334–413?), himself or a member of his circle (see Goshima, 2002; 2007; 2012).

4. The massive Mahāprajñāpāramitopadeśa (T. 1509; 大智度論; see Lamotte, 1949; 1970), if it is an Indian text, apparently achieved more renown in East Asia (and the West) than in India, where it is never alluded to. This commentary on the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikāprajñāpāramitā – ascribed to Nāgārjuna by Kumārajīva, who translated it into Chinese in 402–404 CE – refers to Nāgārjuna, Āryadeva, and Rāhulabhadra. It seems more likely, however, that this "Mahāyānistic replica of the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma" (Lamotte, 1970, xli) was the work of a monk of Sarvāstivāda background and Mahāyānistic persuasion in early 4th-century Gandhara or Kashmir, or of "Serindian scholars and Chinese redactors" (Seyfort Ruegg, 1982, 508).

Next in importance only to Nāgārjuna is his likely disciple Āryadeva (mid-3rd cent. CE?; see Lang, 1986, 7–15). More than Nāgārjuna, Āryadeva endeavored to defend the Madhyamaka against the non-Buddhists. This makes his works important sources concerning early Sāṃkhya and Vaiśeṣika, two of these non-Buddhist opponents. Āryadeva's magnum opus is the Catuḥśataka (D 3846/P 5246; see Lang, 1986). The treatise's 400 stanzas are distributed into 16 chapters, of which 1–8 and 9–16 form two homogenous units – Dharmapāla commented on chapters 9–16 alone (T. 1571; 大乘廣百論釋論), the likely reason why Xuanzang (玄奘; 602–664) limited his Chinese translation to these same chapters (T. 1570; 廣百論本). Chapters 1–8 are close in intent to Nāgārjuna's two epistles and deal, as an ethical "preparation of those who practise the path" (Lang, 1986, 52), with the elimination of the four misconceptions (chs. 1–4; see Lang, 2003), the bodhisattva practice (ch. 5), the elimination of the defilements (ch. 6), the attachment to sensory objects (ch. 7), and the practice of the disciple (ch. 8). Chapters 9–16 are "a defense of the Madhyamaka philosophy of emptiness against its detractors" (Lang, 1986, 52) and negate permanent things (ch. 9; see May, 1980–1984), the self (ch. 10), time (ch. 11), false views (ch. 12; see Tillemans, 1990), the sense organs and their objects (ch. 13; see Tillemans, 1990), the belief in extremities (ch. 14), and conditioned things (ch. 15) in addition to addressing logical and epistemological issues related to the doctrine of emptiness (ch. 16).

Āryadeva's Catuḥśataka has been commented on by Dharmapāla (see above; see also Tillemans, 1990) and by Candrakīrti in the Catuḥśatakaṭīkā/Catuḥśatakavṛtti (D 3865/P 5266; see Suzuki, 1994). At least in East Asia, however, Āryadeva's fame is due mainly to the Śata(ka)śāstra (T. 1569; 百論; see Tucci, 1929b, 3–89), in 50 sūtras (sic), the third authoritative treatise of the Sanlun school. Of disputed authenticity (see de Jong, 1971, 110; Gard, 1954, 751–747), the Śata(ka)śāstra might have been a "rearranged and abridged version of the Catuḥśataka" (Lang, 1986, 13), possibly compiled by the (Central Asian?) commentator Vasu (Gard, 1954, 747). At least as far as their subject matter is concerned, the two works have much in common:

1. merit and demerit;
2. the self;
3. unity;
4. multiplicity;
5. sense perception;
6. sense objects;
7. the (Sāṃkhya) doctrine according to which the result preexists in the cause (satkāryavāda);
8. the (Vaiśeṣika) doctrine according to which the result does not preexist in the cause (asatkāryavāda);
9. permanence; and
10. emptiness. (Lang, 1986, 11–13)

As pointed out by K.C. Lang, however, the two treatises differ in the arrangement of topics, in their arguments, and in their style (didactic stanzas vs. sūtras).

Several other treatises have been ascribed to Āryadeva:

- the Hastavālaprakaraṇa, likely the work of Dignāga (see below);
- the Treatise on the Explanation of Nirvāṇa by Heterodox and Hīnayāna Teachers in the Laṅkāvatārasūtra (T. 1640; Shì léng gā jīng zhōng wài dào xiǎo chéng niè pán lùn [釋楞伽經中外道小乘涅槃論]; see Tucci, 1926);
- the Treatise on the Refutation of Heterodox and Hīnayāna Theses in the Laṅkāvatārasūtra (T. 1639; Pò léng gā jīng zhōng wài dào xiǎo chéng sì zōng lùn [破楞伽經中外道小乘四宗論]);
- the Skhalitaprama[rd]anayuktihetusiddhi (D 3847/P 5247; see Clarke & Jamspal, 1978), a short treatise in which naive versions of hedonism/materialism, naturalism, temporalism, and theism are criticized in the name of dependent origination;
- the Madhyamakabhramaghāta (D 3850/P 5250), apparently a compilation of selected excerpts from Bhāviveka's Tarkajvālā (see Lindtner, 1982b, 173n21); and
- the philosophically more substantial Akṣaraśataka (T. 1572; D 3834, 3835/P 5234, 5235; see Gokhale, 1930), whose targets are Sāṃkhya and Vaiśeṣika views, and whose topics parallel those of Śata(ka)śāstra 2–10.

Rāhulabhadra, a contemporary and follower of Nāgārjuna (maybe of Āryadeva as well; see Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 54n155), is the last important figure of the formative period of Indian Madhyamaka. He likely authored a now lost commentary on Nāgārjuna's Mūlamadhyamakakārikā, which is referred to by early authorities such as Asaṅga and *Sāramati (in T. 1565, 1634; see Lamotte, 1970, 1374). But Rāhulabhadra is especially famous for his hymns – first and foremost for his Prajñāpāramitāstotra, which serves as a preface to several (Indian versions of) Prajñāpāramitā sūtras and is quoted in the pseudo-Nāgārjuna's Mahāprajñāpāramitopadeśa (see Lamotte, 1949, 1060–1065, 1060n2). According to D. Seyfort Ruegg (1981, 55–56), Rāhulabhadra's hymns betray his indebtedness to tathāgatagarbha ideas (i.e. the doctrinal stream accepting the existence of Buddha-nature in each sentient being).

This may be the place to briefly mention a work that, although it bears no particular relationship to the Madhyamaka (but see Katsura, 1979) and is more closely connected with Abhidharmic ways of thinking, had a strong impact on t Indian Buddhist philosophy and of Dārṣṭāntika/Sautrāntika thoug varman's Tattvasiddhi* (also know T. 1646; 成實論; see Aiyaswami Sas ter, 1999, 255–312), composed eit and 350 (Katsura, 1978, 1063) or be (Kritzer, 2005, 210). Besides an in ter dedicated to the three jewels law, and the community) and the controversy, the work consists of f ing with the four nobles' truths. consists of the five skandhas (co sensation, identification, conditio cognitions), the origin of suffering action and defilements. Harivarma sation of suffering as the cessation of designations, of the awareness the awareness of emptiness (see for the path leading to the cessati consists of concentration and kn man's treatment of topics such a past and future factors (ch. 1; see the modalities of cognition (ch. 2) ing controversies with Vaiśeṣika a early Buddhist philosophers' main

---

Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda Li

The origin of what came to be kn Vijñānavāda, or *Vijñaptivāda – th alism – is commonly traced to a ( community of meditators or y (yogācāra) that, from the 1st cent mences to be active in the produc treatises and manuals" (Deleanu, references in Deleanu, vol. II, 2006, are regularly discussed in the Mah 2000, 286–287; Deleanu, vol. I, 200

Not infrequently entitled Yogā
tise on] the Levels of Those Who E Training; Delhey, vol. I, 2009, 3n2; the most ancient among these Yog the "prototypes" (Demiéville, 195 (Deleanu, 2006) of the Yogācāra as the foundation of classical Bud (vijñaptimātratā) idealism. The m these and later meditation digests

1. the 1st- to 2nd-century
(T. 606; 修行道地經; T. 607; into Chinese in 148–170 CE but in Kashmirian Sarvāstivāda patria

C. Lang, however, the two trea-rrangement of topics, in their heir style (didactic stanzas vs.

atises have been ascribed to rakaraṇa, likely the work of the Explanation of Nirvāṇa Hīnayāna Teachers in the 1640; Shì léng gā jīng zhōng wài in lùn [釋楞伽經中外道小乘涅

);
he Refutation of Heterodox and the Laṅkāvatārasūtra (T. 1639;
g wài dào xiǎo chéng sì zōng 小乘四宗論]);
a[rd]anayuktihetusiddhi (D 3847/Jamspal, 1978), a short treatise ons of hedonism/materialism, lism, and theism are criticized dent origination; akabhramaghāta (D 3850/a compilation of selected eka's Tarkajvālā (see Lindtner, ally more substantial Akṣara- 3834, 3835/P 5234, 5235; see se targets are Sāṃkhya and whose topics parallel those of contemporary and follower of f Āryadeva as well; see Seyfort s the last important figure of the ndian Madhyamaka. He likely commentary on Nāgārjuna's rikā, which is referred to by ch as Asaṅga and *Sāramati ee Lamotte, 1970, 1374). But ecially famous for his hymns – for his Prajñāpāramitāstotra, reface to several (Indian vermitā sūtras and is quoted in a's Mahāprajñāpāramitopadeśa 1060–1065, 1060n2). According (1981, 55–56), Rāhulabhadra's ebtedness to tathāgatagarbha nal stream accepting the exis-ure in each sentient being).

lace to briefly mention a work ars no particular relationship (but see Katsura, 1979) and is ted with Abhidharmic ways of thinking, had a strong impact on the early history of Indian Buddhist philosophy and the development of Dārṣṭāntika/Sautrāntika thought – that is, Harivarman's Tattvasiddhi* (also known as Satyasiddhi*; T. 1646; 成實論; see Aiyaswami Sastri, 1975, 1978; Potter, 1999, 255–312), composed either between 250 and 350 (Katsura, 1978, 1063) or between 310 and 390 (Kritzer, 2005, 210). Besides an introductory chapter dedicated to the three jewels (the Buddha, the law, and the community) and the different points of controversy, the work consists of four chapters dealing with the four nobles' truths. Whereas suffering consists of the five skandhas (corporeity, affective sensation, identification, conditioning factors, and cognitions), the origin of suffering is to be found in action and defilements. Harivarman defines the cessation of suffering as the cessation of the awareness of designations, of the awareness of factors, and of the awareness of emptiness (see Katsura, 1979). As for the path leading to the cessation of suffering, it consists of concentration and knowledge. Harivarman's treatment of topics such as the existence of past and future factors (ch. 1; see Katsura, 1978) or the modalities of cognition (ch. 2) contains interesting controversies with Vaiśeṣika and Sāṃkhya, the early Buddhist philosophers' main opponents.

Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda Literature

The origin of what came to be known as Yogācāra, Vijñānavāda, or *Vijñaptivāda – that is, Buddhist idealism – is commonly traced to a (Mūla)sarvāstivāda community of meditators or yoga practitioners (yogācāra) that, from the 1st century onward "commences to be active in the production of meditation treatises and manuals" (Deleanu, vol. I, 2006, 162; references in Deleanu, vol. II, 2006, 212n53). Its views are regularly discussed in the Mahāvibhāṣā (see Silk, 2000, 286–287; Deleanu, vol. I, 2006, 213n60).

Not infrequently entitled Yogācārabhūmi ([Treatise on] the Levels of Those Who Engage in Spiritual Training; Delhey, vol. I, 2009, 3n2; Delhey, 2013, 501), the most ancient among these *Yogācārabhūmi*s form the "prototypes" (Demiéville, 1954) or "forefathers" (Deleanu, 2006) of the Yogācārabhūmi that served as the foundation of classical Buddhist "mind-only" (vijñaptimātratā) idealism. The most famous among these and later meditation digests are the following:

1. the 1st- to 2nd-century Yogācārabhūmi (T. 606; 修行道地經; T. 607; 道地經; translated into Chinese in 148–170 CE but incomplete) by the Kashmirian Sarvāstivāda patriarch Saṅgharakṣa (see Demiéville, 1954, 363–397; Deleanu, 1997, 34–35), "a literary as well as scholastic work written in a unique blend of poetic imagery … and technical discussions concerning the theory and practice of spiritual cultivation" (Deleanu, vol. I, 2006, 158);
2. the 4th-century Yogācārabhūmi (also known as The Meditation Scripture [Taught] by Dharmatrāta; T. 618; Dá mó duō luó chán jīng [達摩多羅禪經]; see Demiéville, 1954, 362–363; Deleanu, 1993; Yamabe, 1999, 72–76) by the Kashmirian meditation master Buddhasena; and
3. the so-called Yogalehrbuch, a Mūlasarvāstivāda work (Schmithausen, 1970, 109, 113n257), Sanskrit fragments of which were discovered in 1906 in Kizil near Kucha and edited by D. Schlingloff (1964; see Hartmann, 1996; Yamabe, 1997; Yamabe, 1999, 60–72; see also Bretfeld, 2003).

The number of these digests was apparently so important that > in the early 5th century, in order to compile a Yoga treatise destined to his Chinese disciples, Kumārajīva used, besides Saṅgharakṣa's Yogācārabhūmi and Aśvaghoṣa's Saundarananda, all sorts of 'dhyāna summaries' … that were the works of other Sarvāstivādin patriarchs: Vasumitra, Upagupta, Saṅghasena, Pārśva, Kumāralāta. (Demiéville, 1954, 396; see also Yamabe, 1999, 78–79)

As noted by P. Demiéville (1954, 349–350, 354, 362), D. Schlingloff (1964, 54–56), D. Seyfort Ruegg (1967, 160–161), and N. Yamabe (1999, 73–74), these originally purely Śrāvakayānist works were supplemented with Mahāyānist elements or appendices from the 3rd to 4th century on. This is the case with chapters 28–30 of Saṅgharakṣa's Yogācārabhūmi, maybe an originally independent treatise, with chapters 4–7 of Buddhasena's Yogācārabhūmi, and with the bodhisattva ideal that made its way into the Yogalehrbuch. Properly Mahāyānistic treatises circulated as well, such as the Vīradattaparipṛcchā (also known as Bodhisattvayogācārabhūmisūtra*; T. 330; 菩薩修行經; comp. T. 331; 無畏授所問; comp. also T. 310; 大寶積經; XCVI, 540a–543a), which deals with the practice of the perfections (six, sometimes ten behavioral, ethical, and cognitive norms/ideals), the meditation on the human body, and so on. According to P. Demiéville, the "mahāyānization" that took place between the 2nd and the 4th century reflects "a new need born … of the gradual increase of the Mahāyānists: the Yoga masters could no longer ignore this clientele" (Demiéville, 1954, 397).

A very similar blend of Śrāvakayānist and Mahāyānist materials can be observed on a much larger scale in the Yogācārabhūmi(śāstra) (see Schmithausen, 1969a; Deleanu, 2006; Delhey, 2013; Kragh, 2013), which serves as a doctrinal authority of semi-canonical character to the Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda. One of its parts, the Śrāvakabhūmi (T. 1579; D 4036/P 5537; see Yugaron Shōmonji, 1998; 2007; Deleanu, 2006), belongs to the same "ascetic current" (Deleanu, vol. I, 2006, 158; see also Yamabe, 2013) as the one underlying Saṅgharakṣa's Yogācārabhūmi. This massive work – 100 juan (fascicles) in its Chinese translation – has been ascribed to either Maitreya (East Asian traditions) or Asaṅga (late Indic and Tibetan traditions), but its compilatory character has been demonstrated by L. Schmithausen (1969a).

The Yogācārabhūmi has come down to us in two complete translations – one in Tibetan (D 4035–4042/P 5536–5543) and one in Chinese (T. 1579; partial translation of the Viniścayasaṃgrahaṇī [T. 1584]; on Dharmakṣema's 418 CE translation, see below). Important parts of the so-called Maulī Bhūmi (Basic Section; see below), including the Śrāvakabhūmi and the Bodhisattvabhūmi (T. 1579; D 4037/P 5538; see Wogihara, 1930–1936; Dutt, 1978; Takahashi, 2005), have been preserved in Sanskrit manuscripts and fragments (see Delhey, 2009, 15n45; 2013, 507–540).

The Yogācārabhūmi consists of five parts (six in Tibetan; Deleanu, vol. I, 2006, 43–50):

1. the Maulī Bhūmi (Basic Section; or maulyo bhūmayaḥ; maybe originally referred to collectively as Yogācārabhūmi) consisting of 14 chapters expounding 17 levels/stages and representing about one half of the whole work;
2. the Viniścayasaṃgrahaṇī (Collection of Clarifications; see Schmithausen, 1969b; Kramer, 2005);
3. the Vyākhyā[na]saṃgrahaṇī* or Vivaraṇasaṃgrahaṇī* (Collection of Exegeses; see Nance, 2012, 167–212);
4. the Paryāyasaṃgrahaṇī (Collection of Synonym Terms); and
5. the Vastusaṃgrahaṇī (Collection of [Scriptural] Bases[?]).

According to F. Deleanu, > the basic part . . . deals with the three paths towards Liberation . . . as well as with various psychological and doctrinal aspects related directly or indirectly to spiritual cultivation, [whereas] the rest of the text represents collections of various doctrinal definitions, lists, exegetical materials dedicated to canonical scriptures, and so on. (Deleanu, vol. I, 2006, 43–44)

Except for the Bodhisattvabhūmi, the whole basic part is of Śrāvakayānist orientation. As for the four Saṃgrahaṇīs, they are essentially Śrāvakayānist as well, except for the Sandhinirmocanasūtra, quoted extensively in the Viniścayasaṃgrahaṇī (see Delhey, 2013, 535–538), and for the rest of the Bodhisattvabhūmiviniścaya. As F. Deleanu puts it, > the Yogācārabhūmi became a fundamental treatise of one of India's major Mahāyāna traditions in spite of the fact that a large part of it contains or presupposes no teachings peculiar to the Great Vehicle. (Deleanu, vol. I, 2006, 182)

Even in its Mahāyānist parts, the Yogācārabhūmi recurrently targets misconceptions of emptiness that reflect ideas close to the Prajñāpāramitā if not to early Madhyamaka (see Seyfort Ruegg, 1969, 322–323; Deleanu, vol. I, 2006, 162–163; 170–171; Buescher, 2008, 173–176).

This fivefold macrostructure is reflected in the emic classifications of the Yogācārabhūmi as an Abhidharma work. Thus according to the Viniścayasaṃgrahaṇī (T. 1579, 654b3–6; D Zhi 188b2–3/P Zi 195b6), the Abhidharma piṭaka (basket; called mātṛkā [matrix] in a Mūlasarvāstivāda environment) consists of 17 levels and four collections. In other words, the Yogācārabhūmi is an Abhidharma matrix. The Yogācārabhūmi has also been described as an Abhidharma piṭaka revealed by Maitreya (Delhey, vol. I, 2009, 3n3; Delhey, 2013, 502nn9–10).

From a doctrinal and literary point of view, L. Schmithausen distinguishes three main layers in the Yogācārabhūmi:

> 1) portions – probably the oldest layer(s) – not containing any reference to ālayavijñāna: parts of the Basic Section, esp. the Śrāvakabhūmi and the Bodhisattvabhūmi, and the Vastusaṅgrahaṇī; 2) the rest of the Basic Section, with sporadic occurrences of ālayavijñāna but no reference to the Sandhinirmocana sūtra; 3) the Viniścayasaṅgrahaṇī containing a detailed treatment of ālayavijñāna and at the same time quoting and making use of the Sandhinirmocana sūtra. (Schmithausen, vol. I, 1987, 14)

The gradual elaboration of the ālayavijñāna in the Yogācārabhūmi is to be seen as genetically and doctrinally independent of Mahāyāna and vijñaptimātratā (mind-only; Schmithausen, vol. I, 1987, 33), a notion that only occurs in the quotation of the Sandhinirmocanasūtra (8.7–9; see Lamotte, 1935) in the Viniścayasaṃgrahaṇī, expression of the vijñaptimātratā 1984, 455; vol. I, 1987, 88–89). As Yogācāra doctrines, such as the (character[istic]s) or svabhāvas phenomena, the Buddha's not pe nirvāṇa and his three bodies (body of magic transformation, and enjoy the notion of false imagination (a they are nowhere to be found in the (see Schmithausen, 1969a, 820–82 2006, 175). As F. Deleanu (vol. also Buescher, 2008, 202) puts it, "p is the formation of the Sandhinirm marks the actual birth of the Yogāc as a distinct Mahāyāna school." In a Prajñāpāramitā stance, the Sandh (7.30) presents itself as a third turni cakra surpassing the dispensation truths and the revelation of emptin vol. I, 2006, 175).

---

The chronology of the Yogācār cult point (see Delhey, vol. I, 2009 its terminus post quem correspon century CE works such as those o Saṅgharakṣa, the terminus ante q its parts would be Dharmakṣema' translation of the Bodhisattvabh Delhey, 2013, 524n130), whose references suggest that several ad the Yogācārabhūmi were already ex F. Deleanu (vol. I, 2006, 155, 195) phases in the compilation of the Y

1. the formation of the Śrāvaka
2. the formation of the Bodhis 300?);
3. the formation of the rest of
   of the Vyākhyāsaṃgraha Paryāyasaṃgrahaṇī (270–34
4. the formation of the Sand (300–350?);
5. the formation of the ear Viniścayasaṃgrahaṇī (320–
6. the citation of the Sandhin the Viniścayasaṃgrahaṇī, th the late parts of the Viniścaya the final redaction of the entir (350–380?), a process in wh have taken part. (Deleanu, 195).

The Yogācārabhūmi has been m numerous Indic commentaries (s odhisattvabhūmi, the whole basic yānist orientation. As for the four ey are essentially Śrāvakayānist for the Sandhinirmocanasūtra, ely in the Viniścayasaṃgrahaṇī , 535–538), and for the rest of the iviniścaya. As F. Deleanu puts it, > ūmi became a fundamental trea> dia's major Mahāyāna traditions > act that a large part of it contains > no teachings peculiar to the Great > u, vol. I, 2006, 182) āyānist parts, the Yogācārabhūmi ts misconceptions of emptiness close to the Prajñāpāramitā if not aka (see Seyfort Ruegg, 1969, 322– I, 2006, 162–163; 170–171; Buescher, macrostructure is reflected in fications of the Yogācārabhūmi na work. Thus according to the haṇī (T. 1579, 654b3–6; D Zhi b6), the Abhidharma piṭaka (basā [matrix] in a Mūlasarvāstivāda nsists of 17 levels and four col-words, the Yogācārabhūmi is an

rix. The Yogācārabhūmi has also s an Abhidharma piṭaka revealed ey, vol. I, 2009, 3n3; Delhey, 2013, inal and literary point of view, distinguishes three main layers in mi:

> robably the oldest layer(s) – not > reference to ālayavijñāna: parts > tion, esp. the Śrāvakabhūmi and > bhūmi, and the Vastusaṅgrahaṇī; > Basic Section, with sporadic occur> vijñāna but no reference to the > a sūtra; 3) the Viniścaya- > ntaining a detailed treatment > and at the same time quoting > e of the Sandhinirmocana sūtra. > vol. I, 1987, 14)

boration of the ālayavijñāna in mi is to be seen as genetically independent of Mahāyāna and mind-only; Schmithausen, vol. I, that only occurs in the quotation nocanasūtra (8.7–9; see Lamotte, 1935) in the Viniścayasaṃgrahaṇī, the first literary expression of the vijñaptimātratā (Schmithausen, 1984, 455; vol. I, 1987, 88–89). As for well-known Yogācāra doctrines, such as the three lakṣaṇas (character[istic]s) or svabhāvas (natures) of all phenomena, the Buddha's not permanently fixed nirvāṇa and his three bodies (body of the law, body of magic transformation, and enjoyment body), and the notion of false imagination (abhūtaparikalpa), they are nowhere to be found in the Yogācārabhūmi (see Schmithausen, 1969a, 820–821; Deleanu, vol. I, 2006, 175). As F. Deleanu (vol. I, 2006, 172; see also Buescher, 2008, 202) puts it, "philosophically, it is the formation of the Sandhinirmocanasūtra that marks the actual birth of the Yogācāra-Vijñānavāda as a distinct Mahāyāna school." In a vehemently anti-Prajñāpāramitā stance, the Sandhinirmocanasūtra (7.30) presents itself as a third turning of the dharmacakra surpassing the dispensation of the four nobles' truths and the revelation of emptiness (see Deleanu, vol. I, 2006, 175).

The chronology of the Yogācārabhūmi is a difficult point (see Delhey, vol. I, 2009, 10–13). Whereas its terminus post quem corresponds to 1st- to 2nd-century CE works such as those of Aśvaghoṣa and Saṅgharakṣa, the terminus ante quem for most of its parts would be Dharmakṣema's 418 CE Chinese translation of the Bodhisattvabhūmi (T. 1581; see Delhey, 2013, 524n130), whose numerous cross-references suggest that several additional parts of the Yogācārabhūmi were already extant by that time. F. Deleanu (vol. I, 2006, 155, 195) distinguishes six phases in the compilation of the Yogācārabhūmi:

> 1. the formation of the Śrāvakabhūmi (200–270?);
> 2. the formation of the Bodhisattvabhūmi (230–300?);
> 3. the formation of the rest of the Maulī Bhūmi, of the Vyākhyāsaṃgrahaṇī, and of the Paryāyasaṃgrahaṇī (270–340?);
> 4. the formation of the Sandhinirmocanasūtra (300–350?);
> 5. the formation of the early parts of the Viniścayasaṃgrahaṇī (320–350?);
> 6. the citation of the Sandhinirmocanasūtra in the Viniścayasaṃgrahaṇī, the compilation of the late parts of the Viniścayasaṃgrahaṇī, and the final redaction of the entire Yogācārabhūmi (350–380?), a process in which Asaṅga could have taken part. (Deleanu, vol. I, 2006, 155, 195).

The Yogācārabhūmi has been made the object of numerous Indic commentaries (see Deleanu, vol. I, 2006, 248–251). Some have been preserved in Tibetan translation:

- the incomplete and anonymous (or Jinaputra's?) Yogācārabhūmivyākhyā* (D 4043/P 5544);
- Guṇaprabha's Bodhisattvabhūmivṛtti* (D 4044/P 5545; 5th cent. CE?) on parts of the Bodhisattvabhūmi and his Bodhisattvaśīlaparivartabhāṣya* (D 4045/P 5546) on the Śīlapaṭala;
- Jinaputra's Bodhisattvaśīlaparivartaṭīkā* (D 4046/P 5547), a subcommentary on the Śīlapaṭala; and
- Sāgaramegha's Yogācārabhūmau Bodhisattvabhūmivyākhyā (D 4047/P 5548; c. 750–800?).

Other exegetical works are alluded to or partly preserved in Chinese materials:

- Nanda's Yogācārabhūmivyākhyā* (c. 500?) and
- the commentaries by alleged disciples of Dharmapāla (530–561?), namely Viśeṣamitra, Jñānacandra, and Jinaputra (e.g. Yogācārabhūmivyākhyā*, of which Xuanzang translated the introductory part [T. 1580; 瑜伽師地論釋]).

As pointed out by L. Schmithausen (1969a, 821–822, 822n48), all the works belonging to the "Maitreya-Asaṅga complex" – the next layer of Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda literature – depend on the Yogācārabhūmi, but no influence of either of these works on the Yogācārabhūmi can be convincingly argued for. The authorship of five of these works is one of the most vexed problems of modern Buddhist scholarship (see Ui, 1929; Frauwallner, 1952; Demiéville, 1954, 380n4; Frauwallner, 1956, 255–258, 296–309; Seyfort Ruegg, 1969, 39–55; May, 1971, 281–293). In a nutshell, ubiquitous Indian and Tibetan traditions ascribe a group of five works to Maitreya:

1. Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkāra (T. 1604; D 4020/P 5521; see Lévi, 1907; 1911; Jamspal et al., 2004);
2. Madhyāntavibhāga (T. 1601; D 4021/P 5522; see Nagao, 1964; Frauwallner, 1956, 320–326; D'Amato 2012);
3. Dharmadharmatā(pra)vibhāga (D 4022, 4023/P 5523, 5524; see Mathes, 1996, 61–67, 99–103, 104–114; Nozawa, 1955);
4. Abhisamayālaṃkāra; and
5. Uttaratantra (= Ratnagotravibhāga; T. 1611; D 4024/P 5525; see Johnston, 1991; Obermiller, 1991, 96–111; Frauwallner, 1956, 255–264; Takasaki, 1966; Seyfort Ruegg, 1969).

According to these traditions, Asaṅga redacted these five works under the direct inspiration of the bodhisattva Maitreya residing in the Tuṣita heaven. Following H. Ui, E. Frauwallner regards Maitreya(nātha) as the name of Asaṅga's historical rather than celestial teacher. He also ascribes, in accordance with East Asian traditions, the Ratnagotravibhāga not to Maitreya but to Sāramati (c. 250?; see Lamotte, 1987, 92, 93n2; Silk, forthcoming), the alleged author of the Dharmadhātvaviśeṣatāśāstra (T. 1626, 1627; 大乘法界無差別論) and the Mahāyānāvatāraśāstra* (T. 1634; 入大乘論).

The Ratnagotravibhāga, one of the most authoritative sources of tathāgatagarbha ideas, likely had a strong impact on Maitreya's three genuinely Yogācāra works. In the Ratnagotravibhāga, Sāramati/Maitreya "professes a monistically coloured form of Buddhism in which the immaculate and radiant thought becomes a supreme entity" (Lamotte, 1987, 92n2). This doctrine foreshadows the pseudo-Aśvaghoṣa's (Mahāyānaśraddhotpāda; T. 1666, 1667; 大乘起信論; see Hakeda, 1967), "a Chinese apocryphon composed perhaps around the mid-6th century CE and presenting an ingenious … synthesis of the main Mahāyānistic theses that had reached China by that time" (May, 1971, 284–285).

The Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkāra comprises 21 chapters, of which the doctrinally most attractive are chapter 1 (apology of the Mahāyāna; see Nōnin et al., 2009), chapter 9 (buddha nature), and chapter 18 (systematic demonstrations of momentariness and selflessness; see Eltschinger, 2010b). As a whole, the Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkāra is "an exposition of Yogācāra theories in connection with the religious practice and conduct of the Bodhisattva" (Obermiller, 1931, 86). Maitreya equates his positive, all-pervading absolute with the naturally immaculate and radiant mind whose impurities are strictly adventitious. Inasmuch as it consists in mind, this supreme entity resides in all beings as a seed or element out of which appears false imagination (viewed as the dependent nature). False imagination is the origin of the phenomenal world characterized by subject-object duality – here identified with the imagined nature. In Maitreya's system, the perfect nature refers to the purified mind. In a Vedānta-like manner, this purified absolute is equated with the supreme self (paramātman). The Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkāra has been commented on in the following:

- Vasubandhu's Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkārabhāṣya (T. 1604; D 4026/P 5527; see Lévi, 1907; see Nōnin et al., 2009; 2013); Sthiramati (510–570?) wrote a massive subcommentary, the Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkāravṛttibhāṣya (D 4034/P 5531; see Hayashima, 1977–1983), and Vairocanarakṣita (11th–12th cent.?) wrote a cursory gloss, the Sūtrālaṃkāravivṛti* (see Kano, 2008, 343);
- *Asvabhāva's Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkāraṭīkā (D 4029/P 5530; early 6th cent. CE?);
- Parahitabhadra's Sūtrālaṃkārādiślokadvayavyākhyāna (D 4030/P 5532; 11th cent. CE?); and
- Jñānaśrīmitra's Sūtrālaṃkārapiṇḍārtha (D 4031/P 5533; early 11th cent. CE?).

The Madhyāntavibhāga "contains an idealistic interpretation of the doctrine of the middle way … and of the doctrine of emptiness" (May, 1971, 289; see Frauwallner, 1956, 320–326). This interpretation likely derives from the Bodhisattvabhūmi and appears to be intended as a critique of Mādhyamika views on the subject. The treatise has been commented on by Vasubandhu in his Madhyāntavibhāgabhāṣya (T. 1599, 1600; D 4027/P 5528; see Nagao, 1964), and Vasubandhu's explanations have been in turn expanded on by Sthiramati in his Madhyāntavibhāgaṭīkā (D 4032/P 5534; see Yamaguchi, 1934). Both commentaries have been glossed by Vairocanarakṣita in his Madhyāntavibhāgakatipayapadavivṛti (see Kano, 2008, 343).

The Dharmadharmatā(pra)vibhāga consists of two parts. The treatise first demonstrates the nonexistence of external phenomena by reducing them to false imagination, inasmuch as they entail a subject-object duality and are nothing but appearances that conform to language. Its second part teaches that the path of nonconceptual insight results in one's identification with the nondual and inexpressible true nature (dharmatā) of phenomena, namely the immaculate thusness (tathatā). It has been commented on by Vasubandhu in his Dharmadharmatāvibhāgavṛtti (D 4028/P 5529; see Mathes, 1996) and, together with Vasubandhu's gloss, by Vairocanarakṣita in his Dharmadharmatāvibhāgavivṛti (see Kano, 2008, 358–373).

Asaṅga (315–390 CE in Frauwallner, 1956, 326 but 330–405 CE in Deleanu, vol. I, 2006, 196; 244n266) contributed decisively to the dogmatic systematization of Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda (see Frauwallner, 1956, 326–350; May, 1971, 289–293). He achieved this by accommodating "idealistic" doctrines to traditional Śrāvakayāna dogmatics and by integrating the "old scholastics of liberation" (Frauwallner, 1956, 327) into this new doctrinal framework. If this tendency toward the "appropriation of the conceptual world of Hīnayāna dogmatics" (Frauwallner, 1956, 328) can be said to permeate most of Asaṅga's literary output, his works nevertheless betray significant differences in terms of confessional o authored the following:

---

1. the Abhidharmasamuccaya (T.
P 5550; see Gokhale, 1947; Pradhan, 19

2. the Mahāyānasaṃgraha (T. 1592
P 5549; see Lamotte, 1973); and

3. the Āryadeśanāvikhyāpanaśās* 揚聖教論; see Schmithausen, vol. II, von Rospatt, 1995, 219–251; Potter, 199
The Abhidharmasamuccaya is a work the standpoint of traditional reali ontology" (Schmithausen, 1972, 15 typically idealist notions such as or vijñaptimātra(tā) do not occur. T the three natures is interpreted agai Śrāvakayānist background of the self person. Whereas the dependent nat the constituents (skandha), sensory b and elements (dhātu), the imagine sists in the superimposition of a sel the perfect nature in their very se Abhidharmasamuccaya has been con
*Jinaputra(?) in his Abhidharmasam (D 4053/P 5554; see Tatia, 1976; 1969b, 101ny; de Jong, 1973, 340–341 be the same as the Abhidharmasam ascribed to Sthiramati (T. 1606; D 40

The Mahāyānasaṃgraha (T. 1592
P 5549; see Lamotte, 1973) is fairly dif Abhidharmasamuccaya. It presents i ogy for the Mahāyāna, whose ten su regard to the Śrāvakayāna coincide w logical, ontological, and soteriologi Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda:

1. store consciousness (ālayavijñ
2. three natures (svabhāvatraya
3. mind-only (vijñaptimātratā);
4. the perfections (pāramitā);
5. the stages (bhūmi);
6. the discipline (saṃvara) of th
7. the specific concentrations ( bodhisattva;
8. nonconceptual (nirvikalpaka
9. unfixed (apratiṣṭhita) nirvāṇa
10. the three Buddha-bodies (kāy

According to J.W. de Jong,

> whereas the Mahāyānasaṅgraha is a > of the specifically Mahāyānistic d > Yogācāra school, the Abhidharmas > systematic guide of the Abhidhar > said school's doctrinal system (de J ss, the Sūtrālaṃkāravivṛti* (see ahāyānasūtrālaṃkāraṭīkā (D 4029/nt. CE?);

a's Sūtrālaṃkārādiślokadvaya- /P 5532; 11th cent. CE?); and s Sūtrālaṃkārapiṇḍārtha (D 4031/
nt. CE?).
vibhāga "contains an idealisof the doctrine of the middle octrine of emptiness" (May, 1971, er, 1956, 320–326). This interpres from the Bodhisattvabhūmi and ded as a critique of Mādhyamika ect. The treatise has been comsubandhu in his Madhyānta- 1599, 1600; D 4027/P 5528; see asubandhu's explanations have nded on by Sthiramati in his ṭīkā (D 4032/P 5534; see Yamaommentaries have been glossed ta in his Madhyāntavibhāga- (see Kano, 2008, 343). harmatā(pra)vibhāga consists treatise first demonstrates the xternal phenomena by reducimagination, inasmuch as they ject duality and are nothing but onform to language. Its second e path of nonconceptual insight ntification with the nondual and nature (dharmatā) of phenom-immaculate thusness (tathatā). ented on by Vasubandhu in his ibhāgavṛtti (D 4028/P 5529; see l, together with Vasubandhu's rakṣita in his Dharmadharmatā- ano, 2008, 358–373).
CE in Frauwallner, 1956, 326 but eanu, vol. I, 2006, 196; 244n266) vely to the dogmatic systemati-/Vijñānavāda (see Frauwallner, , 1971, 289–293). He achieved this g "idealistic" doctrines to tradi-dogmatics and by integrating of liberation" (Frauwallner, 1956, doctrinal framework. If this ten-appropriation of the conceptual dogmatics" (Frauwallner, 1956, permeate most of Asaṅga's liters nevertheless betray significant differences in terms of confessional orientation. He authored the following:

1. the Abhidharmasamuccaya (T. 1605; D 4049/P 5550; see Gokhale, 1947; Pradhan, 1950);
2. the Mahāyānasaṃgraha (T. 1592–1594; D 4048/P 5549; see Lamotte, 1973); and
3. the Āryadeśanāvikhyāpanaśāstra* (T. 1602; 顯揚聖教論; see Schmithausen, vol. II, 1987, 261n99; von Rospatt, 1995, 219–251; Potter, 1999, 433).

The Abhidharmasamuccaya is a work "written from the standpoint of traditional realistic Hīnayāna ontology" (Schmithausen, 1972, 158), in which typically idealist notions such as cittamātra(tā) or vijñaptimātra(tā) do not occur. The doctrine of the three natures is interpreted against the purely Śrāvakayānist background of the selflessness of the person. Whereas the dependent nature consists of the constituents (skandha), sensory bases (āyatana), and elements (dhātu), the imagined nature consists in the superimposition of a self on them and the perfect nature in their very selflessness. The Abhidharmasamuccaya has been commented on by *Jinaputra(?) in his Abhidharmasamuccayabhāṣya (D 4053/P 5554; see Tatia, 1976; Schmithausen, 1969b, 101ny; de Jong, 1973, 340–341), which might be the same as the Abhidharmasamuccayavyākhyā ascribed to Sthiramati (T. 1606; D 4054/P 5555).

The Mahāyānasaṃgraha (T. 1592–1594; D 4048/P 5549; see Lamotte, 1973) is fairly different from the Abhidharmasamuccaya. It presents itself as an apology for the Mahāyāna, whose ten superiorities with regard to the Śrāvakayāna coincide with the gnoseological, ontological, and soteriological program of Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda:

1. store consciousness (ālayavijñāna);
2. three natures (svabhāvatraya);
3. mind-only (vijñaptimātratā);
4. the perfections (pāramitā);
5. the stages (bhūmi);
6. the discipline (saṃvara) of the bodhisattva;
7. the specific concentrations (samādhi) of the bodhisattva;
8. nonconceptual (nirvikalpaka) knowledge;
9. unfixed (apratiṣṭhita) nirvāṇa; and
10. the three Buddha-bodies (kāya).

According to J.W. de Jong,

> whereas the Mahāyānasaṅgraha is a compendium of the specifically Mahāyānistic doctrines of the Yogācāra school, the Abhidharmasamuccaya is a systematic guide of the Abhidharma part of the said school's doctrinal system (de Jong, 1973, 339)

The Mahāyānasaṃgraha has been commented on by Vasubandhu in his Mahāyānasaṃgrahabhāṣya (T. 1595–1597; D 4050/P 5551) and by *Asvabhāva in his Mahāyānasaṃgrahopanibandhana (T. 1598; D 4051/P 5552).

E. Frauwallner characterizes the Āryadeśanāvikhyāpanaśāstra* (T. 1602; 顯揚聖教論; see Schmithausen, vol. II, 1987, 261n99; von Rospatt, 1995, 219–251; Potter, 1999, 433) as "a systematic summary of the doctrines of the bulky Yogācārabhūmiśāstram" (1956, 327–328).

The next decisive figure for Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda is Vasubandhu, whose name is associated with innumerable works on topics ranging from tathāgatagarbha to Vaibhāṣika and from Sukhāvatī to Yogācāra (see Nakamura, 1980, 268–273; Mejor, 1991, 7–13). E. Frauwallner (1951) notoriously distinguishes two Vasubandhus:

1. Vasubandhu the Elder (320–380 CE), a Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika (referred to as Sthaviravasubandhu or Vṛddhācāryavasubandhu; see Mejor, 1989–1990, 277–281), who, on the inspiration of his (half-)brother Asaṅga, turned to Mahāyāna and composed Yogācāra and Mahāyāna commentaries;
2. Vasubandhu the Younger (400–480 CE), who authored the Abhidharmakośabhāṣya (as a heterodox, Sautrāntika-oriented Vaibhāṣika), the Paramārthasaptatikā, and, later in his life, the Viṃśikā and Triṃśikā.

Many objections have been raised against E. Frauwallner's hypothesis (see Griffiths, 1986, 164–165n9; Skilling, 2000, 29n2; Kritzer, 2005, xxv; Deleanu, vol. I, 2006, 234n205). The chronological gap between the two alleged Vasubandhus has narrowed since L. Schmithausen (1992) demonstrated that the Laṅkāvatārasūtra as translated into Chinese by Guṇabhadra as early as 443 CE presupposes Triṃśikā 20 and 28. Moreover, R. Kritzer (2005) has convincingly shown how deep the Abhidharmakośabhāṣya's indebtedness to the Yogācārabhūmi is, thus suggesting a strong Yogācāra impact already on the young Vasubandhu. The prevailing scholarly consensus concerning the works that can be regarded, mainly because of their "Sautrāntika presuppositions" (Schmithausen, 1967), as authored by Vasubandhu is as follows:

1. the Abhidharmakośabhāṣya;
2. the Vyākhyāyukti (D 4061/P 5562; see Lee, 2001; Cabezon, 1992; Skilling, 2000; Verhagen, 2005; 2008; Horiuchi, 2009; Nance, 2012; commented on in Guṇamati's Vyākhyāyuktiṭīkā; D 4069/P 5570);

3. the Karmasiddhi(prakaraṇa) (T. 1608, 1609; D 4062/P 5563; see Lamotte, 1936; Muroji, 1985);
4. the Pratītyasamutpādavyākhyā;
5. the Pañcaskandhaka (T. 1612; D 4059/P 5560; see Li & Steinkellner 2008; Buescher, 2010);
6. the Viṃśikā (T. 1588–1590; D 4056, 4057/ P 5557, 5558; see Lévi, 1925; Kellner & Taber, forthcoming); and
7. the Triṃśikā (T. 1586; D 4055/P 5556; see Lévi, 1925; Schmithausen, vol. II, 1987, 262, 263n101).

To the above, the lost Paramārthasaptatikā is certainly to be added as well as the Pratītyasamutpādādivibhaṅganirdeśa (D 3995/P 5496; commented on in Guṇamati's Pratītyasamutpādādivibhaṅganirdeśaṭīkā; D 3996/P 5497).

However, Vasubandhu's authorship of the commentaries on the aforementioned Madhyāntavibhāga, Dharmadharmatāvibhāga, Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkāra, and Mahāyānasaṃgraha as well as of the Trisvabhāvanirdeśa (see below) and the Gāthā(rtha)saṃgraha (D 4102, 4103/P 5603, 5604; see Skilling, 2000, 305–307) cannot be categorically dismissed. The issue simply awaits further research. According to F. Deleanu (vol. I, 2006, 187; see also Franco & Preisendanz, 2010, xv–xvii), Vasubandhu's dates are 350–430 CE. The issue of the number of Vasubandhu(s) remains open (see Mejor, 1989–1990; Buescher, 2013).

In his Karmasiddhiprakaraṇa, Vasubandhu explains, against the Vaibhāṣikas and the Āryasāṃmitīyas, psychophysical continuity (memory, karmic retribution, etc.) by resorting to a Sautrāntika version of the ālayavijñāna, its seeds, and the subtle transformation of the series. The work has been commented on by Sumatiśīla (Karmasiddhiṭīkā, D 4071/P 5572; late 8th cent.?).

The Pañcaskandhaka consists of an enumeration of dharmas accompanied by short definitions and "can be roughly characterised as a summary of Abhidharma in accordance with the Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda tradition as was presented by Asaṅga in chapter 1 of his Abhidharmasamuccaya" (Li & Steinkellner, 2008, vii–viii). It has been glossed by Sthiramati (T. 1613; D 4066/P 5567; see Kramer, forthcoming), by Guṇaprabha in his Pañcaskandhavivaraṇa (D 4067/P 5568), and by *Pṛthivībandhu in his Pañcaskandhakabhāṣya (D 4068/P 5569).

The Trisvabhāvanirdeśa (D 4058/P 5559; see La Vallée Poussin, 1932–1933a; Tola & Dragonetti, 1983) explores in 38 verses the respective characteristics, the mutual relationships, and the soteriological (ir)relevance of the three natures, which it compares with a magical elephant (imagined nature, subject-object duality) whose form or appearance (dependent nature, false conception) is created from a piece of wood (perfect nature, thusness) by the force of magic formulas (the root consciousness).

Vasubandhu's most important works are without doubt Viṃśikā (or Viṃśikāvṛtti; on the title, see Kano, 2008, 345, 350) and Triṃśikā (see Frauwallner, 1956, 350–390; May, 1971, 301–318). Rather than positively and systematically expounding Vasubandhu's idealism, the Viṃśikā constitutes a sort of defensive propaedeutic in which Vasubandhu answers Buddhist objections pertaining to the place of the object in cognition and dismisses the Vaiśeṣikas' and the Vaibhāṣikas' atomistic accounts of the external objects. It has been commented on by Dharmapāla (T. 1591; 成唯識寶生論), by Vinītadeva in his Viṃśikāṭīkā (D 4065/P 5566); the root-text together with Vinītadeva's commentary have been commented upon by Vairocanarakṣita in his Viṃśikāṭīkāvivṛti (see Kano, 2008, 348–358).

Unlike the Viṃśikā, the Triṃśikā provides a systematic account of mature Buddhist idealism. In an Abhidharma-like manner, Vasubandhu describes the store consciousness, the defiled mind, and all the concomitant factors including defilements; he further discusses the three natures before concluding with soteriology. Only two Indic commentaries of the Triṃśikā have been preserved: Sthiramati's Triṃśikābhāṣya (D 4064/P 5565; see Buescher, 2007) and Vinītadeva's Triṃśikāṭīkā (D 4070/P 5571; see Jaini, 1985). Both commentaries have received cursory explanations by Vairocanarakṣita in his Triṃśikāṭīkāvivṛti (see Kano, 2008, 343). But as Xuanzang's famous, and in China hugely influential, commentary on the Triṃśikā (T. 1585; 成唯識論; see La Vallée Poussin, 1928–1929; Wei, 1973) makes clear by quoting and discussing the views of the ten scholars Bandhuśrī, Citrabhānu, Guṇamati, Sthiramati, Nanda, Śuddhacandra, Dharmapāla, Viśeṣamitra, Jinaputra, and Jñānacandra (see Lévi, 1932, 18–22; Dignāga should be added), Vasubandhu's treatise had been the focus of intensive exegetical activity by mid-7th century CE. Its proper interpretation was at stake during the 6th-century debate between the Nālandā-based Dharmapāla and the Valabhi scholar Sthiramati (see Frauwallner, 1956, 394–407; May, 1971, 298–299).

Epistemological Literature

The philosophical tradition known as "Buddhist (logic and) epistemology" has close connections with

---

Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda. Dignāga's Has
and Ālambanaparīkṣā demonstra of the phenomenal world. His Pra had a strong impact on Yogāc thinkers such as Sthiramati, Dharm zang. The "perception" sections Pramāṇavārttika and Pramāṇa idealistic conclusions from the ap realism. Chapter 23 of Śāntarakṣita's Tattvasaṃgraha(pañjikā) neutrali demonstration of the existence of Śaṅkaranandana's Prajñālaṃkāra at demonstrating mind only (see 391; Eltschinger, forthcoming a), Advaitabinduprakaraṇa (Thakur, 1 on the identity between cognition same author's Bhedābhedaparīkṣ and finally Ratnākaraśānti's Vijña (D 4259/P 5756; see Umino & Kelsa known but likely belong to the sam

This inclination is also evidence these authors developed new argu mind only, among which the so-call niyama (the necessary coperceptio and the cognition]), shaped first by later defended in Prajñākaragupta niyamasiddhi (D 4255/P 5753; see Jitāri's Sahopalambhaprakaraṇa (s Much, 1995, 89), among others. Mo earliest works exhibit doctrina Maitreyan idealism (see below).

However, the epistemologists' ism are far from homogeneous. A forward different types of philoso (see Arnold, 2008; Ratié, forth philosophers disagree on the is some accepting the existence of Dharmakīrti in his Santānāntara the level of ordinary existence) ing it (e.g. Ratnakīrti in his San see Thakur, 1975; Kajiyama, 1965b 159, 223–230). Furthermore, note defend the existence of the exter several authors acknowledge ide sionally true account of conven adopt the Madhyamaka as their ul (see below). In his Sugatamat (D 3900/P 5868; see Shirasaki, even attempted to interpret Mādhyamika (see Seyfort Ruegg kellner, 1990). This should dissua standing Buddhist epistemology as further qualification.

whose form or appearance (depenlse conception) is created from a erfect nature, thusness) by the force as (the root consciousness).
s most important works are with-ikā (or Viṃśikāvṛtti; on the title, see 350) and Triṃśikā (see Frauwallner, Iay, 1971, 301–318). Rather than posi-natically expounding Vasubandhu's iṃśikā constitutes a sort of defen-tic in which Vasubandhu answers ions pertaining to the place of the tion and dismisses the Vaiśeṣikas' āṣikas' atomistic accounts of the s. It has been commented on by 1591; 成唯識寶生論), by Vinītadeva ikā (D 4065/P 5566); the root-text Vinītadeva's commentary have ed upon by Vairocanarakṣita in his i (see Kano, 2008, 348–358). iṃśikā, the Triṃśikā provides a sys-of mature Buddhist idealism. In an e manner, Vasubandhu describes iousness, the defiled mind, and all t factors including defilements; he s the three natures before concludlogy. Only two Indic commentaries have been preserved: Sthiramati's (D 4064/P 5565; see Buescher, 2007)
's Triṃśikāṭīkā (D 4070/P 5571; see oth commentaries have received ations by Vairocanarakṣita in his ti (see Kano, 2008, 343). But as ous, and in China hugely influential, n the Triṃśikā (T. 1585; 成唯識論; ussin, 1928–1929; Wei, 1973) makes g and discussing the views of the Bandhuśrī, Citrabhānu, Guṇamati, nda, Śuddhacandra, Dharmapāla, aputra, and Jñānacandra (see Lévi, āga should be added), Vasubandhu's en the focus of intensive exegetical 7th century CE. Its proper interpreake during the 6th-century debate ālandā-based Dharmapāla and the Sthiramati (see Frauwallner, 1956, 971, 298–299).

gical Literature

cal tradition known as "Buddhist emology" has close connections with

Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda. Dignāga's Hastavālaprakaraṇa and Ālambanaparīkṣā demonstrate the unreality of the phenomenal world. His Pramāṇasamuccaya had a strong impact on Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda thinkers such as Sthiramati, Dharmapāla, and Xuanzang. The "perception" sections of Dharmakīrti's Pramāṇavārttika and Pramāṇaviniścaya draw idealistic conclusions from the apories of external realism. Chapter 23 of Śāntarakṣita's and Kamalaśīla's Tattvasaṃgraha(pañjikā) neutralizes Śubhagupta's demonstration of the existence of external objects. Śaṅkaranandana's Prajñālaṃkāra, a work aimed at demonstrating mind only (see Ratié, 2011, 390–391; Eltschinger, forthcoming a), Jñānaśrīmitra's Advaitabinduprakaraṇa (Thakur, 1959), which bears on the identity between cognition and its object, the same author's Bhedābhedaparīkṣā (Thakur, 1959), and finally Ratnākaraśānti's Vijñaptimātratāsiddhi (D 4259/P 5756; see Umino & Kelsang, 1982) are little known but likely belong to the same broad category.

This inclination is also evidenced by the fact that these authors developed new arguments in favor of mind only, among which the so-called sahopalambhaniyama (the necessary coperception [of the object and the cognition]), shaped first by Dharmakīrti and later defended in Prajñākaragupta's Sahopalambhaniyamasiddhi (D 4255/P 5753; see Iwata, 1991) and Jitāri's Sahopalambhaprakaraṇa (see Steinkellner & Much, 1995, 89), among others. Moreover, Dignāga's earliest works exhibit doctrinal affinities with Maitreyan idealism (see below).

However, the epistemologists' accounts of idealism are far from homogeneous. Apart from putting forward different types of philosophical arguments (see Arnold, 2008; Ratié, forthcoming a), these philosophers disagree on the issue of solipsism, some accepting the existence of other minds (e.g. Dharmakīrti in his Santānāntarasiddhi, at least on the level of ordinary existence) and others rejecting it (e.g. Ratnakīrti in his Santānāntaradūṣaṇa; see Thakur, 1975; Kajiyama, 1965b; Wood, 1991, 149–159, 223–230). Furthermore, noted epistemologists defend the existence of the external world. Finally, several authors acknowledge idealism as a provisionally true account of conventional reality but adopt the Madhyamaka as their ultimate standpoint (see below). In his Sugatamatavibhaṅgabhāṣya (D 3900/P 5868; see Shirasaki, 1984–1987), Jitāri even attempted to interpret Dharmakīrti as a Mādhyamika (see Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 100; Steinkellner, 1990). This should dissuade us from understanding Buddhist epistemology as a "school" without further qualification.

This tradition is a school neither in the sense that its representatives would share definite metaphysical and/or practical commitments nor in the sense that they would exhibit institutional and/or sectarian unity. Buddhist logic is a school in the looser sense of an intellectual tradition applying a(n apparently) consensual methodology to a set of problems that it partly shares with its opponents (not only the orthodox Brahmanical systems of Mīmāṃsā, Nyāya, and Vyākaraṇa but also Sāṃkhya, Śaivism, Vaiṣṇavism, materialism, and Jainism), and this with a view to defend the rationality of Buddhism as a salvational system.

Besides a common reliance on the Abhidharmakośabhāṣya's account of Buddhist dogmatics, epistemologists take the works of Dignāga and Dharmakīrti as a canon, the conformity to which is the stake of internal controversies. In its polemical spirit and targets, Buddhist epistemological literature is reminiscent of the following:

- Aśvaghoṣa's Buddhacarita (against the self [chs. 12, 16; see Eltschinger, 2013] and against god, nature, or time as ultimate principles [ch. 17]);
- Āryadeva's Catuḥśataka (see above);
- the Yogācārabhūmi's critique of the allodoxia (paravāda; see Eltschinger, forthcoming b);
- Vasubandhu's lost Paramārthasaptatikā (against the Sāṃkhya teacher Vindhyavāsin; see Eltschinger & Ratié, 2013, 159); and
- the end of Abhidharmakośabhāṣya's chapter 9.

The origin of Buddhist epistemology is to be sought in the so-called Buddhist dialectical tradition (vāda and hetuvidyā; see Kang, 2003, 10–16). Like its non-Buddhist counterpart (e.g. Nyāyasūtra, books 1 and 5, Carakasaṃhitā Vimānasthāna 8.15–66; see Frauwallner, 1984; Preisendanz, 2000; Kang, 2003), this tradition concerned itself with enumerating and discussing eristic-dialectical items (e.g. types of logical fallacies, false objections, points of defeat, means of valid cognition [pramāṇa]), namely all that a monk or a bodhisattva was to master before engaging in scholarly disputation or catechetic/didactic dialogue. Important remnants of this tradition have come down to us in works such as the following:

- the Upāyahṛdaya* (also known as Prayogasāra*; T. 1632; 方便心論; see Tucci, 1929b; Kajiyama, 1991; Gillon & Katsura, forthcoming);
- the so-called Spitzer Manuscript (see Franco, 2004);
- chapter 10 of the Sandhinirmocanasūtra (see Kajiyama, 1984; Yoshimizu, 1996; 2010);

- the Hetuvidyā section of the Yogācārabhūmi (D 4035, Tshi 187a7ff./P 5536, Dzi 214b6ff.; see Yaita, 2005; Wayman, 1958; Eltschinger, 2012, 456–466);
- the pseudo-Nāgārjuna's Vaidalyaprakaraṇa (see above);
- parts of Asaṅga's Abhidharmasamuccaya (Sāṅkathyaviniścaya section; see Schmithausen, 1972; Todeschini, 2011; Eltschinger, 2012, 456–466);
- the Tarkaśāstra* (T. 1633; 如實論; see Tucci, 1929b; Frauwallner, 1957) and the dialectical treatises ascribed to Vasubandhu: the Vādavidhi, the Vādavidhāna, and the Vādasāra*, all of which are lost (see Frauwallner, 1933; 1957).

Dignāga's Nyāyamukha, whose structure is borrowed from the Vādavidhi's, is to be counted as a dialectical rather than an epistemological work.

Dignāga (480–540 CE; or a few decades earlier?) is credited with the dialectical tradition's logico-epistemological turn. The turn toward logic was made possible by Dignāga's "discovery" of the wheel of logical reasons (hetucakra), a theoretical device displaying the (types of) acceptability or unacceptability of any given reason. Dignāga's theorem drew on an earlier doctrine, the trairūpya (the three properties [of a logical reason]), aimed at defining the necessary requirements of an acceptable reason (see Frauwallner, 1959, 85–91; Hattori, 1968, 4n22). Dignāga's new ideas found expression in a short tract entitled Hetucakraḍamaru (D 4209/P 5708; D–/P 5708; see Frauwallner, 1959) and later in the Nyāyamukha and the Pramāṇasamuccaya. This tradition's epistemological turn was due to Dignāga's new focus on the means of valid cognition, likely inspired by recent developments within the Sāṃkhya system (see Frauwallner, 1958; 1959, 96–98). Dignāga's account remained the standard hetuvidyā system in Buddhist educational centers such as Nālandā until the 7th century (see Takakusu, 1896, 186–187).

While describing Buddhist learning in Nālandā, Yijing (義淨; 635–713 CE) provides a list of eight works by Dignāga (see Frauwallner, 1959, 139; Hattori, 1968, 10n57; on Dignāga's writings, see Frauwallner, 1959; Hattori, 1968, 1–11; Steinkellner & Much, 1995, 1–15):

1. the Traikālyaparīkṣā (D 4207/P 5705; see Frauwallner, 1959);
2. the Sāmānyalakṣaṇaparīkṣā* (T. 1623; 觀總相論頌);
3. the Ālambanaparīkṣā(vṛtti) (T. 1619, 1624; D 4205–4206/P 5703–5704; see Frauwallner, 1930; 1959, 130–132; Yamaguchi, 1929; Tola & Dragonetti, 1982);
4. the Hetumukha (nonextant);
5. the Hetvābhāsamukha* (nonextant);
6. the Nyāyamukha (T. 1628, 1629; 因明正理門論; see Tucci, 1930; Frauwallner, 1959, 91–96; Katsura, 1977–1987);
7. the Upādāyaprajñaptiprakaraṇa* (T. 1622; 取因假設論; see Kitagawa, 1952; Frauwallner, 1959, 121–126; Hattori, 1977); and
8. the Pramāṇasamuccaya(vṛtti) (D 4203/P–; D 4204/P 5701 [i.e. Vasudhararakṣita's translation]; D–/P 5700; D–/P 5702 [i.e. Kanakavarman's translation]; see Steinkellner, 2005; Lasic, forthcoming; Katsura et al., forthcoming; Pind, forthcoming; see Hattori, 1968; Kitagawa, 1973; Steinkellner & Much, 1995, 8–15).

The Traikālyaparīkṣā, one of Dignāga's earlier works, is nothing but an excerpt from the Sambandhasamuddeśa (vv. 53–85) of Bhartṛhari's Vākyapadīya (early 5th cent. CE?) meant to demonstrate, via slight lexical changes (and the lost autocommentary?), the potencies of the Yogācāra mind instead of those of Bhartṛhari's śabdabrahman (word absolute).

The Sāmānyalakṣaṇaparīkṣā* consists of a critical examination of realist accounts of universals.

In the lost Hetumukha, Dignāga developed – in order to solve problems pertaining to inference – the theory of language and concepts that would become the subject matter of chapter 5 of Pramāṇasamuccaya, dedicated to the theory of conceptual exclusion (apoha; see Frauwallner, 1959, 98–104; Hattori, 1982; Hayes, 1988; Pind, forthcoming).

The lost Hetvābhāsamukha* likely consisted of a monograph on fallacious logical reasons.

Dignāga's most influential work is his later Pramāṇasamuccaya(vṛtti). It consists of six chapters dedicated to the following:

1. perception (pratyakṣa);
2. private inferential judgement (svārthānumāna);
3. proof (parārthānumāna);
4. example (dṛṣṭānta);
5. conceptual/verbal exclusion (apoha); and
6. false objections (jāti).

Each chapter is divided into an exposition of Dignāga's own opinion and a critical examination of his opponents' views. Dignāga's adversaries are not only early representatives of the Sāṃkhya,

---

Nyāya, Vaiśeṣika, and Mīmāṃsā sc coreligionists such as Vasubandhu his Vādavidhi). According to Dignā Frauwallner, 1959, 84nn4–7; Hattori, Pramāṇasamuccaya summarizes cal tracts that he composed ag (Sāṃkhyaparīkṣā*), Vaiśeṣika (Va* and Nyāya (Nyāyaparīkṣā; see Much

Prior to his interest in logic an knowledge, Dignāga had authored st commentaries (see Hattori, 1968, lower of Maitreya(nātha), he de to Prajñāpāramitā exegetics in the P piṇḍārthasaṃgraha (T. 1518; D 38 Tucci, 1947; Frauwallner, 1959) an of vision and cultivation of nondu monograph on yoga, the Yogāvatāra see Frauwallner, 1959). Later, Dign Vasubandhu's Sautrāntika ideas, tur lem of the (non)existence of the ext the impossibility of extranoetic ob lowing works:

1. the Hastavālaprakaraṇa (T. 16 3849/P 5248, 5249; see Frauwallner he attempted to show, with the Viṃ atomism, that the phenomenal wo as a designation;

2. the Upādāyaprajñaptipraka* Dignāga demonstrated that comp not exist since they are neither the ferent from their parts and merely dent designations (upādāyaprajña

3. the Ālambanaparīkṣā(vṛtti), i critically examined the concept cognition by assigning it two n tions: (1) to be the cause of th
(2) to be isomorphic with it; atoms the first condition but not the sec gate wholes satisfy the second but consequence, the object is nothin ance of an object in cognition itsel

Dignāga's familiarity with Vasub he has been traditionally conside Hattori, 1968, 1–3) is also eviden mentary on Vasubandhu's Abhi Abhidharmakośamarmapradīpa ( see Frauwallner, 1959, 126–127).

Dignāga also composed a Vāda see Frauwallner, 1959, 84n7; Hat Dignāga's student Śaṅkarasvāmi few decades earlier?) composed an the Nyāyapraveśaka(śāstra) (T. 1 naparīkṣā(vṛtti) (T. 1619, 1624;

6/P 5703–5704; see Frauwallner, 30–132; Yamaguchi, 1929; Tola & 1982);
kha (nonextant);
hāsamukha (nonextant);
ukha (T. 1628, 1629; 因明正理門 i, 1930; Frauwallner, 1959, 91–96; 7–1987); yaprajñaptiprakaraṇa (T. 1622;
; see Kitagawa, 1952; Frauwallner, ; Hattori, 1977); and asamuccaya(vṛtti) (D 4203/P–; 01 [i.e. Vasudhararakṣita's trans-P 5700; D–/P 5702 [i.e. Kanakanslation]; see Steinkellner, 2005; oming; Katsura et al., forthcomforthcoming; see Hattori, 1968; 973; Steinkellner & Much, 1995, ikṣā, one of Dignāga's earlier but an excerpt from the Samban- (vv. 53–85) of Bhartṛhari's ly 5th cent. CE?) meant to dem-t lexical changes (and the lost ), the potencies of the Yogācāra ose of Bhartṛhari's śabdabrahman lakṣaṇaparīkṣā consists of a critif realist accounts of universals. umukha, Dignāga developed – in blems pertaining to inference – guage and concepts that would t matter of chapter 5 of Pramāṇa- ated to the theory of conceptual

; see Frauwallner, 1959, 98–104;
es, 1988; Pind, forthcoming). bhāsamukha likely consisted of a lacious logical reasons.
t influential work is his late ya(vṛtti). It consists of six chapters llowing:
pratyakṣa);
ntial judgement (svārthānumāna); thānumāna);
ṣṭānta);
verbal exclusion (apoha); and ons (jāti).
divided into an exposition of pinion and a critical examina-nts' views. Dignāga's adversaries representatives of the Sāṃkhya,

Nyāya, Vaiśeṣika, and Mīmāṃsā schools but also coreligionists such as Vasubandhu (esp. against his Vādavidhi). According to Dignāga himself (see Frauwallner, 1959, 84nn4–7; Hattori, 1968, 9n51), the Pramāṇasamuccaya summarizes earlier polemical tracts that he composed against Sāṃkhya (Sāṃkhyaparīkṣā*), Vaiśeṣika (Vaiśeṣikaparīkṣā*), and Nyāya (Nyāyaparīkṣā; see Much, 1991b).

Prior to his interest in logic and the theory of knowledge, Dignāga had authored stotras and stotra commentaries (see Hattori, 1968, 6–7). As a follower of Maitreya(nātha), he dedicated himself to Prajñāpāramitā exegetics in the Prajñāpāramitāpiṇḍārthasaṃgraha (T. 1518; D 3809/P 5207; see Tucci, 1947; Frauwallner, 1959) and to the paths of vision and cultivation of nonduality in a short monograph on yoga, the Yogāvatāra (D 4074/P 5575; see Frauwallner, 1959). Later, Dignāga, inspired by Vasubandhu's Sautrāntika ideas, turned to the problem of the (non)existence of the external world and the impossibility of extranoetic objects in the following works:

1. the Hastavālaprakaraṇa (T. 1620, 1621; D 3848, 3849/P 5248, 5249; see Frauwallner, 1959), in which he attempted to show, with the Viṃśikā's critique of atomism, that the phenomenal world merely exists as a designation;
2. the Upādāyaprajñaptiprakaraṇa*, in which Dignāga demonstrated that composite wholes do not exist since they are neither the same as nor different from their parts and merely consist in dependent designations (upādāyaprajñapti);
3. the Ālambanaparīkṣā(vṛtti), in which Dignāga critically examined the concept of an object of cognition by assigning it two necessary conditions: (1) to be the cause of the cognition and (2) to be isomorphic with it; atoms obviously satisfy the first condition but not the second, while aggregate wholes satisfy the second but not the first; as a consequence, the object is nothing but the appearance of an object in cognition itself.

Dignāga's familiarity with Vasubandhu (of whom he has been traditionally considered a pupil; see Hattori, 1968, 1–3) is also evidenced by his commentary on Vasubandhu's Abhidharmakośa, the Abhidharmakośamarmapradīpa (D 4095/P 5596; see Frauwallner, 1959, 126–127).

Dignāga also composed a Vādavidhānaṭīkā (lost; see Frauwallner, 1959, 84n7; Hattori, 1968, 9–10). Dignāga's student Śaṅkarasvāmin (500–560; or a few decades earlier?) composed an influential work, the Nyāyapraveśaka(śāstra) (T. 1630; D–/P 5706; D 4208/P 5707; see Jambuvijaya, 2009). It has been commented on by the Jain polymath Haribhadra (late 8th cent.?) in the Nyāyapraveśakaṭīkāśiṣyahitā (see Jambuvijaya, 2009). This work in 27 sūtras seems to have enjoyed enormous popularity as a logic primer.

The works of Dignāga seem to have been infrequently commented on in post-Dharmakīrti times. But as his system permeated the hetuvidyā curriculum in Nālandā, these works must have been more frequently glossed. Dharmakīrti's likely teacher, Īśvarasena (early 6th cent. CE?), is reported to have commented on the Pramāṇasamuccaya (see Steinkellner & Much, 1995, 22), and Dharmakīrti himself polemicizes against a Nyāyamukhaṭīkākāra (see Tillemans, 2000, 177–179). A commentary on the Nyāyamukha is ascribed to Dharmapāla by Huili (慧立; 615–? CE), Xuanzang's biographer (see Tillemans, vol. I, 1990, 11). The Ālambanaparīkṣā has been commented on by Dharmapāla (T. 1625; 觀所緣論釋) and by Vinītadeva (710–770 CE?) in his Ālambanaparīkṣāṭīkā (D 4241/P 5739). The Prajñāpāramitāpiṇḍārthasaṃgraha has been glossed by Dignāga's friend Triratnadāsa in his Vivaraṇa (T. 1517; D 3810/P 5208). The Yogāvatāra was commented on by Dharmendra(?) in his Yogāvatāropadeśa (D 4075/P 5576). The most important among the extant exegetical works is, however, Jinendrabuddhi's Viśālāmalavatīpramāṇasamuccayaṭīkā (8th–9th cent.?; D 4268/P 5766; see Steinkellner et al., 2005; Lasic et al., 2012; Katsura et al., forthcoming; Krasser & Lasic, forthcoming).

Inasmuch as he created a Buddhist system of the world, language, cognition, and action out of Dignāga's logic and epistemology, Dharmakīrti (c. 550 CE?; see Krasser, 2012) is the instigator of the mature pramāṇa school (see Vetter, 1964; Dunne, 2004; Eltschinger, 2010a). In the field of metaphysics, Dharmakīrti improved on Vasubandhu's demonstration of momentariness by devising a new proof strategy, the sattvānumāna (inference [of momentariness] from existence). As regards logic, in addition to settling the number of valid logical reasons to three (intrinsic nature, effect, and nonperception), he attempted to give a more rigorously deductive or analytical orientation to Dignāga's system by vindicating a natural connection between the two properties involved in an inference. Dharmakīrti made the apoha theory the foundation of his system by showing how reliable conceptual constructs and language ultimately go back to the real things' causal efficiencies and how inference is called for in order to correct the errors for which nescience is responsible. Moreover, Dharmakīrti strongly insisted on scripture's lack of reliability and discarded all attempts at grounding scriptural, especially vedic, authority in naturalistic accounts of language. His system also mirrors strong apologetic concerns in its defense of Buddhism and the possibility of salvation against materialism and Mīmāṃsā.

Dharmakīrti is the author of seven treatises (see Frauwallner, 1954; Steinkellner & Much, 1995, 23–44; comp. Lindtner, 1980; Steinkellner, 1991):

1. the Pramāṇavārttika (D 4210/P 5709; see Miyasaka, 1971–1972; see also below);
2. the Pramāṇaviniścaya (D 4211/P 5710; see also below);
3. the Nyāyabindu (D 4212/P 5711; see La Vallée Poussin, 1907; Stcherbatsky, 1918; 1930; Malvania, 1971);
4. the Hetubindu (D 4213/P 5712; see Steinkellner, 1967; Krasser, forthcoming);
5. the Santānāntarasiddhi (D 4219/P 5716; see Stcherbatsky, 1916; Chu, 2011);
6. the Sambandhaparīkṣā(vṛtti) (D 4214, 4215/P 5713, 5714; see Frauwallner, 1934); and
7. the Vādanyāya (D 4218/P 5715; see Much, 1991a).

The Pramāṇavārttika, Dharmakīrti's first and principal work, contains Dharmakīrti's philosophical system in almost its entirety. The treatise's chapter 1 (Svārthānumānapariccheda), originally an independent work in mixed prose and verses, the Pramāṇavārttikasvavṛtti (D 4216/P 5717a; see Gnoli, 1960; Eltschinger, 2007; Eltschinger et al., 2012; Steinkellner, 2013), is dedicated to the three kinds of valid logical reasons (i.e. intrinsic nature, effect, and nonperception), although about 70% of the chapter bears on apoha and scriptural authority. Chapters 2 to 4 consist of verses alone and present themselves as a loose and innovative commentary on Dignāga's Pramāṇasamuccaya:

1. Pramāṇavārttika 2 (or Pramāṇasiddhi) comments on the Pramāṇasamuccaya's initial stanza (homage to the Buddha) and outlines Dharmakīrti's Buddhology and apologetic line (see Vetter, 1990; Franco, 1997);
2. Pramāṇavārttika 3 (or Pratyakṣapariccheda) comments on Pramāṇasamuccaya 1 and contains Dharmakīrti's doctrine of perception, its types, the apories of external realism, and the turn to idealism (see Tosaki, 1979);
3. Pramāṇavārttika 4 (or Parārthānumāna) comments on Pramāṇasamuccaya 3 and spells out Dharmakīrti's conception of a thesis, of valid and invalid reasons, and of Dignāga's wheel of reasons (see Tillemans, 2000).

The Pramāṇaviniścaya's three chapters are dedicated to the following:

1. perception (see Steinkellner, 2007; Vetter, 1966);
2. private inferential judgement (see Steinkellner, 1973; 1979; 2007); and
3. proof (see Hugon & Tomabechi, 2011).

This work does not add anything really significant except for a gradual turn to the new proof of momentariness and the neglection of apoha, scriptural authority, and Buddhology.

The Nyāyabindu is a three-chapter summary of the Pramāṇaviniścaya composed of 209 sūtras. As its abundant commentaries and subcommentaries testify, the Nyāyabindu enjoyed great popularity as an introduction to Dharmakīrti's logic. The four remaining works are short monographs dealing with various topics:

1. The Hetubindu turns back to the three kinds of valid logical reasons.
2. The Santānāntarasiddhi presents itself as a polemical dialogue among Sautrāntikas, Vaibhāṣikas, and Yogācāras on the issue of solipsism.
3. The Sambandhaparīkṣā(vṛtti) refutes the existence of real relations among things and among properties.
4. The Vādanyāya presents Dharmakīrti's account of debate and dialectics via a systematic confrontation with Nyāya on the points of defeat.

A significant part of the Buddhist epistemologists' literary output consists of commentaries and (sub)subcommentaries on the seven treatises of Dharmakīrti.

The Pramāṇavārttika's chapter 1, together with the autocommentary, has been glossed by Śākyabuddhi in his Pramāṇavārttikaṭīkā (660–720 CE?; D 4220/P 5718; see Inami et al., 1992) and by Karṇakagomin in his Pramāṇavārttikasvavṛttiṭīkā (c. 800?; see Sāṅkṛtyāyana, 1943), the latter of which is in many respects an update of Śākyabuddhi's commentary. The verses of chapters 1 to 4 have been commented on by Manorathanandin (12th cent. CE?) in his Pramāṇavārttikavṛtti (see Sāṅkṛtyāyana, 1938–1940; with Vibhūticandra's [c. 1200?] marginal notes). Chapters 2 to 4 have been commented on by Devendrabuddhi (630–690 CE?), perhaps a direct pupil of Dharmakīrti, in his Pramāṇavārttikapañjikā (D 4217/P 5717b), and by Prajñākaragupta (c. 800 CE?) in his Pramāṇavārttikālaṃkāra (D 4221/P 5719; see Sāṅkṛtyāyana, 1953; Franco, 1997; Ono, 2000; ns, and of Dignāga's wheel of reas, 2000).

niścaya's three chapters are dedi-
ing:
ee Steinkellner, 2007; Vetter, 1966); ential judgement (see Steinkell-9; 2007); and ıgon & Tomabechi, 2011). ot add anything really signifi-gradual turn to the new proof of d the neglection of apoha, scripd Buddhology.
ı is a three-chapter summary of aya composed of 209 sūtras. As nentaries and subcommentaries bindu enjoyed great popularity to Dharmakīrti's logic. The four are short monographs dealing
:
u turns back to the three kinds of easons.
ntarasiddhi presents itself as dialogue among Sautrāntikas, and Yogācāras on the issue of dhaparīkṣā(vṛtti) refutes the eal relations among things and ties.
a presents Dharmakīrti's account dialectics via a systematic con-h Nyāya on the points of defeat. of the Buddhist epistemolot consists of commentaries and ries on the seven treatises of ṭika's chapter 1, together with the as been glossed by Śākyabuddhi ṭikaṭīkā (660–720 CE?; D 4220/al., 1992) and by Karṇakagomin ṛttikasvavṛttiṭīkā (c. 800?; see the latter of which is in many of Śākyabuddhi's commen-hapters 1 to 4 have been comorathanandin (12th cent. CE?) ttikavṛtti (see Sāṅkṛtyāyana, ūticandra's [c. 1200?] marginal 4 have been commented on by 0–690 CE?), perhaps a direct in his Pramāṇavārttikapañjikā by Prajñākaragupta (c. 800 CE?) kālaṃkāra (D 4221/P 5719; see Franco, 1997; Ono, 2000;

Moriyama, forthcoming). Chapters 2 and 3 have been commented on by Ravigupta (early 9th cent.?) in his Pramāṇavārttikavṛtti (D 4224, 4225/P 5726, 5722). Śaṅkaranandana's (early 10th cent.?) Pramāṇavārttikānusāriṇī (D 4223/P 5721) covers both the stanzas and the prose autocommentary of the first chapter (at least), but its extant Tibetan translation stops with stanza 128.

The Pramāṇaviniścaya has been commented on by Dharmottara (740–800 CE?) in his Pramāṇaviniścayaṭīkā (D 4229, 4227/P 5752; see Sakai, 2010; Ishida, 2011; Watanabe, forthcoming), by Śaṅkaranandana in the nonextant Viniścayānusāriṇī (see Eltschinger, forthcoming a), and by Jñānaśrībhadra (late 11th cent. CE?) in his Pramāṇaviniścayaṭīkā (D 4228/P 5728).

The Nyāyabindu has received detailed explanations by Dharmottara in his Nyāyabinduṭīkā (D 4231/P 5730; see Stcherbatsky, 1918; 1930; Malvania 1971) and Vinītadeva in his Nyāyabinduṭīkā (D 4230/P 5729; see La Vallée Poussin, 1913), and cursory ones by Kamalaśīla in his Nyāyabindupūrvapakṣasaṃkṣipta (D 4232/P 5731; see Tosaki, 1984) and Jinamitra (c. 800 CE?) in his Nyāyabindupiṇḍārtha (D 4233/P 5732).

The Hetubindu has been commented on by Arcaṭa (also known as Dharmākaradatta; 730–790 CE?) in his Hetubinduṭīkā (D 4235/P 5734; see Sanghavi & Jinavijayaji, 1949) and by Vinītadeva in his Hetubinduṭīkā (D 4236/P 5735).

The Santānāntarasiddhi has been commented on by Vinītadeva in his Santānāntarasiddhiṭīkā (D 4238/P 5724; see Stcherbatsky, 1916).

The Sambandhaparīkṣā(vṛtti) has been commented on by Vinītadeva (Sambandhaparīkṣāṭīkā; D 4236/P 5735), by Śaṅkaranandana in his Sambandhaparīkṣānusāriṇī (D 4237/P 5736), and by the Jain scholar Prabhācandra (9th cent.?; see Shastri, 1972).

The Vādanyāya has been commented on by Vinītadeva in his Vādanyāyaṭīkā (D 4240/P 5735) and by Śāntarakṣita (725–788 CE?) in his Vādanyāyaṭīkāvipañcitārthā (D 4239/P 5725; see Sāṅkṛtyāyana, 1935–1936).

Several among these glosses have in turn been commented on by later scholars such as the Jain Mallavādin (9th–10th cents. CE?), Devabala (10th cent. CE?), Durvekamiśra (970–1030 CE?), Jayanta (mid-11th cent. CE?), and Yamāri (1000–1060 CE?; see Steinkellner & Much, 1995, 91, 97, 102–103, 119).

Dharmakīrti's ideas were soon made the object of digests and manuals. Chronologically first may have been the works of (Bhadanta) Śubhagupta (720–780 CE?), who authored concise treatises (only the stanzas are extant) on nearly all topics of the system:

- omniscience, in his Sarvajñasiddhi (D 4243/P 5741; see Watanabe, 1987);
- revealed word, in his Śrutiparīkṣā (D 4245/P 5743; see Eltschinger, 1999);
- apoha, in his Anyāpohavicāra (D 4246/P 5744; see Mikogami, 1993);
- refutation of the existence of god, in his Īśvarabhaṅga (D 4247/P 5745; see Watanabe, 1977);
- proof of the possibility of rebirth, in his Paralokasiddhi (lost; see Steinkellner, 1985); and
- demonstration of selflessness, in his Nairātmyasiddhi (lost).

Śubhagupta is especially well known for his Bāhyārthaparīkṣā (D 4244/P 5742; see Steinkellner & Much, 1995, 53–54), whose attempt to refute Dharmakīrti's mind-only was in turn severely criticized by Śāntarakṣita and Kamalaśīla in chapter 23 of their Tattvasaṃgraha(pañjikā).

The most interesting among the extant works dedicated to expounding Dharmakīrti's philosophy is indeed the Tattvasaṃgraha(pañjikā) (D 4266/P 5764; D 4267/P 5765; see Krishnamacharya, 1926; Shastri, 1968; Funayama, 1992; Steinkellner & Much, 1995, 56–63; McClintock, 2010; Ratié, forthcoming b). The treatise covers the whole of Dharmakīrti's philosophy in 26 chapters (summary in Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 89–90). It is at the same time a brilliant attempt at legitimating Dharmakīrti's program by integrating it into the wider framework of Mahāyāna Buddhism. Far from being a servile introduction, the Tattvasaṃgraha elaborates on and updates its model while applying Dharmakīrti's methodology to new ór insufficiently examined problems. Remnants of a commentary on the Tattvasaṃgraha have been preserved (see Harimoto & Kano, 2008). Other later digests include Jitāri's Bālāvatāratarka (940–1000 CE?; D 4263/P 5760; see Shirasaki, 1983), Mokṣākaragupta's Tarkabhāṣā (11th–13th cents.?; D 4264/P 5762; see Krishnamacharya, 1942; Kajiyama, 1966), Vidyākaraśānti's Tarkasopāna (12th cent. CE?; see Dorjee, 1994), and the anonymous Tarkarahasya (see Yaita, 2005).

However, the followers of Dharmakīrti did not limit themselves to commenting, summarizing, and updating his treatises, for they actually never ceased to identify new problems, to refine their methodology, and to adapt to new religio-philosophical environments – especially to Tantrism, of which many of them were noted specialists (Śāntarakṣita, Kamalaśīla, Jitāri, Ratnākaraśānti, etc.). In the 9th to 10th centuries at the latest, Kashmir became the center of an intense philosophical interaction involving Buddhists, Naiyāyikas, Vaiyākaraṇas (Grammarians), and Śaivas.

Śaṅkaranandana, a Brahman by birth and a Buddhist layman by conviction, likely was Buddhism's main representative (see Krasser, 2001; Eltschinger, forthcoming a). And from the second half of the 10th century, the Magadhan center of Vikramaśīla produced several generations of polyvalent intellectuals: Jitāri, Durvekamiśra, Ratnākaraśānti (970–1030?), Jñānaśrīmitra (980–1040?), and Ratnakīrti (990–1050?).

In the field of the theory of knowledge, research and polemics were carried out regarding the number, the scope, and the validity of the *pramāṇa*s (the means of valid cognition). Arcaṭa had presumably written a Pramāṇadvitvasiddhi (lost), a work whose subject matter – the reduction of all *pramāṇa*s to two – possibly coincided with that of Ratnakīrti's Pramāṇāntarbhāvaprakaraṇa (see Thakur, 1975) as well as with that of an anonymous treatise bearing the same title (see Nyayacharya, 1969). Candragomin's Nyāyasiddhyāloka* (mid-8th cent. CE?; D 4242/P 5740) is apparently devoted to the means of valid cognition as well. The validity of the(se) means of cognition is the object of Dharmottara's two *Prāmāṇyaparīkṣā*s – a long one (D 4248/P 5746) and a short one (D 4249/P 5747; see Krasser, 1991) – and of three treatises by Śaṅkaranandana, Bṛhatprāmāṇyaparīkṣā, Madhyaprāmāṇyaparīkṣā, and Sūkṣmaprāmāṇyaparīkṣā.

Post-Dharmakīrti authors also dedicated several treatises to the defense of a nominalist ontology and the concomitant language theory. Monographs on apoha were composed by Dharmottara (Apohaprakaraṇa [D 4250/P 5748; see Frauwallner, 1937]), Śaṅkaranandana (Anyāpohasiddhi [D 4256/P 5754]), Jitāri (Apohasiddhi [lost]), Jñānaśrīmitra (Apohaprakaraṇa [see Akamatsu, 1983; McCrea & Patil, 2010]), and Ratnakīrti (Apohasiddhi [Mc Allister, 2011]).

The refutation of the non-Buddhists' real universals is the subject matter of Jitāri's Jātinirākṛti (see Bühnemann, 1982) and Paṇḍita Aśoka's Avayavinirākaraṇa and Sāmānyadūṣaṇa (early 11th cent. CE?; see Thakur, 1974; Tola & Dragonetti, 1994).

Later philosophers showed great interest in various aspects of the theory of logic and inference. Besides his Hetutattvopadeśa (D 4261/P 5758; see Tucci, 1986), a primer of Buddhist logic, Jitāri wrote two treatises on issues related to logical pervasion, a Dharmadharmiviniścaya (D 4262/P 5759) and a Vyāpakānupalambha (sic). Pervasion is also the subject matter of two monographs by Jñānaśrīmitra and Ratnakīrti – the Vyāpticarcā (see Lasic, 2000b) and the Vyāptinirṇaya (see Lasic, 2000a). Ratnākaraśānti's Antarvyāptisamarthana (D 4260/P 5757; see Kajiyama, 1999) belongs to the same category.

In addition to pervasion per se, much attention was paid to logical reasons. Śaṅkaranandana composed two treatises on the identity relation – the Pratibandhasiddhi (D 4257/P 5755, stanzas only) and the Laghupratibandhasiddhi. Jñānaśrīmitra devoted a treatise to the issue of the establishment of the causality relation (Kāryakāraṇabhāvasiddhi [D 4258/P 5763; see Thakur, 1959]) and wrote two monographs on nonperception (Anupalabdhirahasya and Sarvaśabdābhāvacarcā [see Kellner, 2007]).

One of the topics often encountered in later epistemological literature is the proof of momentariness (kṣaṇabhaṅga), which is hardly surprising granting that momentariness is the cornerstone of Buddhist ontology and soteriology. Treatises entitled Kṣaṇabhaṅgasiddhi were flourishing. Works on this topic have been composed by Arcaṭa (lost; see Steinkellner & Much, 1995, 64), Dharmottara (D 4253/P 5751; see Frauwallner, 1935), *Muktākalaśa (D 4254/P 5752), Jitāri, Durvekamiśra (lost), and Ratnakīrti (see Woo, 1999; McDermott, 1969). Jñānaśrīmitra's treatise on the same topic is entitled Kṣaṇabhaṅgādhyāya (see Thakur, 1959; Kyuma, 2005). Ratnakīrti is the author of a Sthirasiddhidūṣaṇa (see Mimaki, 1976). Chapters 1 and 3 of Śaṅkaranandana's Dharmālaṃkāra deal with momentariness and the rebuttal of objections raised against momentariness.

Thematically connected with the proofs of momentariness are the proofs of selflessness (nairātmya) – another soteriologically relevant aspect of Buddhist ontology. Whereas Karṇakagomin's Nairātmyasiddhi is lost, Jitāri's short treatise of the same title has survived (see Bühnemann, 1982); the proof of selflessness is the subject matter of chapter 2 of Śaṅkaranandana's Dharmālaṃkāra.

More Buddhologically connoted aspects of epistemology, such as omniscience and yogic perception, are comparatively little represented. We owe *Sarvajñasiddhi*s to Śaṅkaranandana (Sarvajñasiddhi [see Eltschinger, 2008] and Sarvajñasiddhisaṃkṣepa), Jitāri (see Bühnemann, 1982), Jñānaśrīmitra (lost; see Steinkellner, 1977), and Ratnakīrti (see Thakur, 1975; Bühnemann, 1980), and a Yoginirṇ Jñānaśrīmitra (see Woo, 2006; Fran As Śubhagupta before him, Dh posed a short monograph den possibility of rebirth against materiali siddhi (D 4251/P 5749; see Steinkell Later Kashmirian and Mag also criticized various non-Bud of religious authority. While Śa Āgamasiddhi and Jitāri's Śruti Vedāprāmāṇyasiddhi (see Büh Eltschinger, 2003) criticize Mīmā concerning the authorlessness o the permanence of the relation be meaning, two treatises by Śaṅka Īśvarāpākaraṇa and the Īśvarāpā (with an anonymous commenta 2002), Jitāri's Īśvarādimataparīkṣā ( 1982), Jñānaśrīmitra's Īśvaravād 1959), and Ratnakīrti's Īśvarasādh Thakur, 1975; Patil, 2009) refute th creator god revealing the Veda. Jit put includes a critique of Digamb Digambaramataparīkṣā (or Anek see Iyengar, 1952).

Late Mādhyamika Literatu

From about 500, the Madhyamak depth transformations that event rise of two mutually contentious st Buddhapālita (c. 500 CE?), denied Dignāga's new methodology while Mādhyamika position and advoca type of argument. Others, like Bhāv 500–570 CE?), advocated the use inferences (svatantrānumāna) and gisms, thus allowing reasoning to tion side by side with scripture for establishing positions. From a 11th century on, Tibetan doxograp first *Prāsaṅgika-mādhyamikas *Svātantrika-mādhyamikas. Furt in this classification reflected th attitude toward the Yogācāra/Vij who, like Bhāviveka, strongly r and thus accepted external obje ventional level, were referred to svātantrikas, whereas those wh (7th cent. CE?), Jñānagarbha (earl and especially Śāntarakṣita, acce as a provisionally true and useful d n issues related to logical pervasion, mivinišcaya (D 4262/P 5759) and a ambha (sic). Pervasion is also the of two monographs by Jñānaśrīmitra i – the Vyāpticarcā (see Lasic, e Vyāptinirṇaya (see Lasic, 2000a). i's Antarvyāptisamarthana (D 4260/ajiyama, 1999) belongs to the same to pervasion per se, much attention gical reasons. Śaṅkaranandana com-atises on the identity relation – the dhi (D 4257/P 5755, stanzas only) and bandhasiddhi. Jñānaśrīmitra devoted issue of the establishment of the cau-(Kāryakāraṇabhāvasiddhi [D 4258/akur, 1959]) and wrote two mono-nperception (Anupalabdhirahasya ibhāvacarcā [see Kellner, 2007]). topics often encountered in later l literature is the proof of momenbhaṅga), which is hardly surprising nomentariness is the cornerstone ntology and soteriology. Treatises abhaṅgasiddhi were flourishing. opic have been composed by Arcaṭa kellner & Much, 1995, 64), Dhar-53/P 5751; see Frauwallner, 1935), D 4254/P 5752), Jitāri, Durvekamiśra akīrti (see Woo, 1999; McDermott, nitra's treatise on the same topic is bhaṅgādhyāya (see Thakur, 1959; Ratnakīrti is the author of a ṇa (see Mimaki, 1976). Chapters 1 ranandana's Dharmālaṃkāra deal ness and the rebuttal of objections omentariness.

connected with the proofs of momenproofs of selflessness (nairātmya) – ogically relevant aspect of Buddhist as Karṇakagomin's Nairātmyasiddhi hort treatise of the same title has Bühnemann, 1982); the proof of ne subject matter of chapter 2 of 's Dharmālaṃkāra.
ogically connoted aspects of episte-omniscience and yogic perception, little represented. We owe Sarvajña- aranandana (Sarvajñasiddhi [see 8] and Sarvajñasiddhisaṃkṣepa), nann, 1982), Jñānaśrīmitra (lost; see ), and Ratnakīrti (see Thakur, 1975;

Bühnemann, 1980), and a Yoginirṇayaprakaraṇa to Jñānaśrīmitra (see Woo, 2006; Franco, 2008).

As Śubhagupta before him, Dharmottara composed a short monograph demonstrating the possibility of rebirth against materialism, the Paralokasiddhi (D 4251/P 5749; see Steinkellner, 1986).

Later Kashmirian and Magadhan authors also criticized various non-Buddhist accounts of religious authority. While Śaṅkaranandana's Āgamasiddhi and Jitāri's Śrutikartṛsiddhi and Vedaprāmāṇyasiddhi (see Bühnemann, 1982; Eltschinger, 2003) criticize Mīmāṃsaka doctrines concerning the authorlessness of the Veda and the permanence of the relation between word and meaning, two treatises by Śaṅkaranandana, the Īśvarāpākaraṇa and the Īśvarāpākaraṇasaṃkṣepa (with an anonymous commentary; see Krasser, 2002), Jitāri's Īśvarādimataparīkṣā (see Bühnemann, 1982), Jñānaśrīmitra's Īśvaravāda (see Thakur, 1959), and Ratnakīrti's Īśvarasādhanadūṣaṇa (see Thakur, 1975; Patil, 2009) refute the existence of a creator god revealing the Veda. Jitāri's literary output includes a critique of Digambara Jainism, the Digambaramataparīkṣā (or Anekāntavādanirāsa?; see Iyengar, 1952).

Late Mādhyamika Literature

From about 500, the Madhyamaka underwent in-depth transformations that eventually led to the rise of two mutually contentious streams. Some, like Buddhapālita (c. 500 CE?), denied any relevance to Dignāga's new methodology while establishing the Mādhyamika position and advocated the prasaṅga type of argument. Others, like Bhāviveka (or Bhavya, 500–570 CE?), advocated the use of independent inferences (svatantrānumāna) and probative syllogisms, thus allowing reasoning to positively function side by side with scripture as a justification for establishing positions. From at least the early 11th century on, Tibetan doxographers labeled the first *Prāsaṅgika-mādhyamikas and the second *Svātantrika-mādhyamikas. Further refinements in this classification reflected the *Svātantrikas' attitude toward the Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda. Those who, like Bhāviveka, strongly rejected idealism and thus accepted external objects on the conventional level, were referred to as *Sautrāntika-svātantrikas, whereas those who, like Śrīgupta (7th cent. CE?), Jñānagarbha (early 8th cent. CE?), and especially Śāntarakṣita, accepted cittamātra as a provisionally true and useful device in order to grasp Madhyamaka-like emptiness, were labelled *Yogācāra-svātantrikas (see Dreyfus & McClintock, 2003).

Buddhapālita's commentary on the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā, the Mūlamadhyamakakārikāvṛtti (D 3842/P 5242; see Saito, 1984; Ye 2011b) has come down to us in a Tibetan translation and an incomplete Sanskrit manuscript. It exhibits close similarities with another old commentary on the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā, the Akutobhayā* (D 3829/P 5229; see Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 47–48; Huntington, 1986) – never alluded to by Buddhapālita, Bhāviveka, and Candrakīrti. Bhāviveka's own commentary on the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā, the Prajñāpradīpa (T. 1566; D 3853/P 5253; see Kajiyama, 1963; Eckel, 1980; Ames, 1982; 1986; 1993–2000), which is commented on by Avalokitavrata (7th cent. CE?) in his Prajñāpradīpaṭīkā (D 3859/P 5259), contains a sharp criticism of Guṇamati's and Buddhapālita's ideas as well as refutations of Sāṃkhya, Vaiśeṣika, Jaina, and Ābhidharmika conceptions.

Bhāviveka's critique of competing Buddhist as well as non-Buddhist systems is the focus of his most original work, the Madhyamakahṛdayakārikā (stanzas: D 3855/P 5255; see Lindtner, 2001; prose commentary: D 3856/P 5256; see Heitmann, 2004, 2009; Eckel, 2008; Krasser, 2011). This work, which became an inexhaustible source for Tibetan doxographers, is composed of 11 chapters (the first three possibly formed an originally independent treatise, the Tattvajñānāmṛtāvatāra):

1. the thought of awakening (Bodhicittāparityāga);
2. Buddha's vow (Munivratasamāśraya);
3. reality (Tattvajñānaiṣaṇā);
4. critique of the Śrāvaka view of reality;
5. critique of the Yogācāra view of reality;
6. critique of the Sāṃkhya view of reality;
7. critique of the Vaiśeṣika view of reality;
8. critique of the Vedānta view of reality;
9. critique of the Mīmāṃsaka view of reality;
10. omniscience (Sarvajñasiddhinirdeśa); and
11. praise (Stutilakṣaṇanirdeśa).

Excerpts from chapter 4 became an independent treatise dedicated to the doxography of the Buddhist sects, the Nikāyabhedavibhaṅgavyākhyāna (D 4139/P 5640; see Teramoto & Hiramatsu, 1935). The question whether the prose commentary on the Madhyamakahṛdayakārikā, the Madhyamakahṛdayavṛttitarkajvālā (D 3856/P 5256), is also the work of Bhāviveka or the work of a later author (named Bhavya?) remains debated (see Ejima, 1990; Seyfort Ruegg, 1990; Krasser, 2011).

Three other treatises have been ascribed to Bhāviveka.

1. The Karatalaratna (T. 1578; 大乘掌珍論; see La Vallée Poussin, 1932–1933b) summarizes the Mādhyamika doctrine while discussing two syllogisms, criticizes non-Buddhist as well as Buddhist views (e.g. Yogācāra's dependent nature), and deals, in its final part, with soteriological topics.

2. The Madhyamakārthasaṃgraha (D 3857/P 5258; see Ejima, 1980, 18–34) presents itself as a monograph on the two truths, which it subdivides into a true/untrue conventional level (the criterion being the pseudo-things' possessing causal efficiency or not) and a modal/nonmodal ultimate level. It is most certainly the work of a later Bhāviveka/Bhavya.

3. The Madhyamakaratnapradīpa (D 3854/P 5254; see Lindtner, 1982b, 172–182; Ejima, 1982; Seyfort Ruegg, 1990, 62–67), which refers to Candrakīrti, Dharmakīrti, and tantric literature (e.g. Mahāvairocanābhisambodhisūtra, Mañjuśrīmūlakalpa, and Pañcakrama) is probably also the work of that later Bhāviveka/Bhavya.

No less important for the history of the Indo-Tibetan Madhyamaka is Candrakīrti who, through recurrent critiques of Bhāviveka, Dignāga, and the Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda, "sought to establish once for all the prasaṅga method of reasoning" (Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 71), or, to be more precise, took advantage of his defense of Buddhapālita's use of prasaṅgas to update to paraprasiddhānumānas (inferences that are established for the opponent) on the basis of his conviction that reliance on just prasaṅgas was outdated.

Candrakīrti's first major work is the Madhyamakāvatāra (D 3861–3863/P 5261–5263; see La Vallée Poussin, 1912; Li et al., forthcoming). The first ten chapters of this introduction to Madhyamaka deal with the ten levels of the resolve to awaken associated with the ten stages and the ten perfections of a bodhisattva. Its chapter 6 (on the Prajñāpāramitā) divides itself into two parts. The first part, the exposition of dharmanairātmya (the selflessness/insubstantiality of the factors of existence), provides an opportunity to criticize Bhāviveka and Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda in order to analyze the two truths and to emphasize the provisionality of the ālayavijñāna dispensation. The second part, dedicated to pudgalanairātmya (the selflessness/insubstantiality of the person), argues against Buddhist and non-Buddhist views on the personalistic belief. Chapters 11, 12, and 13 contain an account of the qualities of a bodhisattva, an account of the buddha stage, and a conclusion. The work has been commented on by Jayānanda (Ṭīkā; D 3870/P 5271; see van der Kuijp, 1993).

Candrakīrti is also well known as a commentator of Nāgārjuna's Śūnyatāsaptati and Yuktiṣaṣṭikā and Āryadeva's Catuḥśataka (see above). His most famous commentary, however, is his Prasannapadāmūlamadhyamakavṛtti (D 3860/P 5260; see de Jong, 1949; 1978; May, 1959; La Vallée Poussin, 1903–1913; MacDonald, 2000; forthcoming; Seyfort Ruegg, 2002), the only commentary on Nāgārjuna's Mūlamadhyamakakārikā that has been preserved in its Sanskrit original. It contains a defense of Buddhapālita's prasaṅga method and a detailed critique of both Bhāviveka's independent reasoning and Dignāga's two pramāṇas (see Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 74–81).

Śrīgupta and his likely student Jñānagarbha appear as the forerunners of Śāntarakṣita in the elaboration of the *Yogācāra-mādhyamika synthesis. Śrīgupta is the author of a Tattvāvatāravṛtti (D 3892/P 5292), in which he subjected both material/atomic things and cognition to the neither-one/simple-nor-many/multiple (ekānekaviyogahetu) argument for emptiness. Idealism is here considered provisionally true as a step toward the elimination of the belief in material entities and the realization of nonsubstantiality. Jñānagarbha, who may have been Śāntarakṣita's teacher, wrote the Satyadvayavibhaṅga and its commentary, the Satyadvayavibhaṅgavṛtti (D 3881, 3882/P–; see Eckel, 1992), which were in turn commented on by Śāntarakṣita in his Satyadvayavibhaṅgapañjikā (D 3883/P 5283; see Eckel, 1992, 105–150). Jñānagarbha shares Śrīgupta's basic views on idealism. In close agreement with the pseudo-Bhāviveka's Madhyamakārthasaṃgraha (see Seyfort Ruegg, 1990, 67–68), Jñānagarbha subdivides the two truths according to whether they conform to mere appearances (saṃvṛti), which are divided into nondelusive and delusive, or to reasoned argument and syllogisms (paramārtha). In both authors' view, that which is tenable if examined by reasoned argument is considered to be paramārtha; as for mere appearances in a cognition, they are regarded as a saṃvṛti, which is not tenable if examined by reasoned argument.

Another important early 8th-century Mādhyamika master is Śāntideva (also known as Akṣayamati), the author of the celebrated Bodhi(sattva)caryāvatāra (D 3871/P 5272; see La Vallée Poussin, 1904–1912; Vaidya, 1960) – commented on by Prajñākaramati (c. 950–1000 CE?) in his Bodhicaryāvatārapañjikā (D 3872/P 5273; note also Vibhūticandra's Tātparyapañjikā [D 3880/P 5282]). The curre Bodhicaryāvatāra, which is enla version found in Dunhuang (s Harrison, 2007), comprises ten c on the six perfections. Chapters on various aspects of the resolve citta); chapters 6 to 9 deal with f energy (vīrya), meditation (dh (prajñā); and chapter 10 focuses merit (puṇya). From a philosop chapter 9 (on the Prajñāpāramit important. Its critique of the pr tion of the Yogācāra/Vijñānavā Śāntideva's likely inclination to interpretation of the Madhyama cess is testified to by the high mentaries and abridged versions 1981, 84–85). Śāntideva's Śikṣās 3940/P 5235, 5236; see Bendall, 1 Harrison, 2007), probably comp two versions of the Bodhicaryāv chapters and 27 stanzas, which th by quoting numerous Mahāyān authored stanzas, thus making t a treasury of Sanskrit fragments sūtras.

Śāntarakṣita is generally cons atizer of the *Yogācāra(-svātantr "a school which elaborated a Madhyamaka and the Yogācāra/level of the philosophical analys process" (Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, considered by Śāntarakṣita to b propaedeutic leading up to t goal of establishing the insubsta tors including the mind" (Seyfor Śāntarakṣita develops this doctri Madhyamakālaṃkāra and Madhy
(D 3884, 3885/P 5284, 5285; see menthal, 2004), whose 97 stan along two parts – reasoning nor-many argument) and script speculative part I successively d ality (atoms, etc.) and the mind accounts such as those of Vaibhāṣ and non-Buddhists and nondualis as those of the various branches Vijñānavāda). In addition to th siddhi (D 3708/P 4531), the logic Tattvasaṃgraha and Vādanyāyaṭīk tary (Satyadvayavibhaṅgapañjikā) Satyadvayavibhaṅga (see above)

, and a conclusion. The work has on by Jayānanda (Ṭīkā; D 3870/Kuijp, 1993).

lso well known as a commenta-Śūnyatāsaptati and Yuktiṣaṣṭikā tuḥśataka (see above). His most ary, however, is his Prasanna- makavṛtti (D 3860/P 5260; see 8; May, 1959; La Vallée Poussin, nald, 2000; forthcoming; Seyfort nly commentary on Nāgārjuna's kārikā that has been preserved iginal. It contains a defense of asaṅga method and a detailed hāviveka's independent reason-two pramāṇas (see Seyfort Ruegg, his likely student Jñānagarbha erunners of Śāntarakṣita in the e *Yogācāra-mādhyamika syn-the author of a Tattvāvatāravṛtti

, in which he subjected both hings and cognition to the neither-any/multiple (ekānekaviyogahetu) ptiness. Idealism is here considtrue as a step toward the elimi-lief in material entities and the nonsubstantiality. Jñānagarbha, een Śāntarakṣita's teacher, wrote bhaṅga and its commentary, the ṅgavṛtti (D 3881, 3882/P–; see ich were in turn commented on n his Satyadvayavibhaṅgapañjikā 3; see Eckel, 1992, 105–150). es Śrīgupta's basic views on idealement with the pseudo-Bhāviveka's saṃgraha (see Seyfort Ruegg, 1990, rbha subdivides the two truths ther they conform to mere appear-which are divided into nondelusive reasoned argument and syllogisms both authors' view, that which is ned by reasoned argument is conamārtha; as for mere appearances ey are regarded as a saṃvṛti, which xamined by reasoned argument.

rtant early 8th-century Mādhyamika va (also known as Akṣayamati), the elebrated Bodhi(sattva)caryāvatāra e La Vallée Poussin, 1904–1912; Vaidya, nted on by Prajñākaramati (c. 950– Bodhicaryāvatārapañjikā (D 3872/
o Vibhūticandra's Tātparyapañjikā

[D 3880/P 5282]). The current version of the Bodhicaryāvatāra, which is enlarged from an earlier version found in Dunhuang (see Saito, 1996, 258; Harrison, 2007), comprises ten chapters and focuses on the six perfections. Chapters 1 to 5 concentrate on various aspects of the resolve to awaken (bodhicitta); chapters 6 to 9 deal with forbearance (kṣānti), energy (vīrya), meditation (dhyāna), and insight (prajñā); and chapter 10 focuses on the dedication of merit (puṇya). From a philosophical point of view, chapter 9 (on the Prajñāpāramitā) is by far the most important. Its critique of the pramāṇas and refutation of the Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda tenets point to Śāntideva's likely inclination toward Candrakīrti's interpretation of the Madhyamaka. The work's success is testified to by the high number of its commentaries and abridged versions (see Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 84–85). Śāntideva's Śikṣāsamuccaya (D 3939, 3940/P 5235, 5236; see Bendall, 1902; Hedinger, 1984; Harrison, 2007), probably composed between the two versions of the Bodhicaryāvatāra, consists of 19 chapters and 27 stanzas, which the author elucidates by quoting numerous Mahāyāna sūtras and self-authored stanzas, thus making the Śikṣāsamuccaya a treasury of Sanskrit fragments of the Mahāyāna sūtras.

Śāntarakṣita is generally considered the systematizer of the *Yogācāra(-svātantrika)-mādhyamika, "a school which elaborated a synthesis of the Madhyamaka and the Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda on the level of the philosophical analysis of surface-level process" (Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 87). Mind only is considered by Śāntarakṣita to be "a philosophical propaedeutic leading up to the Madhyamaka's goal of establishing the insubstantiality of all factors including the mind" (Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 90). Śāntarakṣita develops this doctrinal program in his Madhyamakālaṃkāra and Madhyamakālaṃkāravṛtti (D 3884, 3885/P 5284, 5285; see Ichigo, 1985; Blumenthal, 2004), whose 97 stanzas are organized along two parts – reasoning (the neither-one-nor-many argument) and scripture. The treatise's speculative part I successively discusses corporeality (atoms, etc.) and the mind (realistic-dualistic accounts such as those of Vaibhāṣikas, Sautrāntikas, and non-Buddhists and nondualistic accounts such as those of the various branches of the Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda). In addition to the tantric Tattvasiddhi (D 3708/P 4531), the logico-epistemological Tattvasaṃgraha and Vādanyāyaṭīkā, and a commentary (Satyadvayavibhaṅgapañjikā) on Jñānagarbha's Satyadvayavibhaṅga (see above), Śāntarakṣita is also the author of the Saṃvaraviṃśakavṛtti (D 4082/P 5583), a work that discusses a bodhisattva's ethical practice taking as its background the Bodhisattvabhūmi.

Śāntarakṣita's famous disciple Kamalaśīla (740–795 CE?) closely followed in the footsteps of his master, not only by joining him in journeying to Tibet but also in a literary way by first commenting on Śāntarakṣita's Tattvasaṃgraha (see above) and Madhyamakālaṃkāra (D 3886/P 5286; see Ichigo, 1985) and then by composing an independent *Mādhyamika-yogācāra treatise, the Madhyamakāloka (D 3887/P 5287; see Keira, 2004). In addition to discussing the Yogācāra's three natures and mind only, two doctrines regarded as propaedeutic inasmuch as they help neutralize superimposition, negation, and the subject-object dichotomy, Kamalaśīla's Madhyamakāloka alludes to the doctrines of the one vehicle (ekayāna), the tathāgatagarbha, and the gotra. His important literary output includes commentaries on the Saptaśatikāprajñāpāramitā and Vajracchedikāprajñāpāramitā (D 3815/P 5215; D 3817/P 5216), as well as on the Śālistambasūtra (D 4001/P 5502; see Schoening, 1995), and other independent tracts (see Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 99). Historically important are Kamalaśīla's three Bhāvanākrama treatises (D 3915/P 5310; see Tucci, 1986; D 3916/P 5311; see Goshima, 1983; and D 3917/P 5312; see Tucci, 1971), which contain the documents and arguments that served as a basis for Kamalaśīla's defense of gradualism during the famous Council of Lhasa/bSam-yas.

The postclassical period of Indian Madhyamaka witnesses two other important syntheses.

The first synthesis connects Madhyamaka and Prajñāpāramitā. Although the connection between Prajñāpāramitā and Madhyamaka dates back to Nāgārjuna, it found a specific scholastic expression in the synthesis of Madhyamaka and the Abhisamayālaṃkāra formulated by the (6th-cent.?) scholar Ārya Vimuktisena, the author of a Vṛtti on Maitreya's Abhisamayālaṃkāra (D 3787/P 5185). Other famous representatives of this synthesis include Bhadanta Vimuktisena, the author of the Abhisamayālaṃkāravārttika (7th cent. CE?; D 3788/P 5186), and Haribhadra, the author of the huge Abhisamayālaṃkārālokāprajñāpāramitāvyākhyā (D 3791/P 5189; see Wogihara, 1932). Buddhajñānapāda, the tantric master who founded the Jñānapāda lineage of the tradition based on the Guhyasamāja, authored the Saṃcayagāthāpañjikā (D 3798/P 5196). Abhayākaragupta (d. 1125) composed the Marmakaumudī (D 3805/P 5202) on the Aṣṭasāhasrikāprajñāpāramitā.

The second synthesis connects Madhyamaka and Tantrism. Several representatives of this movement bear the same names as the founders of Madhyamaka. Ārya Nāgārjuna (8th cent. CE?), who founded the Ārya lineage of the tradition based on the Guhyasamāja, is the presumed author of the Bodhicittavivaraṇa (D 1801/P 2666) and of the Pañcakrama. Āryadevapāda might be the author of the Cittaviśuddhiprakaraṇa (D 1804/P 2669; comp. D–/P 5028 [ascribed to Indrabhūti]) and the Jñānasārasamuccaya (D 3851/P 5251; see Mimaki, 1976). Candrakīrtipāda composed a commentary on the Guhyasamāja, the Pradīpoddyotana (D 1785/P 2650). Kambalapāda's Ālokamālā (D 3895/P 5866; see Lindtner, 2003) deserves to be mentioned for its close connection with Yogācāra. Advayavajra (or Maitrīpāda), Kṛṣṇapāda, and Vimalamitra are other significant figures of this doctrinal trend (see Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 106–108).

Finally, mention should be made of a few late Mādhyamikas whose biographies time and again testify to the ever greater impact of Tibet as a dynamic center of Buddhist intellectual life.

Atiśa (also known as Dīpaṅkaraśrījñāna; 982–1054 CE?), who was schooled by the best Magadhan teachers (Bodhibhadra, Jitāri, Kṛṣṇapāda, and Ratnākaraśānti) as well as by Dharmakīrti/Dharmapāla of Suvarṇadvīpa (i.e. Indonesia), occupies a prominent place among them. Atiśa left Vikramaśīla, where he likely wrote his Satyadvayāvatāra (D 3902, 4467/P 5298, 5380), for western Tibet, where he collaborated with the famous translator Rin chen bzang po (958–1055 CE), and central Tibet (see Eimer, 1977). His works include the important Bodhipathapradīpa (D 3947, 4465/P 5343, 5378; see Eimer, 1978), "a short guide to the path of awakening" (Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 111), in which Atiśa outlines the history of Madhyamaka and summarizes its main arguments for emptiness.

Among Atiśa's teachers, Bodhibhadra composed the Jñānasārasamuccayanibandhana (D 3852/P 5252; see Mimaki, 1976) and the more Vijñānavāda-inclined Dharmakīrti/Dharmapāla of Suvarṇadvīpa the Abhisamayālaṃkāraṭīkā (D 3794/P 5192). Ratnākaraśānti also sided more with the Yogācāra/Vijñānavāda than with the Madhyamaka (see Isaacson, 2013). Besides his tantric and logico-epistemological works (see above), this influential teacher authored a Madhyamakālaṃkāravṛtti (D 4072/P 5573), the Madhyamakālaṃkāropadeśa (D 4085/P 5586), the Triyānavyavasthāna (D 3712/P4535), and a Prajñāpāramitopadeśa (D 4079/P 5579), a "manual of the Yogācāra doctrine" (Katsura, 1976, 484).

Other important figures of late Indian Madhyamaka are Jayānanda (late 11th cent. CE?), the author of the Madhyamakāvatāraṭīkā and a short work on logic, the Tarkamudgara (D 3869/P 5270), and especially Abhayākaragupta. Abhayākaragupta, a *Yogācāra-mādhyamika master of Vikramaśīla and a prolific author in the field of tantric ritual, composed the Munimatālaṃkāra (D 3903/P 5299; see Isoda, 1981; 1983), which > expounds Mahāyānist gnoseology and soteriology in connection with the Prajñāpāramitā doctrine … [this work] bears testimony to the efforts made by the later Mādhyamikas systematically to elaborate a synthesis of the entire Mahāyānist tradition. (Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 114f.)

Bibliography

Aiyaswami Sastri, N., Satyasiddhiśāstra of Harivarman, 2 vols., Baroda, 1975–1978.

Aiyaswami Sastri, N., "Dvādaśamukha Śāstra of Nāgārjuna," VBA 6, 1954, 165–231.

Akamatsu, A., "Évolution de la Théorie de l'Apoha (L'Apohaprakaraṇa de Jñānaśrīmitra)," diss., Paris III Sorbonne Nouvelle University, 1983.

Ames, W.L., "Bhāvaviveka's Prajñāpradīpa," JIP 21, 1993, 209–259; 22, 1994, 93–135; 23, 1995, 295–365; BL 1, 1999, 1–119; 2, 2000, 1–91.

Ames, W.L., "Bhāvaviveka's Prajñāpradīpa: Six Chapters," diss., University of Washington, 1986.

Ames, W.L., "Bondage and Liberation according to the Mādhyamika School of Buddhism: A Study and Translation of Chapter Sixteen of the Mūlamadhyamakakārikās and Five of Its Commentaries," diss., University of Washington, 1982.

Arnold, D., "Buddhist Idealism, Epistemic and Otherwise: Thoughts on the Alternating Perspectives of Dharmakīrti," Sophia 47, 2008, 3–28.

Bendall, C., Çikshāsamuccaya: A Compendium of Buddhistic Teaching Compiled by Çāntideva Chiefly from Earlier Mahāyāna-Sūtras, Saint Petersburg, 1897–1902.

Bhattacharya, K., E.H. Johnston & A. Kunst, The Dialectical Method of Nāgārjuna: Vigrahavyāvartanī, Delhi, 1978, ^{2}1998.

Blumenthal, J., The Ornament of the Middle Way: A Study of the Madhyamaka Thought of Śāntarakṣita, Ithaca, 2004.

Bretfeld, S., "Visuelle Repräsentation im sogenannten 'buddhistischen Yogalehrbuch' aus Qïzïl," in: S. Bretfeld & J. Wilkens, eds., Indien und Zentralasien. Sprach- und Kulturkontakt, Wiesbaden, 2003, 167–205.

Bronkhorst, J., Why Is There Philosophy in India?, Amsterdam, 1999.

Buescher, H., "Distinguishing the Two Vasubandhus, the Bhāṣyakāra and the Kośakāra, as Yogācāra-Vijñānavāda Authors," in: U.T. Kragh, ed., The Practitioners: The Buddhist Yogācār Its Adaptation in India, East Asia, a MA, 2013, 368–396.

Buescher, H., The Inception of Yogācāra- 2008.

Buescher, H., Sthiramati's Triṃśikāvij Editions of the Sanskrit Text and Its Vienna, 2007.

Bühnemann, G., Jitāri. Kleine Texte, Vien

Bühnemann, G., Der allwissende Buddha.
Probleme. Ratnakīrtis Sarvajñasiddhi,

Cabezón, J., "Vasubandhu's Vyākhyāyu ticity of the Mahāyāna Sūtras," in: J.
Context: Traditional Hermeneutics in 1992, 221–243.

Campbell, W.L., She-rab Dong-bu or Praj 1919.

Chu, J., "Sanskrit Fragments of Dharma siddhi," in: H. Krasser, H. Lasic, E. eds., Religion and Logic in Buddhist Ph
Vienna, 2011, 33–42.

Clarke, R.W., & L. Jamspal, "The Diale Errors Establishing Logical Reasons,"

D'Amato, M., Maitreya's Distinguishing Extremes (Madhyāntavibhāga), along Commentary (Madhyāntavibhāgabhāṣ

Deleanu, F., The Chapter on th
(Laukikamārga) in the Śrāvakabhūmi: (Sanskrit, Tibetan, Chinese), Annotat
Introductory Study, 2 vols., Tokyo, 200

Deleanu, F., "A Preliminary Study of A Translation of the Yogācārabhūmi ( 1997, 33–52.

Deleanu, F., "Śrāvakayāna Yoga Practi Buddhism," WDDBKK 20, 1993, 3–12.

Delhey, M., "The Yogācārabhūmi Co tions, Translations, and Reference W ed., The Foundation for Yoga Practiti Yogācārabhūmi Treatise and Its Adap Asia, and Tibet, Cambridge MA, 2013,

Delhey, M., Samāhitā Bhūmiḥ. Das Kap tive Versenkung im Grundteil der Yog
Vienna, 2009.

Demiéville, P., "La Yogācārabhūmi de S 44/2, 1954, 339–436.

Dietz, S., "The bŚed pa'i phrin yig of Nāg tion of Tibetan Manuscripts of Dunhu Schaub, ed., Old Tibetan Studies, Leide

Dietz, S., Die buddhistische Briefliteratu tibetischen Tanjur herausgegeben, übe Wiesbaden, 1984.

Dorjee, A.P., Tarkasopānam of Ācār
Varanasi, 1994.

Dreyfus, G., & S.L. McClintock, "Introducti S.L. McClintock, eds., The Svātantrika- tion, Boston, 2003, 1–37.

Dunne, J.D., Foundations of Dharmakīrti's 2004.

Dutt, N., Bodhisattvabhūmi, Patna, 1978.

padeśa (D 4079/P 5579), a "manual octrine" (Katsura, 1976, 484). nt figures of late Indian Madhya-da (late 11th cent. CE?), the author akāvatāraṭīkā and a short work amudgara (D 3869/P 5270), and ākaragupta. Abhayākaragupta, a amika master of Vikramaśīla and n the field of tantric ritual, comatālaṃkāra (D 3903/P 5299; see which yānist gnoseology and soterioln with the Prajñāpāramitā dock] bears testimony to the efforts Mādhyamikas systematically to esis of the entire Mahāyānist tra-uegg, 1981, 114f.)

atyasiddhiśāstra of Harivarman, 2 vols.,

"Dvādaśamukha Śāstra of Nāgārjuna,"
.
lution de la Théorie de l'Apoha de Jñānaśrīmitra)," diss., Paris III/University, 1983.
eka's Prajñāpradīpa," JIP 21, 1993, 209–
; 23, 1995, 295–365; BL 1, 1999, 1–119; 2, veka's Prajñāpradīpa: Six Chapters," Vashington, 1986.

e and Liberation according to the l of Buddhism: A Study and Translaeen of the Mūlamadhyamakakārikās mentaries," diss., University of Wash-

Idealism, Epistemic and Otherwise: rnating Perspectives of Dharmakīrti," 8. uccaya: A Compendium of Buddhised by Çāntideva Chiefly from Earlier int Petersburg, 1897–1902.
Johnston & A. Kunst, The Dialecti- juna: Vigrahavyāvartanī, Delhi, 1978.

ament of the Middle Way: A Study of ought of Śāntarakṣita, Ithaca, 2004. epräsentation im sogenannten 'budrbuch' aus Qïzïl," in: S. Bretfeld & n und Zentralasien. Sprach- und Kul-n, 2003, 167–205.
ere Philosophy in India?, Amsterdam, ishing the Two Vasubandhus, the Kośakāra, as Yogācāra-Vijñānavāda

Authors," in: U.T. Kragh, ed., The Foundation for Yoga Practitioners: The Buddhist Yogācārabhūmi Treatise and Its Adaptation in India, East Asia, and Tibet, Cambridge MA, 2013, 368–396.

Buescher, H., The Inception of Yogācāra-Vijñānavāda, Vienna, 2008.

Buescher, H., Sthiramati's Triṃśikāvijñaptibhāṣya: Critical Editions of the Sanskrit Text and Its Tibetan Translation, Vienna, 2007.

Bühnemann, G., Jitāri. Kleine Texte, Vienna, 1982.

Bühnemann, G., Der allwissende Buddha. Ein Beweis und seine Probleme. Ratnakīrtis Sarvajñasiddhi, Vienna, 1980.

Cabezón, J., "Vasubandhu's Vyākhyāyukti and the Authenticity of the Mahāyāna Sūtras," in: J. Timm, ed., Texts in Context: Traditional Hermeneutics in South Asia, Albany, 1992, 221–243.

Campbell, W.L., She-rab Dong-bu or Prajnya Danda, Calcutta, 1919.

Chu, J., "Sanskrit Fragments of Dharmakīrti's Santānāntarasiddhi," in: H. Krasser, H. Lasic, E. Franco & B. Kellner, eds., Religion and Logic in Buddhist Philosophical Analysis, Vienna, 2011, 33–42.

Clarke, R.W., & L. Jamspal, "The Dialectic Which Refutes Errors Establishing Logical Reasons," GI 2/1, 1978, 1–14.

D'Amato, M., Maitreya's Distinguishing the Middle from the Extremes (Madhyāntavibhāga), along with Vasubandhu's Commentary (Madhyāntavibhāgabhāṣya), New York, 2012.

Deleanu, F., The Chapter on the Mundane Path (Laukikamārga) in the Śrāvakabhūmi: A Trilingual Edition (Sanskrit, Tibetan, Chinese), Annotated Translation, and Introductory Study, 2 vols., Tokyo, 2006.

Deleanu, F., "A Preliminary Study of An Shigao's (安世高) Translation of the Yogācārabhūmi (道地経)," KIDKK 17, 1997, 33–52.

Deleanu, F., "Śrāvakayāna Yoga Practices and Mahāyāna Buddhism," WDDBKK 20, 1993, 3–12.

Delhey, M., "The Yogācārabhūmi Corpus: Sources, Editions, Translations, and Reference Works," in: U.T. Kragh, ed., The Foundation for Yoga Practitioners: The Buddhist Yogācārabhūmi Treatise and Its Adaptation in India, East Asia, and Tibet, Cambridge MA, 2013, 498–561.

Delhey, M., Samāhitā Bhūmiḥ. Das Kapitel über die meditative Versenkung im Grundteil der Yogācārabhūmi, 2 vols., Vienna, 2009.

Demiéville, P., "La Yogācārabhūmi de Saṅgharakṣa," BÉFEO 44/2, 1954, 339–436.

Dietz, S., "The bŚed pa'i phrin yig of Nāgārjuna in the Collection of Tibetan Manuscripts of Dunhuang," in: C. Scherrer-Schaub, ed., Old Tibetan Studies, Leiden, 2012, 77–112.

Dietz, S., Die buddhistische Briefliteratur Indiens nach dem tibetischen Tanjur herausgegeben, übersetzt und erläutert, Wiesbaden, 1984.

Dorjee, A.P., Tarkasopānam of Ācārya Vidyākaraśānti, Varanasi, 1994.

Dreyfus, G., & S.L. McClintock, "Introduction," in: G. Dreyfus & S.L. McClintock, eds., The Svātantrika-Prāsaṅgika Distinction, Boston, 2003, 1–37.

Dunne, J.D., Foundations of Dharmakīrti's Philosophy, Boston, 2004.

Dutt, N., Bodhisattvabhūmi, Patna, 1978.

Eckel, M.D., Bhāviveka and His Buddhist Opponents, Cambridge MA, 2008.

Eckel, M.D., Jñānagarbha on the Two Truths: An Eighth Century Handbook of Madhyamaka Philosophy, Delhi, 1992.

Eckel, M.D., "A Question of Nihilism: Bhāvaviveka's Response to the Fundamental Problems of Mādhyamika Philosophy," diss., Harvard University, 1980.

Eimer, H., Bodhipathapradīpa. Ein Lehrgedicht des Atiśa (Dīpaṃkaraśrījñāna) in der tibetischen Überlieferung, Wiesbaden, 1978.

Eimer, H., Berichte über das Leben des Atiśa (Dīpaṅkaraśrījñāna). Eine Untersuchung der Quellen, Wiesbaden, 1977.

Ejima, Y., "Bhāvaviveka/Bhavya/Bhāviveka," IBK 38/2, 1990, 98–106.

Ejima, Y., "'Letter (31 March, 1980)' to Christian Lindtner on the Authenticity of Bhāviveka's Works," in: C. Lindtner, "Adversaria Buddhica," WZKS 22, 1982, 183.

Ejima, Y., Chūgan shisō no tenkai: Bhāvaviveka kenkyū (中観思想の展開: Bhāvaviveka 研究; The Development of Madhyamaka Thought: Studies on Bhāvaviveka), Tokyo, 1980.

Eltschinger, V., "Latest News from a Kashmirian 'Second Dharmakīrti': On the Life, Works and Confessional Identity of Śaṅkaranandana according to New Manuscript Resources," in: P. Mc Allister, H. Krasser & C. Scherrer-Schaub, eds., Proceedings of the International Conference on Cultural Flows across the Western Himalayas (Shimla, Institute of Advanced Sanskrit Studies, April 18–21, 2009), forthcoming a.

Eltschinger, V., "The Yogācārabhūmi against Allodoxies (paravāda): 1. Introduction and Doxography," WZKS, forthcoming b.

Eltschinger, V., "Aśvaghoṣa and (His) Canonical Sources. I. Preaching Selflessness to King Bimbisāra and the Magadhans (Buddhacarita 16.73–93)," JIP 41/2, 2013, 167–194.

Eltschinger, V., "Debate, Salvation and Apologetics: On the Institutionalization of Dialectics in the Buddhist Monastic Environment," in: F. Voegeli et al., eds., Devadattīyam: Johannes Bronkhorst Felicitation Volume, Bern, 2012, 429–489.

Eltschinger, V., "Dharmakīrti," RIPh 64/3, 2010a, 397–440.

Eltschinger, V., "On a Hitherto Neglected Text against Buddhist Personalism: Mahāyānasūtrālaṅkāra 18.93–102 and Bhāṣya," AS 64/2, 2010b, 291–340.

Eltschinger, V., "Śaṅkaranandana's Sarvajñasiddhi – A Preliminary Report," in: F. Sferra, ed., Manuscripta Buddhica: 1: Manuscripts from Giuseppe Tucci's Collection, Part I, Rome, 2008, 115–156.

Eltschinger, V., Penser l'autorité des Écritures: La polémique de Dharmakīrti contre la notion brahmanique orthodoxe d'un Veda incréé, Vienna, 2007.

Eltschinger, V., "La Vedaprāmāṇyasiddhi de Jitāri: Introduction et traduction," JA 291/1–2, 2003, 137–172.

Eltschinger, V., "Śubhagupta's Śrutiparīkṣākārikā (vv. 10cd–19) and Its Dharmakīrtian Background," in: S. Katsura, ed., Dharmakīrti's Thought and Its Impact on Indian and Tibetan Philosophy, Vienna, 1999, 47–61.

Eltschinger, V., H. Krasser, & J. Taber, Can the Veda Speak? Dharmakīrti against Mīmāṃsā Exegetics and Vedic Authority, Vienna, 2012.

Eltschinger, V., & I. Ratié, Self, No-Self, and Salvation: Dharmakīrti's Critique of the Notions of Self and Person, Vienna, 2013.

Erb, F., Śūnyatāsaptati. Candrakīrtis Kommentar zu den 'Siebzig Versen über die Leerheit' des Nāgārjuna [Kārikās 1–14], Stuttgart, 1997.

Franco, E., "Variant Readings from Tucci's Photographs of the Yoginirṇayaprakaraṇa Manuscript," in: F. Sferra, ed., Manuscripta Buddhica: 1: Manuscripts from Giuseppe Tucci's Collection, Part I, Rome, 2008, 157–186.

Franco, E., The Spitzer Manuscript: The Oldest Philosophical Manuscript in Sanskrit, 2 vols., Vienna, 2004.

Franco, E., Dharmakīrti on Compassion and Rebirth, Vienna, 1997.

Franco, E., & K. Preisendanz, "Vorwort" in: E. Frauwallner, Die Philosophie des Buddhismus, Berlin, ^{5}2010, xi–xxx.

Frauwallner, E., Die Philosophie des Buddhismus, Berlin, 1956; ET: The Philosophy of Buddhism, Delhi, 2010.

Frauwallner, E., "Erkenntnistheorie und Logik der klassischen Zeit," in: E. Steinkellner, ed., E. Frauwallner, Nachgelassene Werke. I. Aufsätze, Beiträge, Skizzen, Vienna, 1984, 67–87.

Frauwallner, E., "Dignāga, sein Werk und seine Entwicklung," WZKSO 3, 1959, 83–164.

Frauwallner, E., "Die Erkenntnislehre des klassischen Sāṃkhya-Systems," WZKSO 2, 1958, 84–139.

Frauwallner, E., "Vasubandhu's Vādavidhiḥ," WZKSO 1, 1957, 104–146.

Frauwallner, E., "Die Reihenfolge und Entstehung der Werke Dharmakīrti's," in: J. Schubert & U. Schneider, eds., Asiatica. Festschrift Friedrich Weller, Leipzig, 1954, 142–154.

Frauwallner, E., On the Date of the Buddhist Master of the Law Vasubandhu, Rome, 1951.

Frauwallner, E., "Beiträge zur Apohalehre. II. Dharmottara," WZKM 44, 1937, 233–287.

Frauwallner, E., "Dharmottaras Kṣaṇabhaṅgasiddhiḥ," WZKM 42, 1935, 217–258.

Frauwallner, E., "Dharmakīrtis Sambandhaparīkṣā. Text und Übersetzung," WZKM 41, 1934, 261–300.

Frauwallner, E., "Zu den Fragmenten buddhistischer Logiker im Nyāyavārttikam," WZKM 40, 1933, 281–304.

Frauwallner, E., "Dignāgas Ālambanaparīkṣā. Text, Übersetzung und Erläuterungen," WZKM 37, 1930, 174–194.

Funayama, T., "A Study of Kalpanāpoḍha: A Translation of the Tattvasaṃgraha vv.1212–1263 by Śāntarakṣita and the Tattvasaṃgrahapañjikā by Kamalaśīla on the Definition of Direct Perception," Zinbun 27, 1992, 33–128.

Gard, R.A., "On the Authenticity of the Pai-lun 百論 and Shi-erh-mên-lun 十二門論," IBK 2/2, 1954, 751–742.

Gillon, B., & S. Katsura, *An English Translation of the Upāyahṛaya, forthcoming.

Gnoli, R., The Pramāṇavārttikam of Dharmakīrti: The First Chapter with the Auto-Commentary, Rome, 1960.

Gokhale, V.V., "Fragment from the Abhidharmasamuccaya of Asaṅga," JBBRASNS 23, 1947, 13–38.

Gokhale, V.V., Akṣara-Çatakam: The Hundred Letters, Heidelberg, 1930.

Goshima, K., "Jūnimonron to sono shūhen" (ナーガールジュナ作『十二門論』とその周辺; Nāgārjuna's Twelve-Gate Treatise and Its Surroundings), in: S. Katsura, A. Saito, M. Shimoda & F. Sueki, eds., 『シリーズ大乗仏教6 空と中観』 (Series Mahāyāna Buddhism 6 Emptiness and Madhyamaka), Tokyo, 2012, 43–66.

Goshima, K., "The Twelve-Gate Treatise and Nāgārjuna, Piṅgala, and Kumārajīva," IBK 53/1, 2004, 380–376; 55/2, 2007, 932–926.

Goshima, K., "Jūnimonron no kōsei to chosha mondai" (『十二門論』の構成と著者問題; On the Structure and Author of The Twelve-Gate Treatise), in: 櫻部建博士喜寿記念論集刊行会 (Sakurabe Hajime Hakase Kiju Kinen Ronshū Kankōkai), ed., Early Buddhism and Abhidharma Thought in Honor of Doctor Hajime Sakurabe on His Seventy-seventh Birthday, Kyoto, 2002, 447–465.

Goshima, K., The Tibetan Text of the Second Bhāvanākrama, Kyoto, 1983.

Griffiths, P.J., On Being Mindless: Buddhist Meditation and the Mind-Body Problem, La Salle, 1986.

Hahn, M., Hundert Strophen von der Lebensklugheit – Nāgārjuna's Prajñāśataka, Tibetisch und Deutsch, Bonn, 1990.

Hahn, M., "Die indischen Nītiśāstras im tibetischen Tanjur," ZDMG 6, 1985, 227–237.

Hahn, M., Nāgārjuna's Ratnāvalī, Bonn, 1982.

Hakeda, Y., The Awakening of Faith, Attributed to Aśvaghosha, New York, 1967.

Harimoto, K., & K. Kano, "Fragments of a Commentary on the Tattvasaṅgraha, Part 1," NNGMCP 6, 2008, 15–24.

Hartmann, J.U., "Neue Fragmente aus dem 'Yogalehrbuch,'" in: F. Wilhelm, ed., Festschrift, Dieter Schlingloff zur Vollendung des 65. Lebensjahres dargebracht von Schülern, Freunden und Kollegen, Reinbek, 1996, 127–135.

Hattori, M., The Pramāṇasamuccayavṛtti of Dignāga: With Jinendrabuddhi's Commentary. Chapter Five: Anyāpoha-parīkṣā: Tibetan Text with Sanskrit Fragments, Kyoto, 1982.

Hattori, M., "The Sautrāntika Background of the Apoha Theory," in: L.S. Kawamura, ed., Buddhist Thought and Asian Civilization: Essays in Honour of Herbert V. Guenther on His Sixtieth Birthday, Emeryville, 1977, 47–58.

Hattori, M., Dignāga: On Perception: Being the Pratyakṣapariccheda of Dignāga's Pramāṇasamuccaya from the Sanskrit Fragments and the Tibetan Versions, Cambridge MA, 1968.

Hayashima, O., "Dharmaparyeṣṭi, The XIth Chapter of the Sūtrālaṃkāravṛttibhāṣya Subcommentary on the Mahāyāna-sūtrālaṃkāra – Its Synopsis and Tibetan Text, Edited and Collated on the Basis of the Derge and the Peking Editions," NKJK 26, 1977, 19–61; 27, 1978, 73–119; 28, 1979, 37–79; 31, 1982, 55–95; 32, 1983, 11–23.

Hayes, R.P., Dignāga on the Interpretation of Signs, Dordrecht, 1988.

Hedinger, J., Aspekte der Schulung in der Laufbahn eines Bodhisattva. Dargestellt nach dem Śikṣāsamuccaya des Śāntideva, Wiesbaden, 1984.

Heitmann, A., Textedition und -kritik von Bhavyas Madhyamaka-hṛdayakārikā I–III, Hamburg, 2009.

Heitmann, A., Nektar der Erkenntnis. Buddhistische Philosophie des 6. Jh.: Bhavyas Tarkajvālā I–III.26, Aachen, 2004.

Hermann-Pfandt, A., Die lHan kar ma. Ein früher Katalog der ins Tibetische übersetzten buddhistischen Texte, Vienna, 2008.

Horiuchi, T., Vasubandhu's Proof
the Mahāyāna as Found in the Vyākhyāyukti, Tokyo, 2009.
Hugon, P., & T. Tomabechi, Dharmak
Chapter 3, Beijing, 2011.
Huntington, C.W., "The Akutobh Madhyamaka," diss., University of Ichigo, M., Madhyamakālaṅkāra o
Own Commentary or Vṛtti and wit
Pañjikā of Kamalaśīla, 2 vols., Kyo Inami, M., K. Matsuda & T. Tani, A vārttikaṭīkā by Śākyabuddhi from Collection, Kathmandu, Part I: Sa scribed, Tokyo, 1992.
Isaacson, H., "Yogācāra and Va Ratnākaraśānti," in: U.T. Kragh, Yoga Practitioners: The Buddhist and Its Adaptation in India, East bridge MA, 2013, 1036–1051.
Ishida, H., "Dharmottaras Pramāṇavi Realität basierenden logischen Ne
versity, 2011.
Isoda, H., "A Study of the Munimatā 885–879; 32/1, 1983, 443–438.
Iwata, T., Sahopalambhaniyama. St des Schlusses von der Tatsache, da stand ausschließlich zusammen w auf deren Nichtverschiedenheit, 2 v Iyengar, H.R., Tarkabhāṣā and Vādast and Jitāripāda, Mysore, 1952.
Jaini, P.S., "The Sanskrit Fragm Triṃśikāṭīkā," BSOAS 48/2, 1985, 4 Jambuvijaya, M., Nyāyapraveśakaś Diṅnāga (The Father of Buddhist L tary of Ācārya Haribhadrasūri an tary of Pārśvadevagaṇi, Delhi, 200 Jamspal, L., et al., The Universal Veh (Mahāyānasūtrālaṅkāra) by Ma
Together with Its Commentary (B
New York, 2004.
Johnston, E.H., The Ratnagotravibh traśāstra, in: H.S. Prasad, The Ut Containing Introduction, E.H. John E. Obermiller's English Translation, Jong, J.W. de, "Textcritical Notes on 20, 1978, 25–59.
Jong, J.W. de, Nāgārjuna: Mūlamadhy
1977.
Jong, J.W. de, "'Review' of W. Rahul Super-doctrine (Paris, 1971)," TP 59, Jong, J.W. de, "'Review' of Lamotte 197 Jong, J.W. de, "La Madhyamakaśāst OE 9, 1962, 47–56.
Jong, J.W. de, Cinq chapitres de la Pra
Kajiyama, Y., The Antarvyāptisamart
Tokyo, 1999.
Kajiyama, Y., "On the Authorship o
E. Steinkellner, ed., Studies in the B
Tradition, Vienna, 1991, 107–117.
Kajiyama, Y., "Bukkyō chishiki ron の形成; The Formulation of Bud da & F. Sueki, eds., 『シリーズ大乗仏教 6 ries Mahāyāna Buddhism 6 Emptiness and Tokyo, 2012, 43–66.

e Twelve-Gate Treatise and Nāgārjuna, umārajīva," IBK 53/1, 2004, 380–376; 55/2, nimonron no kōsei to chosha mondai" の構成と著者問題; On the Structure and Twelve-Gate Treatise), in: 櫻部建博士喜 行会 (Sakurabe Hajime Hakase Kiju Kinen kai), ed., Early Buddhism and Abhidharma nor of Doctor Hajime Sakurabe on His Sevrthday, Kyoto, 2002, 447–465.

Tibetan Text of the Second Bhāvanākrama, eing Mindless: Buddhist Meditation and the blem, La Salle, 1986.

lert Strophen von der Lebensklugheit – ajñāśataka, Tibetisch und Deutsch, Bonn, dischen Nītiśāstras im tibetischen Tanjur," 27–237.

na's Ratnāvalī, Bonn, 1982.
wakening of Faith, Attributed to Aśvaghoṣa,

. Kano, "Fragments of a Commentary on raha, Part 1," NNGMCP 6, 2008, 15–24. eue Fragmente aus dem 'Yogalehrbuch,'" ed., Festschrift, Dieter Schlingloff zur Vol-
. Lebensjahres dargebracht von Schülern, ollegen, Reinbek, 1996, 127–135.
Pramāṇasamuccayavṛtti of Dignāga: With
's Commentary. Chapter Five: Anyāpoha-Text with Sanskrit Fragments, Kyoto, 1982. autrāntika Background of the Apoha The-wamura, ed., Buddhist Thought and Asian ays in Honour of Herbert V. Guenther on His y, Emeryville, 1977, 47–58. ignāga: On Perception: Being the cheda of Dignāga's Pramāṇasamuccaya krit Fragments and the Tibetan Versions, , 1968. harmaparyeṣṭi, The XIth Chapter of the tibhāṣya Subcommentary on the Mahāyāna-Its Synopsis and Tibetan Text, Edited and Basis of the Derge and the Peking Edition," 19–61; 27, 1978, 73–119; 28, 1979, 37–70; 31, 1983, 11–23.
ga on the Interpretation of Signs, Dordrecht, ekte der Schulung in der Laufbahn eines argestellt nach dem Śikṣāsamuccaya des sbaden, 1984.

edition und -kritik von Bhavyas Madhyamaka-
-III, Hamburg, 2009.
ktar der Erkenntnis. Buddhistische Philosohavyas Tarkajvālā I–III.26, Aachen, 2004.
A., Die lHan kar ma. Ein früher Katalog der ersetzten buddhistischen Texte, Vienna, 2008.

Horiuchi, T., Vasubandhu's Proof of the Authenticity of the Mahāyāna as Found in the Fourth Chapter of His Vyākhyāyukti, Tokyo, 2009.

Hugon, P., & T. Tomabechi, Dharmakīrti's Pramāṇaviniścaya, Chapter 3, Beijing, 2011.

Huntington, C.W., "The Akutobhayā and Early Indian Madhyamaka," diss., University of Michigan, 1986.

Ichigo, M., Madhyamakālaṅkāra of Śāntarakṣita with His Own Commentary or Vṛtti and with the Subcommentary or Pañjikā of Kamalaśīla, 2 vols., Kyoto, 1985.

Inami, M., K. Matsuda & T. Tani, A Study of the Pramāṇavārttikaṭīkā by Śākyabuddhi from the National Archives Collection, Kathmandu, Part I: Sanskrit Fragments Transcribed, Tokyo, 1992.

Isaacson, H., "Yogācāra and Vajrayāna according to Ratnākaraśānti," in: U.T. Kragh, ed., The Foundation for Yoga Practitioners: The Buddhist Yogācārabhūmi Treatise and Its Adaptation in India, East Asia, and Tibet, Cambridge MA, 2013, 1036–1051.

Ishida, H., "Dharmottaras Pramāṇaviniścayaṭīkā zum auf der Realität basierenden logischen Nexus," diss., Vienna University, 2011.

Isoda, H., "A Study of the Munimatālaṅkāra," IBK 29/2, 1981, 885–879; 32/1, 1983, 443–438.

Iwata, T., Sahopalambhaniyama. Struktur und Entwicklung des Schlusses von der Tatsache, daß Erkenntnis und Gegenstand ausschließlich zusammen wahrgenommen werden, auf deren Nichtverschiedenheit, 2 vols., Stuttgart, 1991.

Iyengar, H.R., Tarkabhāṣā and Vādasthāna of Mokṣākaragupta and Jitāripāda, Mysore, 1952.

Jaini, P.S., "The Sanskrit Fragments of Vinītadeva's Triṃśikāṭīkā," BSOAS 48/2, 1985, 470–492.

Jambuvijaya, M., Nyāyapraveśakaśāstra of Baudh Ācārya Diṅnāga (The Father of Buddhist Logic) with the Commentary of Ācārya Haribhadrasūri and with the Subcommentary of Pārśvadevagaṇi, Delhi, 2009.

Jamspal, L., et al., The Universal Vehicle Discourse Literature (Mahāyānasūtrālaṅkāra) by Maitreyanātha/Āryāsaṅga Together with Its Commentary (Bhāṣya) by Vasubandhu, New York, 2004.

Johnston, E.H., The Ratnagotravibhāga Mahāyānottaratantraśāstra, in: H.S. Prasad, The Uttaratantra of Maitreya: Containing Introduction, E.H. Johnston's Sanskrit Text and E. Obermiller's English Translation, Delhi, 1991, 51–197.

Jong, J.W. de, "Textcritical Notes on the Prasannapadā," IIJ 20, 1978, 25–59.

Jong, J.W. de, Nāgārjuna: Mūlamadhyamakakārikāḥ, Madras, 1977.

Jong, J.W. de, "'Review' of W. Rahula, Le Compendium de la Super-doctrine (Paris, 1971)," TP 59, 1973, 339–346.

Jong, J.W. de, "'Review' of Lamotte 1970," AM 17/1, 1971, 105–112.

Jong, J.W. de, "La Madhyamakaśāstrastuti de Candrakīrti," OE 9, 1962, 47–56.

Jong, J.W. de, Cinq chapitres de la Prasannapadā, Paris, 1949.

Kajiyama, Y., The Antarvyāptisamarthana of Ratnākaraśānti, Tokyo, 1999.

Kajiyama, Y., "On the Authorship of the Upāyahṛdaya," in: E. Steinkellner, ed., Studies in the Buddhist Epistemological Tradition, Vienna, 1991, 107–117.

Kajiyama, Y., "Bukkyō chishiki ron no keisei" (仏教知識論の形成; The Formulation of Buddhist Epistemology), in: A. Hirakawa, Y. Kajiyama & J. Takasaki, eds., Kōza daijō bukkyō 9: ninshikiron to ronrigaku (講座大乗仏教 9 認識論と論理学; Lectures on Mahāyāna Buddhism 9, Epistemology and Logic), Tokyo, 1984, 1–101.

Kajiyama, Y., An Introduction to Buddhist Philosophy: An Annotated Translation of the Tarkabhāṣā of Mokṣākaragupta, Kyoto, 1966.

Kajiyama, Y., "The Vaidalyaprakaraṇa of Nāgārjuna," IGS 6–7, 1965a, 129–155.

Kajiyama, Y., "Buddhist Solipsism: A Free Translation of Ratnakīrti's Saṃtānāntaradūṣaṇa," IBK 13/1, 1965b, 435–420.

Kajiyama, Y., "Bhāviveka's Prajñāpradīpaḥ (1. Kapitel)," WZKSO 7, 1963, 37–62.

Kang, S.Y., Die Debatte im alten Indien. Untersuchungen zum Sambhāṣāvidhi und verwandten Themen in der Carakasaṃhitā Vimānasthāna 8.15–28, Reinbek, 2003.

Kano, K., "Two Short Glosses on Yogācāra Texts by Vairocanarakṣita: Viṃśikāṭīkāvivṛti and *Dharmadharmatāvibhāgavivṛti," in: F. Sferra, ed., Manuscripta Buddhica: 1: Manuscripts from Giuseppe Tucci's Collection, Part I, Rome, 2008, 343–380.

Katsura, S., et al., Jinendrabuddhi's Viśālāmalavatī Pramāṇasamuccayaṭīkā, Chapter 3, 2 vols., forthcoming.

Katsura, S., "Inmyō shōri mon ron kenkyū" (因明正理門論研究; A Study of the Nyāyamukha), HDBK 37, 1977, 106–126; 38, 1978, 110–113; 39, 1979, 83–82; 41, 1981, 62–82; 42, 1982, 82–99; 44, 1984, 43–74; 46, 1987, 46–85.

Katsura, S., "Harivarman on Satyadvaya," IBK 27/2, 1979, 961–957.

Katsura, S., "Harivarman on Sarvāstivāda," IBK 26/2, 1978, 1063–1058.

Katsura, S., "A Synopsis of the Prajñāpāramitopadeśa of Ratnākaraśānti," IBK 25/1, 1976, 487–484.

Keira, R., Mādhyamika and Epistemology: A Study of Kamalaśīla's Method for Proving the Voidness of All Dharmas, Vienna, 2004.

Kellner, B., Jñānaśrīmitra's Anupalabdhirahasya and Sarvaśabdābhāvacarcā: A Critical Edition with a Survey of His Anupalabdhi-Theory, Vienna, 2007.

Kellner, B., & J. Taber, "Studies in Yogācāra-Vijñānavāda Idealism I: The Interpretation of Vasubandhu's Viṃśikā," AS, forthcoming.

Kitagawa, H., "A Study of a Short Philosophical Treatise Ascribed to Dignāga," SIS 5/3–4, 1952, 126–137.

Kitagawa, H., Indo koten ronrigaku no kenkyū, Jinna (Dignāga) no taikei (インド古典論理学の研究、陳那 [Dignāga] の体系; Study of Indian Classical Logic, System of Dignāga), Tokyo, 1973.

Kragh, U.T., ed., The Foundation for Yoga Practitioners: The Buddhist Yogācārabhūmi Treatise and Its Adaptation in India, East Asia, and Tibet, Cambridge MA, 2013.

Kramer, J., Sthiramati's Pañcaskandhavibhāṣā, 2 vols., Beijing, forthcoming.

Kramer, J., Kategorien der Wirklichkeit im frühen Yogācāra. Der Fünf-vastu-Abschnitt in der Viniścayasaṃgrahaṇī der Yogācārabhūmi, Wiesbaden, 2005.

Krasser, H., Dharmakīrti's Hetubindu: Diplomatic and Critical Edition, forthcoming.

Krasser, H., "Bhāviveka, Dharmakīrti, and Kumārila," in: F. Voegeli et al., eds., Devadattīyam: Johannes Bronkhorst Felicitation Volume, Bern, 2012, 535–594.

Krasser, H., "How to Teach a Buddhist Monk to Refute the Outsiders: Text-Critical Remarks on Some Works by Bhāviveka," DJRBT 51, 2011, 49–76.

Krasser, H., Śaṅkaranandanas Īśvarāpākaraṇasaṅkṣepa, mit einem anonymen Kommentar und weiteren Materialien zur buddhistischen Gottespolemik, 2 vols., Vienna, 2002.

Krasser, H., "On the Dates and Works of Śaṅkaranandana," in: R. Torella, ed., Le parole e i marmi: Studi in onore di Raniero Gnoli nel suo 70° compleano, 2 vols., Rome, 2001, 489–508.

Krasser, H., Dharmottaras kurze Untersuchung der Gültigkeit einer Erkenntnis. Laghuprāmāṇyaparīkṣā, 2 vols., Vienna, 1991.

Krasser, H., & H. Lasic, Jinendrabuddhi's Viśālāmalavatī Pramāṇasamuccayaṭīkā, Chapter 5, forthcoming.

Krishnamacharya, E., Tarkabhāṣā of Mokṣākara Gupta, Baroda, 1942.

Krishnamacharya, E., Tattvasaṅgraha of Śāntarakṣita with the Commentary of Kamalaśīla, 2 vols., Baroda, 1926.

Kritzer, R., Vasubandhu and the Yogācārabhūmi: Yogācāra Elements in the Abhidharmakośabhāṣya, Tokyo, 2005.

Kuijp, L. van der, "Yogācārada: A Twelfth-Century Guoshi from Kashmir among the Tangut," CAJ 37/3–4, 1993, 188–197.

Kyuma, T., Sein und Wirklichkeit in der Augenblicklichkeitslehre Jñānaśrīmitras. Kṣaṇabhaṅgādhyāya I: Pakṣadharmatādhikāra, Vienna, 2005.

La Vallée Poussin, L. de, "Le Joyau dans la main," MCB 2, 1932–1933, 68–138.

La Vallée Poussin, L. de, "Le Petit traité de Vasubandhu-Nāgārjuna sur les trois natures," MCB 2, 1932–1933, 147–162.

La Vallée Poussin, L. de, Vijñaptimātratāsiddhi. La Siddhi de Hiuan-Tsang, 2 vols., Paris, 1928–1929.

La Vallée Poussin, L. de, Tibetan Translation of the Nyāyabindu of Dharmakīrti (A Treatise on Buddhist Logic) with the Commentary of Vinītadeva, Calcutta, 1913.

La Vallée Poussin, L. de, Madhyamakāvatāra par Candrakīrti: Traduction tibétaine, Saint Petersburg, 1912.

La Vallée Poussin, L. de, Prajñākaramati's Commentary to the Bodhicaryāvatāra of Śāntideva, Calcutta, 1904–1912.

La Vallée Poussin, L. de, Madhyamakavṛttiḥ: Mūlamadhyamakakārikās (Mādhyamikasūtras) de Nāgārjuna avec la Prasannapadā, Commentaire de Candrakīrti, Saint Petersburg, 1903–1913.

Lamotte, É., L'Enseignement de Vimalakīrti (Vimalakīrtinirdeśa), Louvain-la-Neuve, 1987.

Lamotte, É., La Somme du Grand Véhicule d'Asaṅga (Mahāyānasaṃgraha), 2 vols., Louvain-la-Neuve, 1973.

Lamotte, É., Le Traité de la Grande Vertu de Sagesse de Nāgārjuna (Mahāprajñāpāramitāśāstra), vol. III, Louvain, 1970.

Lamotte, É., Le Traité de la Grande Vertu de Sagesse de Nāgārjuna (Mahāprajñāpāramitāśāstra), vol. II, Louvain, 1949.

Lamotte, É., "Le Traité de l'acte de Vasubandhu," MCB 4, 1936, 151–288.

Lamotte, É., Saṃdhinirmocanasūtra, l'explication des mystères, Louvain, 1935.

Lang, K.C., Four Illusions: Candrakīrti's Advice to Travelers on the Bodhisattva Path, Oxford, 2003.

Lang, K.C., Āryadeva's Catuḥśataka: On the Bodhisattva's Cultivation of Merit and Knowledge, Copenhagen, 1986.

Lasic, H., Sanskrit Reconstruction of Dignāga's Pramāṇasamuccaya, Chapter 2, forthcoming.

Lasic, H., Ratnakīrtis Vyāptinirṇaya. Sanskrittext, Übersetzung, Analyse, Vienna, 2000a.

Lasic, H., Jñānaśrīmitras Vyāpticarcā. Sanskrittext, Übersetzung, Analyse, Vienna, 2000b.

Lasic, H., H. Krasser & E. Steinkellner, Jinendrabuddhi's Viśālāmalavatī Pramāṇasamuccayaṭīkā, Chapter 2, 2 vols., Beijing, 2012.

Lee, J.C., The Tibetan Text of the Vyākhyāyukti of Vasubandhu, Tokyo, 2001.

Lévi, S., Matériaux pour l'étude du système Vijñaptimātratā, Paris, 1932.

Lévi, S., Vijñaptimātratā-siddhi: Deux traités de Vasubandhu. Viṃśatikā (La Vingtaine) accompagnée d'une explication en prose et Triṃśikā (La Trentaine) avec le commentaire de Sthiramati, Paris, 1925.

Lévi, S., Mahāyāna-Sūtrālaṃkāra: Exposé de la doctrine du Grand-Véhicule selon le système Yogācāra, Paris, 1911.

Lévi, S., Asaṅga: Mahāyāna-Sūtrālaṃkāra: Exposé de la doctrine du Grand Véhicule, Paris, 1907.

Li, X., K. Kano & S. Ye, "A Sanskrit Folio of the Yuktiṣaṣṭikāvṛtti Newly Found in Tibet," ARIRIAB 17, 2014, 189–194.

Li, X., H. Krasser, H. Lasic & A. MacDonald, Candrakīrti's Madhyamakāvatāra, Chapters 1 to 5: Diplomatic and Critical Editions, forthcoming.

Li, X., & E. Steinkellner, Vasubandhu's Pancaskandhaka, Beijing, 2008.

Li, X., & S. Ye, Liushirulisong: Fanzanghan Hejiao, Daodu, Yizhu (《六十如理颂》—梵藏汉合校 • 导读 • 译注 Yuktiṣaṣṭikā: Editions of the Sanskrit, Tibetan and Chinese Versions, with Commentary and a Modern Chinese Translation), Shanghai, forthcoming.

Lindtner, C., A Garland of Light: Kambala's Ālokamālā, Fremont, 2003.

Lindtner, C., Madhyamakahṛdayam of Bhavya, Chennai, 2001.

Lindtner, C., Nagarjuniana: Studies in the Writings and Philosophy of Nāgārjuna, Copenhagen, 1982a.

Lindtner, C., "Adversaria Buddhica," WZKS 22, 1982b, 167–194.

Lindtner, C., "Apropos Dharmakīrti: Two New Works and a New Date," AO 41, 1980, 27–37.

Mabbett, I., "The Problem of the Historical Nāgārjuna Revisited," JAOS 118/3, 1998, 332–346.

MacDonald, A., Prasannapadā: A Critical Edition of the First Chapter, forthcoming.

MacDonald, A., "The Prasannapadā: More Manuscripts from Nepal," WZKS 44, 2000, 165–181.

Malvania, P.D., Paṇḍita Durveka Miśras's Dharmottarapradīpa (Being a Sub-commentary on Dharmottara's Nyāyabinduṭīkā, a Commentary on Dharmakīrti's Nyāyabindu), Patna, 1971.

Mathes, K.D., Unterscheidung der Gegebenheiten von ihrem wahren Wesen (Dharmadharmatāvibhāga). Eine Lehrschrift der Yogācāra-Schule in tibetischer Überlieferung, Swisttal-Odendorf, 1996.

May, J., "Āryadeva et Candrakīrti sur la permanence," in: Indianisme et bouddhisme, Mélanges offerts à Mgr Etienne Lamotte, Louvain, 1980, 215–232; BÉFEO 69, 1981, 75–96; AS 35/2, 1981, 47–76; ÉdL 3, 1982, 45–76; IKK 6, 1984, 115–144.

May, J., "La philosophie bouddhique idéal 265–323.
May, J., Candrakīrti: Prasannapadā Madhy
1959.
Mc Allister, P., "Ratnakīrti's Apohasiddhi: Annotated Translation and Study," diss
sity, 2011.
McClintock, S.L., Omniscience and the Rh Śāntarakṣita and Kamalaśīla on Ration tion, and Religious Authority, Boston, 201 McCrea, L.J., & P.G. Patil, Buddhist Philosop
India: Jñānaśrīmitra on Exclusion, New Y McDermott, A.C.S., An Eleventh-Century
"Exists": Ratnakīrti's Kṣaṇabhaṅgasiddh Dordrecht, 1969.
Mejor, M., Vasubandhu's Abhidharmakośa
taries Preserved in the Tanjur, Stuttgart, Mejor, M., "The Problem of the Two Vasub ered," IT 15–16, 1989–1990, 275–283.
Mikogami, E., "Śubhagupta no communi バグプタのコミュニケーション論; Ś munication Theory), in: E. Mayeda, ed., Buddhism and Mahāyāna Buddhism i of Late Professor Dr. Fumimaro Watan 1993, 151–167.
Mimaki, K., La réfutation bouddhique de choses (Sthirasiddhidūṣaṇa) et la preuve ité des choses (Kṣaṇabhaṅgasiddhi), Par Miyasaka, Y., "Pramāṇavārttika-kārik Tibetan)," IKK 2, 1971–1972, 1–206.
Moriyama, S., Omniscience and Re
Prajñākaragupta's Commentary on P 8–10 and 29–33, forthcoming.
Much, M.T., Dharmakīrtis Vādanyāyaḥ, 2 v Much, M.T., "Fragments from Dignāga Dharmakīrti Buddhist Polemic ag Nigrahasthāna," in: E. Steinkellner, Buddhist Epistemological Tradition, Vie Muroji, Y., The Tibetan Text of the Karm of Vasubandhu, with Reference to the bhāṣya and the Pratītya-samutpād 1985.
Nagao, G.M., Madhyāntavibhāgabhāṣya
sophical Treatise Edited for the First T Manuscript, Tokyo, 1964.
Nakamura, H., Indian Buddhism: A Surve
cal Notes, Delhi, 1980.
Nance, R.F., Speaking for Buddhas: Script
Indian Buddhism, New York, 2012.
Nōnin, M., et al., Daijō shōgon kyōron dai aku to chūkai – kuyō, shiji, muryō toku 荘厳経論第 XVII 章の和訳と注解—とくに悲無量 –; Mahāyānasūtrālaṃ
Sanskrit and Tibetan Texts and A Translation), Kyoto, 2013.
Nōnin, M., et al., Daijō shōgonkyōron da chūkai: Daijō no kakuritsu (大乗荘 訳と注解: 大乗の確立; An Annotate First Chapter of the Mahāyānasūtrā lishment of Mahāyāna), Kyoto, 2009.

skrit Reconstruction of Dignāga's aya, Chapter 2, forthcoming.
tis Vyāptinirṇaya. Sanskrittext, Überset-enna, 2000a. nitras Vyāpticarcā. Sanskrittext, Überset-enna, 2000b. ser & E. Steinkellner, Jinendrabuddhi's ramāṇasamuccayaṭīkā, Chapter 2, 2 vols., n Text of the Vyākhyāyukti of Vasubandhu, pour l'étude du système Vijñaptimātratā, tratā-siddhi: Deux traités de Vasubandhu: ingtaine) accompagnée d'une explication ikā (La Trentaine) avec le commentaire de , 1925.

-Sūtrālaṃkāra: Exposé de la doctrine du elon le système Yogācāra, Paris, 1911. ahāyāna-Sūtrālaṃkāra: Exposé de la doc-éhicule, Paris, 1907.
e, "A Sanskrit Folio of the Yuktiṣaṣṭikāvṛtti Tibet," ARIRIAB 17, 2014, 189–194.
H. Lasic & A. MacDonald, Candrakīrti's āra, Chapters 1 to 5: Diplomatic and Criticoming.
kellner, Vasubandhu's Pancaskandhaka, shirulisong: Fanzanghan Hejiao, Daodu, 理颂》—梵藏汉合校 • 导读 • 译注;

tions of the Sanskrit, Tibetan and Chinese ommentary and a Modern Chinese Trans-
, forthcoming.
arland of Light: Kambala's Ālokamālā, amakahṛdayam of Bhavya, Chennai, 2001. juniana: Studies in the Writings and Phi-una, Copenhagen, 1982a. saria Buddhica," WZKS 22, 1982b, 167–194. pos Dharmakīrti: Two New Works and a , 1980, 27–37.

oblem of the Historical Nāgārjuna Revis-1998, 332–346. sannapadā: A Critical Edition of the First ming.
e Prasannapadā: More Manuscripts from , 2000, 165–181.
dita Durveka Miśras's Dharmottarapradīpa mentary on Dharmottara's Nyāyabinduṭīkā, on Dharmakīrti's Nyāyabindu), Patna, nterscheidung der Gegebenheiten von Vesen (Dharmadharmatāvibhāga). Eine ogācāra-Schule in tibetischer Überliefer-endorf, 1996.

et Candrakīrti sur la permanence," in:
ddhisme, Mélanges offerts à Mgr Etienne , 1980, 215–232; BÉFEO 69, 1981, 75–96; AS ÉdL 3, 1982, 45–76; IKK 6, 1984, 115–144.

May, J., "La philosophie bouddhique idéaliste," AS 25, 1971, 265–323.

May, J., Candrakīrti: Prasannapadā Madhyamakavṛtti, Paris, 1959.

Mc Allister, P., "Ratnakīrti's Apohasiddhi: A Critical Edition, Annotated Translation and Study," diss., Vienna University, 2011.

McClintock, S.L., Omniscience and the Rhetoric of Reason: Śāntarakṣita and Kamalaśīla on Rationality, Argumentation, and Religious Authority, Boston, 2010.

McCrea, L.J., & P.G. Patil, Buddhist Philosophy of Language in India: Jñānaśrīmitra on Exclusion, New York, 2010.

McDermott, A.C.S., An Eleventh-Century Buddhist Logic of "Exists": Ratnakīrti's Kṣaṇabhaṅgasiddhiḥ vyatirekātmikā, Dordrecht, 1969.

Mejor, M., Vasubandhu's Abhidharmakośa and the Commentaries Preserved in the Tanjur, Stuttgart, 1991.

Mejor, M., "The Problem of the Two Vasubandhus Reconsidered," IT 15–16, 1989–1990, 275–283.

Mikogami, E., "Śubhagupta no communication ron" (*シュバグプタのコミュニケーション*論; Śubhagupta's Communication Theory), in: E. Mayeda, ed., Studies in Original Buddhism and Mahāyāna Buddhism in Commemoration of Late Professor Dr. Fumimaro Watanabe, 2 vols., Kyoto, 1993, 151–167.

Mimaki, K., La réfutation bouddhique de la permanence des choses (Sthirasiddhidūṣaṇa) et la preuve de la momentanéité des choses (Kṣaṇabhaṅgasiddhi), Paris, 1976.

Miyasaka, Y., "Pramāṇavārttika-kārikā (Sanskrit and Tibetan)," IKK 2, 1971–1972, 1–206.

Moriyama, S., Omniscience and Religious Authority: Prajñākaragupta's Commentary on Pramāṇavārttika II 8–10 and 29–33, forthcoming.

Much, M.T., Dharmakīrtis Vādanyāyaḥ, 2 vols., Vienna, 1991a.

Much, M.T., "Fragments from Dignāga? Traces of a Pre-Dharmakīrti Buddhist Polemic against the Nyāya-Nigrahasthāna," in: E. Steinkellner, ed., Studies in the Buddhist Epistemological Tradition, Vienna, 1991b, 211–220.

Muroji, Y., The Tibetan Text of the Karma-siddhi-prakaraṇa of Vasubandhu, with Reference to the Abhidharma-kośa-bhāṣya and the Pratītya-samutpāda-vyākhyā, Kyoto, 1985.

Nagao, G.M., Madhyāntavibhāgabhāṣya: A Buddhist Philosophical Treatise Edited for the First Time from a Sanskrit Manuscript, Tokyo, 1964.

Nakamura, H., Indian Buddhism: A Survey with Bibliographical Notes, Delhi, 1980.

Nance, R.F., Speaking for Buddhas: Scriptural Commentary in Indian Buddhism, New York, 2012.

Nōnin, M., et al., Daijō shōgon kyōron dai jūnana shō no wayaku to chūkai – kuyō, shiji, muryō tokuni himuryō – (大乗荘厳経論第 XVII 章の和訳と注解—供養・師事・無量とくに悲無量 –; Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkāra, Chapter 17, Sanskrit and Tibetan Texts and Annotated Japanese Translation), Kyoto, 2013.

Nōnin, M., et al., Daijō shōgonkyōron daiisshō no wayaku to chūkai: Daijō no kakuritsu (大乗荘厳経論』第I章の和訳と注解: 大乗の確立; An Annotated Translation of the First Chapter of the Mahāyānasūtrālaṅkāra, the Establishment of Mahāyāna), Kyoto, 2009.

Nozawa, J., "The Dharmadharmaṭāvibhaṅga and the Dharmadharmatāvibhaṅgavṛtti: Tibetan Texts (Together with a Sanskrit Fragment of the DhDhVV), Edited, Collated, Based upon the Peking and Derge Editions," in: 山口博士還暦記念会 (Yamaguchi Hakase Kanreki Kinenkai), ed., Studies in Indology and Buddhology Presented in Honour of Prof. Susumu Yamaguchi on the Occasion of His Sixtieth Birthday, Kyoto, 1955, 9–49.

Nyayacharya, S.C., Pramāṇāntarbhāva, Calcutta, 1969.

Obermiller, E., The Sublime Science of the Great Vehicle to Salvation Being a Manual of Buddhist Monism: The Work of Ārya Maitreya with a Commentary by Āryāsaṅga, Leipzig, 1931.

Oetke, C., "'Nihilist' and 'Non-nihilist' Interpretations of Madhyamaka," AO 57, 1996, 57–104.

Oetke, C., "Rationalismus und Mystik in der Philosophie Nāgārjunas," StII 15, 1989, 1–39.

Oetke, C., "Die metaphysische Lehre Nāgārjunas," CZP 22/56, 1988, 47–64.

Okada, Y., Die Ratnāvalīṭīkā des Ajitamitra, Bonn, 1990.

Ono, M., Prajñākaraguptas Erklärung der Definition gültiger Erkenntnis (Pramāṇavārttikālaṃkāra zu Pramāṇavārttika II 1–7), Vienna, 2000.

Pāsādika, B., "Der Mahāyāna-Buddhismus gemäß Nāgārjuna's Sūtrasamuccaya," Hōrin 10, 2003, 73–96.

Pāsādika, B., Nāgārjuna's Sūtrasamuccaya: A Critical Edition of the mDo kun las btus pa, Copenhagen, 1989.

Patil, P.G., Against a Hindu God: Buddhist Philosophy of Religion in India, New York, 2009.

Pind, O.H., Dignāga on anyāpoha: An Annotated English Translation of Dignāga's Pramāṇasamuccayavṛtti, forthcoming.

Pind, O.H., "Why the Vaidalyaprakaraṇa Cannot Be an Authentic Work by Nāgārjuna," WZKS 45, 2001, 149–172.

Potter, K.H., ed., Encyclopedia of Indian Philosophies, vol. VIII: Buddhist Philosophy from 100 to 350 A.D., Delhi, 1999.

Powers, J., The Yogācāra School of Buddhism: A Bibliography, Metuchen, 1991.

Pradhan, P., Abhidharmasamuccaya by Asaṅga, Santiniketan, 1950.

Preisendanz, K., "Debate and Independent Reasoning vs. Tradition: On the Precarious Position of Early Nyāya," in: R. Tsuchida & A. Wezler, eds., Harānandalaharī: Volume in Honour of Professor Minoru Hara on His Seventieth Birthday, Reinbek, 2000, 221–251.

Ratié, I., "On the Distinction between Epistemic and Metaphysical Buddhist Idealisms: A Śaiva Perspective," JIP, forthcoming a.

Ratié, I., Une critique bouddhique de la définition mīmāṃsaka du Soi: Présentation, édition critique et traduction de la Mīmāṃsakaparikalpitātmaparīkṣā de Śāntarakṣita (Tattvasaṅgraha 222–284 et Pañjikā), forthcoming b.

Ratié, I., Le Soi et l'Autre: Identité, différence et altérité dans la philosophie de la Pratyabhijñā, Leiden, 2011.

Rospatt, A. von, The Buddhist Doctrine of Momentariness: A Survey of the Origins and Early Phase of This Doctrine up to Vasubandhu, Stuttgart, 1995.

Saigusa, M., Nāgārjuna's Mūlamadhyamakakārikā-s: Texts and Translations, Tokyo, 1985.

Saito, A., "Śāntideva in the History of Mādhyamika Philosophy," in: K. Sankarnarayan, M. Yoritomi & S. Joshi, eds., Buddhism in India and Abroad, Mumbai, 1996, 257–263.

Saito, A., "A Study of the Buddhapālita-Mūlamadhyamaka-Vṛtti," diss., Australian National University, 1984.

Sakai, M., "Dharmottaras Erklärung von Dharmakīrtis kṣaṇikatvānumāna (Pramāṇaviniścayaṭīkā zu Pramāṇaviniścaya 2 vv. 53–55 mit Prosa)," diss., Vienna University, 2010.

Sanghavi, P.S., & M.S. Jinavijayaji, Hetubinduṭīkā of Bhaṭṭa Arcaṭa with the Sub-Commentary Entitled Āloka by Durveka Miśra, Baroda, 1949.

Sāṅkṛtyāyana, R., "Dharmakīrti's Pramāṇavārttika: With the Commentary by Manorathanandin," JBORS 24–26, 1938–1940, appendix.

Sāṅkṛtyāyana, R., Pramāṇavārttikabhāṣyam or Vārtikālaṅkāraḥ of Prajñākaragupta (Being a Commentary on Dharmakīrti's Pramāṇavārtikam), Patna, 1953.

Sāṅkṛtyāyana, R., Karṇakagomin's Commentary on the Pramāṇavārttikavṛtti of Dharmakīrti, Allahabad, 1943.

Sāṅkṛtyāyana, R., "Dharmakīrti's Vādanyāya: With the Commentary of Śāntarakṣita," JBORS 21–22, 1935–1936, appendix.

Scherrer-Schaub, C.A., Yuktiṣaṣṭikāvṛtti: Commentaire à la soixantaine sur le raisonnement ou Du vrai enseignement de la causalité par le Maître indien Candrakīrti, Brussels, 1991.

Schlingloff, D., Ein buddhistisches Yogalehrbuch, 2 vols., Berlin, 1964.

Schmithausen, L., "A Note on Vasubandhu and the Laṅkāvatārasūtra," AS 46/1, 1992, 392–397.

Schmithausen, L., Ālayavijñāna: On the Origin and the Early Development of a Central Concept of Yogācāra Philosophy, 2 vols., Tokyo, 1987.

Schmithausen, L., "On the Vijñaptimātra Passage in Saṃdhinirmocana VIII.7," IKK 6, 1984, 433–455.

Schmithausen, L., "The Definition of Pratyakṣam in the Abhidharmasamuccayaḥ," WZKS 16, 1972, 153–163.

Schmithausen, L., "Zu den Rezensionen des Udānavargaḥ," WZKS 14, 1970, 47–124.

Schmithausen, L., "Zur Literaturgeschichte der älteren Yogācāra-Schule," ZDMG 17, 1969a, 811–823.

Schmithausen, L., Der Nirvāṇa-Abschnitt in der Viniścayasaṃgrahaṇī der Yogācārabhūmiḥ, Vienna, 1969b.

Schmithausen, L., "Sautrāntika-Voraussetzungen in Viṃśatikā und Triṃśikā," WZKSO 11, 1967, 109–136.

Schoening, J.D., The Śālistamba Sūtra and Its Indian Commentaries, 2 vols., Vienna, 1995.

Seyfort Ruegg, D., Two Prolegomena to Madhyamaka Philosophy: Studies in Indian and Tibetan Madhyamaka Thought, Vienna, 2002.

Seyfort Ruegg, D., "On the Authorship of some Works Ascribed to Bhāvaviveka/Bhavya," in: D. Seyfort Ruegg & L. Schmithausen, eds., Earliest Buddhism and Madhyamaka, Leiden, 1990, 59–71.

Seyfort Ruegg, D., "Towards a Chronology of the Madhyamaka School," in: L.A. Hercus et al., eds., Indological and Buddhist Studies: Volume in Honour of Professor J.W. de Jong on His Sixtieth Birthday, Canberra, 1982, 505–530.

Seyfort Ruegg, D., The Literature of the Madhyamaka School of Philosophy in India, Wiesbaden, 1981.

Seyfort Ruegg, D., La Théorie du Tathāgatagarbha et du Gotra: Études sur la Sotériologie et la Gnoséologie du Bouddhisme, Paris, 1969.

Seyfort Ruegg, D., "On a Yoga Treatise in Sanskrit from Qïzïl," JAOS 87/2, 1967, 157–165.

Shastri, S.D., Tattvasaṅgraha of Ācārya Shāntarakṣita with the Commentary 'Pañjikā' of Shri Kamalshīla, 2 vols., Varanasi, 1981.

Shastri, S.D., Vadanyayaprakaraṇa of Acharya Dharmakirtti with the Commentary Vipanchitārthā of Acharya Śāntarakṣita and Sambandhaparīkṣā with the Commentary of Acharya Prabhachandra (Dharmakirtti Nibandhawali 2), Varanasi, 1972.

Shirasaki, K., "The Sugatamatavibhaṅgabhāṣya of Jitāri," KJDBK 17–20, 1984–1987, 77–107 (Sautrāntika and Yogācāra), 101–143 (Mādhyamika), 35–59 (Vaibhāṣika I), 71–93 (Vaibhāṣika II).

Shirasaki, K., "The Bālāvatāratarka," KJDBK 15, 1983, 63–134.

Siderits, M., & S. Katsura, Nāgārjuna's Middle Way. Mūlamadhyamakakārikā, Boston, 2013.

Silk, J.A., Buddhist Cosmic Unity: An Edition, Translation and Study of the Anūnatvāpūrṇatvanirdeśaparivarta, forthcoming.

Silk, J.A., "Contributions to the Study of the Philosophical Vocabulary of Mahāyāna Buddhism," EB 33/1, 2001, 144–168.

Silk, J.A., "The Yogācāra Bhikṣu," in: J.A. Silk, ed., Wisdom, Compassion, and the Search for Understanding: The Buddhist Studies Legacy of Gadjin M. Nagao, Honolulu, 2000, 265–314.

Skilling, P., "Vasubandhu and the Vyākhyāyukti Literature," JIABS 23/2, 2000, 297–350.

Śrāvakabhūmi Study Group (声聞地研究会; Shōmonji Kenkyūkai), Yugaron Shōmonji (瑜伽論声聞地 Śrāvakabhūmi, Revised Sanskrit Text and Japanese Translation), 2 vols., Tokyo, 2007.

Stcherbatsky, T., Buddhist Logic, vol. II, Leningrad, 1930.

Stcherbatsky, T., Nyāyabindu: Buddijskij učebnik logiki sočinenie Dharmakirti i tolkovanie na nego Nyāyabinduṭīka sočinenie Dharmottary, Petrograd, 1918.

Stcherbatsky, T., Tibetskij perevod sočinenij Saṃtānāntarasiddhi Dharmakīrti i Saṃtānāntarasiddhiṭīkā Vinītadeva, Petrograd, 1916.

Steinkellner, E., Dharmakīrtis frühe Logik. Annotierte Übersetzung der logischen Teile von Pramāṇavārttika I mit der Vṛtti, 2 vols., Tokyo, 2013.

Steinkellner, E., Dharmakīrti's Pramāṇaviniścaya, Chapters 1 and 2, Beijing, 2007.

Steinkellner, E., "Apropos Lindtner's Two New Works of Dharmakīrti," in: D. Sen Sharma & M. Banerjee, eds. Prajñājyoti: Prof. Dr. Gopikamohan Bhattacharya Commemoration Volume, Kurukshetra, 1991, 277–286.

Steinkellner, E., "Was Dharmakīrti a Mādhyamika?," in: D. Seyfort Ruegg & L. Schmithausen, eds., Earliest Buddhism and Madhyamaka, Leiden, 1990, 72–90.

Steinkellner, E., Dharmottaras Paralokasiddhi. Nachweis der Wiedergeburt, Vienna, 1986.

Steinkellner, E., "Paralokasiddhi-Texts," in: 雲井昭善博士古希記念会 (Kumoi Shozen Hakase Koki Kinenkai), ed., Buddhism and Its Relation to Other Religions: Essays in Honour of Dr. Shozen Kumoi on His Seventieth Birthday, Kyoto, 1985, 215–224.

Steinkellner, E., Dharmakīrti's Pramāṇaviniścayaḥ. Zweites Kapitel: Svārthānumānam, vol. II, Vienna, 1979.

Steinkellner, E., "Jñānaśrīmitra's Sarvajñasiddhiḥ," in: L. Lancaster, ed., Prajñāpāramitā and Related Systems: Studies in Honour of Edward Conze, Berkeley, 1977, 383–393.

Steinkellner, E., Dharmakīrti's Pramāṇaviniścayaḥ. Zweites Kapitel: Svārthānumānam, vol. I, Vienna, 1973.

Steinkellner, E., Dharmakīrti's Hetubinduḥ, vc

Steinkellner, E., "Dignāgas Pramāṇasamu A Hypothetical Reconstruction of the S the Help of the Two Tibetan Translati of the Hitherto Known Sanskrit Fragm guistic Materials Gained from Jinend Apr 2005, www.ikga.oeaw.ac.at/Mat/dig

Steinkellner, E., H. Krasser & H. Lasic, Viśālāmalavatī Pramāṇasamuccayaṭīkā
Beijing, 2005.

Steinkellner, E., & M.T. Much, Texte der tischen Schule des Buddhismus. Systen über die buddhistische Sanskrit-Literatu vey of Buddhist Sanskrit Literature II, Gö

Suzuki, K., Sanskrit Fragments and Tibe
Candrakīrti's Bodhisattvayogācāracatuḥś

Takahashi, K., Bosatsuji Shinjitugihon kar chū bosatsuji heno sisō tenkai – vastu g shite – (『菩薩地』「真実義品」から 地』への思想展開 – vastu 概念を中 sophical Developments from the Bo the Bodhisattvabhūmiviniścaya: With to the Concept of Vastu as Used in the ter), Tokyo, 2005.

Takakusu, J., A Record of the Buddhist Rel India and the Malay Archipelago (AD
London, 1896.

Takasaki, J., A Study of the Ratnagot tantra) Being a Treatise on the Tathāg Mahāyāna Buddhism, Rome, 1966.

Tatia, N., Abhidharmasamuccaya-Bhāṣya

Tenzin, P., Suhṛllekha of Ācārya Vyaktapadāṭīkā of Ācārya Mahāmati,

Teramoto, E., & T. Hiramatsu, Vasumitra's cana-cakra, Bhavya's Nikāyabheda-V and Vinītadeva's Samaya-Bhedoparaca Bhedopadarśana-Nāma-Saṃgraha, T
Kyoto, 1935.

Thakur, A., Ratnakīrti-Nibandhāvaliḥ (B of Ratnakīrti), Patna, 1975.

Thakur, A., Aśokanibandhau Avayavinir
dūṣaṇaṃ ca, Patna, 1974.

Thakur, A., Jñānaśrīmitranibandhāvali cal Works of Jñānaśrīmitra), Patna, 19

Tillemans, T.J.F., Dharmakīrti's Pramā
tated Translation of the Fourth Chapte
Vienna, 2000.

Tillemans, T.J.F., Materials for the Dharmapāla and Candrakīrti, 2 vols.,

Todeschini, A., "The Ideal Debater: Abhidharmasamuccaya and Abhidhar ICK 15, 2011, 244–271.

Tola, F., & C. Dragonetti, "Against th Vigrahavyāvartanī to Nāgārjuna," W

Tola, F., & C. Dragonetti, Nāgārjuna
(Nyāya) – Vaidalyaprakaraṇa, Delhi

Tola, F., & C. Dragonetti, On Voidness Nihilism, Delhi, 1995b.

Tola, F., & C. Dragonetti, The Avayavi Aśoka, Tokyo, 1994.

ısaṅgraha of Ācārya Shāntarakṣita with 'Pañjikā' of Shri Kamalshīla, 2 vols., Vara-ınyayaprakaraṇa of Acharya Dharmaommentary Vipanchitārthā of Acharya Sambandhaparīkṣā with the Commen-Prabhachandra (Dharmakirtti Nibandha-1972.

Sugatamatavibhaṅgabhāṣya of Jitāri," 1984–1987, 77–107 (Sautrāntika and 3 (Mādhyamika), 35–59 (Vaibhāṣika I), II).
ālāvatāratarka," KJDBK 15, 1983, 63–134.
. Katsura, Nāgārjuna's Middle Way,
kakārikā, Boston, 2013.
mic Unity: An Edition, Translation and Study ūrṇatvanirdeśaparivarta, forthcoming. tions to the Study of the Philosophical hāyāna Buddhism," EB 33/1, 2001, 144–168. ācāra Bhikṣu," in: J.A. Silk, ed., Wisdom, the Search for Understanding: The Budacy of Gadjin M. Nagao, Honolulu, 2000, ndhu and the Vyākhyāyukti Literature," 297–350. dy Group (声聞地研究会; Shōmonji Yugaron Shōmonji (瑜伽論声聞地; evised Sanskrit Text and Japanese Transokyo, 2007. ddhist Logic, vol. II, Leningrad, 1930.

Nyāyabindu: Buddijskij učebnik logiki kirti i tolkovanie na nego Nyāyabinduṭīkā ttary, Petrograd, 1918. betskij perevod sočinenij Saṃtānāntararti i Saṃtānāntarasiddhiṭīkā Vinītadeva, armakīrtis frühe Logik. Annotierte Überchen Teile von Pramāṇavārttika I mit der

o, 2013.
armakīrti's Pramāṇaviniścaya, Chapters 1 07. propos Lindtner's Two New Works of
: D. Sen Sharma & M. Banerjee, eds., Dr. Gopikamohan Bhattacharya Comme, Kurukshetra, 1991, 277–286. as Dharmakīrti a Mādhyamika?," in: D.
L. Schmithausen, eds., Earliest Buddhism a, Leiden, 1990, 72–90. armottaras Paralokasiddhi. Nachweis der enna, 1986. aralokasiddhi-Texts," in: 雲井昭善博士 moi Shozen Hakase Koki Kinenkai), ed., s Relation to Other Religions: Essays in ozen Kumoi on His Seventieth Birthday, 224. armakīrti's Pramāṇaviniścayaḥ. Zweites umānam, vol. II, Vienna, 1979. ınaśrīmitra's Sarvajñasiddhiḥ," in: L. Lanpāramitā and Related Systems: Studies in d Conze, Berkeley, 1977, 383–393. armakīrti's Pramāṇaviniścayaḥ. Zweites umānam, vol. I, Vienna, 1973.

Steinkellner, E., Dharmakīrti's Hetubinduḥ, vol. I, Vienna, 1967.

Steinkellner, E., "Dignāgas Pramāṇasamuccaya, Chapter 1: A Hypothetical Reconstruction of the Sanskrit Text with the Help of the Two Tibetan Translations on the Basis of the Hitherto Known Sanskrit Fragments and the Linguistic Materials Gained from Jinendrabuddhi's Ṭīkā," Apr 2005, www.ikga.oeaw.ac.at/Mat/dignaga_PS_1.pdf.

Steinkellner, E., H. Krasser & H. Lasic, Jinendrabuddhi's Viśālāmalavatī Pramāṇasamuccayaṭīkā, Chapter 1, 2 vols., Beijing, 2005.

Steinkellner, E., & M.T. Much, Texte der Erkenntnistheoretischen Schule des Buddhismus. Systematische Übersicht über die buddhistische Sanskrit-Literatur II/Systematic Survey of Buddhist Sanskrit Literature II, Göttingen, 1995.

Suzuki, K., Sanskrit Fragments and Tibetan Translation of Candrakīrti's Bodhisattvayogācāracatuḥśataka, Tokyo, 1994.

Takahashi, K., Bosatsuji Shinjitugihon kara Shōkecchakubun chū bosatsuji heno sisō tenkai – vastu gainen wo chūshin to shite – (『菩薩地』「真実義品」から「摂決択分中菩薩地」への思想展開 – vastu 概念を中心として –; Philosophical Developments from the Bodhisattvabhūmi to the Bodhisattvabhūmiviniścaya: With Special Reference to the Concept of Vastu as Used in the "Tattvārtha" Chapter), Tokyo, 2005.

Takakusu, J., A Record of the Buddhist Religion as Practised in India and the Malay Archipelago (AD 671–695) by I-Tsing, London, 1896.

Takasaki, J., A Study of the Ratnagotravibhāga (Uttaratantra) Being a Treatise on the Tathāgatagarbha Theory of Mahāyāna Buddhism, Rome, 1966.

Tatia, N., Abhidharmasamuccaya-Bhāṣyam, Patna, 1976.

Tenzin, P., Suhṛllekha of Ācārya Nāgārjuna and Vyaktapadāṭīkā of Ācārya Mahāmati, Sarnath, 2002.

Teramoto, E., & T. Hiramatsu, Vasumitra's Samaya-Bhedoparacana-cakra, Bhavya's Nikāyabheda-Vibhaṅga-Vyākhyāna and Vinītadeva's Samaya-Bhedoparacana-cakrasya-Nikāya-Bhedopadarśana-Nāma-Saṃgraha, Three Tibetan Texts, Kyoto, 1935.

Thakur, A., Ratnakīrti-Nibandhāvaliḥ (Buddhist Nyāya Works of Ratnakīrti), Patna, 1975.

Thakur, A., Aśokanibandhau Avayavinirākaraṇaṃ Sāmānyadūṣaṇaṃ ca, Patna, 1974.

Thakur, A., Jñānaśrīmitranibandhāvali (Buddhist Philosophical Works of Jñānaśrīmitra), Patna, 1959.

Tillemans, T.J.F., Dharmakīrti's Pramāṇavārttika: An Annotated Translation of the Fourth Chapter (parārthānumāna), Vienna, 2000.

Tillemans, T.J.F., Materials for the Study of Āryadeva, Dharmapāla and Candrakīrti, 2 vols., Vienna, 1990.

Todeschini, A., "The Ideal Debater: The Yogācārabhūmi, Abhidharmasamuccaya and Abhidharmasamuccayabhāṣya," ICK 15, 2011, 244–271.

Tola, F., & C. Dragonetti, "Against the Attribution of the Vigrahavyāvartanī to Nāgārjuna," WZKS 42, 1998, 151–166.

Tola, F., & C. Dragonetti, Nāgārjuna's Refutation of Logic (Nyāya) – Vaidalyaprakaraṇa, Delhi, 1995a.

Tola, F., & C. Dragonetti, On Voidness: A Study on Buddhist Nihilism, Delhi, 1995b.

Tola, F., & C. Dragonetti, The Avayavinirākaraṇa of Paṇḍita Aśoka, Tokyo, 1994.

Tola, F., & C. Dragonetti, "The Trisvabhāvakārikā of Vasubandhu," JIP 11, 1983, 225–266.

Tola, F., & C. Dragonetti, "Dignāga's Ālambanaparīkṣāvṛtti," JIP 10, 1982, 105–134.

Tosaki, H., Bukkyō Ninshikiron no Kenkyū: Hosshō cho "Pramāṇavārttika" no Genryōron (仏教認識論の研究：法称著『プラマーナ・ヴァールティカ』の現量論; Studies on Buddhist Epistemology: The Doctrine of Perception in Dharmakīrti's Pramāṇavārttika), 2 vols., Tokyo, 1979.

Tosaki, H., "Kamalaśīla saku Nyāyabindupūrvapakṣasaṃkṣipta, genryo sho no tekisuto to wayaku" (Kamalaśīla 作 Nyāyabindupūrvapakṣasaṃkṣipta – 現量章のテキストと和訳; The Nyāyabindupūrvapakṣasaṃkṣipta Composed by Kamalaśīla: Text and Japanese Translation), IKK 4, 1984, 477–493.

Tsukamoto, K., Y. Matsunaga & H. Isoda, A Descriptive Bibliography of the Sanskrit Buddhist Literature (Bongo Butten no kenkyū), vol. III: Abhidharma, Madhyamaka, Yogācāra, Buddhist Epistemology and Logic, Kyoto, 1990.

Tucci, G., Minor Buddhist Texts: Parts I & II, Delhi, 1986.

Tucci, G., Minor Buddhist Texts: Part III: Third Bhāvanākrama, Rome, 1971.

Tucci, G., "Minor Sanskrit Texts on the Prajñāpāramitā," JRAS 79/1–2, 1947, 53–75.

Tucci, G., The Nyāyamukha of Dignāga: The Oldest Buddhist Text on Logic, after Chinese and Tibetan Materials, Heidelberg, 1930.

Tucci, G., "Buddhist Logic before Diṅnāga (Asaṅga, Vasubandhu, Tarka-Śāstras)," JRAS 61/4, 1929a, 451–488.

Tucci, G., Pre-Diṅnāga Buddhist Texts on Logic from Chinese Sources, Baroda, 1929b.

Tucci, G., "Un traité d'Āryadeva sur le 'Nirvāṇa' des hérétiques," TP 24, 1926, 16–31.

Ui, H., "Maitreya as an Historical Personage," in: Indian Studies in Honor of Charles Rockwell Lanman, Cambridge MA, 1929, 95–102.

Umino, T., & T. Kelsang, "The Vijñaptimātratāsiddhi of Ratnākaraśānti," MDJK 28, 1982, 18–31.

Vaidya, P.L., Bodhicaryāvatāra of Śāntideva with the Commentary Pañjikā of Prajñākaramati, Darbhanga, 1960.

Verhagen, P., "Studies in Indo-Tibetan Buddhist Hermeneutics (6): Validity and Valid Interpretation of Scripture according to Vasubandhu's Vyākhyāyukti," in: R. Gombrich & C. Scherrer-Schaub, eds., Buddhist Studies, Delhi, 2008, 233–258.

Verhagen, P., "Studies in Indo-Tibetan Buddhist Hermeneutics (4): The Vyākhyāyukti by Vasubandhu," JA 293/2, 2005, 559–602.

Vetter, T., Der Buddha und seine Lehre in Dharmakīrtis Pramāṇavārttika, Vienna, 1990.

Vetter, T., "Die Lehre Nāgārjunas in den Mūla-madhyamakakārikās," in: G. Oberhammer, ed., Epiphanie des Heils. Zur Heilsgegenwart in indischer und christlicher Religion, Vienna, 1982, 87–108.

Vetter, T., Dharmakīrti's Pramāṇaviniścayaḥ. 1. Kapitel: Pratyakṣam, Vienna, 1966.

Vetter, T., Erkenntnisprobleme bei Dharmakīrti, Vienna, 1964.

Walleser, M., The Life of Nāgārjuna from Tibetan and Chinese Sources, Leipzig, 1923.

Walser, R., Nāgārjuna in Context: Mahāyāna Buddhism and Early Indian Culture, New York, 2005.

Watanabe, F., Philosophy and Its Development in the Nikāyas and Abhidhamma, Delhi, 1983.

Watanabe, S., "Śubhagupta's Sarvajñasiddhikārikā," NBKK 10, 1987, 55–74.

Watanabe, S., "Bukkyō ronrigakuha no hashinron, Śubhagupta to Śāntarakṣita no baai" (仏教論理学派の破神論; The Refutation of the Doctrine of Īśvara in the Buddhist Logical School with Reference to Śubhagupta and Śāntarakṣita), in: 玉城康四郎博士還暦記念会 (Tamaki Kōshirō Hakase Kanreki Kinenkai), ed., Hotoke no kenkyū: Tamaki Kōshirō hakase kanreki kinen ronshū (佛の研究: 玉城康四郎博士還暦記念論集; Studies on the Buddha in Honor of Doctor Kōshirō Tamaki on His Sixtieth Birthday), Tokyo, 1977, 579–593.

Watanabe, T., The hetu and hetvābhāsa Sections of Dharmottara's Pramāṇaviniścayaṭīkā on Dharmakīrti's Pramāṇaviniścaya, Chapter 3, forthcoming.

Wayman, A., "The Rules of Debate according to Asaṅga," JAOS 78, 1958, 29–40.

Wei, T., Ch'eng Wei-Shih Lun: Doctrine of Mere-Consciousness, Hong Kong, 1973.

Wogihara, U., Abhisamayālaṅkār'ālokā Prajñāpāramitāvyākhyā, the Work of Haribhadra, Tokyo, 1932.

Wogihara, U., Bodhisattvabhūmi: A Statement of Whole Course of the Bodhisattva (Being Fifteenth Section of Yogācārabhūmi), Tokyo, 1930–1936.

Woo, J., Yogipratyakṣa (Yogahaengjaui Jenngji), Seoul, 2006.

Woo, J., "The Kṣaṇabhaṅgasiddhi-Anvayātmikā: An Eleventh-Century Buddhist Work on Existence and Causal Theory," diss., University of Pennsylvania, 1999.

Wood, T.E., Mind Only: A Philosophical and Doctrinal Analysis of the Vijñānavāda, Honolulu, 1991.

Yaita, H., Three Sanskrit Texts from the Buddhist Pramāṇa-Tradition – The Hetuvidyā Section of the Yogācārabhūmi, the Dharmottaraṭippaṇaka, and the Tarkarahasya, Narita, 2005.

Yamabe, N., "Parallel Passages between the Manobhūmi and the *Yogācārabhūmi of Saṃgharakṣa," in: U.T. Kragh, ed., The Foundation for Yoga Practitioners: The Buddhist Yogācārabhūmi Treatise and Its Adaptation in India, East Asia, and Tibet, Cambridge MA, 2013, 596–737.

Yamabe, N., "On the School Affiliation of Aśvaghoṣa: 'Sautrāntika' or 'Yogācāra'?," JIABS 26/2, 2003, 225–254.

Yamabe, N., "The Sūtra on the Ocean-Like Samādhi of the Visualization of the Buddha, The Interfusion of the Chinese and Indian Cultures in Central Asia as Reflected in a Fifth Century Apocryphal Sūtra," diss., Yale University, 1999.

Yamabe, N., "Fragments of the 'Yogalehrbuch' in the Pelliot Collection," KRTDK 43, 1997, 11–39.

Yamaguchi, S., Sthiramati: Madhyāntavibhāgaṭīkā: Exposition systématique du Yogācāravijñānavāda, Nagoya, 1934.

Yamaguchi, S., "Dignāga, examen de l'objet de la connaissance (Ālambanaparīkṣā)," JA 214, 1929, 1–65.

Ye, S., "A Sanskrit Folio of the Yuktiṣaṣṭikāvṛtti from Tibet," ARIRIAB 16, 2013, 233–240.

Ye, S., Zhunglungsong: Fanzanghan Hejiao, Daodu, Yizhu (中论颂–梵藏汉合校・导读・译注;Mūlamadhyamakakārikā: New Edition of the Sanskrit, Tibetan, and Chinese Versions, with Commentary and a Modern Chinese Translation), Shanghai, 2011a.

Ye, S., Mūlamadhyamakakārikā and Buddhapālita's Commentary: A Philological Study on the Basis of Newly Identified Sanskrit Manuscripts, Beijing, 2011b.

Yonezawa, Y., "Vigrahavyāvartanī: Sanskrit Transliteration and Tibetan Translation," NBKK 31, 2008, 209–333.

Yoshimizu, C., "The Logic of the Saṃdhinirmocanasūtra: Establishing Right Reasoning Based on Similarity (sārūpya) and Dissimilarity (vairūpya)," in: B. Gillon, ed., Logic in Earliest Classical India, Delhi, 2010, 139–166.

Yoshimizu, C., "Saṃdhinirmocanasūtra X ni okeru shishu no yukti ni tsuite" (Saṃdhinirmocanasūtra X における四種の yukti について; On the Four Kinds of yukti in the Tenth Chapter of the Saṃdhinirmocanasūtra), NBKK 19, 1996, 123–168.

Vincent Eltschinger

Philoso

Although Tibetan lacks an emic ter correspond to "philosophy", there is indigenous conceptual domain that be characterized as philosophical. Th to some extent demarcated by terms ("view"; Skt. darśana), which has bee in contradistinction to spyod pa ("c caryā). Some basic tenets of faith go u including belief in the efficacy of the (the Buddha, his teachings, and his co workings of karma, the existence of p lives, and the need to act morally and cal codes. These have generally not b challenge, even theoretically, and exh few signs of historical variation. Conve rect "view", or correct philosophical st resented disputed ground, and served of controversy and debate. The Tibe tarial and debate traditions – deemed be the province of the scholarly comm been preoccupied with these issues.
views and interpretations have bee and revised, and debate of philosoph been seen as permissible. Trenchant between scholars and schools have developed, but these have generally as impinging upon the aforementione of faith and morality. The main e cerned views that were deemed to be as those attributed to the Chinese mo Mahāyāna (see below), which have as undermining crucial Buddhist p thermore, from an early stage, Tibeta organized non-Tibetan (principally In doxographically, distinguishing diff and traditions in terms of competing systems of philosophical tenets.

Historically, a number of topi Tibetan philosophical discussion. T most centrally the nature and relatio the two truths, the absolute and conv dam; Skt. paramārtha; and kun rdzob especially the ontological status, c verifiability of conventional reality; u of the buddha nature or the essence o (de bzhin gshegs pa'i snying po; Skt. tath

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

on for Yoga Practitioners: The Buddhist reatise and Its Adaptation in India, East
mbridge MA, 2013, 596–737.
he School Affiliation of Aśvaghoṣa: gācāra'?," JIABS 26/2, 2003, 225–254. tra on the Ocean-Like Samādhi of the e Buddha, The Interfusion of the Chiultures in Central Asia as Reflected in ocryphal Sūtra," diss., Yale University, nts of the 'Yogalehrbuch' in the Pelliot K 43, 1997, 11–39.

amati: Madhyāntavibhāgaṭīkā: Exposi-u Yogācāravijñānavāda, Nagoya, 1934. āga, examen de l'objet de la connaisarīkṣā)," JA 214, 1929, 1–65. lio of the Yuktiṣaṣṭikāvṛtti from Tibet," 33–240.
Fanzanghan Hejiao, Daodu, Yizhu (中论 导读・译注;Mūlamadhyamakakārikā:
e Sanskrit, Tibetan, and Chinese Verentary and a Modern Chinese Translaıa.
makakārikā and Buddhapālita's Com-gical Study on the Basis of Newly Identi-scripts, Beijing, 2011b. havyāvartanī: Sanskrit Transliteration ation," NBKK 31, 2008, 209–333.
Logic of the Saṃdhinirmocanasūtra:
t Reasoning Based on Similarity similarity (vairūpya)," in: B. Gillon, ed., ssical India, Delhi, 2010, 139–166. dhinirmocanasūtra X ni okeru shishu (Saṃdhinirmocanasūtra X における四 て; On the Four Kinds of yukti in the the Saṃdhinirmocanasūtra), NBKK 19,

Vincent Eltschinger

Philosophical Literature: Tibet

Although Tibetan lacks an emic term that might correspond to "philosophy", there is certainly an indigenous conceptual domain that can broadly be characterized as philosophical. This territory is to some extent demarcated by terms such as lta ba ("view"; Skt. darśana), which has been understood in contradistinction to spyod pa ("conduct"; Skt. caryā). Some basic tenets of faith go unquestioned, including belief in the efficacy of the three jewels (the Buddha, his teachings, and his community), the workings of karma, the existence of past and future lives, and the need to act morally and observe ethical codes. These have generally not been subject to challenge, even theoretically, and exhibit relatively few signs of historical variation. Conversely, the correct "view", or correct philosophical stance, has represented disputed ground, and served as the subject of controversy and debate. The Tibetan commentarial and debate traditions – deemed principally to be the province of the scholarly community – have been preoccupied with these issues. Philosophical views and interpretations have been questioned and revised, and debate of philosophical issues has been seen as permissible. Trenchant disagreements between scholars and schools have occasionally developed, but these have generally not been seen as impinging upon the aforementioned basic issues of faith and morality. The main exception concerned views that were deemed to be nihilistic, such as those attributed to the Chinese monk Hwa shang Mahāyāna (see below), which have been depicted as undermining crucial Buddhist principles. Furthermore, from an early stage, Tibetan authors have organized non-Tibetan (principally Indic) materials doxographically, distinguishing different schools and traditions in terms of competing or hierarchical systems of philosophical tenets.

Historically, a number of topics dominated Tibetan philosophical discussion. These included most centrally the nature and relationship between the two truths, the absolute and conventional (don dam; Skt. paramārtha; and kun rdzob; Skt. saṃvṛti), especially the ontological status, coherence, and verifiability of conventional reality; understandings of the buddha nature or the essence of buddhahood (de bzhin gshegs pa'i snying po; Skt. tathāgatagarbha), the innate factor that serves as the basis for an individual's eventual enlightenment; the relevance to the path of conceptual thought and analytical reasoning; and how freedom from conceptual constructs is to be understood. Despite the more universal themes – such as the exact relationship between philosophy and contemplative practice – that these might be said to address, the fascination with these topics must be seen as the legacy of Tibetan attempts to make sense of the extremely diverse sets of teachings and traditions that entered their lands from India and surrounding territories during the first centuries of the introduction of Buddhism, from the 7th century CE onwards.

The Madhyamaka (Dbu ma; "Middle Way") philosophy of Mahāyāna Buddhism, championed by Nāgārjuna (fl. c. 150–250 CE) and his major commentators, made a major impact at an early stage, and subsequent generations of Tibetan religious authors have almost exclusively claimed some form of allegiance to Nāgārjuna's system. However, simultaneously, scriptures (such as the Tathāgatagarbhasūtra) and treatises important to the other major branch of Mahāyāna philosophy, the Yogācāra (Rnal 'byor spyod pa), attributed to Maitreya, or composed by Asaṅga and Vasubandhu (fl. 4th cent. CE and c. 350–430, respectively), also became influential. Both these and the varieties of tantric teachings that flowed into Tibet seemed to call for a far more affirmative stance on consciousness, buddha nature, and various aspects of the path than was immediately apparent in the anti-realist approach of the Madhyamaka, with its heavy emphasis upon negation. Ever since, there have been attempts to reconcile the Madhyamaka and Yogācāra systems, whether by presenting some form of syncretized version of their teachings, or organizing them hierarchically, within a doxographical model. A third important aspect of Buddhist philosophy to enter Tibet from India was the Pramāṇa (Tshad ma) or logico-epistemological tradition – as described by Dignāga (fl. c. 500 CE) and Dharmakīrti (fl. c. 625 CE). Discussions about the pertinence and viability of the analytical approach that this topic encouraged began during the formative period of Buddhism in Tibet. Tantra also flourished in India and Nepal

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

during this time, and huge numbers of materials and teachings were imported into Tibet.

Meanwhile, from China, Chan Buddhist teachings also made an impression. Both these and the tantric teachings dealt with the spiritual path in a radically different fashion than that advanced by supporters of the analytical approach. The roots of the indigenous system of Rdzogs chen (Great Perfection), with its own notions regarding thought and conceptualization, can similarly be traced back to this time. The aforementioned favored topics of Tibetan philosophical literature grew largely from attempts to organize and resolve apparent conflicts between these different systems, and they furthermore grapple with issues of authenticity and emphasis.

Some broad categories of periodization have been proposed for the development of the thought and writings of some of the traditions. D. Seyfort Ruegg divides the Tibetan development of Madhyamaka philosophy into four periods: (1) preliminary assimilation during the 8th and 9th centuries CE; (2) complete assimilation during the 10th to the 14th centuries; (3) the classical period – roughly the 14th–16th centuries; and (4) the scholastic period (16th cent. onward; Seyfort Ruegg, 1981, 207–29). Four phases have also been distinguished for the Pramāṇa tradition: (1) the ancient period (8th and 9th cents. CE); (2) the preclassical period (mainly the 10th and 11th cents.); (3) the classical period (12th to 15th cents.); and (4) the post-classical period (15th cent. onward; van der Kuijp, 1989; 1983 for a broader review of Pramāṇa literature in the 11th to the 13th cents.).

This periodization is partly acknowledged in indigenous literature by the use of the terms snga rabs pa ("former generation[s]") and phyi rabs pa ("later generation[s]"), by means of which Tibetan authors would seek to categorize earlier writers according to historical period and intellectual affinities. These categories would then be contrasted and criticized.

Periodization is judged mainly in terms of the perceived innovations introduced by authors, or the critical responses that certain writings provoked. Some works mentioned below seem to have made an almost immediate impact, and interest in them has remained almost constant, while others fell into obscurity for long periods of time, only to reemerge more recently. Yet others perhaps only ever enjoyed limited popularity (either locally or among the religious elites). Tibetan authors often wrote in response to earlier philosophical writings, but frequently remained vague about the identity of the works they had in mind. The historical record also undoubtedly has numerous distortions, due to bipartisan religious reporting, including questionable assertions of continuity. Much work remains to be done to build up a more balanced historical picture of the impact and significance of individual texts and authors.

Philosophy within Limits

As is the case in Indian Buddhist literature, Tibetan authors have commonly projected the philosophical enterprise as a means of uniting "text" (lung Skt. āgama) with "intellectual enquiry" or "reasoning" (rigs pa; Skt. yukti). However, perhaps the most important underlying concept and organizing principle in the philosophical literature of Tibet is that of "upholding the tradition." Authors have neither identified nor advertised the exercise they have been engaged in as one of philosophizing. Instead, they have seen themselves as heirs to a tradition which could be traced back to the teachings of the Buddha. A general decline in standards and the specificities of circumstance and audience to which the original teachings were delivered have been cited as reasons why the original message became increasingly obscure, and also justified the necessity for a commentarial tradition. Disputes – often focusing upon relatively minor points of philosophy and doctrine – have essentially concerned the question of who held the correct interpretation of the point under debate. Discussions centered less upon canonical than commentarial evidence, with a focus on determining which of the successive generations of Indic (and later Tibetan) writers maintained and transmitted the "correct" position – advertised as the Buddha's true "intent" (dgongs pa, dgongs don, etc.).

In many respects Tibetan philosophical writings remained remarkably faithful to their predecessors, particularly to later Indian traditions. Some Western scholars speak of an Indo-Tibetan tradition. This seems to imply that Tibetan philosophers simply continued where their Indic counterparts stopped, while in reality, there was a considerable amount of philosophical creativity and innovation. However, due to the emphasis upon maintaining the tradition, to propose that someone had produced an "inventive" work (rang bzo) was a serious charge. It was therefore invariably necessary for Tib to disguise innovation as rediscovery.

---

Related to the above principle is urge to present an integrated vision attempt to bring order to the thousa from diverse sources absorbed by the dhist tradition over the centuries, Tib attempted to create an integrated sys apparently diverse or even contradict and traditions, as presented in Indi works, were not only projected as co as elements of a single, harmonious w most commonly been presented by th dition as the integrated understandin tantra. It has also been expressed in t canons, most centrally the Kanjur and involved editorial decisions that oc to works being excluded on the grou were judged corrupt or inauthentic. the integrated vision, in particular, l graphical organization in which Inc philosophical schools – despite the opposing positions – have all been being based on the Buddha's teachin however, often been projected as r hierarchical progression, leading to t sophical position – the true understa ity. The perceived necessity to orgar to the doxographical model and the unified vision greatly influenced Tib interpretations of scriptural and histo Tibetan philosophical literature c into a number of distinct, but relate getical, pedagogical, and polemical Commentarial literature, a category passes subgenres such as 'grel ba ( 'grel bshad (Skt. ṭīkā), is the cleare the Tibetan continuity with regard t ings, and includes titles (or subgenre Sanskrit or hybrid Sanskrit-Tibetan and ṭīk chen ("great commentary"). works, such as the tshig 'grel (lit. word provide a line-by-line or word-by-wor to a text, whereas the don 'grel (lit. mentary), for instance, focuses more import. Others vary from this format, only upon particular sections, or espe elements – for example, the dka' 'gre of difficult points"). Still others, bearin brjed byang ("memorandum") or zin are presented more as personal s have been treated as commentaria nse to earlier philosophical writings, remained vague about the identity of y had in mind. The historical record dly has numerous distortions, due to gious reporting, including questions of continuity. Much work remains build up a more balanced historical impact and significance of individual ors.

within Limits

n Indian Buddhist literature, Tibetan commonly projected the philosophias a means of uniting "text" (lung; ith "intellectual enquiry" or "reason-kt. yukti). However, perhaps the most erlying concept and organizing prinilosophical literature of Tibet is that the tradition." Authors have neither advertised the exercise they have in as one of philosophizing. Instead, themselves as heirs to a tradition, traced back to the teachings of the neral decline in standards and the circumstance and audience to which achings were delivered have been s why the original message became scure, and also justified the necesnentarial tradition. Disputes – often relatively minor points of philosophy have essentially concerned the ques-ld the correct interpretation of the bate. Discussions centered less upon commentarial evidence, with a focus which of the successive generations later Tibetan) writers maintained d the "correct" position – advertised
's true "intent" (dgongs pa, dgongs ects Tibetan philosophical writings rkably faithful to their predecessors, later Indian traditions. Some West-ak of an Indo-Tibetan tradition. This that Tibetan philosophers simply re their Indic counterparts stopped, there was a considerable amount of reativity and innovation. However, asis upon maintaining the tradition, someone had produced an "inveng bzo) was a serious charge. It was therefore invariably necessary for Tibetan scholars to disguise innovation as rediscovery.

---

Related to the above principle is the Tibetan urge to present an integrated vision. Partly in an attempt to bring order to the thousands of works from diverse sources absorbed by the Tibetan Buddhist tradition over the centuries, Tibetan thinkers attempted to create an integrated system, in which apparently diverse or even contradictory teachings and traditions, as presented in Indian canonical works, were not only projected as compatible, but as elements of a single, harmonious whole. This has most commonly been presented by the Tibetan tradition as the integrated understanding of sūtra and tantra. It has also been expressed in the creation of canons, most centrally the Kanjur and Tanjur, which involved editorial decisions that occasionally led to works being excluded on the grounds that they were judged corrupt or inauthentic. The pursuit of the integrated vision, in particular, led to a doxographical organization in which Indian Buddhist philosophical schools – despite their sometimes opposing positions – have all been recognized as being based on the Buddha's teachings. They have, however, often been projected as representing a hierarchical progression, leading to the final philosophical position – the true understanding of reality. The perceived necessity to organize according to the doxographical model and thereby present a unified vision greatly influenced Tibetan scholarly interpretations of scriptural and historical sources.

Tibetan philosophical literature can be divided into a number of distinct, but related, areas (exegetical, pedagogical, and polemical) and genres. Commentarial literature, a category that encompasses subgenres such as 'grel ba (Skt. vṛtti) and 'grel bshad (Skt. ṭīkā), is the clearest example of the Tibetan continuity with regard to Indian writings, and includes titles (or subgenres) bearing the Sanskrit or hybrid Sanskrit-Tibetan names of ṭīka and ṭik chen ("great commentary"). Many of these works, such as the tshig 'grel (lit. word commentary), provide a line-by-line or word-by-word commentary to a text, whereas the don 'grel (lit. meaning commentary), for instance, focuses more upon a text's import. Others vary from this format, concentrating only upon particular sections, or especially abstruse elements – for example, the dka' 'grel ("explanation of difficult points"). Still others, bearing titles such as brjed byang ("memorandum") or zin bris ("notes"), are presented more as personal study aids, but have been treated as commentarial literature by later generations of Tibetan scholars. The extent to which these subgenres represent a continuity or a departure from genres of Indic commentarial literature, and the degree to which the categories represent substantially different – rather than nominally distinct – formats and genres require further investigation.

The gradual rise of scholasticism and the debate tradition led to the production of textbook materials with philosophical content, including the large variety of "manuals" (yig cha) used in the monastic colleges (Newland, 1996) and the "summary" format (bsdus pa), which sometimes facilitated memorization. Scholarly discussion and dispute also resulted in a philosophical subgenre called dgag lan: polemical rejoinders, often exchanged between those belonging to different schools (Lopez, 1996). Interest in doxographical organization also spurred the popularity of the grub mtha' (Skt. siddhānta) genre (Hopkins, 1996).

Background: Philosophy and Philosophical Literature

The enterprise of translating Buddhist texts, primarily from Indic languages, was first undertaken in the Tibetan imperial era (7th to 9th cents. CE). Translation continued even beyond the demise of Buddhism in India in the 12th century, although it, along with various Buddhist institutions and traditions, was interrupted by the break-up of the Tibetan empire in the mid-9th century. The arrival and spread of Buddhism in Tibet are traditionally referred to in terms of two periods, the so-called "earlier dissemination" (snga dar) and "later dissemination" (phyi dar). In these periods, different schools of Tibetan Buddhism developed. The Rnying ma school ("Old" tradition) traces its roots primarily to the translations and religious figures from the imperial period. Other schools are referred to collectively as Gsar ma ("New" traditions), and associate themselves more directly with translations and founder figures from the post-imperial period. The philosophically significant Gsar ma schools are the Bka' brgyud, Bka' gdams, Sa skya, Jo nang, and Dge lugs. The old-new dichotomy, however, is of limited use in understanding divisions between these schools. While there is also a philosophical dimension to these divisions, regional history, political events and alignments, loyalties and resistance histories are often more relevant to understanding their differences.

The Imperial Period, the 8th and the 9th centuries CE

The initial introduction of Buddhism into Tibet is usually projected as a state-sponsored exercise. Bsam yas, the first monastery in Tibet, was founded during the reign of the Tibetan ruler Khri srong Lde'u btsan (742– 794? CE). It is celebrated as the site of what is now commonly referred to as the "Samye Debate," between the Chinese master Moheyan (Hwa shang Mahāyāna) and the Indian master Kamalaśīla (for an early study see Demiéville, 1952). Khri srong Lde'u btsan is reported to have adjudicated, and ruled that Buddhism in Tibet should follow the Indian, rather than the Chinese, model. Some of the earliest known descriptions of Bsam yas' foundation and the debate are contained in the Dba' bzhed or Sba bzhed (Testament of Dba'/Sba; Wangdu & Diemberger, 2000). Numerous Tibetan scholars demonize the Chinese protagonist in the debate and attribute to him nihilistic views on philosophy and morality. However, imperial-era writings, such as those discovered in Dunhuang, suggest that the monk's view was closer to a form of Chan Buddhism (for evidence related to the debate based on Chinese language materials, see Demiéville, 1952; Pachow, 1979; Gómez, 1983). Early debates, although apparently touching upon issues of the respective traditions' claims to authenticity, seem also to have pitted those who favored a more analytical method against those who were inclined toward a more quiescent approach. The tussle introduced one of the first serious philosophical discussions, with those supporting the Indian "gradualist" (rim gyis; Skt. kramena) approach to enlightenment opposing the notion of "sudden" or "simultaneous" (cig c[h]ar ba) enlightenment. This informed later debates, particularly regarding buddha nature and the relationship between the unenlightened and enlightened mind (Seyfort Ruegg, 1989). The gradualist approach generally prevailed, but the influences of the sudden approach remained, particularly in Tibetan Rdzogs chen philosophy (Karmay, 1988).

The arrival, during the first dissemination period, of the Indian scholar Śāntarakṣita (c. 725–788 CE), and his disciple Kamalaśīla (c. 740–795 CE), who is reported to have been Hwa shang Mahāyāna's opponent during the Samye debate, left a significant mark upon Tibetan intellectual thought. Śāntarakṣita, in his seminal work, Madhyamakālaṃkāra (Dbu ma rgyan; Ornament of the Middle Way; D 3884/ P 5284; trans. Blumenthal, 2004), propounds a Yogācāra-Madhyamaka synthesis. This became the standard way of understanding the relationship between the two traditions during the early period, and the text's presentation of the two truths served as the principal interpretation for the later Rnying ma school. Śāntarakṣita's position was elaborated upon by Kamalaśīla, in works such as his Madhyamakālaṃkārapañjikā (Dbu ma'i rgyan gyi dka' 'grel; Commentary on Difficult Points of the Madhyamakālaṃkāra; D 3886/ P 5286).

Early Buddhist narrative (such as that contained in the Dba' bzhed) concentrated on the heroic exploits of foreign Buddhist masters who arrived in Tibet, and the activities of Tibetan translators. The state was heavily involved in the project of translating mainly Indic Buddhist texts, with Bsam yas as an early center. Attempts were made to standardize translation terminology, through production of official dictionaries, such as the late 8th-early 9th-century Sanskrit-Tibetan lexicon Mahāvyutpatti (Bye brag rtogs byed chen mo; Great Volume of Precise Understanding; D 4346/P 5832; ed. Ishihama & Fukuda, 1989). This includes substantial lists of philosophical terminology, not only related, for instance, to Buddhist Pramāṇa, but also of non-Buddhist schools, such as the Sāṃkhya and Vaiśeṣika. Similarly, as outlined in a related text, the Sgra sbyor bam po gnyis pa (Word Combination in Two Parts; D 4347/P 5833; ed. Ishikawa, 1990), rules were established for the creation of translation teams, comprised of Tibetans working in conjunction with Indian scholars. In addition to historical trends in India, availability of Indian masters and texts was obviously a significant factor determining which philosophical works were translated during this early stage.

Long before the finalization of the Kanjur and Tanjur compendia in the 13th-14th century, catalogues that listed text collections at imperial courts, such as the 'Phang thang ma (Halkias, 2004), divided translations of Indian commentaries (śāstra) taxonomically, according to philosophical content, differentiating between the two great branches of Mahāyāna thought, the Yogācāra (also known as Cittamātra, sems tsam) and Madhyamaka. Tibetan translators from the early period are traditionally celebrated (and venerated) primarily for producing faithful renderings of a pre-existing tradition, but clearly they also had a major role in editorship and literary organization, shaping Tibetan understandings of that tradition.

The beginnings of what developed into an independent Tibetan tradition of philosophical literature are apparent in the Lta ba'i khyad par (Varieties of Views), composed by Sna nam Ye sh 8th–early 9th cent. CE), translator of the tioned treatises by Śāntarakṣita and A version of this work was recovered cache of Dunhuang manuscripts (Pellio despite its Tibetan authorship, it was al rated into the Tanjur (D 4360/P 5847) does not provide exegesis of any speci or treatise, but represents an early fora mentarial writing. As with later writi bines explanation of selected scriptur and engages in cross-textual analyses, principles and hierarchical (doxograph zation (Snellgrove, 2002 [1987], 439; Se 1981). The work advertises itself as a ("memorandum"), rather than a com though it constituted collected notes fr teaching. However, it is obvious that made a very considered attempt to pres vision of the Mahāyāna Buddhist doctri philosophy. The Lta ba'i khyad par ackn separate emergence of Madhyamaka a philosophies in India, and the hermene sions of scripture related to the two. A later doxographical division (between trika-svātantrika-madhyamaka and th svātantrika-madhyamaka), Ye shes s two distinct forms of Madhyamaka, and that the latter, the syncretic model of and Kamalaśīla, has settled the issue o between the Madhyamaka and Yogācā

---

The 10th to the 12th centurie

Traditionally portrayed as the period Buddhism was reestablished in Cent so-called later dissemination of Bu place in the centuries immediately collapse of the Tibetan empire, a peri innovation. A new generation of tra notably Lo tsa ba Rin chen bzang p who travelled to India, and Indian tea Atiśa (980–1054), who arrived in Tibet new set of translations and teaching li formed the basis of the various Gsar of which arose during this time, with of the Jo nang and Dge lugs, which de Growing literary confidence saw the of new literary genres, and translator as Rngog Blo ldan shes rab (1059–1109) first wave of indigenous commentari hyamaka synthesis. This became the of understanding the relation-the two traditions during the early text's presentation of the two truths rincipal interpretation for the later hool. Śāntarakṣita's position was n by Kamalaśīla, in works such as kālaṃkārapañjikā (Dbu ma'i rgyan mmentary on Difficult Points of the ṃkāra; D 3886/ P 5286). t narrative (such as that contained in concentrated on the heroic exploits ist masters who arrived in Tibet, and Tibetan translators. The state was in the project of translating mainly texts, with Bsam yas as an early s were made to standardize trans-gy, through production of official h as the late 8th-early 9th-century lexicon Mahāvyutpatti (Bye brag o; Great Volume of Precise Under-6/P 5832; ed. Ishihama & Fukuda, des substantial lists of philosophical t only related, for instance, to Bud-but also of non-Buddhist schools, hya and Vaiśeṣika. Similarly, as out-text, the Sgra sbyor bam po gnyis nation in Two Parts; D 4347/P 5833; o), rules were established for the lation teams, comprised of Tibet-njunction with Indian scholars. In rical trends in India, availability of nd texts was obviously a significant ng which philosophical works were this early stage.

he finalization of the Kanjur and ia in the 13th-14th century, cata-text collections at imperial courts, thang ma (Halkias, 2004), divided dian commentaries (śāstra) taxo-ding to philosophical content, tween the two great branches of ht, the Yogācāra (also known as tsam) and Madhyamaka. Tibetan the early period are traditionally enerated) primarily for producing s of a pre-existing tradition, but ad a major role in editorship and ion, shaping Tibetan understand-on.
of what developed into an inde-tradition of philosophical literain the Lta ba'i khyad par (Varieties of Views), composed by Sna nam Ye shes sde (late 8th–early 9th cent. CE), translator of the aforementioned treatises by Śāntarakṣita and Kamalaśīla. A version of this work was recovered among the cache of Dunhuang manuscripts (Pelliot 5847), and despite its Tibetan authorship, it was also incorporated into the Tanjur (D 4360/P 5847). The work does not provide exegesis of any specific scripture or treatise, but represents an early foray into commentarial writing. As with later writings, it combines explanation of selected scriptural passages, and engages in cross-textual analyses, establishing principles and hierarchical (doxographical) organization (Snellgrove, 2002 [1987], 439; Seyfort Ruegg, 1981). The work advertises itself as a brjed byang ("memorandum"), rather than a commentary, as though it constituted collected notes from a specific teaching. However, it is obvious that Ye shes sde made a very considered attempt to present a unified vision of the Mahāyāna Buddhist doctrine, path, and philosophy. The Lta ba'i khyad par acknowledges the separate emergence of Madhyamaka and Yogācāra philosophies in India, and the hermeneutical discussions of scripture related to the two. Anticipating a later doxographical division (between the Sautrantrika-svātantrika-madhyamaka and the Yogācāra-svātantrika-madhyamaka), Ye shes sde identifies two distinct forms of Madhyamaka, and seems to feel that the latter, the syncretic model of Śāntarakṣita and Kamalaśīla, has settled the issue of the relation between the Madhyamaka and Yogācāra systems.

The 10th to the 12th centuries

Traditionally portrayed as the period during which Buddhism was reestablished in Central Tibet, the so-called later dissemination of Buddhism took place in the centuries immediately following the collapse of the Tibetan empire, a period of flux and innovation. A new generation of translators, most notably Lo tsa ba Rin chen bzang po (958–1055), who travelled to India, and Indian teachers, such as Atiśa (980–1054), who arrived in Tibet, gave rise to a new set of translations and teaching lineages, which formed the basis of the various Gsar ma schools, all of which arose during this time, with the exception of the Jo nang and Dge lugs, which developed later. Growing literary confidence saw the development of new literary genres, and translator-authors, such as Rngog Blo ldan shes rab (1059–1109), produced the first wave of indigenous commentarial literature.

The roots of Rdzogs chen seem to lie in a system of meditative practice which developed during the imperial era, and drew inspiration and terminology from tantric yoga, as found in the Guhyagarbhatantra (Rgyud gsang ba snying po; TBRC W12652; van Schaik, 2004). Already during this time, the features that would later be seen as characterizing Rdzogs chen doctrine were apparent, including the stress upon nonconceptuality and nonduality, and the encouragement of practitioners to recognize the natural state of their own minds, rather than to strive for any "external" enlightenment. As the Rnying ma school was forging a separate identity from the Gsar ma schools, Rong zom Chos kyi bzang po (11th cent.) attempted to place the Rdzogs chen system in some form of philosophical framework. Several of this Rnying ma author's compositions are overtly doxographical in nature. These include a commentary to the Man ngag lta ba'i phreng ba, a treatise attributed to Padmasambhava (TBRC W24519) – apparently one of the earliest works in Tibet with a truly doxographical character – and his Lta ba dang grub mtha' sna tshogs pa brjed byang du bgyis pa (Notes on Various Views and Philosophical Systems Set Down as a Memorandum; TBRC W21617). In these, and several other writings, Rong zom referred to what appears to already have become a standard framework, in which Indian Buddhist schools were divided according to their respective philosophies: into the realist Bye brag smra ba (Vaibhāṣika) and Mdo sde pa (Sautrāntika) schools, associated with non-Mahāyāna thought, and the Mahāyāna philosophies of Yogācāra and Madhyamaka. In his Snang ba lhar bsgrub (Establishing Appearances as Divine; trans. Köppl, 2008), Rong zom criticized the Madhyamaka system for what he saw as its failure to appreciate the inseparability of the two truths, and expressed some disdain for what he considered to be the intellectualization of the spiritual path. Frequent references to the primordial (ye nas) understanding indicate that he was sympathetic to the simultaneous approach to enlightenment, one of the two tendencies debated at Bsam yas. Rong zom's notion of the unified system resulted in his arguing that the vehicle of tantra (mantrayāna) was superior to that of sūtra (sūtrayāna), and that while a correct understanding begins with the tantric system of thought, it could only be fully gained through the embrace of Rdzogs chen. In the Snang ba lhar bsgrub he argued against what he saw as the Madhyamaka tendency for the reification of the relative, proposing that the relative had to be appreciated as a manifestation of the deity. This blend of sūtra and tantra elements is one that was largely rejected in the scholastic traditions of the Gsar ma, which increasingly sought to understand the philosophical distinctions and commentarial traditions of sūtra-related systems in their own right (without necessarily endorsing their contents as representing the final view).

Developments connected to the monastery of Gsang phu (Gsang phu sne'u thog) of the Bka' gdams tradition, established in 1073 (the same year as Sa skya monastery) by Rngog Legs pa'i shes rab (fl. early to late 11th cent.) turned out to have a large impact on the state of Tibetan Buddhist philosophy. His nephew and successor as abbot was Rngog Blo ldan shes rab (1059–1109), who has been referred to as the "father of Tibetan scholasticism" (Jackson, 1994, 372; for an account of Rngog Blo ldan shes rab's life see Kramer, 2007). In addition to his major contributions as a translator, Rngog Blo ldan shes rab promoted the Yogācāra-Madhyamaka synthesis position of Śāntarakṣita, Kamalaśīla, and Jñānagarbha. His translations of texts from the cycle "The Five Dharmas" of Maitreya (Byams chos sde lnga; TBRC W2CZ8058), attributed to Maitreya (and Asaṅga) and other associated works helped establish the topic of Phar phyin (the exposition of aspects of Prajñāpāramitā sūtras) as a distinct scholastic field in Tibet. In relation to the Abhisamayālaṃkāra (TBRC W3JT13413), one of the aforementioned five dharmas, in particular, his work confirmed the primacy of the commentarial tradition emanating from Haribhadra (Seng ge bzang po, fl. 8th cent.). In Rngog's Rgyud bla ma don bsdus pa, a "Summary" (commentary) to another of the five dharmas (TBRC W1PD104832), the Mahāyānottaratantra (Theg pa chen po'i rgyud bla ma'i bstan bcos, D 4024/P 5525; also known as the Uttaratantra or Ratnagotravibhāga), he argued that the buddha nature should be identified with emptiness, rather than equated with some variety of consciousness, or a certain quality therein. Crucially, through both his translations and commentaries, Rngog Blo ldan shes rab founded the Tshad ma gsar ma ("New Pramāṇa") tradition, a fresh approach to epistemology. The earlier tradition attributed to Śāntarakṣita and Kamalaśīla was favorable to the epistemological approach, but Rngog Blo ldan shes rab was far more systematized and more successful in establishing the importance of the topic. His explanations of Dharmakīrti's Pramāṇaviniścaya (entitled Tshad ma rnam nges kyi dka' gnad rnam bshad, in the Rgyud bla ma don bsdus pa, vol. I, 83–389) was one of the first indigenously composed commentaries, and – as with Kamalaśīla's earlier treatment of Śāntarakṣita's Madhyamakālaṃkāra – dealt with the work not by line-by-line exposition, but by focusing upon the treatise's "difficult points" (dka' gnad). Rngog's Tshad ma rnam nges kyi bsdus don, however, provided a "topical summary" (don bsdus or bsdus don) of the same text (Kramer, 2007, 109 n. 161). He employed the summary format for dealing with three of the five dharmas of Maitreya: the Uttaratantra (Jackson, 1993), the Abhisamayālaṃkāra (see Mngon par rtogs pa'i rgyan gyi 'grel pa'i bsdus don, D 3795/P 5193), and the Madhyāntavibhāga (Dbus mtha' don bsdus).

Despite the disappearance of many of his compositions (a number of which have recently resurfaced in the Bka' gdams gsung 'bum; TBRC W1PD89051), the reputation of the sixth abbot of Gsang phu (c. 1152–1169), Ph(w)ya pa Chos kyi seng ge (1109–1169), remains considerable. He is credited with creating the first general summary (bsdus pa) of Dharmakīrti's thought in Tibet, in the form of his Tshad ma yid kyi mun sel (Clarifying Ignorance regarding the Pramāṇa Treatises; TBRC W1PD89051, 434–630). He is reported to have composed more than one version of a text bearing this name, and thereby "initiated a literary genre of Summaries that has proven immensely successful" (Dreyfus, 1997, 22). It is uncertain whether Phya pa based himself on an earlier Tibetan text of the same format, but there appear to be no Indian precedents for this sort of work in which topics within Pramāṇa are addressed systematically (van der Kuijp, 2002, 384–389). Phya pa is also seen as instrumental in transforming debate into a pedagogical tool. Not only are his summaries considered the predecessor of the later Dge lugs bsdus grwa textbooks (see below), but popular tradition says that he was the first to propose that debate should be presented in the form of consequences (thal 'gyur; Skt. prasaṅga) instead of formal syllogisms (Dreyfus, 1997, 22), thereby ensuring that debate was used more for education than public disputation between those holding competing views.

Outside the Gsang phu tradition, Pa tshab Nyi ma grags (1055–1145), who took up residence in Rgyal lha khang monastery in Central Tibet, is remembered for his contribution to the understanding of Madhyamaka. He was the first to translate the two major works of Candrakīrti (fl. c. 625), the Prasannapadā (Dbu ma tshig gsal; D 3860/P 5260) and Madhyamakāvatāra (Dbu ma la 'jug pa; D 3861/P 5262), commentaries to Nāgārjuna's Mūlamadhyamakakārikā (Dbu ma rtsa rab; D 3824/P 5224; Dunne, 2011, 216), a brought Candrakīrti's interpretations to tion of Tibetan scholars. Pa tshab w author, but only recently a set of texts at him has resurfaced. These are exegetical Nāgārjuna's root text and Candrakīrti c ies (Dreyfus & Drongbu Tsering, 2010) an sitions of Pa tshab's own system. They ar consistent with the traditional narrative, to which Pa tshab played a pivotal role ing the notion of a dichotomy in Ma philosophy.

---

There are various opinions regarding t between the "Syllogistic" school (Rang rg Svātantrika), and "Consequentialist" (Th
Skt. Prāsaṅgika) schools (Dreyfus & M 2003), and questions remain about the ex of the distinction. (Some Western schola names *Svātantrika and *Prāsaṅgika as r tions, since they are not actually atteste sources.) Pa tshab clearly endorsed Ca interpretation of Nāgārjuna's work. T popularize the doxographical division, in Indian authors Buddhapālita and Śāntid cent.) were, like Candrakīrti, classified a to Prāsaṅgika views, whereas Bhāviveka, significantly Śāntarakṣita and Kamala consigned to the inferior Svātantrika su Madhyamaka.

Śāntarakṣita and Kamalaśīla had argu use of inferential reasoning, and a gra from a conception to a perception of In line with the epistemological appr emphasized the reliability and correctn ception, especially as pertaining to kn the domain of conventional reality. C Candrakīrti, in Pa tshab's tradition of tion, was skeptical of any certainty of kn this domain, apparently undermining the logical approach. There are some resona Rong zom's criticism of Madhyamaka th disagreements about the status of objec reliability of knowledge in the conventi have proved among the most abiding Tibetan philosophical literature. Phya pa' to defend Śāntarakṣita and Kamalaśīla lar in the sense that it was not picked up by losophers. Thenceforth Candrakīrti was e as the most popular interpreter and comm Nāgārjuna for centuries in Tibet.

ndigenously composed commentar-th Kamalaśīla's earlier treatment of Madhyamakālaṃkāra – dealt with ine-by-line exposition, but by focusatise's "difficult points" (dka' gnad).
a rnam nges kyi bsdus don, however, ical summary" (don bsdus or bsdus e text (Kramer, 2007, 109 n. 161). He summary format for dealing with dharmas of Maitreya: the Uttara- 1993), the Abhisamayālaṃkāra (see pa'i rgyan gyi 'grel pa'i bsdus don, and the Madhyāntavibhāga (Dbus
).

disappearance of many of his number of which have recently ne Bka' gdams gsung 'bum; TBRC e reputation of the sixth abbot of 52–1169), Ph(w)ya pa Chos kyi seng emains considerable. He is credited e first general summary (bsdus pa) thought in Tibet, in the form of d kyi mun sel (Clarifying Ignorance amāṇa Treatises; TBRC W1PD89051, reported to have composed more n of a text bearing this name, and d a literary genre of Summaries that nensely successful" (Dreyfus, 1997, in whether Phya pa based himself betan text of the same format, but be no Indian precedents for this which topics within Pramāṇa are natically (van der Kuijp, 2002, 384– also seen as instrumental in transnto a pedagogical tool. Not only are onsidered the predecessor of the dus grwa textbooks (see below), but n says that he was the first to pro-should be presented in the form of hal 'gyur; Skt. prasaṅga) instead of s (Dreyfus, 1997, 22), thereby ensur-was used more for education than n between those holding compet-

sang phu tradition, Pa tshab Nyi 1145), who took up residence in monastery in Central Tibet, is his contribution to the under-hyamaka. He was the first to transor works of Candrakīrti (fl. c. 625), dā (Dbu ma tshig gsal; D 3860/P hyamakāvatāra (Dbu ma la 'jug 52), commentaries to Nāgārjuna's

Mūlamadhyamakakārikā (Dbu ma rtsa ba'i shes rab; D 3824/P 5224; Dunne, 2011, 216), and thereby brought Candrakīrti's interpretations to the attention of Tibetan scholars. Pa tshab was also an author, but only recently a set of texts attributed to him has resurfaced. These are exegetical glosses to Nāgārjuna's root text and Candrakīrti commentaries (Dreyfus & Drongbu Tsering, 2010) and not expositions of Pa tshab's own system. They are, however, consistent with the traditional narrative, according to which Pa tshab played a pivotal role in promoting the notion of a dichotomy in Madhyamaka philosophy.

There are various opinions regarding the division between the "Syllogistic" school (Rang rgyud pa; Skt. Svātantrika), and "Consequentialist" (Thal 'gyur pa; Skt. Prāsaṅgika) schools (Dreyfus & McClintock, 2003), and questions remain about the exact origins of the distinction. (Some Western scholars treat the names *Svātantrika and *Prāsaṅgika as reconstructions, since they are not actually attested in Indian sources.) Pa tshab clearly endorsed Candrakīrti's interpretation of Nāgārjuna's work. This helped popularize the doxographical division, in which the Indian authors Buddhapālita and Śāntideva (fl. 8th cent.) were, like Candrakīrti, classified as adhering to Prāsaṅgika views, whereas Bhāviveka, and more significantly Śāntarakṣita and Kamalaśīla, were consigned to the inferior Svātantrika subschool of Madhyamaka.

Śāntarakṣita and Kamalaśīla had argued for the use of inferential reasoning, and a gradual move from a conception to a perception of emptiness. In line with the epistemological approach, they emphasized the reliability and correctness of perception, especially as pertaining to knowledge in the domain of conventional reality. Conversely, Candrakīrti, in Pa tshab's tradition of interpretation, was skeptical of any certainty of knowledge in this domain, apparently undermining the epistemological approach. There are some resonances with Rong zom's criticism of Madhyamaka thought, and disagreements about the status of objects and the reliability of knowledge in the conventional realm have proved among the most abiding themes in Tibetan philosophical literature. Phya pa's attempt to defend Śāntarakṣita and Kamalaśīla largely failed, in the sense that it was not picked up by later philosophers. Thenceforth Candrakīrti was established as the most popular interpreter and commentator of Nāgārjuna for centuries in Tibet.

The 13th and the early 14th Century

The Bka' gdams interpretation of logic seems to have represented the standard until the appearance of the Tshad ma rigs pa'i gter (Treasury of Logic on Valid Cognition; TBRC W11391; partial trans. Fukuda, 1989–1993) by Sa skya Paṇḍita Kun dga' rgyal mtshan (1182–1251). Sa skya Paṇḍita was a towering figure, who was not just an important author but also instrumental in forging a political alliance with the Mongols and the subsequent Yuan dynasty (1271–1368), in the wake of the initial Mongol incursion into Tibet (1240). These events eventually saw the Sa skya tradition, centered at Sa skya monastery, being handed political stewardship over Tibet (Kapstein, 2006, 110–116).

The Tshad ma rigs pa'i gter and its autocommentary are each divided into 11 chapters (rab byed):

1. Objects;
2. Cognition;
3. Generalities and Particulars;
4. Affirmative and Negative (Understanding);
5. Object and Language;
6. Relationship;
7. Incompatibility;
8. Defining Characteristics;
9. Perception;
10. Inference for Oneself; and
11. Inference for Others.

Sa skya Paṇḍita also translated the Pramāṇavārttika (Tshad ma rnam 'grel; D4210/P 5709), Dharmakīrti's major commentary on Dignāga's "Compendium of Valid Cognition" (Pramāṇasamuccaya; Tshad ma kun btus; D 4203/P 5700). While the Tshad ma rigs pa'i gter is not a commentary to any specific Indian treatise, it marks a lasting shift in focus away from Dharmakīrti's Pramāṇaviniścaya (Tshad ma rnam nges; D 4211/P 5710) toward his Pramāṇavārttika. It built upon the topical format of the bsdus pa works, but rather than simply summarizing and clarifying Indian Pramāṇa thinking, it criticized earlier Tibetan interpretations, most notably those of the Gsang phu scholars. This marked a significant step in the development of indigenous scholarly discourse, opening up the way to centuries of disputation and controversy over rival interpretations, conducted through the medium of literature. The Tshad ma rigs pa'i gter also became the center of a commentarial tradition, resulting in the apparently unprecedented situation that a Tibetan work, in contrast to an Indian text, was seen as a root and a source of authority. This treatise is furthermore credited with providing a "fully-fledged theory of concept formation" (van der Kuijp, 1979, 408). The work specifically attacked Phya pa's approach to objects of perception. Rejecting idealist interpretations of Dharmakīrti, Phya pa favored a realist model similar to that of the Indian Buddhist Vaibhāṣika school, according to which objects exist simultaneously with their perceptions. Sa skya Paṇḍita instead argued for a causal model, in which objects exist prior to their perceptions. This is closer to the Sautrāntika view (Hugon, 2015). Sa skya Paṇḍita also put forth the point that on a higher scale of analysis, an idealist interpretation was valid. This solidified the notion that the Indian traditions could be organized on a doxographical ascending scale, a view that was enthusiastically developed by later Dge lugs authors.

Much important Sa skya literature in subsequent decades relates to Sa skya Paṇḍita's interpretation of the Pramāṇavārttika. The Sa skya scholar 'U yug pa Rigs pa'i seng ge (c. 1195–c. 1267) produced the first Tibetan commentary on the Pramāṇavārttika, and also possibly the first commentary – other than the autocommentary – to Sa skya Paṇḍita's Tshad ma rigs pa'i gter (van der Kuijp, 2014, 114). The former was criticized by another Sa skya scholar, Btsun pa Ston gzhon, in his exegesis of the same text (van der Kuijp, 2014). The title of the text, Rnam 'grel gyi rnam bshad gangs can gyi rgyan (Ornament of the Land of Snow: A Commentary to the Pramāṇavārttika; TBRC W20481) is perhaps also significant in terms of a literary awareness, as it is clearly acknowledged, in its use of the epithet for Tibet ("Land of Snow"), that the work is part of an indigenous literary tradition.

Meanwhile, the Bka' gdams monastery of Snar thang had become a major center of learning and literary activity. An author connected to this monastery, Lcom ldan Rigs pa'i ral gri (1227–1305), composed commentaries on the Pramāṇaviniścaya (Tshad ma rnam par nges pa 'i 'grel bshad chen po rgyan gyi me tog; TBRC W11848) and the collection of seven Pramāṇa treatises composed by Dharmakīrti (Tshad ma 'i bstan bcos sde bdun rgyan gyi me tog; TBRC W11847). A successor, Dbus pa blo gsal (also known as Sangs rgyas 'bum; 13th cent.) composed an important text on Indian Buddhist philosophical traditions (Grub pa'i mtha' rnam par bshad pa'i mdzod; W27218; also known as Blo gsal grub mtha'; Mimaki, 1979, 1980, 1982, 1983, 1992, 1994). Lcom ldan rigs pa'i ral gri and Dbus pa blo gsal are also known for their work codifying and cataloguing a collection of texts at Snar thang which eventually gave rise to the earliest known Tibetan canon. Thereby a lasting separation between the Kanjur and the Tanjur was established (van der Kuijp & Schaeffer, 2009).

Bu ston rin chen grub (1290–1364), the 11th abbot of the Sa skya monastery of Zhwa lu, is also mainly remembered for his important work on the formation of the canon, as well as his voluminous writings. His famous treatise on buddha nature written in 1359, entitled De bzhin gshegs pa'i snying po gsal zhing mdzes par byed pa'i rgyan (Ornament Clarifying and Beautifying Buddha Nature; TBRC W22106; trans. Seyfort Ruegg, 1973) is philosophically significant. As did Rngog Blo ldan shes rab, he sought to interpret buddha nature in terms of Madhyamaka philosophy and to identify this essence, shared between buddhas and ordinary beings, as emptiness.

The Phyag rgya chen po tradition ("The Great Seal"; Skt. Mahāmudrā) in Tibet was transmitted through the Bka' brgyud tradition, and popularized by figures such as Sgam po pa Bsod nams rin chen (1079–1153). Like Rdzogs chen, the Phyag rgya chen po system is more phenomenologically and meditatively inclined, and shares with it an emphasis upon nonstriving, nonduality, and upon discovering the natural state of the mind. As with Rdzogs chen, opinions may vary as to when it might be judged philosophical, rather than a purely meditative system. However, Sa skya Paṇḍita's criticisms of Phyag rgya chen po doctrines such as the Dkar po chig thub ("Self-sufficient White Means") in his "Clear Differentiation of the Three Codes" (Sdom gsum rab dbye, TBRC W1KG1686; trans. Rhoton, 2002) certainly drew its proponents into a philosophical discussion. Protagonists of Phyag rgya chen po, such as Sgam po pa, made a clear contrast between analytical and meditative approaches. Without dismissing the former, they stressed the importance of experience and meditation from the start, as opposed to philosophical study and reasoning. Unsurprisingly, the system has harboured strains of anti-intellectualism. Sa skya Paṇḍita's judgement of the Phyag rgya chen po, while perhaps partly responding to these strains, also accused the system of drawing inspiration from Chinese (Chan) influences (Jackson, 1994; Kapstein, 2000, 77). Responses to these criticisms followed in later centuries from authors such as Pad ma dkar po (1527–1592). Rang byung rdo rje (1284–1339), the third Karmapa, composed a text on the theme of buddha nature, De bzhin gshegs pa'i snying po bstan pa (Exposition of Buddha Nature; TRBC W1CZ1094; trans. Brunnhölzl, 2009), in which he equated buddha nature with the key Phyag rgya chen po term "natural mind" (tha mal gyi shes pa; Mathes, 2008, 1).

This work is often posited as a precurso ries of Dol po pa Shes rab rgyal mtshan who visited Rang byung rdo rje in his monastery in 1321.

Dol po pa, who belonged to the Jo na is perhaps the most controversial aut sophical literature in Tibet (on his lif see Stearns, 1999). He completely re bhadra and his otherwise standard inte the Prajñāpāramitā, championed by R shes rab. In particular, reversing the h understanding of Mahāyāna sūtras, that those texts belonging to the final ing of the wheel of dharma, rather th provisional (and inferior) Yogācāra p surpassed those of the "Middle Tur ond Wheel" (primarily the Prajñāpā in their clarity and definitiveness Buddha's final intention. In line wit Madhyamaka thought, Dol po pa he relative or conventional level, objec of intrinsic nature" (rang stong). H stance, however, was to assert that in t ultimate sense, objects are "empty of tence" (gzhan stong), this is to say, tha the ultimate lay in realizing it as bein relative. In this way, Dol po pa seeme a far more affirmative understandi mate than had hitherto prevailed. W ing it as the final view, it was more aspects of Indian Yogācāra interpr Prajñāpāramitā sūtras, such as the espoused by Vasubandhu. It also pr unifying picture, which combined th aspects of buddha nature, tantra, the Way" (Dbu ma chen po), and the "Gre pa set out his primary positions in don rgya mtsho (TBRC W1KG1869; 2006). However, the more positive the ultimate was severely criticized authors, and particularly in the Dge was essentially judged as heretical positions, see Kapstein, 2001, 301 2001, 193–214).

Klong chen Rab 'byams pa dri me 1364), believed by many to be the gre author on doctrine, is credited wit the Rdzogs chen teachings. Reflect nence in the field, most of his transla to Rdzogs chen, particularly the Ng (Trilogy of Rest; TBRC W1GS60877; 1975–1976). Klong chen rab 'byams set against the historical backdrop

This work is often posited as a precursor to the theories of Dol po pa Shes rab rgyal mtshan (1292–1361), who visited Rang byung rdo rje in his Mtshur phu monastery in 1321.

Dol po pa, who belonged to the Jo nang tradition, is perhaps the most controversial author of philosophical literature in Tibet (on his life and works, see Stearns, 1999). He completely rejected Haribhadra and his otherwise standard interpretation of the Prajñāpāramitā, championed by Rngog Blo ldan shes rab. In particular, reversing the hermeneutical understanding of Mahāyāna sūtras, he proposed that those texts belonging to the final (third) turning of the wheel of dharma, rather than teaching a provisional (and inferior) Yogācāra position, often surpassed those of the "Middle Turning" or "Second Wheel" (primarily the Prajñāpāramitā sūtras) in their clarity and definitiveness regarding the Buddha's final intention. In line with mainstream Madhyamaka thought, Dol po pa held that on the relative or conventional level, objects are "empty of intrinsic nature" (rang stong). His innovatory stance, however, was to assert that in the absolute or ultimate sense, objects are "empty of extrinsic existence" (gzhan stong), this is to say, that realization of the ultimate lay in realizing it as being devoid of the relative. In this way, Dol po pa seemed to construct a far more affirmative understanding of the ultimate than had hitherto prevailed. Without endorsing it as the final view, it was more sympathetic to aspects of Indian Yogācāra interpretations of the Prajñāpāramitā sūtras, such as the three natures espoused by Vasubandhu. It also presented a more unifying picture, which combined the more positive aspects of buddha nature, tantra, the "Great Middle Way" (Dbu ma chen po), and the "Great Seal." Dol po pa set out his primary positions in his Ri chos nges don rgya mtsho (TBRC W1KG1869; trans. Hopkins, 2006). However, the more positive perspective on the ultimate was severely criticized by subsequent authors, and particularly in the Dge lugs tradition it was essentially judged as heretical (on Dol po pa's positions, see Kapstein, 2001, 301–316; Sparham, 2001, 193–214).

Klong chen Rab 'byams pa dri med 'od zer (1308–1364), believed by many to be the greatest Rnying ma author on doctrine, is credited with systematizing the Rdzogs chen teachings. Reflecting his preeminence in the field, most of his translated works relate to Rdzogs chen, particularly the Ngal gso skor gsum (Trilogy of Rest; TBRC W1GS60877; trans. Guenther, 1975–1976). Klong chen rab 'byams pa's writings are set against the historical backdrop of the political redefinition of Tibet which took place at the end of the Yuan dynasty, and his works were partly a counter to the continued rise of the Gsar ma traditions, and the formation of the canon, from which various Rnying ma tantras were excluded. Despite the existence of a work on epistemology (Tshad ma de kho na nyid bsdus pa; TBRC W1KG4003) attributed to Klong chen rab 'byams pa – the authorship of which has been called into question (van der Kuijp, 2003, 381–431) – his principal philosophical work is the collection posthumously designated the Mdzod bdun (Seven Treasures; TBRC W10MS11430). These seven works are called:

1. Wish-fulfilling One (Yid bzhin);
2. Personal Instruction (Man ngag);
3. Expanse of Reality (Chos dbyings);
4. Words and Meanings (Tshig don);
5. Supreme Vehicle (Theg mchog);
6. Tenets (Grub mtha'); and
7. Way of Being (Gnas lugs).

In some of these volumes, Klong chen rab 'byams pa systematized the earlier Rnying ma teachings, and in others the focus is placed upon the meditational and empirical aspects of Rdzogs chen and tantra. However, the 6th work, "Tenets", offers a pioneering doxographical presentation (Butters, 2006; Barron, 2007). The work not only deals with the Buddhist and non-Buddhist schools of India – during the course of which the author appears to reject Dol po pa's view of extrinsic emptiness, in favor of a position closer to that of the Prāsaṅgika-Madhyamaka (Butters, 2006, 5) – it also presents two different ways of organizing tantric materials hierarchically, namely the nine-vehicle Rnying ma model alongside the fourfold classification of tantras of the Gsar ma traditions (for the latter see Hopkins, 1977). The integration of the Rdzogs chen into the hierarchical doxographical vision promoted by the Gsar ma schools was a way of arguing for its supremacy. Despite the apparently limited immediate impact of these writings, they have greatly influenced subsequent generations of Rnying ma thinkers.

The 14th Century: The Rise of the Dge lugs

What subsequently became known as the Dge lugs school was originally organized around Dga' ldan monastery in Central Tibet, for which reason its early adherents were known as the Dga' ldan pa. Members of the Dge lugs school have on occasion projected themselves as the inheritors of the Bka' gdams tradition, which effectively ceased to exist as a separate school by the 16th century (Jinpa, 2002). Tsong kha pa Blo bzang grags pa (1357–1419) is credited with the school's foundation. His writings, supported by those of his chief disciples, particularly Rgyal tshab Dar ma rin chen (also known as Rgyal tshab rje, 1364–1462) and Mkhas grub Dge legs dpal bzang (also known as Mkhas grub rje, 1385–1438), have served as the philosophical base of the Dge lugs tradition. The school eventually had a massive effect upon monastic education and organization, and the formation of what amounted to the state religion of Tibet. Its philosophical and doctrinal influence has been equally significant (for Tsong kha pa's contribution to philosophical thought, see Tillemans, 1998; Jinpa, 2002; Sparham, 2014).

Tsong kha pa's writings can be divided between those of his early and mature periods (Sparham, 2014). His distinctive philosophical views only truly emerge in the latter period. Rejecting predominant attempts to syncretize the Yogācāra and Madhyamaka positions, Tsong kha pa depicted these as two distinct schools of thought, with the Madhyamaka as the superior. This hierarchical division pervaded all of his interpretations, including those of tantra and buddha nature, which ultimately had to be understood from the Madhyamaka perspective as presented by Nāgārjuna. Tsong kha pa vehemently opposed Dol po pa's notion of extrinsic emptiness and his impugning of Haribhadra's commentary to the Abhisamayālaṃkara. In his Drang nges legs bshad snying po (Essence of Eloquence with respect to Provisional and Definitive Meaning; TBRC W1CZ1011; trans. Thurman, 1984), Tsong kha pa set out his hermeneutical position with regard to the interpretation of the sūtras, paying particular attention to a section of the Saṃdhinirmocanasūtra (Mdo sde dgongs 'grel; D 0106/ P 0774), in which the Buddha resolves apparent inconsistencies between statements he gave during the three turnings of the wheel of dharma. Tsong kha pa argued that the Buddha explained that it was the Madhyamaka view – rather than the Yogācāra one – that represented his final position. While Tsong kha pa emphasized the centrality of the three nature theory (ngo bo nyid gsum, Skt. trisvabhāva) to the Yogācāra, he refuted Dol po pa's understanding of that theory. In various works, Tsong kha pa greatly elaborated on other aspects of Yogācāra thought, such as emptiness (Hopkins, 1999; 2002) and doctrines of mind (Sparham, 1993). Expansion upon the distinctiveness of the Yogācāra system supported one of his primary philosophical endeavors, namely, establishing a stratified doxographical vision of Buddhist schools. As in earlier doxographies, going back to at least the 12th century, Tsong kha pa organized the Buddhist schools in ascending order, starting with the realist Vaibhāṣika and Sautrāntika (posited on the basis of earlier Buddhist sources), followed by Yogācāra and finally Madhyamaka. Each of the four Buddhist schools was conceived of as having various subdivisions. Tsong kha pa stressed the heuristic value of views ascribed to the lower schools, but dismissed their relevance to the final view. This included the ālayavijñāna (kun gzhi'i rnam shes, "foundation consciousness") – of which many Tibetan philosophers, presenting a syncretic version of Yogācāra-Madhyamaka, had hitherto accepted the literal existence – and the Yogācāra version of the three natures.

One of Tsong kha pa's most important steps related to the internal division within the Madhyamaka. He reoriented discussion regarding the distinction between the Prāsaṅgika and Svātantrika from one of method – whether they rejected or advocated the use of syllogistic formulas – to a fundamental disagreement regarding ontology, arguing that the Svātantrika view failed to penetrate ultimate reality. Tsong kha pa heightened the sense that various historical authors were representatives of distinct philosophical schools, and that the Prāsaṅgika view was not only supreme, but the sole route to higher spiritual goals. As this declared that only the Prāsaṅgika Madhyamaka school pioneered by Candrakīrti captured the Buddha's final intention, it countered the assertion that different interpretations could be combined within the so-called "Great Middle Way" (Dbu ma chen po; Mahāmadhyamaka; Sparham, 2001, 193). This position devalued not only the Yogācāra/Cittamātra, but also the philosophical view that had once dominated in Tibet, based on the teaching of Śāntarakṣita and Kamalaśīla, who, according to the taxonomy developed by Tsong kha pa and his followers, belonged to the Rnal 'byor spyod pa dbu ma rang rgyud pa (Yogācāra-svātantrika-madhyamaka) subcategory. Developing his characteristic position on the two truths, Tsong kha pa proposed that what was refuted by Nāgārjuna was any form of essential or intrinsic existence. This opposed what Tsong kha pa perceived as Dol po pa's reification of the enlightened state, involving the assertion of a pure and privileged transcendent state of consciousness. Here, the enlightened mind had the same ontological status as other conventional phenomena. While denying instrinsic existence, Tsong kha pa's unique – and contentious – understanding of th the ordinary (conventional) world it a degree of coherence and verifi many other commentators of Nāgā had striven to undermine (Tausc kha pa's interpretation of Indian t addition of numerous modal qu "truly" (bden par) and "conventio du) (Tillemans, 1998), which seem for instance, statements of negat denial that adherents of the Madh thought hold specific theses or pro

---

Tsong kha pa's arguments tha was the highest view in the ascen cal model, and his assertion that th a distinct philosophical tradition tenets, are set out in four key work

1. Dka' gnad brgyad kyi zin b
Eight Difficult Points [of Prāsaṅgi TBRC W22272; trans. Seyfort Rueg

2. Dbu ma dgongs pa rab g tary to Candrakīrti's Madhyam W1KG15604);

3. Lhag mthong chen mo (th the Lam rim chen mo; TBRC W4 Chenmo Translation Committee,

4. Dbu ma rtsa ba'i tshig le'ur b bya ba'i rnam bshad rigs pa'i rgya as Rtsa she'i ṭīk chen), a commenta Mūlamadhyamakakārikā (TBRC Samten & Garfield, 2006).

While ostensibly aligning tshab Nyi ma grags in recomme as Nāgārjuna's principal Indi Tsong kha pa effectively discard Candrakīrti was skeptical with tainty of knowledge in the conv thus distancing himself from wh been called "Madhyamaka free (mtha' bral dbu ma), or "the being nor nonbeing" (yod min m Tillemans, 1998). Instead, he su tion of Śāntarakṣita and Kamalaś of inferential reasoning, and fu the importance of the epistem suggesting that Dharmakīrti's p incompatible with that of Candr on Pramāṇa are relatively few i position is said to be outlined in chief disciples, especially the Ts thar lam gsal byed, Rgyal tshab commentary to the Pramāṇavār the second chapter is translated cal vision of Buddhist schools.

hies, going back to at least the ha pa organized the Buddhist order, starting with the realist rāntika (posited on the basis urces), followed by Yogācāra, aka. Each of the four Buddhist d of as having various subdivi-stressed the heuristic value of lower schools, but dismissed he final view. This included n gzhi'i rnam shes, "founda-– of which many Tibetan ting a syncretic version of a, had hitherto accepted the d the Yogācāra version of the 's most important steps related on within the Madhyamaka. ion regarding the distinction ka and Svātantrika from one r they rejected or advocated formulas – to a fundamental ng ontology, arguing that the d to penetrate ultimate realhtened the sense that various re representatives of distinct s, and that the Prāsaṅgika preme, but the sole route to

. As this declared that only yamaka school pioneered by the Buddha's final intention, ion that different interpreta-ed within the so-called "Great chen po; Mahāmadhyamaka; ). This position devalued ra/Cittamātra, but also the at had once dominated in eaching of Śāntarakṣita and rding to the taxonomy develand his followers, belonged d pa dbu ma rang rgyud pa madhyamaka) subcategory. teristic position on the two posed that what was refuted form of essential or intrinsic ed what Tsong kha pa pereification of the enlightened sertion of a pure and privie of consciousness. Here, the the same ontological status phenomena. While denying ong kha pa's unique – and

---

contentious – understanding of the two truths left the ordinary (conventional) world intact, granting it a degree of coherence and verifiable efficacy that many other commentators of Nāgārjuna believed he had striven to undermine (Tauscher, 1995). Tsong kha pa's interpretation of Indian texts requires the addition of numerous modal qualifiers, such as "truly" (bden par) and "conventionally" (tha snyad du) (Tillemans, 1998), which seemingly moderate, for instance, statements of negation, such as the denial that adherents of the Madhyamaka school of thought hold specific theses or propositions.

Tsong kha pa's arguments that the Prāsaṅgika was the highest view in the ascending doxographical model, and his assertion that the Prāsaṅgika was a distinct philosophical tradition with its own set of tenets, are set out in four key works:

1. Dka' gnad brgyad kyi zin bris (Notes on the Eight Difficult Points [of Prāsaṅgika-Mādhyamika]; TBRC W22272; trans. Seyfort Ruegg, 2002);
2. Dbu ma dgongs pa rab gsal, a commentary to Candrakīrti's Madhyamakāvatāra (TBRC W1KG15604);
3. Lhag mthong chen mo (the last section of the Lam rim chen mo; TBRC W466; trans. Lamrim Chenmo Translation Committee, 2004); and
4. Dbu ma rtsa ba'i tshig le'ur byas pa shes rab ces bya ba'i rnam bshad rigs pa'i rgya mtsho (also known as Rtsa she'i ṭīk chen), a commentary on Nāgārjuna's Mūlamadhyamakakārikā (TBRC W22272; trans. Samten & Garfield, 2006).

While ostensibly aligning himself with Pa tshab Nyi ma grags in recommending Candrakīrti as Nāgārjuna's principal Indian commentator, Tsong kha pa effectively discards the notion that Candrakīrti was skeptical with regard to the certainty of knowledge in the conventional domain, thus distancing himself from what has sometimes been called "Madhyamaka free from extremes" (mtha' bral dbu ma), or "the view of neither being nor nonbeing" (yod min med min gyi lta ba; Tillemans, 1998). Instead, he supported the position of Śāntarakṣita and Kamalaśīla on the necessity of inferential reasoning, and further emphasized the importance of the epistemological approach, suggesting that Dharmakīrti's philosophy was not incompatible with that of Candrakīrti. His writings on Pramāṇa are relatively few in number, but his position is said to be outlined in the writings of his chief disciples, especially the Tshad ma rnam 'grel thar lam gsal byed, Rgyal tshab Dar ma rin chen's commentary to the Pramāṇavārttika (TBRC W665; the second chapter is translated by Jackson, 1993). As with his Dka' gnad brgyad kyi zin bris, this work is reported to be a reworking of the notes Rgyal tshab Dar ma rin chen took during Tsong kha pa's teaching. The former is included in Rgyal tshab Dar ma rin chen's "Collected Works" (Gsung 'bum, these are collections of important authors' writings), while the latter is in those of Tsong kha pa. Aspects of Tsong kha pa's views on Pramāṇa are also reflected in Mkhas grub Dge legs dpal bzang's commentary to the Pramāṇavārttika (Tshad ma rnam 'grel ṭīk chen rigs pa'i rgya mtsho; TBRC W321) as well as in his Tshad ma sde bdun gyi rgyan yid kyi mun sel (TBRC W1KG16155; trans. Samuels, forthcoming), and in the Tshad ma rigs rgyan (TBRC W1KG16157), written by another direct disciple of Tsong kha pa, Dge 'dun grub (1391–1474), who was retrospectively designated the first Dalai Lama. Rather than specific commentaries, the latter two works deal with Pramāṇa topically, in much the same way as the Tshad ma rigs pa'i gter and the bsdus pa literature.

Tsong kha pa's views on Madhyamaka are also reflected in, for example, Mkhas grub Dge legs dpal bzang's Dbu ma stong thun chen mo (TBRC W00EGS1016265; trans. Cabezón, 1992). As with the major work on Pramāṇa, it is the Rnam bshad snying po'i rgyan (The Ornament of the Essence; TBRC W3CN1449), Rgyal tshab Dar ma rin chen's commentary to Sphuṭārthā, 'Grel ba don gsal (Haribhadra's Clear Meaning Commentary; D 3793/P 5191) to the Abhisamayālaṃkāra that later Dge lugs tradition regards as presenting Tsong kha pa's final thought on the Prajñāpāramitā (Perfection of Wisdom), rather than his own early commentary on the topic, Legs bshad gser phreng (Golden Garland of Eloquence; TBRC W1KG16138; trans. Sparham, 2007–2009). The same later tradition has sought to project a greater degree of philosophical homogeneity between the writings of Tsong kha pa and his chief disciples – and indeed between his early and mature periods – than seems warranted by their content.

With regard to Tibet's earlier intellectual tradition, Tsong kha pa's "Collected Works" include a brief exposition on Śāntarakṣita's Madhyamakālaṃkāra, entitled Dbu ma rgyan gyi brjed byang (TBRC W22272). This is also considered to be Rgyal tshab Dar ma rin chen's notes from teachings by Tsong kha pa on Śāntarakṣita's text (trans. Blumenthal, 2004, 249–287). More recently, a commentary of Sa skya Paṇḍita's Tshad ma rigs pa'i gter attributed to Rgyal tshab Dar ma rin chen was discovered (Rgyal tshab rje'i tshad ma rigs gter 'grel pa; TBRC W1KG11902), although some doubts over the attribution have been raised (Dreyfus, 1993). Issues regarding the authorship, attribution, and inclusion (or exclusion) from volumes of "Collected Works" appear to exhibit some parallels with those related to the formation of the canon. The intellectual development of the works by Tsong kha pa's disciples and the exact relation between their thought and that of Tsong kha pa require further investigation.

The 15th to the 16th Centuries: Critics of Tsong kha pa

Tsong kha pa's theories sparked controversy and stimulated much philosophical discussion among Tibetan authors. Before the Dge lugs was considered to be a distinct school, and perhaps fueled by the sense that Tsong kha pa – whose principal teacher was the Sa skya master Red mda' ba Gzhon nu blo gros (1349–1412) – had misrepresented their tradition, Sa skya scholars formed the vanguard of the critics disputing Tsong kha pa's representation of Madhyamaka and the two truths. Prominent detractors included the Sa skya authors Gser mdog Paṇ chen Shā kya Mchog ldan (1428–1507), Go rams pa Bsod nams seng ge (1429–1489), and Stag tshang Lo tsa ba Shes rab rin chen (b. 1405). The eighth Karmapa, Mi bskyod rdo rje (1507–1554?) also composed a refutation of Tsong kha pa's views on Madhyamaka (Williams, 1983; trans. Goldfield et al., 2006). Although united in their opposition to Tsong kha pa, there are significant differences in their respective positions.

Perhaps the most effective critic of Tsong kha pa was Go rams pa. In his major Madhyamaka texts, Lta ba'i shan 'byed (Distinguishing the View; TBRC W1PD1725; trans. Cabezón & Dargyay, 2007; Arguillère, 2008), Lta ba ngan sel (Eliminating Bad Views; TBRC W1PD1725), a commentary on Candrakīrti's Madhyamakāvatāra, and Dbu ma'i spyi don (A General Synopsis of Madhyamaka; TBRC W1PD1725) he adopts an overtly polemical stance, especially in criticism of Tsong kha pa, while in the first mentioned work he also disputes Dol po pa's interpretation of Madhyamaka philosophy. Go rams pa's critique of Tsong kha pa was perhaps the main factor resulting in the subsequent censoring of his works, which only emerged from relative obscurity in the 20th century.

Tsong kha pa had proposed that the distinction between the two truths was to be understood on the basis of the apprehended object (yul). This meant that something might be said to have two natures: one conventional, the other ultimate. Go rams pa argued against this, maintaining that the distinction must be made on the basis of the apprehending subject (yul can). Seeking to reverse Tsong kha pa's version of the Madhyamaka subdivision, Go rams pa reasserted that the division between Prāsaṅgika and Svātantrika lay in their preferred method, and indicated nothing about their understanding of reality. Like Tsong kha pa, Go rams pa espoused that logical reasoning was essential to the path. However, he supported neither Tsong kha pa's application of logical rules – such as that a double negation implies an affirmation – nor his use of qualification (ultimate or conventional) when interpreting Indian treatises. For Go rams pa, negation, such as that in Nāgārjuna's famous tetralemma found in the Mūlamadhyamakakārika – in which a thing is said to arise neither from itself, another, both, or neither – was to be taken literally, and such statements represented analytical devices that undermine and dismantle conception, rather than lead to "correct" forms of conception, as might be said to be the case in Tsong kha pa's view. Although Go rams pa argued that a conceptual method had to be used in order to eventually arrive at a state of nonconceptuality, in his Lta ba'i shan 'byed, he defended himself against accusations that his approach was simply one of nonthinking (for a general description of Go rams pa's views, see Kassor, 2011; for a comparison of Go rams pa's differences with Tsong kha pa, see Thakchoe, 2007)

Shā kya Mchog ldan's writings on Madhyamaka include its history in India and Tibet (Dbu ma'i byung tshul rnam par bshad pa'i gtam yid bzhin lhun po; TBRC W00EGS1016899; Tillemans & Tomabechi, 1995; Komarovski, 2000). In his Theg pa chen po dbu ma rnam par nges pa'i chos kyi bang mdzod lung dang rigs pa'i rgya mtsho (Ocean of Scriptural Statements and Reasoning: Treasury of Ascertainment of the Mahāyāna Middle Way; TBRC W23200) he launched a systematic critique of Tsong kha pa. In later writings, Shā kya Mchog ldan moved markedly toward the extrinsic emptiness position expounded earlier by Dol po pa. He challenged the doxographical categories and produced a unique reading of the Yogācāra and Madhyamaka systems, aimed at demonstrating how they could be understood as compatible (Komarovski, 2011). The impact of these works on Tibetan intellectual thought is difficult to judge. Aspects of Shā kya Mchog ldan's works did not meet with the approval of mainstream Sa skya thinkers, and only reappeared from obscurity in the 1970s.

Stag tshang Lo tsa ba (b. 1405) tique of Tsong kha pa in a work (Grub mtha' kun shes nas mtha' bra W29895), in which he calls into q ter's proposition regarding the rol tion in establishing conventional o inspired by G.yag ston Sangs rgyas and his commentary on "Treasury Cognition" (Sde bdun gyi dgongs 'gr pa'i gter gyi de kho na nyid gsal bar
'od stong 'phro ba; TBRC W1KG35 renewed interest in Sa skya Paṇḍ Go rams pa and Shā kya Mchog ld ers, composing their respective con bdun mdo dang bcas pa'i dgongs log par 'grel ba tshad ma rigs pa'i g bar byed pa and Tshad ma rigs pa'i rgyan rigs pa'i 'khor los lugs ngan p texts can be found in TBRC W2040 were chiefly aimed at reaffirming S anti-realist stance. G.yag ston Sangs cially attacked Phya pa, and his p position on universals and commo as outlined in the "Summaries" (b fus, 1997, 24). Current understandi works relies partly upon what can Shā kya Mchog ldan's critical analy skya works, disapproval of Tsong k is more muted than in texts dealing of Madhyamaka. However, differi ings of the roles of language, though interpretations of Dharmakīrti's vie many respects at variance with thos school. For an elaboration on these tions of Pramāṇa, see G.B.J. Dreyfus,

The 16th to the 19th Centur
The Rise of Scholasticism

The aforementioned attacks upon writings provoked responses by Dg These are regularly cited as example generally viewed as a distinct genre, ignated (often retrospectively) as dg is frequently translated as "polemica further discussion, see Lopez, 1996; but refers more specifically to a wo to answer or rebut an attempted re Dge lugs context these are invarial Tsong khapa's positions. The traditio rejoinders precedes the Dge lugs er bearing titles such as rtsod lan ("cour

Stag tshang Lo tsa ba (b. 1405) voiced his critique of Tsong kha pa in a work on doxography (Grub mtha' kun shes nas mtha' bral grub pa; TBRC W29895), in which he calls into question the latter's proposition regarding the role of valid cognition in establishing conventional objects. Probably inspired by G.yag ston Sangs rgyas dpal (1348 –1414) and his commentary on "Treasury of Logic on Valid Cognition" (Sde bdun gyi dgongs 'grel tshad ma rigs pa'i gter gyi de kho na nyid gsal bar byed pa rigs pa'i 'od stong 'phro ba; TBRC W1KG3509), there was a renewed interest in Sa skya Paṇḍita's work, with Go rams pa and Shā kya Mchog ldan, among others, composing their respective commentaries (Sde bdun mdo dang bcas pa'i dgongs pa phyin ci ma log par 'grel ba tshad ma rigs pa'i gter gyi don gsal bar byed pa and Tshad ma rigs pa'i gter gyi dgongs rgyan rigs pa'i 'khor los lugs ngan pham byed; both texts can be found in TBRC W20402). These works were chiefly aimed at reaffirming Sa skya Paṇḍita's anti-realist stance. G.yag ston Sangs rgyas dpal especially attacked Phya pa, and his perceived realist position on universals and commonsense objects, as outlined in the "Summaries" (bsdus pa) (Dreyfus, 1997, 24). Current understanding of Phya pa's works relies partly upon what can be gleaned from Shā kya Mchog ldan's critical analysis. In these Sa skya works, disapproval of Tsong kha pa's position is more muted than in texts dealing with the subject of Madhyamaka. However, differing understandings of the roles of language, thought, and logic, and interpretations of Dharmakīrti's views were still in many respects at variance with those of the Dge lugs school. For an elaboration on these rival interpretations of Pramāṇa, see G.B.J. Dreyfus, 1997.

The 16th to the 19th Centuries: The Rise of Scholasticism

The aforementioned attacks upon Tsong kha pa's writings provoked responses by Dge lugs authors. These are regularly cited as examples of what is now generally viewed as a distinct genre, most often designated (often retrospectively) as dgag lan. This term is frequently translated as "polemical literature" (for further discussion, see Lopez, 1996; Viehbeck, 2014), but refers more specifically to a work that sets out to answer or rebut an attempted refutation. In the Dge lugs context these are invariably defences of Tsong khapa's positions. The tradition of composing rejoinders precedes the Dge lugs era, and writings bearing titles such as rtsod lan ("counter argument") are by no means limited to philosophical subject matter. However, the systematic and rehearsed approach and the vitriolic language of the Dge lugs defences – such as Rje btsun chos kyi rgyal mtshan's (1469–1546) Go lan (Response to Gorampa; TBRC W19227; Lopez, 1996, 217) – seem to distinguish them from what came before, and certainly aid in cementing the notion of a distinct genre.

Students of Tsong kha pa were inspired to found the monasteries of 'Bras spungs and Se ra in 1416 and 1419, respectively. These, together with Dga' ldan monastery, formed the "Three Seats" (Gdan sa gsum), the most powerful Dge lugs monasteries. The three eventually became the world's largest monastic institutions, and their ascendency launched an era of Dge lugs monastic dominance. The monasteries increasingly defined themselves in terms of scholastic activity, specifically laying far greater stress upon group sessions of dialectical contestation and formalized debate than discourse and tutoring (on the concept of scholasticism in relation to the Dge lugs tradition see, Cabezón, 1994). For their part, the non-Dge lugs schools developed commentarial schools (bshad grwa), in which exegesis was stressed (Dreyfus, 2005, 276–292).

As Tsong kha pa's successors systematized his philosophical teachings, and the monasteries steadily grew more organized and successful, there were gradual moves toward tailoring these teachings for pedagogical purposes, within an increasingly standardized curriculum (various aspects of traditional Dge lugs education are explored by Onoda, 1992; Dreyfus, 2003). This brought about innovations in genre, such as the introduction of manuals known as bsdus grwa ("collected topics"), the oldest available instance of which is the Rwa stod bsdus grwa (TBRC W2CZ8044), composed by 'Jam dbyangs mchog lha 'od zer (1429–1500). The tradition of outlining one's position within the format of debate was already well established in Tibetan philosophical literature. The bsdus grwa works (Perdue, 1992; Onoda, 1992), which were designed to serve as primers for young monks, take this to another level, dispensing almost entirely with exegesis. The texts consist primarily of a series of debates. The "correct" position on various points is represented by the responses of "our system" (rang lugs) to the arguments of different (usually unidentified) opponents. It might generally be observed, however, that the responses and the positions of the various interlocutors in bsdus grwa and other scholastic literature range from the obvious to the oblique, and the manner of their presentation is certainly intended to fuel debate and exploration.

The "Three Seats" were comprised of various colleges (grwa tshang). The educational evolution of the college system was intimately linked with the growth of scholastic literature. Each college eventually adopted a different author as their main spokesman and interpreter of the legacy of Tsong kha pa and his main disciples. Works by these authors are known as yig cha – textbooks of the respective colleges, serving as the primary materials for the study of philosophical writings. The core yig cha are texts entitled spyi don and mtha' dpyod. Tending more toward synopsis, the spyi don (lit. general meaning) deal with their respective areas (principally phar phyin [Prajñāpāramitā], dbu ma [Madhyamaka], and tshad ma [Pramāṇa]) more systematically and include numerous divisions and classifications, and sections of exegesis. The mtha' dpyod (lit. examination of boundaries) consider specific issues, entirely through the aforementioned medium of debate, where the "correct" system has to be deciphered from the author's responses to the arguments of various opponents. The spyi don and the mtha' dpyod were sometimes supported by various supplementary works or appendices by later writers, bearing names such as mchan and zur bkol. Spyi don and mtha' dpyod had already been in use as titles prior to this era, but it is within the Dge lugs scholastic literature that they solidify into clearly distinguished genres. The relatively late beginnings of the Dge lugs tradition and its concentration upon the literary endowment of Tsong kha pa and his main disciples means that, historically speaking, the Dge lugs school maintains the highest degree of philosophical homogeneity. Despite major rivalries between the Dge lugs colleges, and fierce loyalties to their respective yig cha authors, philosophical differences between these authors are minimal.

The Dge lugs ascendancy was facilitated by the foundation of the Ganden Podrang (Dga' ldan pho brang) government, under the fifth Dalai Lama (Ngag dbang blo bzang rgya mtsho, 1617–1682), with the support of the Dzungar Mongol leader Gushri Khan (1582–1655). This initially led to an unprecedented period of literary censorship, primarily targeting works of philosophical content. The works of the Jo nang tradition, as well as those of vehement critics of Tsong kha pa, such as Go rams pa and Shā kya Mchog ldan, were banned in Central Tibet, only to be retrieved from Eastern Tibet during the 20th century. Subsequently, under the patronage of the Manchu dynasty, the Dge lugs tradition enjoyed a position verging on that of a state religion. During this era several important treatises on doxography were produced by Dge lugs scholars, beginning with the Grub mtha' chen mo (Great Exposition of Philosophical Systems; TBRC W21503; partial trans. Hopkins, 2004) by 'Jam dbyangs bzhad pa'i rdo rje (1648–1721), followed by Lcang skya Rol pa'i rdo rje's (1717–1786) Grub mtha' lhun po mdzes rgyan (Exposition of the Philosophical Systems Beautifying the Axis Mundi; TBRC W28833; partial trans. Klein, 1987; Lopez, 1987; Hopkins, 1995), and the Grub mtha' shel gyi me long (Crystal Mirror of the Philosophical Systems; TBRC W2124; trans. Sopa & Jackson, 2009) by Thu'u bkwan Chos kyi nyi ma (1737–1802). The last named work is notable for its inclusion of the Bon tradition. More generally speaking, these texts further advanced the Dge lugs version of the hierarchical doxographical model, while moving toward a more inclusive understanding of the philosophical landscape.

Dge lugs scholasticism exerted a major influence on the other Tibetan traditions: various non-Dge lugs monasteries adopted an education system modelled upon it, and produced their own versions of monastic educational materials such as bsdus grwa works. Later Dge lugs writings move further toward formulaic representation and rehearsed argumentation, which are characteristic of the scholastic tradition. The strength of the Dge lugs and the perceived absence of serious philosophical challengers – although the writings of non-Dge lugs authors during the 17th and 18th centuries in particular require further study – led to a process of scholastic stultification. Authors turned repeatedly to attacking long-dead scholars, particularly Rong ston Shākya rgyal tshan (1367–1449), Dol po pa, and Stag tshang Lo tsa ba, while increasingly there was a narrowing of philosophical scope, which focused upon the yig cha.

Tibetan Philosophy in the 19th Century

The Dge lugs supremacy, occasionally manifesting in religious exclusivism, marginalized the other traditions, particularly in Central Tibet, and overshadowed much of the pre-Dge lugs intellectual history. The fortunes of the non-Dge lugs schools were to some extent revived by the advent of what has commonly been referred to as the Ris med (lit. nonpartisan) movement in Kham, Eastern Tibet. Although some questions have been raised about whether it is correct to regard this as a distinct movement (for further discussion, see Gardner, 2006, 112 ff.; Viehbeck, 2014, 68–74), the Ris med thought to have arisen to counterac growing hostilities between the v Ris med was not overtly philosop its most important figure, the proli mgon Kong sprul blo gros mtha' yas ( compose some philosophical works for instance, on the writings of the Rang byung rdo rje (Brunnhölzl, 20 ever, generally viewed as an encycl major treatise, the Shes bya kun khy sury of Knowledge; TBRC W5488), that was relevant to Tibet's intelle chapters of this large work have into English (Kalu Rinpoche Tra et al., 2003–2010). This process of r to preserve and, in some cases, resc ings that were threatened with appearance of this work, and the Ris in general, helped foster affinities sharing, mainly among the non-D Furthermore, 'Jam mgon Kong spr fication, and systemization of the s knowledge eventually provided an figures who, with newfound intelle developed analytical systems tha lacking in the Rnying ma and Bka' b

The most important of these lat Rnying ma scholar, Mi pham Rnam (1846–1912), possibly the most or his time, who was active in the kingdom of Derge (Sde dge), the activity. Mi pham sought to harm ma's Rdzogs chen teachings with philosophical traditions. This proj his engagement with authors com with the Ris med movement, and the writings of figures such as Go r is particularly known for his works (described in Phuntsho, 2005). Mi tary to Śāntarakṣita's Madhyam ma rgyan gyi rnam bshad 'jam dby pa'i zhal lung; TBRC W30366; tra Padmakara Translation Committe reestablish the centrality of this In described and contextualized the emptiness, in works such as Gzh seng ge'i nga ro (TBRC W1PD7 1999; Kapstein, 2009). In his Nor W2DB16631; trans. Arguillère, 20 to the ninth chapter of Śāntideva's (D 3871/ P 5272), he was especiall kha pa's position on Madhyama by Dge lugs scholars, beginning tha' chen mo (Great Exposition of stems; TBRC W21503; partial trans. y 'Jam dbyangs bzhad pa'i rdo rje wed by Lcang skya Rol pa'i rdo rje's mtha' lhun po mdzes rgyan (Expoosophical Systems Beautifying the W28833; partial trans. Klein, 1987; ins, 1995), and the Grub mtha' shel al Mirror of the Philosophical Sys-24; trans. Sopa & Jackson, 2009) Chos kyi nyi ma (1737–1802). The is notable for its inclusion of the re generally speaking, these texts the Dge lugs version of the hierar-cal model, while moving toward a derstanding of the philosophical sticism exerted a major influence etan traditions: various non-Dge adopted an education system and produced their own versions ational materials such as bsdus Dge lugs writings move further representation and rehearsed hich are characteristic of the n. The strength of the Dge lugs absence of serious philosophilthough the writings of non-Dge g the 17th and 18th centuries in further study – led to a process of ation. Authors turned repeatedly dead scholars, particularly Rong shan (1367–1449), Dol po pa, and ba, while increasingly there was losophical scope, which focused sophy in the

emacy, occasionally manifesting ism, marginalized the other train Central Tibet, and overshad-pre-Dge lugs intellectual history. non-Dge lugs schools were to by the advent of what has comd to as the Ris med (lit. nonpar-Kham, Eastern Tibet. Although ve been raised about whether rd this as a distinct movement ion, see Gardner, 2006, 112 ff.;

Viehbeck, 2014, 68–74), the Ris med trend is often thought to have arisen to counteract the perceived growing hostilities between the various schools. Ris med was not overtly philosophical, although its most important figure, the prolific author 'Jam mgon Kong sprul blo gros mtha' yas (1813–1899), did compose some philosophical works, commenting, for instance, on the writings of the third Karmapa, Rang byung rdo rje (Brunnhölzl, 2007). He is, however, generally viewed as an encyclopedist, whose major treatise, the Shes bya kun khyab mdzod (Treasury of Knowledge; TBRC W5488), recorded much that was relevant to Tibet's intellectual past. Most chapters of this large work have been translated into English (Kalu Rinpoche Translation Group et al., 2003–2010). This process of recording helped to preserve and, in some cases, rescue earlier teachings that were threatened with extinction. The appearance of this work, and the Ris med movement in general, helped foster affinities and encouraged sharing, mainly among the non-Dge lugs schools. Furthermore, 'Jam mgon Kong sprul's editing, codification, and systemization of the sprawling mass of knowledge eventually provided an impetus to later figures who, with newfound intellectual confidence, developed analytical systems that were hitherto lacking in the Rnying ma and Bka' brgyud traditions.

The most important of these later figures was the Rnying ma scholar, Mi pham Rnam rgyal rgya mtsho (1846–1912), possibly the most original thinker of his time, who was active in the Eastern Tibetan kingdom of Derge (Sde dge), the heart of Ris med activity. Mi pham sought to harmonize the Rnying ma's Rdzogs chen teachings with aspects of Indian philosophical traditions. This project was aided by his engagement with authors commonly associated with the Ris med movement, and his drawing from the writings of figures such as Go rams pa. Mi pham is particularly known for his works on Madhayamka (described in Phuntsho, 2005). Mi pham's commentary to Śāntarakṣita's Madhyamakālaṃkāra (Dbu ma rgyan gyi rnam bshad 'jam dbyangs bla ma dgyes pa'i zhal lung; TBRC W30366; trans. Doctor, 2004; Padmakara Translation Committee, 2005) aimed to reestablish the centrality of this Indian text. He also described and contextualized the view of extrinsic emptiness, in works such as Gzhan stong khas len seng ge'i nga ro (TBRC W1PD76231; trans. Pettit, 1999; Kapstein, 2009). In his Nor bu ke ta ka (TBRC W2DB16631; trans. Arguillère, 2004), a commentary to the ninth chapter of Śāntideva's Bodhicaryāvatāra (D 3871/ P 5272), he was especially critical of Tsong kha pa's position on Madhyamaka. This provoked responses from Dge lugs scholars, and drew him into a protracted exchange with Dpa' ris Rab gsal (1840–1912), which took the form of writings of the dgag lan genre (Viehbeck, 2014). Mi pham's compositions and his willingness to draw from authors of other traditions left a lasting legacy. A number of his works were studied in monastic colleges of the Rnying ma, Bka' brgyud, and Sa skya schools. As part of the process of exchange, the writings by Go rams pa, from which Mi pham drew particular inspiration, have also been studied within Rnying ma centers of learning.

Tibetan Philosophy in Recent Times

Following the revitalization of the non-Dge lugs traditions, including the increased systematization and embracing of scholastic learning, the first half of the 20th century saw little in the way of development in philosophical literature. The Klu grub dgongs rgyan (Ornament of Nāgārjuna's Intent; TBRC W17210; trans. Lopez, 2006) by Dge 'dun chos 'phel (1903–1951) is perhaps the best known work from the period. Philosophically, it renewed some of the criticisms of Tsong kha pa's Madhyamaka interpretation, making reference to arguments of Mi pham and other critics. However, the current image of the work bears little relation to its initial impact or its philosophical contribution. It was seized upon by those outside the Dge lugs, who were keen to emphasize that it was composed by someone originally trained within that tradition. Its current high profile derives much from the contemporary fascination (particularly among Western academics) with the author, who was also a figure of controversy for more reasons than his philosophical writings.

The decades immediately following the Chinese Communist annexation in the 1950s were the most challenging period for Tibetan literature in general. An effective ban on serious literary activity in the Tibetan language, beginning in the 1960s, was only relaxed during the late 1970s. Writings that emerged prior to this point – and many that appeared subsequently – adopt what purports to be a Marxist-Leninist perspective on Tibetan culture and religion. There is little to suggest serious philosophical reflection: the vast majority of such writings represent ideological (and uninformed) propaganda, intent upon vilifying the ways of thinking associated with "old" Tibet. In the Tibetan regions, genuine attempts to understand Western philosophy perhaps only began in the 1990s, with writings by young scholars such as the Nub phyogs sher rtogs rig pa'i tshig 'bum by 'Brong bu tshe ring rdo rje (Compendium of Western Philosophy; 1995). In the exile community, at a similar time, the 14th Dalai Lama participated in lively dialogues with non-Tibetan scientists and philosophers. In Tibet, the efforts of Tibetan authors to understand Western philosophers have been hampered by their exclusive reliance upon questionable Chinese translations and sometimes by an imperfect grasp of Tibetan philosophy. Both communities lack any form of standardized vocabulary for dealing with non-Tibetan philosophy, or for bridging the gulf between Tibetan and Western systems. For example, translations for "philosophy" range from sher rtogs rig pa in Tibet, to lta grub, or even simply lta ba ("views") among members of the diaspora. Tibetan interest – both on an individual and institutional level – in non-Tibetan philosophical systems and comparisons with indigenous philosophy has been limited. This is at least partly attributable to the fact that so much energy of Tibetan scholars is devoted to the rediscovery, conservation, and propagation of the indigenous literary heritage. Their efforts have proved successful in bringing traditional philosophical material to a wider audience. However, this concentration upon the historical material makes it difficult to identify contemporary Tibetan language works that might qualify as significant contributions to indigenous philosophical literature.

Bibliography

Arguillère, S., La distinction des vues: rayon de lune du véhicule suprême, Paris, 2008.

Arguillère, S., L'opalescent joyau: Nor-bu ke-ta-ka: commentaire du neuvième chapitre du "Bodhicaryāvatāra" de Śāntideva, Paris, 2004.

Barron, R., The Precious Treasury of Philosophical Systems: A Treatise Elucidating the Meaning of the Entire Range of Spiritual Approaches, Junction City, 2007.

Blumenthal, J., The Ornament of the Middle Way: A Study of the Madhyamaka Thought of Santaraksita, Ithaca, 2004.

'Brong bu tshe ring rdo rje, Nub phyogs sher rtogs rig pa'i tshig 'bum, Beijing, 1995.

Brunnhölzl, K., Luminous Heart: The Third Karmapa on Consciousness, Wisdom, and Buddha Nature, Ithaca, 2009.

Brunnhölzl, K., In Praise of Dharmadhātu, Ithaca, 2007.

Butters, A.M., "The Doxographical Genius of Kun mkhyen kLong chen rab 'byams pa," diss., Columbia University, 2006.

Cabezón, J.I., Buddhism and Language: A Study of Indo-Tibetan Scholasticism, Albany, 1994.

Cabezón, J.I.,, A Dose of Emptiness: An Annotated Translation of the sTong Thun Chen Mo of Mkhas Grub Dge Legs Dpal Bzang, Albany, 1992.

Cabezón, J.I., & L. Dargyay, Freedom from Extremes: Gorampa's 'Distinguishing the Views' and the Polemics of Emptiness, Boston, 2007.

Cabezón, J.I., & R. Jackson, eds., Tibetan Literature: Studies in Genre. Ithaca, 1996.

Demiéville, P., Le concile de Lhasa: une controverse sur le quiétisme entre bouddhistes de l'Inde et de la Chine au VIIIᵉ siècle de l'ère chrétienne, Paris, 1952.

Doctor. T., Speech of Delight: Mipham's Commentary on Śantarakṣita's Ornament of the Middle Way, Ithaca, 2004.

Dreyfus, G.B.J., "Where do Commentarial Schools come from? Reflections on the History of Tibetan Scholasticism," JIABS 28/2, 2005, 273–299.

Dreyfus, G.B.J., The Sound of Two Hands Clapping: The Education of a Tibetan Buddhist Monk, Berkeley, 2003.

Dreyfus, G.B.J., Recognizing Reality: Dharmakīrti's Philosophy and Its Tibetan Interpretations, Albany, 1997.

Dreyfus, G.B.J., "Introduction to rGyal tshap's Rigs gter rnam bshad," in: G.B.J Dreyfus & S. Onoda, eds., A Recent Rediscovery: rGyal tshap's Rigs gter rnam bshad, Kyoto, 1993.

Dreyfus, G.B.J., & S.L. McClintock, eds., "Introduction," in: G.B.J. Dreyfus & S.L. McClintock, eds., The Svatantrika Prasangika Distinction: What Difference Does a Difference Make?, Boston, 2003, 1–40.

Dreyfus, G.B.J. & Drongbu Tsering, "Pa tshab and the Origin of Prāsaṅgika," JIABS 32/1–2, 2009 (2010), 387–417.

Duckworth, D., Distinguishing the Views and Philosophies: Illuminating Emptiness in a Twentieth-century Tibetan Buddhist Classic, Albany, 2011.

Dunne, J.D., "Madhyamaka in India and Tibet," in: J. Garfield & W. Edelglass, eds., Oxford Handbook of World Philosophy, Oxford, 2011, 206–221.

Fukuda, Y., Studies in Tibetan Logic: Tshad ma rigs pa'i gter of Sa skya Paṇḍita: Text, Translation and Notes, Tokyo, 1989–1993.

Goldfield, A., J. Levinson, B. Scott & J. Scott, The Moon of Wisdom: Chapter Six of Chandrakīrti's Entering the Middle Way with Commentary from the Eighth Karmapa, Ithaca, 2006.

Gómez, L., "The Direct and the Gradual Approaches of Zen Master Mahayana: Fragments of the Teachings of Mo-ho-yenghin: R.M. Gimello & P.N. Gregory, Studies in Ch'an and Hua-yen, Honolulu, 1983, 69–168.

Guenther, H.V., From Reductionism to Creativity: Rdzogs-chen and the New Sciences of Mind, Boston, 1989.

Guenther, H.V., Kindly Bent to Ease Us, 3 vols., Emeryville, 1975–1976.

Halkias, G., "Tibetan Buddhism Registered: A Catalogue from the Imperial Court of 'Phang thang," EB 36/1–2, 2004, 46–105.

Hopkins, J., Mountain Doctrine: Tibet's Fundamental Treatise on Other-Emptiness and the Buddha Matrix, Ithaca, 2006.

Hopkins, J., Maps of the Profound: Jam-yang-shay-ba's Great Exposition of Buddhist and Non-Buddhist Views on the Nature of Reality, Ithaca, 2004.

Hopkins, J., Reflections on Reality: The Three Natures and Non-Natures in the Mind-Only School, Berkeley, 2002.

Hopkins, J., Emptiness in the Mind-Only School
Berkeley, 1999.

Hopkins, J., "The Tibetan Genre of Doxography a Worldview," in: J.I. Cabezón & R. Jackson, Literature: Studies in Genre, Ithaca, 1996, 170–

Hopkins, J., Emptiness Yoga: The Tibetan Middle 1995.

Hopkins, J., Meditation on Emptiness, London,

Hopkins, J., Tantra in Tibet: The Great Exposi
Mantra, Ithaca, 1977; repr. 1987.

Houston, G.W., Sources for a History of the bSa Sankt Augustin, 1980.

Hugon, P., "Tibetan Epistemology and Philos guage", in: E.N. Zalta, ed., The Stanford Ency losophy, 2015, http://plato.stanford.edu/arc entries/epistemology-language-tibetan/.

Imaeda, Y., Documents tibétains de Touen-H nant le concile du Tibet, Paris, 1975.

Ishihama, Y., & Y. Fukuda, eds., A New Critica
Mahāvyutpatti: Sanskrit-Tibetan-Mongolia
Buddhist Terminology, MTMD 1, Tokyo, 198

Ishikawa, M., A Critical Edition of The sGra sby pa: An Old and Basic Commentary on the Tokyo, 1990.

Jackson, D., Enlightenment By A Single Mea troversies on the "Self-Sufficient White Re chig thub), Vienna, 1994.

Jackson, D. (introduction), Theg chen rgy bsdus pa: Commentary on the Ratnagotra Lotsaba Blo-ldan-śes-rab, Dharamsala, 199

Jackson, D., The Entrance Gate for the Wise skya Paṇḍita on Indian and Tibetan Tradi and Philosophical Debate, 2 vols., Vienna,

Jackson, D., "Notes on Two Early Prin Sa-skya-pa Works," TibJ 8, 1983, 3–24.

Jackson, R.R., Is Enlightenment Possible?
RGyal Tshab Rje on Knowledge, Rebirth, N
tion, Ithaca, 1993.

Jinpa, T., Self, Reality and Reason in Ti Tsongkhapa's Quest for the Middle Way,

Kalu Rinpoche Translation Group et al., Knowledge, 2003–2010.

Kapstein, M.T., "Mipam Namgyel: The Lio Extrinsic Emptiness," in: W. Edelglass, losophy: Essential Readings, Oxford, 200

Kapstein, M.T., The Tibetans, Oxford, 2006

Kapstein, M.T., Reason's Traces: Identity a Indian and Tibetan Buddhist Thought, B

Kapstein, M.T., The Tibetan Assimilation version, Contestation, and Memory, Oxf

Kapstein, M.T., "Śāntarakṣita on the Falla Vitalism," JIP 17/1, 1989, 43–59.

Karmay, S.G., The Great Perfection: A Phil
tative Teaching of Tibetan Buddhism, L

Kassor, C., "Gorampa [go rams pa]," in:
Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, stanford.edu/archives/sum2011/entrie

Klein, A.C., Knowledge and Liberation: Ti temology in Support of Transformati ence, Ithaca, 1987.

of Emptiness: An Annotated Translation
Chen Mo of Mkhas Grub Dge Legs Dpal 2. rgyay, Freedom from Extremes: Goram- g the Views' and the Polemics of Emptikson, eds., Tibetan Literature: Studies in ncile de Lhasa: une controverse sur le uddhistes de l'Inde et de la Chine au hrétienne, Paris, 1952.

f Delight: Mipham's Commentary on ment of the Middle Way, Ithaca, 2004. do Commentarial Schools come from?
listory of Tibetan Scholasticism," JIABS nd of Two Hands Clapping: The Educa-ddhist Monk, Berkeley, 2003.

izing Reality: Dharmakīrti's Philosophy pretations, Albany, 1997.
uction to rGyal tshap's Rigs gter rnam yfus & S. Onoda, eds., A Recent Redis- Rigs gter rnam bshad, Kyoto, 1993.
McClintock, eds., "Introduction," in:
. McClintock, eds., The Svatantrika- on: What Difference Does a Difference 1–40. bu Tsering, "Pa tshab and the Origin 32/1–2, 2009 (2010), 387–417. uishing the Views and Philosophies: ess in a Twentieth-century Tibetan ny, 2011.
ka in India and Tibet," in: J. Garfield Oxford Handbook of World Philoso-–221.
ibetan Logic: Tshad ma rigs pa'i gter Text, Translation and Notes, Tokyo,

, B. Scott & J. Scott, The Moon of Wis- andrakīrti's Entering the Middle Way n the Eighth Karmapa, Ithaca, 2006. and the Gradual Approaches of a: Fragments of the Teachings of Gimello & P.N. Gregory, Studies in onolulu, 1983, 69–168. uctionism to Creativity: Rdzogs-chen f Mind, Boston, 1989.
ent to Ease Us, 3 vols., Emeryville, uddhism Registered: A Catalogue

t of 'Phang thang," EB 36/1–2, 2004, ctrine: Tibet's Fundamental Treatise the Buddha Matrix, Ithaca, 2006. rofound: Jam-yang-shay-ba's Great and Non-Buddhist Views on the , 2004.

Reality: The Three Natures and Non-y School, Berkeley, 2002.

Hopkins, J., Emptiness in the Mind-Only School of Buddhism, Berkeley, 1999.

Hopkins, J., "The Tibetan Genre of Doxography: Structuring a Worldview," in: J.I. Cabezón & R. Jackson, eds., Tibetan Literature: Studies in Genre, Ithaca, 1996, 170–186.

Hopkins, J., Emptiness Yoga: The Tibetan Middle Way, Ithaca, 1995.

Hopkins, J., Meditation on Emptiness, London, 1983.

Hopkins, J., Tantra in Tibet: The Great Exposition of Secret Mantra, Ithaca, 1977; repr. 1987.

Houston, G.W., Sources for a History of the bSam yas Debate, Sankt Augustin, 1980.

Hugon, P., "Tibetan Epistemology and Philosophy of Language", in: E.N. Zalta, ed., The Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, 2015, http://plato.stanford.edu/archives/spr2015/entries/epistemology-language-tibetan/.

Imaeda, Y., Documents tibétains de Touen-Houang concernant le concile du Tibet, Paris, 1975.

Ishihama, Y., & Y. Fukuda, eds., A New Critical Edition of the Mahāvyutpatti: Sanskrit-Tibetan-Mongolian Dictionary of Buddhist Terminology, MTMD 1, Tokyo, 1989.

Ishikawa, M., A Critical Edition of The sGra sbyor bam po gnyis pa: An Old and Basic Commentary on the Mahāvyutpatti, Tokyo, 1990.

Jackson, D., Enlightenment By A Single Means: Tibetan Controversies on the "Self-Sufficient White Remedy" (dkar po chig thub), Vienna, 1994.

Jackson, D. (introduction), Theg chen rgyud bla ma'i don bsdus pa: Commentary on the Ratnagotravibhāga by Rṅog Lotsaba Blo-ldan-śes-rab, Dharamsala, 1993.

Jackson, D., The Entrance Gate for the Wise (Section III): Sa-skya Paṇḍita on Indian and Tibetan Traditions of Pramāṇa and Philosophical Debate, 2 vols., Vienna, 1987.

Jackson, D., "Notes on Two Early Printed Editions of Sa-skya-pa Works," TibJ 8, 1983, 3–24.

Jackson, R.R., Is Enlightenment Possible? Dharmakīrti and RGyal Tshab Rje on Knowledge, Rebirth, No-Self and Liberation, Ithaca, 1993.

Jinpa, T., Self, Reality and Reason in Tibetan Philosophy: Tsongkhapa's Quest for the Middle Way, London, 2002.

Kalu Rinpoche Translation Group et al., The Treasury of Knowledge, 2003–2010.

Kapstein, M.T., "Mipam Namgyel: The Lion's Roar Affirming Extrinsic Emptiness," in: W. Edelglass, ed., Buddhist Philosophy: Essential Readings, Oxford, 2009, 61–72.

Kapstein, M.T., The Tibetans, Oxford, 2006.

Kapstein, M.T., Reason's Traces: Identity and Interpretation in Indian and Tibetan Buddhist Thought, Boston, 2001.

Kapstein, M.T., The Tibetan Assimilation of Buddhism: Conversion, Contestation, and Memory, Oxford, 2000.

Kapstein, M.T., "Śāntarakṣita on the Fallacies of Personalistic Vitalism," JIP 17/1, 1989, 43–59.

Karmay, S.G., The Great Perfection: A Philosophical and Meditative Teaching of Tibetan Buddhism, Leiden, 1988.

Kassor, C., "Gorampa [go rams pa]," in: E.N. Zalta, ed., The Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, 2011, http://plato.stanford.edu/archives/sum2011/entries/gorampa/.

Klein, A.C., Knowledge and Liberation: Tibetan Buddhist Epistemology in Support of Transformative Religious Experience, Ithaca, 1987.

Klein, A.C., & Geshe Tenzin Wangyal Rinpoche, Unbounded Wholeness: Dzogchen, Bon, and the Logic of the Nonconceptual, New York, 2006.

Komarovski, Y., Visions of Unity: The Golden Pandita Shakya Chokden's New Interpretation of Yogacara and Madhyamaka, Albany, 2011.

Komarovski, Y., Three Texts on Madhyamaka, New Delhi, 2000.

Köppl, H.I., Establishing Appearances as Divine: Rongzom Chözang on Reasoning, Madhyamaka, and Purity, Ithaca, 2008.

Kramer, R., The Great Tibetan Translator: Life and Works of Rngog Blo ldan shes rab (1059–1109), Munich, 2007.

Kuijp, L.W.J. van der, "Studies in Btsun pa Ston gzhon's Pramāṇavārttika Commentary of ?1297," RET 30, 2014, 111–198.

Kuijp, L.W.J. van der, "A Treatise on Buddhist Epistemology and Logic Attributed to Klong chen Rab 'byams pa (1308–1364) and its Place in Indo-Tibetan Intellectual History," JIP 31/4, 2003, 381–437.

Kuijp, L.W.J. van der, An Introduction to Gtsang-nag-pa's Tshad-ma rnam-par nges-pa'i ti-ka legs-bshad bsdus pa, an Ancient Commentary on Dharmakīrti's Pramāṇaviniścaya, Kyoto, 1989.

Kuijp, L.W.J. van der, Contributions to the Development of Tibetan Buddhist Epistemology, Wiesbaden, 1983.

Kuijp, L.W.J. van der, "Tibetan Contributions to the 'Apoha' Theory: The Fourth Chapter of the Tshad-ma-rigs-pa'i gter," JAAOS 99/3, 1979, 408–422.

Kuijp, L.W.J. van der, & K. Schaeffer, An Early Tibetan Survey of Buddhist Literature: The Bstan pa rgyas pa rgyan gyi nyi 'od of Bcom ldan ral gri, Cambridge MA, 2009.

Lamrim Chenmo Translation Committee, The Great Treatise on the Stages of the Path to Enlightenment, vol. III, Boston, 2004.

Lopez, D.S., The Madman's Middle Way: Reflections on Reality of the Tibetan Monk Gendun Chopel, Chicago, 2006.

Lopez, D.S., "Polemical Literature (dgag lan)," in: J.I. Cabezón & R. Jackson, eds., Tibetan Literature: Studies in Genre, Ithaca, 1996, 217–228.

Lopez, D.S., A Study of Svātantrika, Ithaca, 1987.

Mathes, K.D., A Direct Path to the Buddha Within: Gö Lotsāwa's Mahāmudrā Interpretation of the Ratnagotravibhāga, Boston, 2008.

Mimaki, K., "Doxographie tibétaine et classifications indiennes," in: F. Fumimasa & G. Fussman, eds., Bouddhisme et cultures locales: quelques cas de réciproques adaptations, Paris, 1994, 115–136.

Mimaki, K., "Annotated translation of the chapter on the Yogācāra of the Blo gsal grub mtha' -Part One," MFL 31, 1992, 1–49.

Mimaki, K., "The Blo gsal grub mtha' and the Mādhyamika Classification in Tibetan grub mtha' Literature," in E. Steinkellner & H. Tauscher, eds., Contributions on Tibetan Language, History and Culture: Proceedings of the Csoma de Kőrös Symposium Held at Velm-Vienna, Austria, 13–19 September 1981, vol. II, Vienna, 1983, 161–167.

Mimaki, K., trans. & ed., Blo gsal grub mtha': Chapitres IX (vaibhāṣika) et XI (yogācāra) édités et chapitre XII (mādhyamika) édité et traduit, Kyoto, 1982.

Mimaki, K., "Le chapitre du Blo gsal grub mtha' sur les Sautrāntrika: Un essai de traduction," Zinbun 16, 1980, 143–172.

Mimaki, K., "Le chapitre du Blo gsal grub mtha' sur les Sautrāntrika: Présentation et édition," Zinbun 15, 1979, 175–210.

Nagao, G., & L.S. Kawamura, Mādhyamika and Yogācāra: A Study of Mahāyāna Philosophies, Albany, 1991.

Newland, G., "The Debate Manual (yig cha) in Tibetan Monastic Education," in: J.I. Cabezón & R. Jackson, eds., Tibetan Literature: Studies in Genre, Ithaca, 1996, 202–216.

Onoda, S., Monastic Debate in Tibet: A Study on the History and Structures of Bsdus grwa Logic, Vienna, 1992.

Pachow, W., "The Twenty-two Dialogues on Mahāyāna Buddhism," CC 20/1, 1979, 35–64.

Padmakara Translation Committee, The Adornment of the Middle Way: Shantarakshita's Madhyamakalankara with Commentary by Jamgön Mipham, Boston, 2005.

Perdue, D.E., Debate in Tibetan Buddhism, Ithaca, 1992.

Pettit, J.W., Mipham's Beacon of Certainty: Illuminating the View of Dzogchen, the Great Perfection, Boston, 1999.

Phuntsho, K., Mipham's Dialectics and Debates on Emptiness: To Be, Not to Be or Neither, London, 2005.

Rhoton, J., & V.R.M. Scott, A Clear Differentiation of the Three Codes: Essential Distinctions Among the Individual Liberation, Great Vehicle, and Tantric Systems: the Sdom Gsum Rab Dbye and Six Letters, Albany, 2002.

Samten, N., & J. Garfield, Ocean of Reasoning: A Great Commentary on Nāgārjuna's Mūlamadhyamakakārikā, New York, 2006.

Samuels, J., Tibetan Buddhist Epistemology II: The Geluk School, Boston, forthcoming.

Schaik, S. van, "The Early Days of the Great Perfection," JIABS 27/1, 2004, 165–206.

Seyfort Ruegg, D., "The Indian and the Indic in Tibetan Cultural History, and Tsoṅ kha pa's Achievement as a Scholar and Thinker: An Essay on the Concepts of Buddhism in Tibet and Tibetan Buddhism," JIP 32/4, 2004, 321–343.

Seyfort Ruegg, D., Two Prolegomena to Madhyamaka Philosophy: Candrakīrti's Prasannapadā Madhyamakavṛttiḥ on Madhyamakakārikā I.1, and Tsoṅ kha pa Blo bzaṅ grags pa / Rgyal Tshab Dar ma rin chen's Dka' gnad/gnas brgyad kyi zin bris: Annotated Translations, Vienna, 2002.

Seyfort Ruegg, D., Three Studies in the History of Indian and Tibetan Madhyamaka Philosophy: Studies in Indian and Tibetan Madhyamaka Thought, vol. I, Vienna, 2000.

Seyfort Ruegg, D., Buddha-nature, Mind, and the Problem of Gradualism in a Comparative Perspective: On the Transmission and Reception of Buddhism in India and Tibet, London, 1989.

Seyfort Ruegg, D., "Autour du lTa ba'i khyad par de Ye shes sde (version de Touen-houang, Pelliot Tibetain 814)," JA 269/1–2, 1981, 207–229, Seyfort Ruegg, D., "On the Reception and Early History of the dBu ma (Madhyamaka) in Tibet," in: M. Aris & A. San Suu kyi, eds., Tibetan Studies in Honour of Hugh Richardson, Warminster, 1980, 277–279.

Seyfort Ruegg, D., Le traité du Tathāgatagarbha de Bu ston rin chen grub, Paris, 1973.

Smith, E.G., Among Tibetan Texts: History and Literature of the Himalayan Plateau, Boston, 2001.

Snellgrove, D., Indo-Tibetan Buddhism: Indian Buddhists and Their Tibetan Successors, vol. II, Boston, 1987.

Sopa, L., & R. Jackson, The Crystal Mirror of Philosophical Systems: A Tibetan Study of Asian Religious Thought, Boston, 2009.

Sparham, G., "Tsongkhapa," in: E.N. Zalta, ed., The Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, 2014, http://plato.stanford.edu/archives/spr2014/entries/tsongkhapa/.

Sparham, G., Golden Garland of Eloquence, vol. I–III, Fremont, 2007–2009.

Sparham, G., "Demons on the Mother: Objections to the Perfect Wisdom Sūtras in Tibet," in: G. Newland, ed., Changing Minds: Contributions to the Study of Buddhism in Honor of Jeffrey Hopkins, Boston, 2001, 193–214.

Sparham, G., Ocean of Eloquence: Tsong kha pa's Commentary on the Yogācāra Doctrine of Mind, Albany, 1993.

Stearns, C., The Buddha from Dölpo: A Study of the Life and Thought of the Tibetan Master Dolpopa Sherab Gyaltsen, Albany, 1999.

Stein, R.A., "Sudden Illumination and Sudden Comprehension," in: P.N. Gregory, ed., Sudden and Gradual: Approaches to Enlightenment in Chinese Thought, Honolulu, 1987, 41–65.

Stein, R.A., Une chronique ancienne de bSam-yas (Bsam.yas): sBa-bžed (Sba.bzhed), Paris, 1961.

Tauscher, H., Die Lehre von den Zwei Wirklichkeiten in Tson kha pas Madhyamaka-Werken, Vienna, 1995.

Thakchoe, S., The Two Truths Debate: Tsongkhapa and Gorampa on the Middle Way, Boston, 2007.

Thurman, R.A., Tsong Khapa's Speech of Gold in the Essence of True Eloquence, Princeton, 1984.

Tillemans, T. "Tsong kha pa blo bzang grags pa," in: E. Craig, ed., Routledge Encyclopedia of Philosophy, London, 1998, 487–490.

Tillemans, T., & T. Tomabechi, "Le dBu ma'i byuṅ tshul de Śākya mchog ldan," AS 44/4, 1995, 891–918.

Tucci, G., Minor Buddhist Texts, Rome, 1956.

Viehbeck, M., Polemics in Indo-Tibetan Scholasticism: A Late 19th-century Debate between 'Ju mi pham and Dpa' ris rab gsal, Vienna, 2014.

Vose, K., Resurrecting Candrakīrti: Disputes in the Tibetan Creation of Prāsaṅgika, Boston, 2009.

Wangdu, P., & H. Diemberger, dBa' bzhed: The Royal Narrative Concerning the Bringing of the Buddha's Doctrine to Tibet, Vienna, 2000.

Williams, P., "A Note on Some Aspects of Mi bskyod rdo rje's Critique of dGe lugs pa Madhyamaka," JIP 11, 1983, 125–145.

JONATHAN SAMUELS
BERTHE JANSEN

Philos

Buddhist philosophical literature i extensive use of Classical Chinese the exception of certain works writ it was the norm for Buddhist philoso in Japan to be written in Classical Ch Buddhism, along with that of Chin the Korean Peninsula, thus belongs Chinese Buddhist cultural sphere. Cl within this sphere, played a role si Latin in the Western world.

Despite this use of a commor set of cultural assumptions, there Japanese Buddhist philosophical c Japan. As the structure of the Japane fers from that of Chinese, it was oft Classical Chinese word order was a nese words were added to aid unde time, the custom of reading Classic it were Japanese took hold; this wa kundoku (訓読; Jin Wenjing, 2010, code marks (kunten [訓点]) indic word order were added to texts to reading. In addition, Classical Chi Japanese people often did not follow cal rules of the continental original.

A considerable number of wor paid no attention to Classical Ch and from the outset arranged Chi in the Japanese reading order. Mar of the nature of notes or records ne be presented as finished pieces of that the reading and writing of Clas Japan was by no means necessarily cise served to increase the margin and interpretation.

Recent scholarly work on Japa from the perspective of philosophy by J.W. Heisig, T.P. Kasulis, and J.C. in which the point is made that in losophy and religion are not dist distinction was introduced from t 19th century and gave rise to a grea question of whether Buddhism wa or a religion. However, it is certain distinction did not originally exist w itself and that both philosophical

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill betan Texts: History and Literature of au, Boston, 2001.

etan Buddhism: Indian Buddhists and sors, vol. II, Boston, 1987. he Crystal Mirror of Philosophical Sys-ly of Asian Religious Thought, Boston, apa," in: E.N. Zalta, ed., The Stanford ilosophy, 2014, http://plato.stanford.

4/entries/tsongkhapa/.
rland of Eloquence, vol. I–III, Fremont, on the Mother: Objections to the Per-in Tibet," in: G. Newland, ed., Chang-ions to the Study of Buddhism in Honor ston, 2001, 193–214. loquence: Tsong kha pa's Commentary trine of Mind, Albany, 1993. a from Dölpo: A Study of the Life and an Master Dolpopa Sherab Gyaltsen,

Illumination and Sudden Compre-Gregory, ed., Sudden and Gradual:
htenment in Chinese Thought, Hono-ue ancienne de bSam-yas (Bsam.yas): ), Paris, 1961.

von den Zwei Wirklichkeiten in Tsoṅ a-Werken, Vienna, 1995.
o Truths Debate: Tsongkhapa and dle Way, Boston, 2007.
hapa's Speech of Gold in the Essence of ceton, 1984.
a pa blo bzang grags pa," in: E. Craig, lopedia of Philosophy, London, 1998, nabechi, "Le dBu ma'i byuṅ tshul de S 44/4, 1995, 891–918.

st Texts, Rome, 1956.
in Indo-Tibetan Scholasticism: A Late between 'Ju mi pham and Dpa' ris rab

Candrakīrti: Disputes in the Tibetan a, Boston, 2009.
berger, dBa' bzhed: The Royal Narra-Bringing of the Buddha's Doctrine to

Some Aspects of Mi bskyod rdo rje's a Madhyamaka," JIP 11, 1983, 125–145.

JONATHAN SAMUELS
BERTHE JANSEN

Philosophical Literature: Japan

Buddhist philosophical literature in Japan makes extensive use of Classical Chinese works, and with the exception of certain works written in Japanese, it was the norm for Buddhist philosophical literature in Japan to be written in Classical Chinese. Japanese Buddhism, along with that of China, Vietnam, and the Korean Peninsula, thus belongs to the Classical Chinese Buddhist cultural sphere. Classical Chinese, within this sphere, played a role similar to that of Latin in the Western world.

Despite this use of a common language and set of cultural assumptions, there is much in the Japanese Buddhist philosophical corpus unique to Japan. As the structure of the Japanese language differs from that of Chinese, it was often the case that Classical Chinese word order was altered and Japanese words were added to aid understanding. Over time, the custom of reading Classical Chinese as if it were Japanese took hold; this was the system of kundoku (訓読; Jin Wenjing, 2010, 21ff.). Guiding code marks (kunten [訓点]) indicating Japanese word order were added to texts to facilitate their reading. In addition, Classical Chinese written by Japanese people often did not follow the grammatical rules of the continental original.

A considerable number of works deliberately paid no attention to Classical Chinese grammar and from the outset arranged Chinese characters in the Japanese reading order. Many of these were of the nature of notes or records never intended to be presented as finished pieces of writing. The fact that the reading and writing of Classical Chinese in Japan was by no means necessarily correct or precise served to increase the margin for free thought and interpretation.

Recent scholarly work on Japanese Buddhism from the perspective of philosophy includes works by J.W. Heisig, T.P. Kasulis, and J.C. Maraldo (2011), in which the point is made that in Buddhism, philosophy and religion are not distinguished. This distinction was introduced from the West in the 19th century and gave rise to a great debate on the question of whether Buddhism was a philosophy or a religion. However, it is certainly clear that this distinction did not originally exist within Buddhism itself and that both philosophical reasoning and soteriological purpose are fundamental to Buddhism. An empirical, dogmatically neutral understanding of the nature of man and the world is not a central aim of Buddhist philosophy. Rather, with religious ideals such as enlightenment or rebirth in the Pure Land as key principles, an understanding of the relationship between this world and those ideal states is at the heart of Buddhist philosophical concerns. An understanding of this fact is prerequisite to a consideration of Buddhist philosophy. Of particular interest with regard to the method of philosophical argumentation is the fact that debate in Buddhism typically develops around the interpretation of previously existing textual materials. In India, at first, the words of the scriptures themselves were accepted as proof for arguments. This changed over time, and eventually only direct perception and reasoned inference were accepted as valid epistemic methods (Ganeri, 2001). The field of logic then emerged as set of rules for logical inference and argumentation. Buddhist logic was also studied in Japan, where it was known as inmyō (因明; Takemura Shōhō, 1986). Indian logic was bound up, however, with the structures of Indian languages. It was therefore difficult to translate accurately to Chinese, and the process of translation introduced a great many misunderstandings and errors. Despite this, the study of Buddhist logic flourished in Japan, and we observe many instances of Japanese Buddhist debaters making efforts to put forward arguments in keeping with its rules (Takemura Shōhō, 1970, 30–52; Nakamura Hajime, 1967, 192–194). That is not to say that these efforts were always successful. Thus it was that Japanese Buddhist philosophy developed as a hermeneutic discipline wherein interpretations of textual precedents rather than arguments from pure reason were offered as proofs. If one's views were problematic or inconvenient, the issue was how one might go about reinterpreting and changing them. In so doing, the texts acceptable as scriptural bases for argument were the sūtras, Indian or Chinese exegetical works and commentaries, and the works of Japanese treatise masters (ronshi [論師]) established as authorities. Among these, the works of the school's founding patriarchs were in particular treated as holy writ. Obtaining sūtras

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

and commentarial literature from China was thus of great significance. With the transmission and copying of the Tripiṭaka, the study of Buddhist philosophy in Japan began in earnest (Sueki Fumihiko, 2014a, 91–104).

The wide distribution of texts was attempted as publishing became available in and around the 12th century. It was not until the 17th century, however, that printed canons entered circulation in large numbers. As scholarship increased on the sūtras and commentarial literature that formed the textual bases for the doctrines of the various Buddhist schools in Japan (Ishii Kōsei, 2012), many annotated editions of such works were produced. There are also a considerable number of school-specific "essential texts" collections and works that focus on a certain theme or issue. The type of argumentation contained in such volumes was also put forth in the form of lectures, debates (exegetical and sectarian disputes), preaching, exposition of the dharma, and oral teachings given in private. Extant records of these live forms of argumentation have great significance as philosophical materials. In these hermeneutical debates, branches within a certain school broke away over even a minor difference in interpretation that became the subject of a dispute. Another flourishing area was the classification of Buddhist teachings according to content, period, and other factors known as kyōsō hanjaku (教相判釋; doctrinal taxonomy; often abbreviated to kyōhan – the term kyōhan is equivalent to the Chinese pànjiāo [判教]; Sueki Fumihiko, 2014b). This taxonomy typically involved judging the relative value of Buddhist doctrines.

The above forms of Japanese Buddhist philosophical literature are not limited in scope to narrow, technical points of philosophy. They are works that recognize and embrace the importance of ritual, meditative, and other forms of practice and give due attention to texts relevant to such matters. In the past, scholarly research focused only on those textual materials that had been edited and produced as finished works. Now, all the materials stored in temples are referred to as sacred teachings, shōgyō (聖教; Abe Yasurō, 2010). This includes such items as injin (印信; documents, particularly in the esoteric traditions, that signify the passing of teachings from master to disciple; Nagamura Makoto, 2000, 94) and notes for the performance of rituals. Comprehensive surveys of materials held in Buddhist temples are now being carried out (Nagamura Makoto, 2000). These hitherto insufficiently studied materials, far from being unassociated with philosophical concerns, provide clues for the understanding of the deep ties that bind Buddhist philosophy to Buddhist practice. The importance of images, sculpture, and architecture is now also being fully recognized, along with the limits imposed by an overreliance on documentary materials. Buddhist philosophy in Japan must now be approached with full regard to nondocumentary materials, although, this overview article will mainly look to documentary sources in the form of completed texts.

The paragraphs above deal with issues concerning the materials relevant to the development of Buddhist philosophy in Japan. The following sections turn to Japanese Buddhist philosophical texts in historical context, after a brief survey of the fundamental concepts of Japanese Buddhism.

Buddhism, having originated in India, has its foundations in Indian thought. That is to say, it has as a first principle the purpose of breaking free from the suffering inherent in saṃsāra, the cyclical existence dependent on karma (Gowans, 2003, 104–116; Sadakata Akira and Nakamura Hajime, 1997, 69–71). The notion of saṃsāra was introduced to East Asia along with Buddhism. The six realms of saṃsāra (rokudō [六道]) through which beings wander are the following:

1. the hell realms;
2. the realm of hungry ghosts;
3. the animal realm;
4. the realm of the asura (angry gods);
5. the human realm; and
6. the heavenly realms.

Thus, the concept of beings is not limited to humans but is understood to include all living beings (shujō [衆生]; Skt. sattva). Animals in particular were thought to belong to the same category as humans. The question of whether plant life could be placed in the same broad category as humans and animals became a debate topic. Saṃsāra entails a clear concept of another existence following death. There had not been any logically grounded concept of an afterlife in Japan prior to the introduction of Buddhism, and thus the Buddhist view of life after death came to be widely accepted throughout the Japanese archipelago (Nauman, 2004, 51–62; Matsumura Kazuo, 2006). However, the very Indian notion of cyclical transmigration in saṃsāra spanning from the limitless past to a limitless future was not easily absorbed in East Asia. Therefore, "[b]y the seventh century in China, we find the creation of interpretative paradigms that stressed practices capable of bringing liberation at an accele 2011, 45). These paradigms were in Japan.

Concepts such as achieving b very body (sokushin jōbutsu [即 the Pure Land (jōdo ōjō [淨土 enlightenment (dongo [頓悟]) states such as enlightenment Pure Land to be realized relative als were particularly thoroughly fused in Japan and reached their or limit, in innate-enlightenmen shisō [本覚思想]). The term "inn appears in the Chinese Dàshèng kishin ron [大乗起信論]; Discou ing of Faith in the Mahāyāna; St it developed in Japan, this notion actual states in which beings ex the same as the absolute buddha ries were predicated on the pe of the Mahāyāna. Non-Mahāyā seen as a "Hīnayāna" ("Lesser V quently of little value. This gen more or less continuously and u 18th century. Vasubandhu's "Hī dharmakośabhāṣya (Jpn. Abidat 毘達磨俱舎論]) has, neverthele influence on the basic Japanese B

That imagined world has M center, and to the south thereof Jambudvīpa ("Continent of the which has India (Tenjiku [天竺 China (Shintan [震旦]) to the e as no more than a small periph this main continental landmas the world took hold throughout 2012). This is known as the "per theory (Nihon henkokuron [日本 13th century onward, it gave way alist viewpoint that Japan was the gods – the "land of the kami ron [神国論]; Sato Hiroo, 2006, 8 the kami" theory was not an out of the "peripheral land Japan" t rather, on the concept that indeed a peripheral land far fr Buddhist world, the buddhas h in the form of kami for the salv ants. This concept is known as t manifest traces" theory (honji s 跡説]), the key logical framewor being treated as incarnations (Teeuwen & Rambelli, 2003).

nassociated with philosophical :lues for the understanding of nd Buddhist philosophy to Budnportance of images, sculpture, ow also being fully recognized, ts imposed by an overreliance terials. Buddhist philosophy in approached with full regard to aterials, although, this overview ook to documentary sources in ed texts.
bove deal with issues concernlevant to the development of y in Japan. The following sec-se Buddhist philosophical texts after a brief survey of the fun-f Japanese Buddhism.
g originated in India, has its n thought. That is to say, it has e purpose of breaking free from t in saṃsāra, the cyclical exis-karma (Gowans, 2003, 104–116; akamura Hajime, 1997, 69–71). a was introduced to East Asia n. The six realms of saṃsāra ugh which beings wander are ngry ghosts;

n;
asura (angry gods);
n; and alms.
of beings is not limited to erstood to include all living Skt. sattva). Animals in paro belong to the same category ion of whether plant life could broad category as humans and bate topic. Saṃsāra entails a ner existence following death.
ny logically grounded concept n prior to the introduction of he Buddhist view of life after lely accepted throughout the (Nauman, 2004, 51–62; Matsu-owever, the very Indian notion ion in saṃsāra spanning from imitless future was not easily Therefore, "[b]y the seventh find the creation of interpre-stressed practices capable of

---

bringing liberation at an accelerated pace" (Blum, 2011, 45). These paradigms were to develop further in Japan.

Concepts such as achieving buddhahood in this very body (sokushin jōbutsu [即身成佛]), rebirth in the Pure Land (jōdo ōjō [浄土往生]), and sudden enlightenment (dongo [頓悟]) allowed for ideal states such as enlightenment and rebirth in the Pure Land to be realized relatively easily. These ideals were particularly thoroughly and popularly diffused in Japan and reached their logical conclusion, or limit, in innate-enlightenment thought (hongaku shisō [本覚思想]). The term "innate enlightenment" appears in the Chinese Dàshèng qǐxìn lùn (Jpn. Daijō kishin ron [大乗起信論]; Discourse on the Awakening of Faith in the Mahāyāna; Stone, 1999, 3–35). As it developed in Japan, this notion meant to view the actual states in which beings existed as essentially the same as the absolute buddha nature. Such theories were predicated on the perceived supremacy of the Mahāyāna. Non-Mahāyāna Buddhism was seen as a "Hīnayāna" ("Lesser Vehicle") and consequently of little value. This general view was held more or less continuously and uncritically until the 18th century. Vasubandhu's "Hīnayāna" text Abhidharmakośabhāṣya (Jpn. Abidatsuma Kusharon [阿毘達磨俱舎論]) has, nevertheless, a foundational influence on the basic Japanese Buddhist worldview.

That imagined world has Mount Sumeru at its center, and to the south thereof is the world of men, Jambudvīpa ("Continent of the Black Plum Tree"), which has India (Tenjiku [天竺]) at its center and China (Shintan [震旦]) to the east. Japan was seen as no more than a small peripheral island far from this main continental landmass, and this view of the world took hold throughout Japan (Abe Yasurō, 2012). This is known as the "peripheral land Japan" theory (Nihon henkokuron [日本辺国論]). From the 13th century onward, it gave way to the more nationalist viewpoint that Japan was a land protected by the gods – the "land of the kami" theory (shinkokuron [神国論]; Sato Hiroo, 2006, 87–129). The "land of the kami" theory was not an outright contradiction of the "peripheral land Japan" theory. It was based, rather, on the concept that because Japan was indeed a peripheral land far from the heart of the Buddhist world, the buddhas had appeared there in the form of kami for the salvation of its inhabitants. This concept is known as the "original ground, manifest traces" theory (honji suijaku setsu [本地垂迹説]), the key logical framework for Japanese kami being treated as incarnations of Buddhist deities (Teeuwen & Rambelli, 2003).

We may understand the development of Buddhism in Japan in terms of four distinct periods. The first period, during which Buddhist thought in Japan underwent its initial formation, was roughly from the 7th to the late 9th century. The second period, from around the late 10th to the 14th century, was one in which the fundamental philosophy established in the first period was developed into a philosophy of practice from a mind-body perspective. The third period, roughly from the 15th to the first half of the 19th century, was one of the gradual extension of the territory occupied by this-worldly concerns within Buddhist thought. It was also one in which Shintō thought took shape and Buddhism's ongoing interrelation with Shintō, Confucian, Christian, and other schools of thought developed further. The fourth period, in which modernization and the introduction of Western culture gave rise to new thought and new avenues of study, began in the latter half of the 19th century. The key characteristics of Japanese Buddhist philosophy apply most directly to the first and second periods. During the third and fourth periods, Japanese Buddhist thought changed as a result of interaction with other intellectual cultures and traditions. This article focuses on the first two periods and will touch only briefly on the third. The fourth period, one of dramatic changes due to the introduction of European and American culture, requires separate treatment. This article is intended to provide a clear picture of the overall character of the first three stages in the history of Buddhist philosophy in Japan, rather than any detailed exploration of individual works.

Initial Formation

According to tradition, Buddhism was brought to Japan from the kingdom of Paekche on the Korean Peninsula in either 538 or 551 CE. At this point in time, however, Buddhism in Japan was limited to such activities as the worship of buddha images, and theoretical study had yet to begin. A figure known as Prince Shōtoku (Shōtoku Taishi [聖徳太子]) is thought to have emerged in the early 7th century; he is credited with bringing Buddhism into national politics and is believed to have authored commentaries on the Saddharmapuṇḍarīkasūtra, Śrīmālādevīsiṃhanādasūtra, and Vimalakīrtinirdeśa. The debate as to whether these were actually the work of Shōtoku himself or merely make use of his name has continued for many years, and as yet no conclusion has been reached. In recent years, the argument for the Japanese provenance of these works from the presence of Japanese grammatical forms in their Classical Chinese has been recognized as a strong one (Ishii Kōsei, 2008).

We can be certain that it was not until the latter half of the 7th century that Buddhist sūtras in Classical Chinese were brought to Japan in large numbers. In the 8th century, a complete Tripiṭaka was brought to Japan, and its copying on a grand scale was undertaken as a state project (Kornicki, 1997, 78–87; Sansom, 1978, 141–143). These copies became the fundamental materials for debate on sacred scripture. Around this time, groups were formed around the study of the various schools of Buddhist thought. These were called shū (宗), institutional scholarly groups involving a shared doctrinal interest. Eventually, these groups solidified in the mid-7th century into the Kusha (俱舍), Jōjitsu (成實), Ritsu (律), Sanron (三論), Hossō (法相), and Kegon (華嚴) schools. These are known as the six schools of the southern capital (i.e. Nara; nanto rokushū [南都六宗]). Each of these schools had a scholastic headquarters within one of the major temples of the time, where they held lectures and carried out scholarly inquiries in honor of their venerated founders (Sueki Fumihiko, 1996). Furthermore, a fixed number of ordinands were given government permission to become Buddhist monks each year. In this way, the study of Buddhist philosophy made rapid progress from the second half of the 7th to the first half of the 8th century. Commentaries were written on the essential texts of each school, and it became possible for debates to arise (Sueki Fumihiko, 1996).

There were marked differences between the six schools. The Kusha and Jōjitsu schools were for the study of the Abhidharma commentaries Abhidharmakośabhāṣya and Satyasiddhiśāstra* (Jpn. Jōjitsu ron [成實論]), respectively. As such, they were important as a locus for the foundational study necessary for understanding other schools and provided a basic conceptual framework for a shared Buddhist philosophical worldview. Study of the Satyasiddhiśāstra* did not flourish in later days. In contrast, the Abhidharmakośabhāṣya was studied by successive generations of monks as an invaluable foundation to the study of Buddhism (Sueki Fumihiko, 1996). The Hossō and Sanron schools were the first to flourish, with the Hossō being particularly influential. One reason for this influence was that the Hossō school taught the latest Buddhist doctrines from Tang China, based on the consciousness-only (cittamātra; Jpn. yuishiki [唯識]) theories introduced by Xuanzang (Jpn. Genjō [玄奘]). Another reason was the support of the Fujiwara, the leading aristocratic lineage of the time. The Fujiwara made the Hossō school's headquarters a temple – the Kōfukiji [興福寺], their clan temple (ujidera [氏寺]; Sueki Fumihiko, 1996). Debates between the Hossō and Sanron schools took place in the late 8th century. During the first half of the 9th century, first the Tendai (天台) school and then the Shingon (真言) school were permitted an official allocation of annual Buddhist ordinands (nenbun dosha [年分度者]) by the Japanese government. There was thenceforth a system of eight officially recognized schools, which became the basis of Buddhism in Japan. The most famous introduction to the eight schools has always been the Hasshūkōyō (八宗綱要; The Essentials of the Eight Traditions). This work by the scholar monk Gyōnen (凝然), dated to 1268, has been consistently valued and is still read today (Sueki Fumihiko, 1996).

In the 13th century, the Jōdo and the Zen schools were added to the previous eight, forming a system of ten schools. Overviews of the two additional schools were included in the Hasshūkōyō as appendices. The major schools of Buddhism in present-day Japan consist of these ten, with the addition of the Jōdoshin and Nichiren schools. The Zen school is now separated into the Rinzai (臨済) and Sōtō (曹洞) schools; the Ōbaku (黄檗) school, introduced in Japan in the early modern period, is also counted among the schools of Japanese Zen Buddhism.

In the first half of the 9th century, two well-known great debates arose involving Saichō (最澄), the founder of the Tendai school in Japan: the Mahāyāna precepts debate (daijōkai ronsō [大乗戒論争]) with the Office of Monastic Affairs (sōgō [僧綱]) in Nara and the one-vehicle/three-vehicles debate (sanjō/ichijō ronsō [三乗・一乗論争]) with the Hossō monk Tokuitsu (徳一).

A number of Saichō's works on these debates are still extant, such as the Kenkairon (顯戒論; A Clarification of the Precepts; 819 CE) on the Mahāyāna-precepts debate and the Shugokokkaishō (守護國界章; 818 CE) and Hokkeshūku (法華秀句; 821 CE) on the one-vehicle/three-vehicles debate (see Sueki Fumihiko, 1995).

The Mahāyāna-precepts debate concerned the practical issue of Buddhist monastic precepts. Saichō argued for the introduction of the Mahāyāna precepts as found in the Brahmajālasūtra* (Chn. Fànwǎng jīng; Jpn. Bonmō kyō [梵網經]; Sueki Fumihiko, 1995, 114, 189; Groner, 1984) and against the use of those proposed by the ancient Buddl of India, those of "nikāya Buddhism." Japan of Mahāyāna precepts to the excl ancient Indian precepts was to becom of Japanese Buddhism that stood in co tion to the continued use of the "nikāy precepts in other Asian regions. This the form of a dichotomous choice b Hīnayāna and Mahāyāna, one was to and the other rejected. This conceptual was inherited by the Pure Land Buddhis from the 12th to the 13th century and b tendency within Japanese Buddhist tho

The one-vehicle/three-vehicles deb Saichō and Tokuitsu concerned points As no primary materials representin side of this controversy remain extan be a degree of uncertainty concerning arguments that he made. His positio was certainly based on the three-vehi (the doctrine that the śrāvaka, prat and bodhisattva vehicles are separate as taught by the Hossō school. Saichō propounding the doctrine of one vehi the doctrine that the three vehicles a final analysis, the buddha vehicle, nam to buddhahood (Sueki Fumihiko, 1995 one-vehicle/three-vehicles problem in China among the disciples of Xuanz have been taken over in Japan. The d ued after the time of Saichō and Tok 10th century (Miyoshi Toshinori, 2008). outcome was that the one-vehicle doc the mainstream in Japan, and the doctrine was excluded. The one-vehic closely linked to the doctrine that all se possess buddha nature (issai shujō [一切衆生悉有佛性]), a principle that eral acceptance in Japanese Buddhis The Hokkeshūku, which marks the end between Saichō and Tokuitsu, places t foremost even among the Mahāyā This work, and the debate to which i became a catalyst for the spread of t of the Lotus Sūtra in Japan (Sueki F 23ff., 65ff.).

Six of the eight schools – the Kus schools being the exceptions – submi of their doctrines around 830 CE b emperor:

1. the Sanron school submitted th daigishō (大乗三論大義抄) aut (玄叡);

g (Jpn. Genjō [玄奘]). Another pport of the Fujiwara, the leadeage of the time. The Fujiwara hool's headquarters a temple – 寺], their clan temple (ujidera ihiko, 1996). Debates between on schools took place in the late the first half of the 9th century, 台) school and then the Shingon permitted an official allocation ordinands (nenbun dosha [年 panese government. There was n of eight officially recognized ame the basis of Buddhism in nous introduction to the eight een the Hasshūkōyō (八宗綱要; e Eight Traditions). This work Gyōnen (凝然), dated to 1268, ly valued and is still read today 96).

y, the Jōdo and the Zen schools revious eight, forming a system erviews of the two additional ed in the Hasshūkōyō as appenools of Buddhism in present-day se ten, with the addition of the ren schools. The Zen school to the Rinzai (臨済) and Sōtō baku (黄檗) school, introduced modern period, is also counted f Japanese Zen Buddhism.

he 9th century, two well-known involving Saichō (最澄), the i school in Japan: the Mahāyāna jōkai ronsō [大乗戒論争]) with ic Affairs (sōgō [僧綱]) in Nara /three-vehicles debate (sanjō/ 一乗論争]) with the Hossō
).

hō's works on these debates h as the Kenkairon (顯戒論; he Precepts; 819 CE) on the lebate and the Shugokokkaishō
) and Hokkeshūku (法華秀句; vehicle/three-vehicles debate 1995).

ecepts debate concerned the Buddhist monastic precepts. introduction of the Mahāyāna the Brahmajālasūtra* (Chn. nmō kyō [梵網經]; Sueki Fumi-oner, 1984) and against the use of those proposed by the ancient Buddhist schools of India, those of "nikāya Buddhism." The use in Japan of Mahāyāna precepts to the exclusion of the ancient Indian precepts was to become a feature of Japanese Buddhism that stood in contradistinction to the continued use of the "nikāya Buddhist" precepts in other Asian regions. This debate took the form of a dichotomous choice between the Hinayāna and Mahāyāna, one was to be adopted and the other rejected. This conceptual framework was inherited by the Pure Land Buddhism of Hōnen from the 12th to the 13th century and became a key tendency within Japanese Buddhist thought.

---

The one-vehicle/three-vehicles debate between Saichō and Tokuitsu concerned points of doctrine. As no primary materials representing Tokuitsu's side of this controversy remain extant, there may be a degree of uncertainty concerning the precise arguments that he made. His position, however, was certainly based on the three-vehicles doctrine (the doctrine that the śrāvaka, pratyekabuddha, and bodhisattva vehicles are separate and distinct) as taught by the Hossō school. Saichō opposed this, propounding the doctrine of one vehicle. This was the doctrine that the three vehicles are all, in the final analysis, the buddha vehicle, namely, the path to buddhahood (Sueki Fumihiko, 1995, 71–75). The one-vehicle/three-vehicles problem was debated in China among the disciples of Xuanzang and may have been taken over in Japan. The debate continued after the time of Saichō and Tokuitsu into the 10th century (Miyoshi Toshinori, 2008). The eventual outcome was that the one-vehicle doctrine became the mainstream in Japan, and the three-vehicles doctrine was excluded. The one-vehicle doctrine is closely linked to the doctrine that all sentient beings possess buddha nature (issai shujō shitsū busshō [一切衆生悉有佛性]), a principle that received general acceptance in Japanese Buddhist philosophy. The Hokkeshūku, which marks the end of the debate between Saichō and Tokuitsu, places the Lotus Sūtra foremost even among the Mahāyāna scriptures. This work, and the debate to which it relates, thus became a catalyst for the spread of the veneration of the Lotus Sūtra in Japan (Sueki Fumihiko, 1995, 23ff., 65ff.).

Six of the eight schools – the Kusha and Jōjitsu schools being the exceptions – submitted overviews of their doctrines around 830 CE by order of the emperor:

1. the Sanron school submitted the Daijō Sanron daigishō (大乗三論大義抄) authored by Genei (玄叡);
2. the Hossō submitted the Daijō Hossōkenjinshō (大乗法相研神章) authored by Gomyō (護命);
3. the Kegon submitted the Kegonshū ichijō kaishinron (華嚴宗一乗開心論) authored by Fuki (普機);
4. the Ritsu submitted the Kairitsu denraiki (戒律傳來来記) authored by Buan (豊安);
5. the Tendai submitted the Tendai hokkeshū gishū (天台法華宗義集) authored by Gishin (義真); and
6. the Shingon submitted the Himitsu mandara jūjūshin ron (秘密曼荼羅十住心論) authored by Kūkai (空海).

This event has been seen as an indication not only of the rivalry among the various schools but also that the flourishing of Japanese Buddhism lay in the schools prospering together (Sueki Fumihiko, 1995). The Daijō Hossō kenshinshō stood out from the other works in that it both focused on the doctrines of the Hossō school and expounded basic Buddhist concepts such as the three realms of existence (Skt. trailokya; Jpn. sangai [三界]), the five destinies (Skt. pañcagati; Jpn. goshu [五趣]), the four kinds of birth (Skt. caturyoni; Jpn. shishō [四生]), the wholesome and unwholesome causes and effects (Skt. kuśalākuśalahetuphala; Jpn. zenaku inga [善惡因果]), and the great chiliocosm (Skt. trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu; Jpn. sanzen sekai [三千世界]). The understanding of the Buddhist worldview found in the Daijō Hossō kenshinshō was not limited to the Hossō school but was common throughout Japanese Buddhism (Sueki Fumihiko, 1995, 23ff., 95ff.). The Abhidharmakośabhāṣya was studied throughout the various schools as a foundational and introductory text. In the Hossō school in particular, this foundation was built on by the study of the Vijñaptimātratāsiddhi (Chn. Cheng weishi lun; Jpn. Jō yuishiki ron [成唯識論]).

Kūkai, the author of the Himitsu mandara jūjūshin ron, is well known as the person who brought esoteric Buddhism in systematic form from China to Japan. The Himitsu mandara Jūjūshin Ron propounds a process of spiritual development from the stage of ignorance to the stage at which the fundamental mindset appropriate to esoteric Buddhism is attained. Though this work is often compared to G.W.F. Hegel's Phänomenologie des Geistes (The Phenomenology of Spirit), it is of the nature of a critical doctrinal taxonomy (kyōhan [教判]) and attributes certain stages of spiritual development to the various schools (Kawasaki Tsuneyuki, 1975). Kūkai's esoteric Buddhist thought is propounded in the Ben kenmitsu nikyō ron (辯顯顕密二教論) and Sokushin jōbutsu ron (即身成佛義), among other works. Of particular interest are the sections of the Ben kenmitsu nikyō ron that expound the differences between esoteric teachings and exoteric teachings (kenkyō [顯教]) and the acceptability of the doctrine of the preaching of the dharma by the dharma body (dharmakaya; hosshin seppō [法身說法]; see Kōbō Daishi Kūkai Zenshū Henshū Iinkai, 2000). It was argued that with the exoteric teachings, it was impossible to express the ultimate principles of reality in words. Though the esoteric teachings were understood to provide the words necessary to achieve this, these words transcended the ordinary vocabularies intelligible to laypeople.

The Sokushin jōbutsu gi preaches the mysterious inner purpose of esoteric Buddhism, the doctrine of achieving enlightenment in this very body (sokushin jōbutsu). This, like the Zen concept of sudden enlightenment (Chn. dùnwù; Jpn. tongo [頓悟]), meant a realization of the ultimate ideal state in this world and this lifetime. In Japan, it came to be a more widely diffused concept than that of sudden enlightenment. Kūkai explained sokushin jōbutsu through a system of six elements (Skt. ṣaḍdhātu; Jpn. rokudai [六大]; earth, water, fire, wind, void, and consciousness), four types of maṇḍalas (shiman [四曼]), and three mysteries (sanmitsu [三密]; those of body, speech, and mind; Shaner, 1985, 72–79). As all human beings possess the six elements that constitute the fundamental principles of existence, the principal constituent elements of human beings are the same as those of buddhas. Moving from this first principle through the maṇḍalas and the realization of the three mysteries, oneness with the buddhas was the goal to be achieved. In the Hokkeshūku, Saichō also preached a doctrine of sokushin jōbutsu. In the Devadatta (Daibadattahon [提婆達多品]) chapter of the Lotus Sūtra, an eight-year-old nāga princess becomes a buddha, demonstrating the possibility of achieving sokushin jōbutsu through the power of the Lotus Sūtra (Groner, 1989; 1992). This was sokushin jōbutsu within exoteric Buddhism; and thus, in that period, the doctrine of enlightenment in this very body was one that found expression in both esoteric and exoteric thought (Sueki Fumihiko, 1995, 315). The Hossō monk Tokuitsu criticized Kūkai's doctrine of sokushin jōbutsu in his collection of criticisms of esoteric teachings entitled Shingonshū miketsumon (真言宗未決文; Sueki Fumihiko, 1995, 86–122). Two main aspects of his criticism are noteworthy. The first was that one lifetime was too short a space of time for Buddhist practice sufficient to attain buddhahood. The second was that the goal of achieving buddhahood for oneself lacked in the bodhisattva's compassionate saving of others. Thus sokushin jōbutsu became a major point of disputation during the first half of the 9th century. After this time, the doctrine of attaining buddhahood over three great eons (sankō jōbutsu [三劫成佛]), taught by the Hossō school, went into obsolescence, and Buddhist thought based on the sokushin jōbutsu paradigm became mainstream in Japan. In later years, due to the difficulty of actually achieving buddhahood in the present lifetime, the concept of attaining buddhahood after death developed and became influential (Takasaki Jikidō, 1995).

Kūkai is also known for bringing the maṇḍalas of the two divisions (ryōbu mandara [兩部曼荼羅], also called the dual maṇḍala, to Japan - the mahākaruṇāgarbhamaṇḍala (daihitaizō [大悲胎藏曼荼羅]; womb-of-great-compassion [maṇḍala]) and the vajradhātumaṇḍala (kongōkaimandara [金剛界曼荼羅]; diamond-realm maṇḍala). Though both these maṇḍalas were present in India, they were not used there as a set. It is thought to have been Kūkai's master Huiguo (Jpn. Keika [惠果]) who first did so, though it was in Japan that the use of the two maṇḍalas together became a significant and widespread aspect of Buddhist practice (for a full discussion of these two maṇḍalas, see Hatta Yukio, 1989, 31–36, 237–271; Snodgrass, 1988). According to the traditional interpretation, the vajradhātumaṇḍala expresses the masculine yang (Jpn. yō [陽]) principle of wisdom (Jpn. chie [智慧]), and the mahākaruṇāgarbhamaṇḍala expresses the feminine yin (Jpn. in [陰]) universal principle of reality (Jpn. ri [理]). Thus, this means of explaining reality is based in dualistic ideas that reflect the influence of Chinese divinatory thonght (Jpn. eki [易]) as found in the Yijing (易經; Book of Changes). In the years that followed, the thought represented by the dual maṇḍalas exerted an influence on Shintō and Shugendō in addition to Buddhism (Miyake Hitoshi, 1973, 21, 29–30; Morrell, 1985; Faure et al., 2009; 2011). Maṇḍalas expressed in written characters alone were also produced; an example of such is the great maṇḍala (daimandara [大曼荼羅]) of Nichiren (日蓮; Dolce, 1999; 2002). Today's scholarship recognizes the importance of these visual and iconographic works.

After the time of Kūkai, the energy of Shingon in the pursuit of ideals decreased somewhat. Meanwhile, Tendai was enthusiastically engaged in introducing esoteric teachings. Ennin (圓仁) and Enchin (圓珍) entered Tang China in swift succession to seek new esoteric teachings (S 1995, 283–315; Dolce, 2011). The monk made a comprehensive survey of th Annen produced a great many works his compilation of Tendai esoteric ing an oeuvre that became an ornam stages of the first, formative perio thought in Japan. His works, expre mate unity of all Buddhism throu teachings, express one of the key standpoints reached in Japanese Bu (Sueki Fumihiko, 1994, 69–86). Anne such as the Sokushin jōbutsu shi 記) and Shinjō sōmoku jōbutsu shi 佛私記), have, in comparison with a character that is somewhat less teric (Sueki Fumihiko, 1995, 377–4 sōmoku jōbutsu shiki adjusted an the early-Heian-period theory of th buddhahood by plants and trees ( [草木成佛]) and is recognized as the basis for the later developmen (Sueki Fumihiko, 2001, 73–92). The debate in China concerning the attainment of buddhahood by in (hijō jōbutsu [非情成佛] or mujō 佛]). The key focus of these discus nevertheless, the practices of sentie Tōketsu (唐決; The Tang Period Dec a work that records the doctrinal by early Japanese Tendai scholar Chinese Tiantai instructors, Japa up the question of the attainmen by plants and trees with conside Fumihiko, 1995, 397ff.). They ask sible for insentient plants and tre perform Buddhist practices and att In the Shinjō sōmoku jōbutsu shiki, to this dialectic; his presentati affirming the attainment of budd and trees was of considerable in ing generations. Annen brought of the various doctrinal debates among Buddhist schools, begin works such as the Gyōji jō (教 ron (教時諍論). The desire to int Buddhist teachings that were th debates was expressed in the S (真言宗教時義), Kyōji gi (教時義) (教時問答; Sueki Fumihiko, 1995, & Mano, 2011, 770). In these work the system of doctrinal analysis k kyōhan (四一教判; the critical d od. The second was that the goal ahood for oneself lacked in the assionate saving of others. Thus came a major point of disputahalf of the 9th century. After this of attaining buddhahood over nkō jōbutsu [三劫成佛]), taught l, went into obsolescence, and sed on the sokushin jōbutsu par-nstream in Japan. In later years, of actually achieving buddha-lifetime, the concept of attain-r death developed and became Jikidō, 1995). wn for bringing the maṇḍalas ns (ryōbu mandara [両部曼 dual maṇḍala, to Japan – the naṇḍala (daihitaizō [大悲胎藏 great-compassion [maṇḍala]) umaṇḍala (kongōkaimandara nond-realm maṇḍala). Though s were present in India, they as a set. It is thought to have Huiguo (Jpn. Keika [惠果]) ugh it was in Japan that the las together became a signifi-aspect of Buddhist practice of these two maṇḍalas, see 36, 237–271; Snodgrass, 1988). aditional interpretation, the xpresses the masculine yang of wisdom (Jpn. chie [智慧]), arbhamaṇḍala expresses the [陰]) universal principle of Thus, this means of explaindualistic ideas that reflect the divinatory thought (Jpn. eki jing (易經; Book of Changes). ved, the thought represented xerted an influence on Shintō ition to Buddhism (Miyake

---

; Morrell, 1985; Faure et al., expressed in written characoduced; an example of such daimandara [大曼荼羅]) of 1999; 2002). Today's scholarportance of these visual and kai, the energy of Shingon eals decreased somewhat.

as enthusiastically engaged eachings. Ennin (圓仁) and Tang China in swift succes-

---

sion to seek new esoteric teachings (Sueki Fumihiko, 1995, 283–315; Dolce, 2011). The monk Annen (安然) made a comprehensive survey of these teachings. Annen produced a great many works in addition to his compilation of Tendai esoteric thought, forming an oeuvre that became an ornament to the final stages of the first, formative period of Buddhist thought in Japan. His works, expressing the ultimate unity of all Buddhism through the esoteric teachings, express one of the key philosophical standpoints reached in Japanese Buddhist thought (Sueki Fumihiko, 1994, 69–86). Annen's early works, such as the Sokushin jōbutsu shiki (即身成佛私記) and Shinjō sōmoku jōbutsu shiki (斟定草木成佛私記), have, in comparison with his later works, a character that is somewhat less strikingly esoteric (Sueki Fumihiko, 1995, 377–408). The Shinjō sōmoku jōbutsu shiki adjusted and reformulated the early-Heian-period theory of the attainment of buddhahood by plants and trees (sōmoku jōbutsu [草木成佛]) and is recognized as having provided the basis for the later development of that theory (Sueki Fumihiko, 2001, 73–92). There had also been debate in China concerning the doctrine of the attainment of buddhahood by insentient beings (hijō jōbutsu [非情成佛] or mujō jōbutsu [無情成佛]). The key focus of these discussions remained, nevertheless, the practices of sentient beings. In the Tōketsu (唐決; The Tang Period Decisions), however, a work that records the doctrinal questions asked by early Japanese Tendai scholar monks of their Chinese Tiantai instructors, Japanese monks take up the question of the attainment of buddhahood by plants and trees with considerable zeal (Sueki Fumihiko, 1995, 397ff.). They ask whether it is possible for insentient plants and trees to themselves perform Buddhist practices and attain buddhahood. In the Shinjō sōmoku jōbutsu shiki, Annen succeeded to this dialectic; his presentation of arguments affirming the attainment of buddhahood by plants and trees was of considerable influence to following generations. Annen brought together accounts of the various doctrinal debates that had occurred among Buddhist schools, beginning in India, in works such as the Gyōji jō (教時諍) and Gyōji jō ron (教時諍論). The desire to integrate the diverse Buddhist teachings that were the subject of these debates was expressed in the Shingonshū kyōji gi (真言宗教時義), Kyōji gi (教時義), and Kyōji mondo (教時問答; Sueki Fumihiko, 1995, 423ff., 436ff.; Dolce & Mano, 2011, 770). In these works, Annen set forth the system of doctrinal analysis known as the shiichi kyōhan (四一教判; the critical doctrinal taxonomy of the "four ones" – that is, all buddhas, times, places, and teachings were united within the one buddha (ichibutsu [一佛]), one time (ichiji [一時]), one place (issho [一處]), and one teaching (ichigyō [一教]) of Mahāvairocana (Jpn. Dainichi nyōrai [大日如來]). This was the formation of a grand system through which not only Śākyamuni but also all the buddhas of all regions of the universe were subsumed within a single buddha – Mahāvairocana. This oneness was supported by the Buddhist principle of "thusness" (Skt. tattva; Jpn. shinnyo [真如]), implying the absolute, the ultimate nature of all phenomena; it further strengthened the foundations of Annen's unitary system (Sueki Fumihiko, 1995, 215–239).

In contrast to the Hossō school, which understood thusness to be eternal and unchanging, Annen gave weight to conditioned thusness (Jpn. zuien shinnyo [随縁真如]) – the aspect of the principle of thusness that was understandable as changing and developing in this world due to the influence of causal conditions (Skt. pratyaya; Jpn. en [縁]). Via a monistic understanding of conditioned thusness, everything in this existence might be valued as sacred. This concept became a part of the innate-enlightenment (hongaku [本覺]) thought of following periods (see below). Annen also produced the compilations of esoteric ritual Kongō daihō taijuki (金剛界大法對受記) and Taizō daihō taijuki (胎藏界大法對受記; Sueki Fumihiko, 1995, 215–239).

Toward a Philosophy of Practice from a Mind-Body Perspective

For a certain period of time following the late 9th century, when Annen was active, there were no noteworthy developments in Buddhist philosophy. This was the period of Fujiwara-dominated aristocratic government during which the official missions to Tang China were abolished and cultural tropes already established in Japan took precedence over new continental imports.

It was not until the second half of the 10th century that new forms of Buddhist thought took shape. The restoration of Mount Hiei (比叡) and its scholasticism by the monk Ryōgen (良源) was the catalyst for the sudden emergence of new developments in Buddhist theory and practice (Groner, 2002; Sueki Fumihiko, 2012, 233–238). The monk Genshin (源信) was at the center of these developments, raising the curtain on the period of practical philosophy that followed. His works Daijō taikushashō (大乗対倶舎鈔) and Ichijō yōketsu (一乗要決) summarized Mahāyāna and one-vehicle Buddhist thought from Saichō onward, while his Ōjōyōshū (往生要集; Essentials of Rebirth in the Pure Land; 985 CE) provided logical groundwork for the Pure Land Buddhist thought that was rapidly gaining influence at the time (Sueki Fumihiko, 2012).

The Ōjōyōshū accepts the theory of transmigration through the six paths (rokudō rinne setsu [六道輪廻說]; see above) as a premise but places Sukhāvatī (gokuraku [極樂]), the Pure Land of the buddha Amitābha (Amida [阿彌陀]) in a position separate and superior to those six types of rebirth. In the Japanese Buddhist view of the world to come, there was also the possibility of rebirth in the Tuṣita heaven (tosotsu ten [兜率天]) of the bodhisattva Maitreya (Miroku [彌勒]). Though Tuṣita rebirth was an important focus for dogma and practice in certain periods and schools, particularly the Hossō, Sukhāvatī was on the whole the more influential concept (Ford, 2006, 81ff., 105ff.). The cult of Maitreya found expression either in practices relating to attaining rebirth in Tuṣita or in the belief that Maitreya would, in the distant future, appear in this world as the next buddha. The latter form of Maitreya worship was later to become the basis for eschatological messianism in certain new religions. A version of the Buddhist afterlife integrating the Amitābha and Maitreya faiths also emerged, in which one who had been born in Sukhāvatī might intend to return to this world once Maitreya had appeared there as a buddha (Mitsuhashi Tadashi, 2000, 448–457).

Genshin did not limit himself to written works. He was also the leader of the Nijūgo zanmaie (二十五三昧會; Society of 25 Samādhi), a group of 25 monks who sought Pure Land rebirth by maintaining the proper state of mindfulness at the moment of death (rinjūshōnen [臨終正念]). From this point on, this state of mind came to be practiced in a ritualized manner, and texts on rites for the end of life (rinjū gyōgi [臨終行儀]) emerged (Stone & Walter, 2008, 4, 85–86). The issue of how to approach the end of life soon came to be associated with the issue of how to deal with the bodies of the dead. The pure and clean state of the dead body was to now be maintained by those left behind, and this development invited the popularization of a mantra, the kōmyō shingon (光明真言; mantra of light), which had the power to lead the deceased to Sukhāvatī. Thus emerged, on the one hand, a definite and clearly apprehensible Buddhist practice centering on death rituals and, on the other hand, theories on the psychophysical mind-body nature of human beings (Stone & Walter, 2008, 254–255). These mind-body theories based on foundations provided by the theoretical principles established during the initial formation, were taken forward in esoteric traditions and systematized in the first half of the 12th century by the monk Kakuban (覺鑁; van der Veere, 2000, 57–103). Kakuban's magnum opus was the Gorin kuji myō himitsu shaku (五輪九字明秘密釋; Commentary on the Secrets of the Five Elements and Nine Syllables; T. 2514; van der Veere, 2000, 125–219). In it, he integrated the cult of Amitābha into his esoteric philosophy and asserted that Mahāvairocana and Amitābha were one.

The gorin (五輪) in Kakuban's Gorin kuji myō himitsu shaku are the five elements or cakras (Skt. pañcadhātu; Jpn. godai [五大]) thought to make up the world: earth, water, fire, wind, and void. Kūkai added a sixth element, the mind, in his interpretation of this concept, but the system of five elements remained the more common one (Nasu Seiryū, 1936, 332–351). The five elements are expressed in the Sanskrit Siddham characters a, va, ra, ha, and kha and in the forms of the square, circle, triangle, half-moon, and oval jewel. The gorintō (五輪塔), a type of stūpa/reliquary/grave marker made of these five geometrical figures, is a vertical representation of the five elements. Gorintōs were constructed in Japan from around the mid-11th to the late 12th century. The five elements are also equated with the five dhyānibuddhas of the vajradhātumaṇḍala: Akṣobhya (Ashuku [阿閦]), Amitābha, Ratnasaṃbhava (Hōshō [寶生]), Amoghasiddhi (Fukūjōju [不空成就]), and Mahāvairocana. Thus, essentially, the five elements indicate and express the world of the buddhas. According to Kakuban, the five elements were also equivalent to the five human viscera (gozō [五臟]): liver, lungs, heart, kidneys, and spleen. As such, they instantiate the essential cosmological unity between the buddhas and living beings. Kūkai's theory of sokushin jōbutsu (achieving buddhahood in this very body) thus far did not have a satisfactorily specific method of implementation. Kakuban established the theory that unification with the world of the buddha might be realized by psychophysical meditation. This theory was to be apprehended not only in terms of the internal life of humanity but also in externalized form via the five-elements stūpa. Stūpas were originally meant for housing the bodily remains of the Buddha and were thus regarded in the same manner as the Buddha himself. The gorintō, via the five elements, transformed the stūpa into a place where human body and the universe itself may be seen as one. The Gorin kuji myō himitsu 55). These mind-body theories, ons provided by the theoretilished during the initial formaward in esoteric traditions and first half of the 12th century an (覺鑁; van der Veere, 2000, nagnum opus was the Gorin kuji (五輪九字明秘密釋; Commenof the Five Elements and Nine der Veere, 2000, 125–219). In it, lt of Amitābha into his esoteric erted that Mahāvairocana and [illegible]

in Kakuban's Gorin kuji myō e five elements or cakras (Skt. dai [五大]) thought to make up ter, fire, wind, and void. Kūkai nt, the mind, in his interpreta-out the system of five elements common one (Nasu Seiryū, ive elements are expressed in characters a, va, ra, ha, and of the square, circle, triangle, jewel. The gorintō (五輪塔), a ry/grave marker made of these es, is a vertical representation *Gorintō*s were constructed in e mid-11th to the late 12th cen-s are also equated with the five vajradhātumaṇḍala: Akṣobhya tābha, Ratnasaṃbhava (Hōshō dhi (Fukūjōju [不空成就]), Thus, essentially, the five elexpress the world of the budkuban, the five elements were five human viscera (gozō [五 , kidneys, and spleen. As such, essential cosmological unity and living beings. Kūkai's the-u (achieving buddhahood in r did not have a satisfactorily lementation. Kakuban estabunification with the world of realized by psychophysical y was to be apprehended not ernal life of humanity but also via the five-elements stūpa. meant for housing the bodily ha and were thus regarded as the Buddha himself. The ments, transformed the stūpa man body and the universe
e. The Gorin kuji myō himitsu shaku contains many pictures, including pictures of gorintō, thus being a synthesis of written and visual and iconographic works.

The kuji (九字) in Kakuban's Gorin kuji myō himitsu shaku are the nine syllables oṃ, a, mṛ, ta, te, je, ha, ra, and hūṃ, which constitute Amitābha's dhāraṇī. The union of the nine syllables (kuji) and the five elements (gorin) asserts the union of Amitābha and Mahāvairocana. Kakuban's assimilation of Pure Land teachings relates to a wholly esoteric Buddhist concept of Amitābha, and in the final analysis, the Pure Land that he expounded is Mahāvairocana's Pure Land of mysterious adornment (mitsugon jōdo [密嚴淨土]). The identification of Mahāvairocana with Amitābha, nonetheless, effectively presents this life and the next in unity, and thus the five-elements theory came to involve the concept of the essential unity of the living and the dead. The monistic unification of the cosmos via the theories of Annen that marked the end of the initial period was now taken forward by Kakuban, who developed the doctrine of the realization of that unity through psychophysical (esp. physical) practices and the philosophy of the five elements. From this point onward, we may identify in the Buddhist philosophy of the second period a process of breaking up the unity and synthesis of various aspects of truth achieved thus far.

The viewpoint from which esoteric Buddhist theory sees humanity is that of the three modes of activity (Skt. trikarman; Jpn. sangō [三業]): action, speech, and thought. Of those three, we may understand a movement centered on speech to have become the nenbutsu (chanting Amida Buddha's name) ideology of Pure Land Buddhism, and a movement centered on action and thought to have become Zen. Just as the five-elements concept perceived the body as the five elements that have absolute power, Pure Land and Zen thought similarly conceived of the human body and mind as manifesting great power.

In the 13th century, the Ritsu school, which was greatly influenced by esotericism, gained extensive popularity through the efforts of Eison (叡尊; Quinter, 2006). It conceived that one could obtain powerful physical strength through receiving the Buddhist precepts. Having obtained power in both mind and body, Buddhist priests presumably became capable of healing the sick, performing effective memorial rites for the dead, and dealing with natural disasters. This caused the general populace to have great faith in them, leading to the spread of Buddhism.

In this way, the ideology of the second period attributed sacred merit to practical action via the three activities of human action, speech, and thought. This was a great change in relation to the basic system of Buddhist soteriology that asserts that one may achieve salvation from the suffering of this world of delusion through ascetic practices of renunciation. This change was to be taken to its furthest theoretical extent with the concept of "innate enlightenment" (hongaku [本覺]). Hongaku thought understood saṃsāra itself as the enlightened world of the buddhas, and in its more extreme expressions taught that ascetic practices were unnecessary (Stone, 1999, 3ff.). Many forms of this philosophical trend developed within the Tendai school and are thus referred to as Tendai hongaku thought (Stone, 1999, 155–194). The same trend, however, may be observed within esoteric thought. Furthermore, Zen and Pure Land movements that emphasized the power of realizing innate enlightenment were often criticized for antinomian tendencies, described as "licensed evil" (lit. unhindered wrongdoing; Skt. apratighapāpacaryā; Jpn. zōaku muge [造惡無礙]) or justification thereof (Rambelli, 2004).

As in esoteric Buddhism, the mode of instruction used in the transmission of hongaku notions was oral instruction from master to disciple. Hongaku material compiled in documentary form comprised collections of short fragmentary works that were originally transmitted in rites of oral instruction. As such, much of the background information to these texts, including authorship and circumstances leading to their codification, is often unknown. An example of this is the Sanjūshika kotogaki (三十四箇事書). Later, the hongaku theory was systematized in the manner of the Sanjūshichika hōmon (三重七箇法門) or took the form of extensive commentarial works such as the Kankō ruiju (漢光類聚; Sueki Fumihiko, 1993, 312–346).

Antinomian trends appear in a lineage called the Tachikawa-ryū (立川流), in later years regarded as heretical because it attributed the highest sacred significance to a secret sexual ceremony. Recent research, however, shows that the existence of a trend or movement called Tachikawa-ryū is debatable (Nobumi Iyanaga, 2010; 2011). Furthermore, explaining the union of the kongō (adamantine) and the taizō (womb) in terms of a sexual unification was to a certain degree widespread within the esoteric Buddhism of the time. For example, it can be seen in the esoteric Buddhist work Ingoshū (隠語集), written by Yōsai (榮西), who is known for bringing the Rinzai school of Zen Buddhism to Japan (Sueki Fumihiko, 2006; Mano, 2011). Trends such as these, more than regarding sexual unity itself as important, focused on the process of a fetus growing within its mother's womb (the "five prenatal periods" identified in Buddhist thought; Jpn. tainai goi [胎内五位]) as the process of becoming a buddha. The birth of the child was associated with achieving nirvāṇa (Sanford, 1997; Dolce, 2006–2007; 2015). This view stands distinct within Buddhist thought, which generally takes a negative view of birth as a continuation of wandering in saṃsāra. Such a view is also present in the works of the Shoichi (聖一) school of Zen established by Enni Ben'en (圓爾辯圓; 1201–1280).

As far as Zen and Pure Land Buddhism becoming independent schools (shū) goes, it is generally accepted that Zen (Rinzai) Buddhism was established by Yōsai and Jōdo Buddhism by Hōnen in the second half of the 12th century. Later these two schools were counted alongside the eight existing schools as part of the ten schools of Buddhism. The establishment within Japanese Buddhism of these two new schools was proclaimed in the Kōzen gokokuron (興禅護國論) and the Senchaku hongan nenbutsu shū (選擇本願念佛集; Kasahara, McCarthy & Sekimori, 2001, 159–160, 228). These two works are of the nature of apologia attempting to prove that Zen and Jōdo Buddhism have credentials equal to those of the other eight schools and are thus qualified to be officially recognized as schools in their own right. Though recognized as a proclamation of the founding of the Zen school in Japan, much of the Kōzen gokokuron is in fact concerned with asserting the importance of the Buddhist precepts and the connection of Zen to the revival thereof (Heine, 2012, 200–201). Yōsai's early writings concentrated on esoteric Buddhism. After introducing Zen from Song China, however, he intended to further the expansion of Japanese Buddhism as a whole, including Zen, Ritsu, and esoteric and Tendai schools. This ambition is evident in works such as his Nippon buppō chūkō ganmon (日本佛法中興願文). Yōsai is thus considered to have encouraged the development not of one specific school but of Buddhism as a whole (Sueki Fumihiko, 2008, 148–169).

Yōsai's idea of Buddhism also had an impact on Dōgen. His Shōbōgenzō (正法眼藏; Treasury of the True Dharma Eye) rejects sectarian specificity and aims to uncover the essence of Buddhism. There have been various editions of the Shōbōgenzō, which raises the textual problem of which edition to study. In recent years, however, the importance of the 12-volume edition expressing Dōgen's later philosophy has been recognized (Kagamishima Genryū & Suzuki Kakuzen, 1991). In these 12 volumes, Dōgen returns to the simplicity of early Buddhism, despite the fact that in Japan, early Buddhism had thus far generally been criticized as Hīnayāna Buddhism. Dōgen, in contrast, attempts to construct a practical philosophy from it (on the nature of the Buddhist path in the Shōbōgenzō, see Kagamishima Genryū & Suzuki Kakuzen, 1991, 447–453).

Compared with Yōsai, Hōnen's Senchaku hongan nenbutsushū is unambiguous in its preaching the "exclusive practice" (senshū [専修]) of chanting Amida's name. According to this work, Amitābha "chose" the chanting of Amida's name above all other practices. Hōnen goes on to identify arguments from the sūtras in order to demonstrate that Śākyamuni also approved of this choice (Sueki Fumihiko, 2008, 124–147). Through this, he aimed to establish the Pure Land as a school. Hōnen himself was known as a transmitter and upholder of the precepts. His followers were many and varied and produced diverse interpretations of the Senchaku hongan nenbutsushū (Sueki Fumihiko, 2008, 124–147).

Shinran was one such follower of Hōnen. An original manuscript (the Bantō-bon [坂東本] edition) of his major work, the Kyōgyōshinshō (教行信証) is extant (Dobbins, 2002, 32ff.). Handwritten manuscripts of many of Shinran's other writings and letters also survive today (Kyōgaku Dendō Kenkyū Sentā, 2007; Hirota et al., 1997). Many of Nichiren's manuscripts also survive today (Yampolsky, 1996). One reason for the survival of so many handwritten manuscripts is the development of sectarian worship of founding patriarchs. The founders of the various schools were venerated to an even greater degree than the buddhas, and thus the original versions of their writings were kept safe. Moreover, many of their letters (or epistolary discourses, shōsoku [消息]) are left to us. These are recognized as having been used as a means for propagating their philosophies. From ancient times, large temples retained many handwritten manuscripts, such as those of Sōshō (宗性; 1202–1278), a scholarly monk of the Kegon school, at the Tōdaiji (東大寺) Temple. During the 13th century, new Buddhist centers were created, such as the Kōzanji (高山寺) Temple established by Myōe (明恵; 1173–1232; Morrell, 1982, 172ff.), an esoteric Kegon monk. These temples collected many texts and became lively venues for learning and research. In contrast to this document-centered approach, there were also movements that rejected documentary texts. Zen Buddhism's concept of unwritten and unmediated transmission of enlightenment from mind to mind (furyū monji [不立文字]) was one such expression of this trend (Emmanuel, 2013, 249–351). Most prominent th regard, was the Pure Land Buddhist (一遍; 1239–1289). Near the time of hi burned all of his books in a rigorous ex decision to cleave to nenbutsu-only pr 1997, 122). Through their unique wand Ippen's pupils gained a broad follow establishment of a fixed-residence so this practice was viewed as threater ished in the 17th century (regarding in the 17th cent., see Hall et al., 1991, 121 660–665).

---

Interaction with other Philo and Secularization

In the 13th century, new trends we from Song China. Although the Song v cess of establishing a Confucian-base time, Japan's main intellectual impor be Buddhism (Sueki Fumihiko, 2010 son may have been that Japanese so were too underdeveloped to accept in which secular ethics have a central

Buddhism's period as the dominant until the 16th century, but the 13th to saw Shintō gradually emerge within of Buddhism as an independent ideol was strongly influenced by the conc ground, manifest traces" (honji suijak which treats the kami as phenomenal of the buddhas, and by esoteric Bud which recognizes the unity of kam (Stone, 1999, 40–43). Independent developed in the 14th century via w by the Shintō thinkers Kitabatake C 親房; 1293–1354) and Jihen (慈遍; n. opment of a Shintō-based historical Kitabatake Chikafusa's Jinnō Shōtōk is of particular interest; it is freque with famous historian and head of Jien's (慈圓; 1155–1225) early 13th-ce on Buddhist historical philosophy in (愚管抄; Sueki Fumihiko, 2006–2007

Buddhism has a notion of time o an individual's saṃsāra. It is base conception of time in which the deteriorates and is extinguished, t defining characteristic of Shintō do has a linear conception of time, with era of myth developing irreversibl torical era. Consequently, it emphas ity of early Buddhism, despite , early Buddhism had thus far ized as Hīnayāna Buddhism. tempts to construct a practical on the nature of the Buddhist zō, see Kagamishima Genryū & 447–453). ōsai, Hōnen's Senchaku hon- nambiguous in its preaching e" (senshū [専修]) of chanting rding to this work, Amitābha f Amida's name above all other on to identify arguments from demonstrate that Śākyamuni choice (Sueki Fumihiko, 2008, is, he aimed to establish the . Hōnen himself was known as older of the precepts. His fold varied and produced diverse Senchaku hongan nenbutsushū 8, 124–147).

ch follower of Hōnen. An orig-Bantō-bon [坂東本] edition)
e Kyōgyōshinshō (教行信証), 02, 32ff.). Handwritten manu-ran's other writings and letters yōgaku Dendō Kenkyū Sentā, 7). Many of Nichiren's manu-oday (Yampolsky, 1996). One of so many handwritten manpment of sectarian worship of The founders of the various ed to an even greater degree d thus the original versions of t safe. Moreover, many of their iscourses, shōsoku [消息]) are cognized as having been used ating their philosophies. From emples retained many hand-such as those of Sōshō (宗性; y monk of the Kegon school, ) Temple. During the 13th cenenters were created, such as Temple established by Myōe rell, 1982, 172ff.), an esoteric emples collected many texts ues for learning and research.
ocument-centered approach, nents that rejected documenhism's concept of unwritten nsmission of enlightenment furyū monji [不立文字]) was of this trend (Emmanuel, 2013, 249–351). Most prominent though, in this regard, was the Pure Land Buddhist thinker Ippen (一遍; 1239–1289). Near the time of his death, Ippen burned all of his books in a rigorous expression of his decision to cleave to nenbutsu-only practice (Hirota, 1997, 122). Through their unique wandering practice, Ippen's pupils gained a broad following. With the establishment of a fixed-residence society in Japan, this practice was viewed as threatening and abolished in the 17th century (regarding social changes in the 17th cent., see Hall et al., 1991, 121–127, 478–485, 660–665).

Interaction with other Philosophies and Secularization

In the 13th century, new trends were introduced from Song China. Although the Song were in the process of establishing a Confucian-based system at this time, Japan's main intellectual import continued to be Buddhism (Sueki Fumihiko, 2010, 20). One reason may have been that Japanese social structures were too underdeveloped to accept Confucianism, in which secular ethics have a central role.

Buddhism's period as the dominant ideology lasted until the 16th century, but the 13th to 14th centuries saw Shintō gradually emerge within the framework of Buddhism as an independent ideology. This trend was strongly influenced by the concept of "original ground, manifest traces" (honji suijaku [本地垂迹]), which treats the kami as phenomenal manifestations of the buddhas, and by esoteric Buddhist thought, which recognizes the unity of kami and buddhas (Stone, 1999, 40–43). Independent Shintō thought developed in the 14th century via works produced by the Shintō thinkers Kitabatake Chikafusa (北畠親房; 1293–1354) and Jihen (慈遍; n.d.). The development of a Shintō-based historical perspective in Kitabatake Chikafusa's Jinnō Shōtōki (神皇正統記) is of particular interest; it is frequently compared with famous historian and head of Tendai school Jien's (慈圓; 1155–1225) early 13th-century writings on Buddhist historical philosophy in the Gukanshō (愚管抄; Sueki Fumihiko, 2006–2007).

Buddhism has a notion of time of circulation as an individual's saṃsāra. It is based on a circular conception of time in which the entire universe deteriorates and is extinguished, then reborn. A defining characteristic of Shintō doctrine is that it has a linear conception of time, with the prehistoric era of myth developing irreversibly into the historical era. Consequently, it emphasizes the notion that the world is an unrepeatable phenomenon (Mugikura Tatsuo, 1993). The view that the present world is a unique event flowing along a linear path is shared by Christianity, which entered Japan and spread rapidly in the 15th century. Given that it came to Japan via Europe, Christian thought would seem at first glance to be unrelated to the course of Buddhist thought in Japan, but it is in fact comparable to philosophical trends at the time. Despite being a monotheistic religion, Christianity was clearly relevant to Japanese philosophical trends of the same era, as is evident in the movement to find a highest kami in Shintō, the veneration of a single buddha (i.e. Amitābha) in Buddhism, and the establishment of the principle of oneness of mind in Zen.

Buddhism became sectarian during this period, and competition among schools became intense. Emerging schools based on simplified teachings, such as Zen, Pure Land, and Nichiren, gained great momentum, and the move toward secularism strengthened. The archetypal example is the development of the Jōdo Shinshū (浄土真宗) by Rennyo (蓮如; 1415–1499). The charisma that he possessed as a descendant of Shinran enabled him to greatly expand his order. It even developed into the grand-scale political movement known as the Ikkō-ikki (一向一揆), which became an armed religious uprising (see Tsang, 2007).

Following the establishment of Shintō as an independent doctrine and the introduction of Christianity, the intellectual development of Buddhism proceeded not only in the context of scholastic debates as before but also in the context of debate with and mutual influence from other philosophies. Of special note is the early 17th-century work Myōtei Mondō (妙貞問答) by Fabian (ハビアン; 1565–1621), which contains the first serious criticism of Buddhism by a Japanese Christian (Sueki Fumihiko, 2014c). Fabian later renounced his faith and went on to prompt criticism of Christianity with his work Hadaiusu (破提宇子). After this, political repression of Christianity intensified, and more Buddhist critiques of Christianity were written (Sueki Fumihiko, 2010, 73–76).

In the late 16th century, Buddhist temples came under large-scale attack by secular authorities, as exemplified by the burning of the Enryakuji (延暦寺) Temple by Oda Nobunaga (織田信長). Buddhism never recovered its constitutional authority as provider of a vital counterpart to kingly law in the form of Buddhist law (Sueki Fumihiko, 2010, 28–31). However, this is not to say that Buddhism was in decline. Formerly, it was thought that the Tokugawa period was an era of Confucianism during which Buddhism declined, but among today's scholars, the consensus is that this idea is mistaken. Rather, from the 17th century onward, Buddhism played a role in controlling the populace under the Tokugawa regime, the number of temples increased rapidly, and the religion expanded greatly (Sueki Fumihiko, 2010, 35–42). Certainly, Confucianism broadened in influence from the 17th century onward, secular ethics became an important issue for the philosophical world, and Buddhism was criticized by Confucianism for its disregard of secular matters. In reality however, secular ethics were disseminated more through Buddhism than through Confucianism. Buddhists held that their secular ethics would lead to the restoration of the Buddhist precepts and were compatible with Confucianism and Shintō (Sueki Fumihiko, 2010, 51–60). Representative of this idea are the "ten wholesome precepts" (jū zenkai [十善戒), the ten precepts to observed by the Buddhist laity as preached by Jiun Onkō (慈雲飲光; 1718–1804) in the Jūzen hōgo (十善法語; Sueki Fumihiko, 2010, 132–133). Jiun Onkō also engaged in research on Sanskrit in his work Bongaku Shinryō (梵学津梁) and worked to elucidate the "true dharma" of Indian Buddhism (Hase Hōshū, 1997).

A characteristic of Buddhist philosophical texts from the 17th century onward was the change in their typical format from manuscript copy to printed book. Christianity brought with it new texts, and the published format of these Christian works was in some ways epoch making. Western print culture was introduced in Japan along with Christianity. The print culture of Korea was also influential, and in the early 17th century, Korean-influenced wooden movable-type printing was used for a time. Movable type failed to grow in popularity, however, and its use declined. Woodcut blocks carved one page at a time were used in place of movable type. The exquisite workmanship of woodcut printers led to the creation of a unique print culture in Japan. Of the many materials published, the majority were related to Buddhism, and Buddhist texts became widespread (Sueki Fumihiko, 2010, 77–85).

The bringing from China to Japan of the Ōbaku school by Ingen Ryūki (隱元隆琦; 1592–1673) was of great significance, especially the publication of the Ōbaku edition, which is a reproduction of the Kakō edition of the Daizōkyō (嘉興藏大藏經) in the Ming period by Ingen Ryūki's pupil Tetsugen Dōkō (Sueki Fumihiko, 2010, 77–85, 96–98). It brought about an unprecedentedly wide diffusion of the Buddhist canon in Japan (Yokote Yutaka, Sueki Fumihiko & Watanabe Mariko, 2010). This new status of published books also affected the circulation of Buddhist scriptures. Hand-copied texts circulate only within narrow, closed groups, potentially giving rise to systems resembling oral traditions. However, when texts are published and released, secretive oral traditions lose their meaning and objective debate can occur in public venues.

The emergence of criticism of "innate enlightenment" is closely related to this change in the circulation of ideas. The critical Tendai and Kegon examinations of scholarship by Hōtan (鳳潭) and Fujaku (普寂), and the argument in the Shutsujō Gogo (出定後語) of Tominaga Nakamoto (富永仲基) that Mahāyāna was not the Buddhism taught by the historical Buddha (daijō hibussetsuron [大乘非佛説論]), were all products of a climate in which public debate was possible (Sueki Fumihiko, 2010, 103–110). The growing trend toward secularization and rationalization in Buddhism from the 17th century onward actually to brought about philosophical limitation to the tradition, in that it led Buddhist thought to increasingly turn a blind eye to irrational aspects of humanity and the cosmos. This problem was addressed by the Shintō thinker Hirata Atsutane (平田篤胤; 1776–1843), who, influenced by Christianity, moved toward establishing a new philosophy of the afterlife. Embracing both the rational and the irrational, Japan entered the modern era via the Meiji Restoration (Sueki Fumihiko, 2010, 185–191).

Bibliography

Abe Yasurō (阿部泰郎), "Sangoku sekaikań no gensetsu to zuzōka" (三国世界観の言説化と図像化), in: Sueki Fumihiko (末木文美士) et al., eds., Nihon shisōshi kōza 1: Kodai (日本思想史講座 1: 古代), Tokyo, 2012, 39–44.

Abe Yasurō (阿部泰郎), "Shōgyō no sekai koramu 1" (聖教の世界コラム 1), in: Sueki Fumihiko (末木文美士), ed., Shin Ajia Bukkyōshi: Nihon 2: Yakudōsuruchūsei Bukkyō (新アジア仏教史日本 2: 躍動する中世仏教), Tokyo, 2010, 58–63.

Baroni, H., Iron Eyes: The Life and Teachings of Obaku Zen Master Tetsugen Doko, New York, 2006.

Blum, M., "Buddhist Traditions: Overview," in: J.W. Heisig, T.P. Kasulis & J.C. Maraldo, eds., Japanese Philosophy: A Sourcebook, Honolulu, 2011.

Bowring, R., The Religious Traditions of Japan 500–1600, Cambridge UK, 2008.

Dobbins, J.C., Jōdo Shinshū: Shin Buddhism in Medieval Japan, Honolulu, 2002.

Dolce, L., "Taimitsu: The Esoteric Buddhism o School," in: C. Orzech et al., eds., Esoteric B the Tantras in East Asia, Leiden, 2011, 744–76 Dolce, L., "Criticism and Appropriation: Nichi toward Esoteric Buddhism," IBK 26/3–4, 199 Dolce, L., & Shinya Mano, "Godai'in Annen," et al., eds., Esoteric Buddhism and the Tantra Leiden, 2011, 768–775.
Emmanuel, S.M., ed., A Companion to Buddhi
London, 2013.
Faure, B., D.M. Moerman & G. Sekimori, e L'histoire et la culture d'une religion japonaise, Faure, B., M. Como & Iyanaga Nobumi, eds., Re eval Shintō/Repenser le shintō médiéval, C 2010.
Ford, J.L., Jōkei and Buddhist Devotion in Japan, New York, 2006.
Ganeri, J., Philosophy in Classical India: The Reason, London, 2001.
Gowans, C., Philosophy of the Buddha: A
London, 2003.
Groner, P., Ryôgen and Mt. Hiei, Honolulu, 20 Groner, P., "Shortening the Path: Early Ten tions of the Realization of Buddhahood Body (Sokushin Jōbutsu)," in: R.E. Buswell Paths to Liberation: The Marga and Its Tra Buddhist Thought, Honolulu, 1992, 439–47 Groner, P., "The Lotus Sūtra and Saichō's In the Realization of Buddhahood with This
G. Tanabe & W. Tanabe, eds., The Lotus S
Culture, Honolulu, 1989, 53–74.
Groner, P., Saichô: The Establishment of the School, Seoul, 1984.
Hall, J.W., et al., eds., The Cambridge History
Early Modern Japan, 1991.
Hase Hōshū (長谷宝秀), ed., Jiun Sonja zens 集), Kyoto, 1977.
Hatta Yukio (八田幸雄), Mikkyō no shōchō 徴世界), Tokyo, 1989.
Heine, S., Dōgen: Textual and Historical St 2012.
Heisig, J.W., T.P. Kasulis & J.C. Maraldo, e losophy: A Sourcebook, Honolulu, 2011.
Hirota, D., No Abode: The Record of Ippen, H Hirota, D., et al., eds., The Collected Works
The Writings, Kyoto, 1997.
Ishii Kōsei (石井公成), "Nara jidai no bu の仏教), in: Sueki Fumihiko (末木文 Nihon shisōshi kōza, vol. I: Kodai (日 古代), Tokyo, 2012, 137–167.
Ishii Kōsei (石井公成), "Sankyō gisho no go 語法), IBK 57/1, 2008, 43–49.
Jin Wenjing (金文京), Kanbun to higashi bunkaken (漢文と東アジア:訓読の文化 Kagamishima Genryū (鏡島元隆) & Suzu 格禅), Jūnikanbon Shōbōgenzō no shom 『正法眼蔵』の諸問題), Tokyo, 1991.
Kasahara, K., P. McCarthy & G. Sekimori, Japanese Religion, Tokyo, 2001.

wide diffusion of the Buddhist okote Yutaka, Sueki Fumihiko & , 2010). This new status of pub-affected the circulation of Bud-Hand-copied texts circulate only osed groups, potentially giving embling oral traditions. However, ublished and released, secretive e their meaning and objective n public venues.

of criticism of "innate enlightrelated to this change in the
s. The critical Tendai and Kegon cholarship by Hōtan (鳳潭)and the argument in the Shutsujō of Tominaga Nakamoto (富永仲 was not the Buddhism taught Buddha (daijō hibussetsuron [大 e all products of a climate in e was possible (Sueki Fumihiko, growing trend toward secularalization in Buddhism from the d actually to brought about phil-n to the tradition, in that it led o increasingly turn a blind eye s of humanity and the cosmos.
addressed by the Shintō thinker 田篤胤; 1776–1843), who, influ-ty, moved toward establishing a he afterlife. Embracing both the ational, Japan entered the mod-ji Restoration (Sueki Fumihiko, ), "Sangoku sekaikan no gensetsu 界観の言説化と図像化), in: Sueki 士) et al., eds., Nihon shisōshi kōza 1: 講座 1: 古代), Tokyo, 2012, 39–44.

), "Shōgyō no sekai koramu 1" (聖教 Sueki Fumihiko (末木文美士), ed., Nihon 2: Yakudōsuruchūsei Bukkyō 本 2: 躍動する中世仏教), Tokyo,

he Life and Teachings of Obaku Zen
, New York, 2006.
aditions: Overview," in: J.W. Heisig, Maraldo, eds., Japanese Philosophy:
lu, 2011.
s Traditions of Japan 500–1600, Cam-

hū: Shin Buddhism in Medieval Japan,

Dolce, L., "Taimitsu: The Esoteric Buddhism of the Tendai School," in: C. Orzech et al., eds., Esoteric Buddhism and the Tantras in East Asia, Leiden, 2011, 744–767.

Dolce, L., "Criticism and Appropriation: Nichiren's Attitude toward Esoteric Buddhism," IBK 26/3–4, 1999, 364–374.

Dolce, L., & Shinya Mano, "Godai'in Annen," in: C. Orzech et al., eds., Esoteric Buddhism and the Tantras in East Asia, Leiden, 2011, 768–775.

Emmanuel, S.M., ed., A Companion to Buddhist Philosophy, London, 2013.

Faure, B., D.M. Moerman & G. Sekimori, eds., Shugendo: L'histoire et la culture d'une religion japonaise, CEA 18, 2011.

Faure, B., M. Como & Iyanaga Nobumi, eds., Rethinking Medieval Shintō/Repenser le shintō médiéval, CEA 16, Kyoto, 2010.

Ford, J.L., Jōkei and Buddhist Devotion in Early Medieval Japan, New York, 2006.

Ganeri, J., Philosophy in Classical India: The Proper Work of Reason, London, 2001.

Gowans, C., Philosophy of the Buddha: An Introduction, London, 2003.

Groner, P., Ryôgen and Mt. Hiei, Honolulu, 2002.

Groner, P., "Shortening the Path: Early Tendai Interpretations of the Realization of Buddhahood with This Very Body (Sokushin Jōbutsu)," in: R.E. Buswell & R.M. Gimello, Paths to Liberation: The Marga and Its Transformations in Buddhist Thought, Honolulu, 1992, 439–473.

Groner, P., "The Lotus Sūtra and Saichō's Interpretations of the Realization of Buddhahood with This Very Body," in: G. Tanabe & W. Tanabe, eds., The Lotus Sutra in Japanese Culture, Honolulu, 1989, 53–74.

Groner, P., Saichô: The Establishment of the Japanese Tendai School, Seoul, 1984.

Hall, J.W., et al., eds., The Cambridge History of Japan, vol. IV: Early Modern Japan, 1991.

Hase Hōshū (長谷宝秀), ed., Jiun Sonja zenshū (慈雲尊者全集), Kyoto, 1977.

Hatta Yukio (八田幸雄), Mikkyō no shōchō sekai (密教の象徵世界), Tokyo, 1989.

Heine, S., Dōgen: Textual and Historical Studies, New York, 2012.

Heisig, J.W., T.P. Kasulis & J.C. Maraldo, eds., Japanese Philosophy: A Sourcebook, Honolulu, 2011.

Hirota, D., No Abode: The Record of Ippen, Honolulu, 1997.

Hirota, D., et al., eds., The Collected Works of Shinran, vol. I: The Writings, Kyoto, 1997.

Ishii Kōsei (石井公成), "Nara jidai no bukkyō" (奈良時代の仏教), in: Sueki Fumihiko (末木文美士) et al., eds., Nihon shisōshi kōza, vol. I: Kodai (日本思想史講座 1: 古代), Tokyo, 2012, 137–167.

Ishii Kōsei (石井公成), "Sankyō gisho no gohō" (三経義疏の語法), IBK 57/1, 2008, 43–49.

Jin Wenjing (金文京), Kanbun to higashi Ajia: Kundoku no bunkaken (漢文と東アジア:訓読の文化圏), Tokyo, 2010.

Kagamishima Genryū (鏡島元隆) & Suzuki Kakuzen (鈴木格禅), Jūnikanbon Shōbōgenzō no shomondai (十二巻本『正法眼蔵』の諸問題), Tokyo, 1991.

Kasahara, K., P. McCarthy & G. Sekimori, trans., A History of Japanese Religion, Tokyo, 2001.

Kawasaki Tsuneyuki (川崎庸之), ed., Kūkai: Himitsu mandara jūjūshin ron (空海: 秘密曼荼羅十住心論), NSS 5, Tokyo, 1975.

Kōbō Daishi Kūkai Zenshū Henshū Iinkai (弘法大師空海全集編輯委員会), eds., Kōbō Daishi Kūkai Zenshū (弘法大師空海全集), vol. II, Tokyo, 2000.

Kornicki, P.F., The Book in Japan: A Cultural History from the Beginnings to the Nineteenth Century, HdO 5/7, Leiden, 1997.

Kyōgaku Dendō Kenkyū Sentā (教学伝道研究センター), Shinran shōnin Goshōsokushū (親鸞聖人御消息) Eshinni Shōsoku (恵信尼消息集), Kyoto, 2007.

Matsumura Kazuo, "Ancient Japan and Religion," in: P.L. Swanson & C. Chilson, eds., Nanzan Guide to Japanese Religions, Honolulu, 2006, 131–143.

Mitsuhashi Tadashi (三橋正), Heian jidai no shinkō to shūkyō girei (平安時代の信仰と宗教儀礼), 2000.

Miyake Hitoshi (宮家準), Yamabushi: sono kōdō to soshiki (山伏: その行動と組織), Tokyo, 1973.

Miyoshi Toshinori (三好俊徳), "Bukkyōshi jojutsu no naka no shūron – Ōwa no Shūron ni kanren suru tekusuto wo megutte" (仏教史叙述のなかの宗論–応和の宗論に関連するテクストをめぐって), NSBK 12/1, 2008, 63–80.

Morrell, R.E., Sand and Pebbles (Shasekishû): The Tale of Mujû Ichien, Albany, 1985.

Morrell, R.E., "Kamakura Accounts of Myōe Shōnin as Popular Religious Hero," JJRS 9/2–3, 1982, 172ff..

Mugikura Tatsuo (麦倉達生), "Shintō ni miraru jikankan (sono ichi): Nihongo ni okeru jisei no henyō to Nihonjin no jikankan (hoi)" (神道にみられる時間観 (その一): 日本語における時制の変容と日本人の時間観 [補遺]), MFESU 43, 1993, 221–230.

Nagamura Makoto (永村眞), Chūsei jiin shiryōron (中世寺院史料論), Tokyo, 2000.

Nakamura Hajime, "Consciousness of the Individual and the Universal among the Japanese," in: C.A. Moore, ed., The Japanese Mind: Essentials of Japanese Philosophy and Culture, Honolulu, 1967, 192–194.

Nasu Seiryū (那須政隆), Gorin kuji hishaku no kenkyū (五輪九字祕釋の研究), Tokyo, 1936.

Naumann, N., "Death and Afterlife in Early Japan," in: S. Formanek & W.R. LaFleur, eds., Practicing the Afterlife, Vienna, 2004.

Nobumi Iyanaga, "Tachikawa-ryū," in: C. Orzech et al., eds., Esoteric Buddhism and the Tantras in East Asia, Leiden, 2011, 803–814.

Nobumi Iyanaga (彌永信美), "Mikkyō girei to 'nenzuru chikara': Hōkyōshō no hihanteki kentō, oyobi Juhōyōjinshū no 'dokuro honzon girei' wo chūshin ni shite" (密教儀礼と「念ずる力」—『宝鏡鈔』の批判的検討、および『受法用心集』の「髑髏本尊儀礼」を中心にして), in: L. Dolce & Matsumoto Ikuyo (松本郁代), eds., Girei no chikara: chūsei shūkyō no jissen sekai (儀礼の力—中世宗教の実践世界), Kyoto, 2010, 127–158.

Quinter, D.R., The Shingon Ritsu School and the Mañjuśrī Cult in the Kamakura Period: From Eison to Monkan, 2006.

Rambelli, F., "'Just Behave as You Like': Radical Amida Cults and Popular Religiosity in Premodern Japan," in: R.K. Payne & K.K. Tanaka, eds., Approaching the Land of Bliss: Religious Praxis in the Cult of Amitabha, Honolulu, 2004, 169–201.

Rhodes, R., "Seeking the Pure Land in Heian Japan: The Practices of the Monks of the Nijūgo Zanmai-e," EB 33/1, 2001, 56–79.

Sadakata Akira & Nakamura Hajime, Buddhist Cosmology: Philosophy and Origins, Tokyo, 1997.

Sanford, J.H., Wind, Waters, Stupas, Mandalas, Fetal Buddhahood in Shingon, JJRS 24/1, 1997, 1–38.

Sansom, G.B., Japan: A Short Cultural History, Stanford, 1978.

Satō Hiroo (佐藤弘夫), "Honji suijaku" (本地垂迹), in: Sueki Fumihiko (末木文美士) et al., eds., Nihon shisōshi kōza, vol. I: Kodai (日本思想史講座 1: 古代), Tokyo, 2012, 363–383.

Satō Hiroo, Shinkoku Nihon (神国日本), Tokyo, 2006.

Shaner, D.E., The Bodymind Experience in Japanese Buddhism: A Phenomenological Perspective of Kūkai and Dōgen, New York, 1985.

Shinya Mano, "Yōsai and Esoteric Buddhism," in: C. Orzech et al., eds., Esoteric Buddhism and the Tantras in East Asia, Leiden, 2011, 827–834.

Snodgrass, A., The Matrix and Diamond World Mandalas in Shingon Buddhism, 2 vols., New Delhi, 1988.

Stone, J.I., Original Enlightenment and the Transformation of Medieval Japanese Buddhism, Honolulu, 1999.

Stone, J.I., & M.N. Walter, eds., Death and Afterlife in Japanese Buddhism, Honolulu, 2008.

Sueki Fumihiko (末木文美士), "Daizōkyō no shōrai" (大蔵経の将来), in: Sueki Fumihiko, ed., Nihon bukkyōnyūmon (日本仏教入門), Tokyo, 2014a, 91–104.

Sueki Fumihiko, "Kyōten no kaishaku to tenkai" (経典の解釈と展開), in: Sueki Fumihiko, ed., Nihon bukkyōnyūmon (日本仏教入門), Tokyo, 2014b, 104–123.

Sueki Fumihiko, ed., Myōtei Mondō wo yomu (妙貞問答を読む), Kyoto, 2014c.

Sueki Fumihiko, "Heian Bukkyōron" (平安仏教論), in: Sueki Fumihiko et al., eds., Nihon shisōshi kōza, vol.I: Kodai (日本思想史講座 1: 古代), Tokyo, 2012, 233–247.

Sueki Fumihiko, Kinsei no Bukkyō (近世の仏教), Tokyo, 2010.

Sueki Fumihiko, Kamakura Bukkyō tenkairon (鎌倉仏教展開論), Tokyo, 2008.

Sueki Fumihiko, "La place des divinités locales, des bouddhas et du tennō dans le shintō médiéval: En particulier la théorie de Jihen," in: B. Faure, M. Como & Iyanaga Nobumi, eds., Rethinking Medieval Shintō/Repenser le shintō médiéval, CEA 16, Kyoto, 2010, 343–373.

Sueki Fumihiko, "Mumyōshu, Ingoshū: kaidai" (無名集、隠語集、解題), in: Kokubungaku Shiryōkan (国文学資料館), eds., Chūsei sentoku chosakushū (中世先徳著作集), Kyoto, 2006, 556–576.

Sueki Fumihiko, "How Can Grasses and Trees Attain Buddhahood?," in: 聖嚴博士古稀記念論集: 東アジア佛教の諸問題= An Anthology of East Asian Buddhism: A Commemorative Volume in Honor of Ven. Sheng-yen on His 70th Birthday, 2001, 73–92(L).

Sueki Fumihiko, "Nara jidai ni okeru Bukkyō tōden" (奈良時代における仏教東伝), in: Minamoto Ryōen (源了圓) & Yō Sōbun (楊曽文), eds., Nicchū bunka kōryū shisōsho, vol. IV: Shūkyō (日中文化交流史叢書 4 宗教), Tokyo, 1996, 111–138.

Sueki Fumihiko, Heian shoki Bukkyō shiso no kenkyū (平安初期仏教思想の研究), Tokyo, 1995.

Sueki Fumihiko, "Annen: The Philosopher Who Japanized Buddhism," AcAs 66, 1994, 69–86.

Sueki Fumihiko, "Chūsei Tendai to Hongaku shisō" (中世天台と本覚思想), in: Sueki Fumihiko, Nihon Bukkyō shisōshi ronkō (日本仏教思想史論考), Tokyo, 1993, 312–346.

Takasaki Jikidō (高崎直道), Shi wa jōbutsu ka (死は成仏か), Tokyo, 1995.

Takemura Shōhō (武邑尚邦), Inmyōgaku: Kigen to hensen (因明学: 起源と変遷), Kyoto, 1986.

Takemura Shōhō (武邑尚邦), "Nihon ni okeru inmyō kenkyū: toku ni Hōkan no kenkyū wo megutte" (日本における因明研究: 特に宝観の研究をめぐって; On the Japanese Studies of Hetu-Vidya [In-myo]), RDR 394, 1970, 30–52.

Teeuwen, M., & F. Rambelli, eds., Buddhas and Kami in Japan: Honji Suijaku as a Combinatory Paradigm, London, 2003.

Tsang, C.R., War and Faith: Ikko Ikki in Late Muromachi Japan, Cambridge MA, 2007.

Veere, H. van der, A Study into the Thought of Kōgyō Daishi Kakuban, Leiden, 2000.

Verschuer, C. von, "Japan's Foreign Relations 600 to 1200 A.D.: A Translation from Zenrin Kokuhōki," MonN 54/1, 1999, 1–39.

Yampolsky, P., ed., Letters of Nichiren, New York, 1996.

Yokote Yutaka (横手裕), Sueki Fumihiko (末木文美士) & Watanabe Mariko (渡辺麻里子), eds., Tōkyō daigaku sōgō toshokan shozō Minban Daizōkyō mokuroku narabi ni kenkyū (東京大学総合図書館所蔵明版大蔵経目録並びに研究), Tokyo, 2010.

Fumihiko Sueki

entoku chosakushū (中世先徳著作
–576.
an Grasses and Trees Attain Buddha-古稀記念論集: 東アジア佛教の諸 of East Asian Buddhism: A Commemo-r of Ven. Sheng-yen on His 70th Birthidai ni okeru Bukkyō tōden" (奈良時 ), in: Minamoto Ryōen (源了円) & ds., Nicchū bunka kōryū shisōsho, vol.

交流史叢書 4 宗教), Tokyo, 1996, hoki Bukkyō shiso no kenkyū (平安初 Tokyo, 1995.

n: The Philosopher Who Japanized 1994, 69–86. i Tendai to Hongaku shisō" (中世天 ueki Fumihiko, Nihon Bukkyō shisōshi 史論考), Tokyo, 1993, 312–346.
道), Shi wa jōbutsu ka (死は成仏か), 尚邦), Inmyōgaku: Kigen to hensen ), Kyoto, 1986.

邑尚邦), "Nihon ni okeru inmyō n no kenkyū wo megutte" (日本に に宝観の研究をめぐって; On the etu-Vidya [In-myo]), RDR 394, 1970, elli, eds., Buddhas and Kami in Japan:

binatory Paradigm, London, 2003.
h: Ikko Ikki in Late Muromachi Japan, dy into the Thought of Kōgyō Daishi

.
an's Foreign Relations 600 to 1200 rom Zenrin Kokuhōki," MonN 54/1, s of Nichiren, New York, 1996.

), Sueki Fumihiko (末木文美士) & 渡辺麻里子), eds., Tōkyō daigaku inban Daizōkyō mokuroku narabi ni 合図書館所蔵明版大蔵経目録並び

FUMIHIKO SUEKI

Ritual Texts

Ritual Texts: South Asia

For most of its flourish in South Asia, Buddhism was not averse to rituals. In fact, in its highly successful esoteric manifestation, the prescriptive literature of which forms the focus of this entry, performance of rituals became the dominant feature of the religion. From relatively humble beginnings as short scriptures containing spells and their applications promising the fulfillment of a variety of worldly aims, ritual literature grew at a very fast pace, culminating in grand compendia of several hundreds of leaves with an ever-increasing palette of promised results, including liberation itself.

It is somewhat difficult to decide what can be regarded as ritual as generally understood, that is to say, external actions (karma or kriyā) involving objects, substances, perceivable incantation and movement, and what is strictly speaking a process of meditation (dhyāna), in other words, internal actions such as visualization (bhāvanā) or generating a certain mental attitude (bhāva). For in both exoteric and esoteric Buddhist ritual, external and internal actions almost invariably work in a mutually reinforcing tandem. Internal visualization can also act as a substitute for external objects or actions, for example in cases where an otherwise prescribed substance such as a precious gem is not available or when a certain action cannot be performed. Conversely, external objects or actions can act as a prop for developing the ritualist's meditative powers until they reach an ideal stage.

Scriptures and Manuals

Among surviving Indic (predominantly Sanskrit) manuscripts of esoteric Buddhist works, ritual texts are the most numerous. The existence of yet more can be ascertained through translations (primarily Chinese and Tibetan) and still more from quotations and references in extant works. Defining what exactly can be called a ritual text is again not an easy task, since very often scriptures contain little more than a frame to encase spells and ritual procedures – that is to say, in actual fact, they are ritual manuals of a scriptural status. This is especially the case for early esoteric texts, often called ritual procedures (kalpa) and spells (dhāraṇī), in which excepting the frame story of revelation – usually a situation of crisis: earthquake, snakebite, assault of demons, and so on – there is little else but the spell itself, its ritual application, and praises of its benefits. (For an example of this literature, see Hidas, 2012; for further applications based on the same text in ritual manuals, see Hidas, 2010.) Furthermore, ritual manuals not infrequently acquired scriptural status by being incorporated in part or in whole into newly fashioned scriptures (Szántó, vol. I, 2012, 94–95, 172–177), or gained such prestige that they are referred to as if having scriptural authority. Commentarial works can also contain detailed descriptions of rituals, hence such passages can also be seen as mini-manuals embedded in exegesis.

However, for the most part, scriptures give only scattered instructions for or merely an outline of a ritual procedure, whereas the manuals, using the scriptural allusion or outline as a validation, spell out the procedure in greater detail. This is very similar to the case of kindred religious traditions, most importantly Śaivism, many rituals of which the Buddhists have adopted and adapted. Making allowance for the difference in terminology, the following quotation discussing descriptions of ritual practice in scriptures versus those in manuals can also be considered relevant in the case of Buddhism:

> [...] common sense and the character of the Indian Śaiva literature must alert us to the naïvety of assuming that these works can reveal more than the general parameters within which some elements of local practice would have operated. They are texts of scripture (āgamaḥ, tantram, saṃhitā) and as such were designed to be accepted as authorities by the widest possible constituency. To that end they tend to prescribe only the bare framework of practice, thereby allowing for the great variety on the level of detail and ancillary elaboration that can be observed in the practical manuals (Paddhatis) that guided the procedures followed by religious officiants in specific regions and lineages. (Sanderson, 2003–2004, 353)

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

Titles and Format

Ritual manuals come under a variety of names, and there does not seem to be any strict delimitation of genres. With small exceptions, all such manuals have an author. If the name of the author is missing, there is still a silent consensus that it is the work of a human being, as practical manuals are not supposed to be superhuman revelation.

The standard Śaiva genre denomination, paddhati (guide), is used extremely rarely. The most common such term is vidhi or vidhāna (procedure), which is usually preceded by the type of ritual it describes. Thus an arcanavidhi or pūjāvidhi would be a manual of worship, maṇḍalavidhi or abhiṣekavidhi an initiation manual, varṣāpaṇavidhi a manual for making rain, and so on. A synonymous term is upāyikā (method), sometimes spelled upayikā or even upaikā. Thus a sādhanopāyikā (although in this case simply sādhana is more common) would be a manual for the visualization of a deity, a maṇḍalopāyikā an initiation manual, a homopāyikā a manual for oblation into fire. Slightly rarer terms include krama (procedural sequence), prayoga (procedure), and upadeśa (teaching). The type of ritual and the name of the genre are generally preceded by the name of the deity or the central deity of the pantheon involved or by the name of the tradition that the ritual is supposedly following. Thus, a Tārāpūjāvidhi would be a step-by-step instruction for the worship of the goddess Tārā and the Guhyasamājamaṇḍalavidhi an initiation manual based on the teachings of the Guhyasamājatantra. Works on a grander scale or deemed important by the author can also have a separate, "poetic" title. Thus the manual of Abhayākaragupta for oblation into fire is called the Jyotirmañjarī (A Bouquet of Light), the same author's grand compendium is titled Vajrāvalī (A String of Vajras), and Ānandagarbha's initiation manual is styled the Sarvavajrodayā (The Rise of All Vajras).

Since ritual manuals are often not very long, manuscripts containing such texts are typically of a smaller format, which made them easily portable and prevented waste of precious writing space on palm leaf or birchbark. More recent paper manuscripts usually retain this format. Nowadays in Nepal, manuals are also published as stitched printed booklets, although the concertina format was quite popular in the region in the late medieval period. An 11th-century Kashmiri birchbark manuscript (as was probably common with manuscripts from that region) containing ritual material is also bound (Kawasaki, 2004). Some manuals come with aiding illustrations; although this is more typical of recent manuscripts, some early samples are known to exist. Older ritual manuals retain the scriptio continua, but some more recent ones contain some formatting, such as highlighting the liturgical parts (the text to be recited such as mantras and hymns) or separating it by other visual means, thus making the manual more convenient to use. From a rather early date (c. 13th–14th cents.), there are some Nepalese bilingual manuals with the liturgical parts in Sanskrit and the instructions in Newar. This has become the standard among contemporary ritualists of Newar communities.

Initiation Manuals

The most operatic of all esoteric Buddhist rituals is undoubtedly that of initiation (abhiṣeka), the primary aim of which is for the candidate (śiṣya) to obtain the right, but also the duty (the word adhikāra entails both), to propitiate a deity-mantra. To this effect, the candidate is led in front of a particular cult's pantheon of deities represented by a diagram made of colored powders (maṇḍala), where he (very rarely: she) undergoes ritual transformation into a qualified worshipper. Several elements, including the terminology and choreography of the ritual, imitate the rite of Brahmanical royal consecration and resemble Śaiva maṇḍala initiation even more closely.

The following outline takes into account only the main rites, and it must be understood that there is great variety concerning which rites are performed, in what way, and in what order. Many of the rites for which the original terms are given below can form the subject of individual ritual manuals (except the abhiṣekas, which are always treated as a set).

Initiation proper is prefaced by a numerous sequence of preliminary rites. Prompted by an earnest request by a suitable candidate, a qualified officiant (ācārya), after having formally accepted the aspirant as a pupil (śiṣyasaṃgraha), first selects an appropriate site (bhūmiparīkṣā) and takes ritual control over it (bhūmiparigraha). He performs several rites to protect the site, including the installation of pegs around the territory in order to pin down possible obstacles (vighnakīlana). He then ritually makes fit (adhivāsana) the site (vasundharā); the utensils to be used, such as the flasks (kalaśa), the strings (sūtra) used to delineate the maṇḍala, and the colored powders (rajas); the initiand (śiṣyādhivāsana); and the deities that are to be invoked (devatādhivāsana).

He then delineates the diagram (maṇḍalasūtraṇa) and fills up the deli with colored powders (rajaḥpātan maṇḍala is finished, the candidate a admitted. He is then blindfolded and in front of the maṇḍala (śiṣyapraveś put into a state of possession (āveśa cast a flower or a tooth stick on the simulacrum thereof, whereby his affi ticular set of deities is established. T then removed, and he is led around t be introduced to the deities. It is here proper begins.

After being sworn to secrecy, th first given a garland (mālābhiṣeka), is consecrated water (udakābhiṣeka), an a tiara (mukuṭābhiṣeka) and his m ritual implements, the vajra-scepter and the bell (ghaṇṭābhiṣeka). To signa tity, he is given a new name (nāmāb is determined by his affinity with a Should he wish to become an officia candidate undergoes a supplement that of the officiant (ācāryābhiṣeka).

Later manuals sometimes treat th a single initiation, collectively callin flask(s) (kalaśābhiṣeka). From aroun tury onward, this set came to be augm "secret initiation" (guhyābhiṣeka), wh devoid of antinomian elements but q denote a rite in which the officiant c consort and the initiand consumes th Very soon after, yet another initiatio edge-of-wisdom initiation" (prajñāj was added. This is a mirror of the pre the initiand copulates with another o sort and again consumes the sexual fl the so-called fourth initiation (ca came to close the set, which in mo a kind of oral explanation of what previous sexual experiences refer to future practice. (For a discussion o controversies concerning the latter Isaacson, 2010.)

At the very end of initiation, there ther, closing rites. The officiant predi enment of the initiate (vyākaraṇa), f the pupil to practice (anujñā), and with encouragement (āśvāsadāna). the new initiate of his ritual duties an Then the deities that were invoked in are respectfully dismissed (visarjana is destroyed, and the powders are ca lthough this is more typical of some early samples are known l manuals retain the scriptio ore recent ones contain some ighlighting the liturgical parts d such as mantras and hymns) her visual means, thus making nvenient to use. From a rather 4th cents.), there are some anuals with the liturgical parts nstructions in Newar. This has among contemporary ritualnities.

als

all esoteric Buddhist rituals is initiation (abhiṣeka), the pris for the candidate (śiṣya) to so the duty (the word adhikāra itiate a deity-mantra. To this is led in front of a particular ties represented by a diagram ers (maṇḍala), where he (very s ritual transformation into a Several elements, including choreography of the ritual, hmanical royal consecration aṇḍala initiation even more e takes into account only the t be understood that there is ng which rites are performed, at order. Many of the rites for ms are given below can form al ritual manuals (except the lways treated as a set). s prefaced by a numerous y rites. Prompted by an ear-ble candidate, a qualified offi-aving formally accepted the yasaṃgraha), first selects an iparīkṣā) and takes ritual congraha). He performs several , including the installation of y in order to pin down possi-lana). He then ritually makes (vasundharā); the utensils to ks (kalaśa), the strings (sūtra) maṇḍala, and the colored itiand (śiṣyādhivāsana); and invoked (devatādhivāsana).

He then delineates the diagram of the deities (maṇḍalasūtraṇa) and fills up the delineated spaces with colored powders (rajaḥpātana). When the maṇḍala is finished, the candidate again asks to be admitted. He is then blindfolded and made to enter in front of the maṇḍala (śiṣyapraveśa). There he is put into a state of possession (āveśa) and made to cast a flower or a tooth stick on the diagram or a simulacrum thereof, whereby his affinity with a particular set of deities is established. The blindfold is then removed, and he is led around the maṇḍala to be introduced to the deities. It is here that initiation proper begins.

After being sworn to secrecy, the candidate is first given a garland (mālābhiṣeka), is sprinkled with consecrated water (udakābhiṣeka), and then is given a tiara (mukuṭābhiṣeka) and his most important ritual implements, the vajra-scepter (vajrābhiṣeka) and the bell (ghaṇṭābhiṣeka). To signal his new identity, he is given a new name (nāmābhiṣeka), which is determined by his affinity with a set of deities. Should he wish to become an officiant himself, the candidate undergoes a supplementary initiation, that of the officiant (ācāryābhiṣeka).

Later manuals sometimes treat the above set as a single initiation, collectively calling it that of the flask(s) (kalaśābhiṣeka). From around the 9th century onward, this set came to be augmented with the "secret initiation" (guhyābhiṣeka), which was at first devoid of antinomian elements but quickly came to denote a rite in which the officiant copulates with a consort and the initiand consumes the sexual fluids. Very soon after, yet another initiation – the "knowledge-of-wisdom initiation" (prajñājñānābhiṣeka) – was added. This is a mirror of the previous rite; here the initiand copulates with another or the same consort and again consumes the sexual fluids. Later still, the so-called fourth initiation (caturthābhiṣeka) came to close the set, which in most cases meant a kind of oral explanation of what the initiand's previous sexual experiences refer to in terms of his future practice. (For a discussion of some of the controversies concerning the latter initiations, see Isaacson, 2010.)

At the very end of initiation, there are several further, closing rites. The officiant predicts the enlightenment of the initiate (vyākaraṇa), formally allows the pupil to practice (anujñā), and provides him with encouragement (āśvāsadāna). He also informs the new initiate of his ritual duties and observances. Then the deities that were invoked into the diagram are respectfully dismissed (visarjana), the maṇḍala is destroyed, and the powders are cast into flowing water (maṇḍalopasaṃhāra). The initiation rite, which can last for several days, is then brought to a conclusion with the officiant's performing a fire oblation (homa) and a communal feast (gaṇacakra).

Several very important and influential initiation manuals survive in the original Sanskrit, although judging by the number of such works extant in Tibetan translation, this is a small proportion of what must have existed. Perhaps the earliest (9th cent.[?]), but certainly the most archaic among them, is the Sarvavajrodayā of Ānandagarbha. It describes initiation related to the maṇḍala of what may be termed the first truly esoteric Buddhist scripture, the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha, which very explicitly states that swift enlightenment is impossible without initiation. (For an edition of the manual, see Mikkyō Seiten Kenkyūkai, 1986; 1987; Takahashi, 1990.)

For the first emphatically antinomian Buddhist scripture, the Guhyasamājatantra, at least two 9th-century manuals survive: the Viṃśatividhi of Nāgabuddhi (edition Tanaka, 2010, 629–716) and the Maṇḍalavidhi of Dīpaṃkarabhadra (edition Bahulkar, 2010). A very influential manual for the same cult, Vāgīśvarakīrti's Saṃkṣiptābhiṣekavidhi, dates from the early 11th century. Besides a succinct description of the initiation rite, this text also contains an important polemic passage (edited – and discussed in Japanese – by Sakurai, 1998, 407–426; the polemic section is reedited, translated, and discussed by Onians, 2002, 279–289). Yet another manual of this cult with significant influences from other traditions is Padmaśrīmitra's still unedited Maṇḍalopāyikā (late 11th or 12th cent.).

The cult of Saṃvara or Śaṃvara has at least one initiation manual extant in the original Sanskrit; this is Bhūvācārya's still unpublished Saṃvarodayā nāma maṇḍalopāyikā (before 1054 CE). A similar manual related to the cult of the deity Yamāri is the 10th-century Yamārimaṇḍalavidhi of Śrīdhara (Kuranishi, 2008, 195–238). The cycle centered on the Catuṣpīṭhatantra also has an extant initiation manual, which has undergone several recensions and even succeeded in reforming the pantheon of the cult. This text is simply called the Maṇḍalopāyikā and is attributed either to (an) Āryadeva or one Caryāvratīpāda (Szántó, 2008; vol. I, 2012, 123–152, which also contains a synopsis of one recension). In spite of its overwhelming importance, the cult of Hevajra can boast only one, incomplete manual in the original – the anonymous Sekaprakriyā (edition and translation Finot, 1934, 19–48; a draft annotated reedition by A.G.J.S. Sanderson and H. Isaacson is in circulation). Further unpublished initiation manuals include the works of one Subhūtipālita for the cult of Bhūtaḍāmara (which are in a fragmentary state) and a manual called Gurūpadeśa* for the cult of Mahāmāyā by *Vinayadatta.

What one might term a subgenre of initiation, or rather conversion, manuals are those for instructing beginners (ādikarmika). These manuals usually start with making a candidate take refuge (i.e. the standard Buddhist conversion rite) and instructing him in the duties of a lay follower, the worship of less esoteric deities such as Jambhala, and less elaborate rites such as fashioning simple reliquaries (caitya) or clay molds (sañcaka), offering a simulacrum in the shape of the universe to the master (gurumaṇḍalaka), and other kinds of worship.

One such work, the Ādikarmapradīpa of Anupamavajra (late 11th cent.) has been published twice (first by La Vallée Poussin, 1898, 162–232, which includes a discussion; reedition by Takahashi, 1993). The Ādikarmāvatāra of Mañjukīrti and the Ādikarmavidhi of Tatakaragupta remain unedited. (A study of this material in a dissertation by I. Sinclair is forthcoming.)

Manuals of Post-initiatory Practice

By far the most numerous among extant manuals are called sādhana (method of accomplishment), a term that covers a multiplicity of meditative rituals (bhāvanā or yoga) centered on a deity (devatā) or a main deity and his or her attendants. The practitioner (sādhaka, yogin, or mantrin) is supposed to perform such rites on a daily basis after initiation.

In more archaic sādhanas, the deities are visualized in front of the practitioner, and they are treated as high-ranking guests. Most typically they are summoned and worshipped with the appropriate offerings, mantras, and hand gestures (mudrā); praises (stotra or stuti) are recited to them, whereafter they are petitioned for a variety of goals. In later sādhanas, the practitioner seeks to gain identity with the deity and is even instructed to maintain this identity outside of meditation sessions.

A variety of preliminaries usher in the main part, which is usually the visualization of the deity. These preliminaries are suffused with standard Mahāyāna concepts, and they usually culminate in the contemplation of emptiness (śūnyatā). From emptiness the main seed-syllable (mantra or bīja) of the deity arises, which then instantly transforms into the deity itself. The descriptions of the forms of the deities can be very detailed and hence of value to art historians for the identification and understanding of iconic objects. The visualization is supposed to be complete and vivid. When the effort of visualization has tired the practitioner, he is instructed to repeatedly recite (japa) the longer mantra of the deity. Thus, the goddess Tārā would appear as a transformation of the seed-syllable trāṃ, but her mantra for recitation is oṃ tāre tuttāre ture svāhā. The recitation of mantras is of paramount importance, since it is often stated that the mantra and the deity are one and the same. One of the relevant rituals in this respect is that of "preliminary service" (pūrvasevā), the repetition of a mantra a given number of times (e.g. 100,000) in order to gain mastery over it.

The sādhanas of deities are transmitted individually, in collections of sādhanas centering on a single deity and its ectypes (for examples of such collections, see English, 2002; Isaacson, 2009), or in heterogeneous collections (manuscripts of several such collections were further compiled by Bhattacharya [1925–1928] under the title Sādhanamālā). This type of literature has been much better studied than the initiation manuals, although several fundamental texts have been edited only very recently (e.g. Sakurai, 1998; Isaacson, 2002; Luo & Tomabechi, 2009). Monographs on the topic include S. Beyer's (1978), which, although primarily dealing with Tibetan texts, is illuminating for Indic material as well; another in-depth study is by E. English (2002), on the goddess Vajrayoginī.

There is great variety in the length of sādhanas: some can contain only a few lines, but some cover dozens of leaves. More elaborate sādhanas can be called abhisamaya (practice), although this is not always the case. Besides the standard step-by-step instructions, authors of sādhanas sometimes cite varying viewpoints concerning the minutiae of ritual either approving them as suitable variations or refuting them.

Initiation entails at least two ritual actors, the officiant and the initiand, but very often more, such as the officiant's helpers, the consort or consorts, and sometimes the family and retinue of the initiand, who are allowed to view the maṇḍala. However, the practice described in sādhanas is a basically private affair (excepting cases in which the officiant is to have an assistant called the uttarasādhaka). Initiates of some of the later tantric revelations (from the 9th cent. onward) are also enjoined to periodically observe group worship. This rite, usually called gaṇacakra, is a reenactment of the maṇḍala, with the overseer (typically the ācārya) and his consort

---

acting as the main deity pair. The com feast on nonvegetarian offerings and liq two complete manuals survive in Sa brief notice of the first, see Isaacson, 2 the second, see Szántó, forthcoming), monograph on the subject to this da 2007; for an overview of this study in Shizuka, 2008) does not take them into

Manuals of Occasional Rites

The rites thus far described concern i for whom they are obligatory. Howeve can also undertake per demand ritua who in most cases would be lay followe the initiate may perform these same ri self if need be, in which case he is his it were.

One of the most common ways of fu ety of aims was oblation into fire (hom izing various elements of the ritual, su and shape of the firepit, the size of the the articles offered into the flames, a s seek to placate or avert (śāntika) or influences, promote invigoration health and wealth, or aggressively at kill (abhicāra) enemies. These thre later on complemented by others su (ākarṣaṇa) and gaining control over commonly for sexual purposes, c (vidveṣaṇa), driving away (uccāṭa (stambhana) an enemy's body or spe (For an edition of a very influential the already mentioned Jyotirmañjar 1983; 1986.) Similar results can be other rituals (typically styled pra the use of amulets. Such prayoga employed toward gaining maste cal accomplishments (siddhi), so "minor" (kṣudrasiddhi), such as obta over a resuscitated corpse (vetāla magical slippers (the relative of sev [pādukāsiddhi]), and the ability to f sword (khaḍgasiddhi).

One very important but rath civic rite is weather control, typic (varṣāpaṇa), which was underst demand in agrarian societies. Seve unedited – texts survive (see Szánt 241). A better-studied group of te consecration (pratiṣṭhā). In the ea rituals were designed to make sac letailed and hence of value to art dentification and understanding e visualization is supposed to be When the effort of visualization ioner, he is instructed to repeat-he longer mantra of the deity. ārā would appear as a transforyllable trāṃ, but her mantra for e tuttāre ture svāhā. The recitaf paramount importance, since t the mantra and the deity are ne of the relevant rituals in this reliminary service" (pūrvasevā), nantra a given number of times r to gain mastery over it. leities are transmitted individuf sādhanas centering on a single s (for examples of such collec-002; Isaacson, 2009), or in hetns (manuscripts of several such ther compiled by Bhattacharya e title Sādhanamālā). This type n much better studied than the although several fundamental ed only very recently (e.g. Saku-002; Luo & Tomabechi, 2009).

topic include S. Beyer's (1978), imarily dealing with Tibetan g for Indic material as well; dy is by E. English (2002), on inī.
iety in the length of sādhanas:
ly a few lines, but some cover ore elaborate sādhanas can be (practice), although this is not ides the standard step-by-step s of sādhanas sometimes cite oncerning the minutiae of rit-them as suitable variations or t least two ritual actors, the offid, but very often more, such as s, the consort or consorts, and ly and retinue of the initiand, iew the maṇḍala. However, the sādhanas is a basically private es in which the officiant is to lled the uttarasādhaka). Initi-later tantric revelations (from ) are also enjoined to periodi-orship. This rite, usually called actment of the maṇḍala, with ly the ācārya) and his consort acting as the main deity pair. The community is to feast on nonvegetarian offerings and liquor. At least two complete manuals survive in Sanskrit (for a brief notice of the first, see Isaacson, 2009, 128; for the second, see Szántó, forthcoming), but the only monograph on the subject to this date (Shizuka, 2007; for an overview of this study in English, see Shizuka, 2008) does not take them into account.

---

Manuals of Occasional Rites

The rites thus far described concern initiates only, for whom they are obligatory. However, an initiate can also undertake per demand rituals for clients, who in most cases would be lay followers. Naturally, the initiate may perform these same rituals for himself if need be, in which case he is his own client, as it were.

One of the most common ways of fulfilling a variety of aims was oblation into fire (homa). By customizing various elements of the ritual, such as the size and shape of the firepit, the size of the firewood, and the articles offered into the flames, a specialist could seek to placate or avert (śāntika) malign events or influences, promote invigoration (pauṣṭika) of health and wealth, or aggressively attack and even kill (abhicāra) enemies. These three headings are later on complemented by others such as attracting (ākarṣaṇa) and gaining control over others (vaśya), commonly for sexual purposes, creating dissent (vidveṣaṇa), driving away (uccāṭana), paralyzing (stambhana) an enemy's body or speech, and others. (For an edition of a very influential homa manual, the already mentioned Jyotirmañjarī, see Okuyama, 1983; 1986.) Similar results can be obtained with other rituals (typically styled prayogas), such as the use of amulets. Such prayogas are also often employed toward gaining mastery over magical accomplishments (siddhi), sometimes styled "minor" (kṣudrasiddhi), such as obtaining command over a resuscitated corpse (vetālasiddhi), gaining magical slippers (the relative of seven-league boots [pādukāsiddhi]), and the ability to fly with a magical sword (khaḍgasiddhi).

One very important but rather understudied civic rite is weather control, typically rainmaking (varṣāpaṇa), which was understandably in high demand in agrarian societies. Several such – as yet unedited – texts survive (see Szántó, vol. I, 2012, 235–241). A better-studied group of texts are those on consecration (pratiṣṭhā). In the earlier period, such rituals were designed to make sacred images (statues, scroll paintings) fit for worship, but as Buddhist ritualists increasingly moved into the civic sphere, they also composed rituals to consecrate monastic and civic structures – such as groves and water tanks – as well as rituals for their renovation (jīrṇoddhāra) when such an occasion arose (Bentor, 1996; Tanemura, 2004).

A large textual body of protective rites suggests that officiants were also seen as specialists of crisis and averting crisis. Many of these are general rituals for protection (rakṣā), but some are very specialized. Two such categories deserve special mention: the treatment of poisons (viṣākarṣaṇa), typically that of snakes, and combatting omens of death, also called "cheating death" (mṛtyuvañcana). (For an edition, translation, and discussion of one such text from the latter category, see Schneider, 2010.)

The wholesale adoption of life-cycle rituals was a relatively late development in esoteric Buddhism, and it most likely occurred among the Newars of Nepal in the 12th century. (A contemporary manual reflecting still existing practice is Kaji & Bajracharya, 2010. There are also several – as yet unedited – works surviving in palm-leaf manuscripts on the topic.) The earliest such ritual with apparently pan-Indic currency was the funerary rite for a departed officiant (for an introductory study to one such manual, see Tanemura, 2007; edition with notes in Japanese in Tanemura, 2013).

Compendia

With so many disparate rituals on offer, it was a natural development to create longer, systematized, and convenient compendia. One such early type of compendium discusses "ten fundamentals" (daśatattva) in which an officiant should be proficient, although the actual contents fluctuated somewhat. (The trope of classifying the principal rituals to be performed by an officiant into ten "fundamentals" is studied, with an edition of one surviving Sanskrit source, in Klein-Schwind, 2012.)

The first truly mature compilation is the Vajrāvalī of Abhayākaragupta (for a full edition and introductory study, see Mori, 2009), an influential though not always very original scholar of the Pāla Empire active in the late 11th and early 12th centuries. The author organized his grand compendium under 50 headings, most of which deal with consecration and initiation. This work was followed very closely by the Kriyāsamuccaya of the Nepalese Jagaddarpaṇa (also known as Darpaṇācārya; before 1305 CE), a work that is still influential among the Newars. Among his 64 headings, the ones that do not correspond to the Vajrāvalī can be suspected to describe rites of local importance. A somewhat earlier, also Nepalese work is the Kriyāsaṃgrahapañjikā of Kuladatta (for an analysis and abridgment, see Skorupski, 1998; 2002; partial edition, translation, and discussion Tanemura, 2004).

Scholarly Study of Buddhist Rituals

Until recently, scholarly studies of Buddhism, including its esoteric aspect, tended to focus on philosophical and mystical matters to the detriment of ritual texts, which are arguably among the best witnesses for exploring realia in the South Asian Buddhist world. Of course, whether such manuals were "models of" or "models for" – in other words, whether they described current practice thereby codifying it in writing or prescribed the ideal model for the performance of a ritual – is a matter of debate. Nevertheless, their very survival means that at least at some point, somebody considered a particular manual important enough to be copied.

The only region to have preserved Buddhist ritual in which at least the liturgical language is Sanskrit is Nepal, which is practically synonymous with the Buddhist Newar communities of the Kathmandu Valley. The most valuable anthropological works in this respect are the ones that also take into account textual evidence (a paradigmatic example is Gellner, 1992). However, numerous aspects of contemporary Nepalese Buddhism and the body of ritual texts surviving since the medieval period are still unexplored.

Bibliography

Bahulkar, S.S., Śrīguhyasamājamaṇḍalavidhiḥ of Ācārya Dīpaṅkarabhadra, Sarnath, 2010.

Bentor, Y., Consecration of Images and Stūpas in Indo-Tibetan Tantric Buddhism, Leiden, 1996.

Beyer, S., The Cult of Tārā: Magic and Ritual in Tibet, Berkeley, 1978.

Bhattacharya, B., Sādhanamālā, 2 vols., Baroda, 1925–1928.

English, E., Vajrayoginī, Her Visualizations, Rituals, and Forms: A Study of the Cult of Vajrayoginī in India, Boston, 2002.

Finot, L., "Manuscripts sanskrits de sādhana's retrouvés en Chine," JA 225, 1934, 1–85.

Gellner, D., Monk, Householder and Tantric Priest: Newar Buddhism and Its Hierarchy of Ritual, Cambridge UK, 1992.

Hidas, G., Mahāpratisarā-Mahāvidyārājñī, The Great Amulet, Great Queen of Spells: Introduction, Critical Editions and Annotated Translation, Delhi, 2012.

Hidas, G., "Mahāpratisarāvidyāvidhi: The Spell-Manual of the Great Amulet," AOH 63, 2010, 473–484.

Isaacson, H., "Observations on the Development of the Ritual of Initiation (abhiṣeka) in the Higher Buddhist Tantric Systems," in: A. Zotter & C. Zotter, eds., Hindu and Buddhist Initiations in India and Nepal, Wiesbaden, 2010.

Isaacson, H., "A Collection of Hevajrasādhanas and Related Works in Sanskrit," in: E. Steinkellner, D. Qing & H. Krasser, eds., Sanskrit Manuscripts in China, Beijing, 2009, 89–[illegible].

Isaacson, H., "Ratnākaraśānti's Bhramaharanāma Hevajrasādhana (Studies in Ratnākaraśānti's Tantric Works III)," JICABS 5, 2002, 151–176.

Isaacson, H., & A.G.J.S. Sanderson, "Hevajrasekaprakriyā," draft unpublished reedition and notes, Oxford, n.d.

Kaji, V.A., & N.B. Bajracharya, The Daśakarma Vidhi: Fundamental Knowledge on Traditional Customs of Ten Rites of Passage amongst the Buddhist Newars, Kathmandu, 2000.

Kawasaki, K., "On a Birch-Bark Sanskrit Manuscript Preserved in the Tibet Museum," IBK 52, 2004, 905–903.

Klein-Schwind, S.G., "The Compendium of the Ten Fundamentals, Daśatattvasaṃgraha of Paṇḍita Kṣitigarbha: Critical Edition of the Sanskrit Text with Introduction and Annotated English Translation," diss., Hamburg University, 2012.

Kuranishi, K., "A Study on the Literature of the Yamāri Cycle," diss., Tohoku University, 2008 (Jpn.).

La Vallée Pourrin, L. de, Bouddhisme: Études et matériaux, London, 1898.

Luo, H., & T. Tomabechi, Candrakīrti's Vajrasattvaniṣpādanasūtra (Vajrasattvasādhana): Sanskrit and Tibetan Texts, Vienna, 2009.

Mikkyō Seiten Kenkyūkai, "Vajradhātumahāmaṇḍalopāyikā-Sarvavajrodaya: Bonbun Tekisuto to Wayaku 2," TDSBKK 9, 1987, 294–222.

Mikkyō Seiten Kenkyūkai, "Vajradhātumahāmaṇḍalopāyikā-Sarvavajrodaya: Bonbun Tekisuto to Wayaku 1," TDSBKK 8, 1986, 256–224.

Mori, M., Vajrāvalī of Abhayākaragupta, Edition of Sanskrit and Tibetan Versions, Tring, 2009.

Okuyama, N., "Jyotirmañjarī no Kenkyū (II)," TISGR 13, 198[illegible], 108–91.

Okuyama, N., "Jyotirmañjarī no Kenkyū (I)," Bunka 47, 198[illegible], 136–119.

Onians, I., "Tantric Buddhist Apologetics or Antinomianism as a Norm," diss., Oxford University, 2001.

Sakurai, M., "Cakrasaṃvarābhisamaya no Genten-Kenkyū: Bonbun-Kōtei-Tekusuto," JCS 47, 1998, 1–32.

Sakurai, M., Indo-mikkyō Girei Kenkyū: Kōki Indo-mikkyō no Kanjō Shidai, Kyoto, 1996.

Sanderson, A.G.J.S., "The Śaiva Age: The Rise and Dominance of Śaivism during the Early Medieval Period," in: S. Einoo, ed., Genesis and Development of Tantrism, Tokyo, 2009, 41–349.

Sanderson, A.G.J.S., "The Śaiva Religion among the Khmers (Part I)," BÉFEO 90–91, 2003–2004, 349–463.

Schneider, J., Vāgīśvarakīrtis Mṛtyuvañcanopadeśa. Eine buddhistische Lehrschrift zur Abwehr des Todes, Vienna, 2010.

Shizuka, H., "An Interim Report on the Stud Vajrayāna's New Horizon in Indian Budd Executive Committee, eds., Esoteric Bu Identity in Diversity, Koyasan, 2008, 185–19

Shizuka, H., Gaṇacakra no Kenkyū, Tokyo, 20

Skorupski, T., Kriyāsaṃgraha: Compendiu Rituals, Tring, 2002.

Skorupski, T., "An Analysis of the Kriyāsaṃgra son & G. Schopen, eds., Sūryacandrāya: E of Akira Yuyama on the Occasion of His Swisttal-Odendorf, 1998, 181–196.

Szántó, P.-D., "The Gaṇacakravidhi Ratnākaraśānti," forthcoming.

Szántó, P.-D., "Selected Chapters from the Ca diss., 2 vols., Oxford University, 2012.

Szántó, P.-D., "Antiquarian Enquiries int Manuals of the Catuṣpīṭha," NNGMCP 6, 2

Takahashi, H., "Ādikarmapradīpa Bonbun Kō ni yoru," in: Miyasaka Yūshō Hakas isarā-Mahāvidyārājñī, The Great Amulet, pells: Introduction, Critical Editions and ation, Delhi, 2012.

atisarāvidyāvidhi: The Spell-Manual of ," AOH 63, 2010, 473–484. ations on the Development of the Ritual seka) in the Higher Buddhist Tantric Sysr & C. Zotter, eds., Hindu and Buddhist and Nepal, Wiesbaden, 2010.
ection of Hevajrasādhanas and Related
" in: E. Steinkellner, D. Qing & H. Krasser, uscripts in China, Beijing, 2009, 89–136.
'Ratnākaraśānti's Bhramaharanāma (Studies in Ratnākaraśānti's Tantric
S 5, 2002, 151–176.
.J.S. Sanderson, "Hevajrasekaprakriyā," reedition and notes, Oxford, n.d. racharya, The Daśakarma Vidhi: Funda- on Traditional Customs of Ten Rites of he Buddhist Newars, Kathmandu, 2010.
Birch-Bark Sanskrit Manuscript Pre-Museum," IBK 52, 2004, 905–903.
"The Compendium of the Ten Fundavasaṃgraha of Paṇḍita Kṣitigarbha:
he Sanskrit Text with Introduction and Translation," diss., Hamburg Univery on the Literature of the Yamāri Cycle," rsity, 2008 (Jpn.).

de, Bouddhisme: Études et matériaux, mabechi, Candrakīrti's Vajrasattva- jrasattvasādhana): Sanskrit and Tibetan ikai, "Vajradhātumahāmaṇḍalopāyikānbun Tekisuto to Wayaku 2," TDSBKK

kai, "Vajradhātumahāmaṇḍalopāyikānbun Tekisuto to Wayaku 1," TDSBKK

Abhayākaragupta, Edition of Sanskrit s, Tring, 2009.
añjarī no Kenkyū (II)," TISGR 13, 1986, añjarī no Kenkyū (I)," Bunka 47, 1983, ddhist Apologetics or Antinomianism ford University, 2001.

ṃvarābhisamaya no Genten-Kenkyū: suto," JCS 47, 1998, 1–32. yō Girei Kenkyū: Kōki Indo-mikkyō no 1996.
e Śaiva Age: The Rise and Dominance
e Early Medieval Period," in: S. Einoo, velopment of Tantrism, Tokyo, 2009, e Śaiva Religion among the Khmers 1, 2003–2004, 349–463. kīrtis Mṛtyuvañcanopadeśa. Eine bud-zur Abwehr des Todes, Vienna, 2010.

Shizuka, H., "An Interim Report on the Study of Gaṇacakra: Vajrayāna's New Horizon in Indian Buddhism," in: IABS Executive Committee, eds., Esoteric Buddhist Studies: Identity in Diversity, Koyasan, 2008, 185–197.

Shizuka, H., Gaṇacakra no Kenkyū, Tokyo, 2007.

Skorupski, T., Kriyāsaṃgraha: Compendium of Buddhist Rituals, Tring, 2002.

Skorupski, T., "An Analysis of the Kriyāsaṃgraha," in: P. Harrison & G. Schopen, eds., Sūryacandrāya: Essays in Honour of Akira Yuyama on the Occasion of His 65th Birthday, Swisttal-Odendorf, 1998, 181–196.

Szántó, P.-D., "The Gaṇacakravidhi Attributed to Ratnākaraśānti," forthcoming.

Szántó, P.-D., "Selected Chapters from the Catuṣpīṭhatantra," diss., 2 vols., Oxford University, 2012.

Szántó, P.-D., "Antiquarian Enquiries into the Initiation Manuals of the Catuṣpīṭha," NNGMCP 6, 2008, 2–12.

Takahashi, H., "Ādikarmapradīpa Bonbun Kōtei: Tōdaishahon ni yoru," in: Miyasaka Yūshō Hakase Koki Kinen Ronbunshū Kankōkai, eds., Indogaku Mikkyōgaku Kenkyū, vol. II, Kyoto, 1993, 129–156.

Takahashi, H., "Vajradhātumahāmaṇḍalopāyika-sarvavajrodaya," JBS 35, 1990, 150–50.

Tanaka, K., Indo ni okeru Mandara no Seiritsu to Hatten, Tokyo, 2010.

Tanemura, R. (種村　隆元), "Śūnyasamādhivajra 著作の葬儀マニュアル　Mṛtasugatiniyojana:　サンスクリット語校訂テキストおよび註," (Śūnyasamādhivajra's Mṛtasugatiniyojana: A Critical Edition and Notes), MIASA 163, 2013, 127–101 (110–136).

Tanemura, R., "Mṛtasugatiniyojana: A Manual of the Indian Buddhist Tantric Funeral," NNGMCP 4, 2007, 2–6.

Tanemura, R., Kuladatta's Kriyāsaṃgrahapañjikā: A Critical Edition and Annotated Translation of Selected Sections, Groningen, 2004.

PÉTER-DÁNIEL SZÁNTÓ

Ritual Texts: Tibet: New Tantras (Gsar ma)

The "new" (gsar ma) tantric ritual literature was the product of the translation activity of the "latter transmission" (phyi dar) of Buddhist teachings to Tibet, which began in the late 10th century and concluded circa the 14th century, when the flow of texts and practices between Tibet and India was reduced to a trickle. It includes translations of Indian Buddhist works as well as Tibetan ritual literature composed by scholars in the "new" schools of Tibetan Buddhism that were established on the basis of the new textual, ritual, and meditative traditions that were transmitted to Tibet during this period.

The imperially sponsored transmission and translation of Buddhist works from India to Tibet ended in the mid-9th century with the collapse of the Tibetan Empire following the assassination of Lang dar ma (r. 838–841 CE). This is usually understood to represent the conclusion of the era of the "early transmission" (snga dar) of the Buddhist teachings and practices to Tibet. The intervening period, that is, 841–975 CE, saw the rise of new practice traditions in India. These were associated with new genres of Vajrayāna scriptures, the *mahāyogatantra*s and *yoginītantra*s, which are most commonly called the "father tantras" (pha rgyud) and "mother *tantra*s" (ma rgyud) in Tibet. While large-scale transmission and translation of these works occurred during the latter transmission period, there is evidence of continued transmission of texts and practices into Tibet throughout the 9th and 10th centuries (Kapstein, 2006), suggesting that the collapse of the empire at most slowed, but did not stop, this transmission. The early and latter transmission periods appear to be a convenient but ultimately misleading historical simplification, as communication between Buddhists in India and Tibet never entirely ceased during the 150 years that separate these eras (Cantwell & Mayer, 2012, 6–9).

The development of these practice traditions actually began prior to the early transmission period; both the Guhyasamājatantra, a well-known mahāyogatantra, and the Sarvabuddhasamāyogatantra, an early yoginītantra, were composed during the first half of the 8th century (Gray, 2007, 12–13; Matsunaga, 1978, xxvi). The fact that works such as these were circulating in Tibet during the early transmission period is suggested by the apparent attempt to prohibit the translation of these works at this time.

According to the 14th-century Tibetan historian Bu ston Rin chen grub in his Rgyud sde spyi'i rnam par gzhag pa rgyud sde rin po che'i mdzes rgyan zhes bya ba, during the late 8th and early 9th centuries,

> Tibet's king and high-ranking ministers observed that dishonest sentient beings of the future would not understand the profound intentional import [of the texts] and would consider the literal sense authoritative. Without even the slightest unification of art and wisdom, they would be educated in the mantras without being bound to even a single commitment concerning [what behaviors are] to be avoided or cultivated. These practitioners of the immodest, deviant, semblant tantras of the heretics would denigrate the teachings of the Buddha and engage in a method of destroying both self and other. Hence it was decided through royal proclamation that there was to be no translation of the mahāyogatantras except when permission is granted. (Lokesh Chandra, 1966, 127; trans. by author)

Indeed, the emperor Khri Lde srong btsan (776–815 CE) is reputed to have declared the following in his introduction to the Sgra sbyor bam po gnyis pa (Two-Fascicle Lexicon), an early 9th-century work:

> The tantras of secret mantra, according to the texts, are to be kept secret. It is also not appropriate to explain and teach them to the unqualified. Still, in the meantime, though it has been permitted to translate and practice them, there have been those who have not deciphered what is expounded allusively, and seizing upon literal understanding have practiced perversely. It is stipulated that, among the tantras of mantra, there have also been some haphazardly translated into the Tibetan language. This being so, hereafter it is not permitted to translate haphazardly the tantras of mantra and the mantra terms except for those dhāraṇīmantras and tantras whose translations are enjoined on order from above. (Kapstein, 2000, 231n60)

© Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, 2015
Also available online – www.brill

Despite the attempts to regulate the tra transmission of *mahāyogatantra*s and y it is clear that some of these works we into Tibetan prior to the late 10th centu latter transmission period began. Amon texts preserved at Dunhuang, dating century, are a number of mahāyoga ri (see Dalton & van Schaik, 2006), a Guhyasamājatantra and Sarvabudd tantra are included in the Rnying ma which apparently preserves older tr these works that very well may have be ing the Imperial Period or shortly ther at some point from the late 8th to the tury (Gray, 2009, 20). C. Cantwell and 8) have noted the preponderance of "k charnel-ground imagery, which is of the *mahāyogatantra*s and yoginīt Dunhuang mahāyoga literature, and th that at least one of these texts, a m entitled 'Phags pa thabs kyi zhags pa gi don bsdus pa (A Noble Noose of Met Garland Synopsis) was likely initially Tibetan during the Imperial Period o after, that is, circa the 9th century (2

The descriptions of violent and er which some Buddhists objected wer ent in the *mahāyogatantra*s and yo also evident in the earliest strata of t (Gray, 2011a, 434–461), and the early t reflected by the older strata of rNyin is likewise replete with violent and (Cantwell, 1997; Dalton, 2011). Howe erotic ritual practices are even m in the *mahāyogatantra*s and yogi feature a series of "consecration" Tib. dbang) initiation rituals that, i taken, involve sexual union (Gray, tain descriptions of a number of that either involve sacrificial ritual 2005a) or were to be undertaken fo destroying enemies (Sinclair, 2014) Buddhists to view them with suspic

There were reports of unortho Western Tibet during the 10th centu the notorious "red ācārya" (atsarya Prajñāgupta, who were disseminati practices involving sexual union a fice (Seyfort Ruegg, 1984, 377; Karm In 985 CE Lha bla ma Ye shes 'od wr criticizing these practices as well a tantras, pretending to be Buddhis

s (Gsar ma)

culating in Tibet during the early iod is suggested by the apparent bit the translation of these works he 14th-century Tibetan historian grub in his Rgyud sde spyi'i rnam d sde rin po che'i mdzes rgyan zhes late 8th and early 9th centuries, high-ranking ministers observed ntient beings of the future would he profound intentional import would consider the literal sense thout even the slightest unifica-isdom, they would be educated vithout being bound to even a ent concerning [what behaviors d or cultivated. These practitio-dest, deviant, semblant tantras ould denigrate the teachings of ngage in a method of destroying

r. Hence it was decided through n that there was to be no transāyogatantras except when per-
d. (Lokesh Chandra, 1966, 127;

or Khri Lde srong btsan (776– have declared the following in the Sgra sbyor bam po gnyis pa on), an early 9th-century work:

ret mantra, according to the pt secret. It is also not appro-nd teach them to the unquali-neantime, though it has been late and practice them, there ho have not deciphered what ively, and seizing upon literal e practiced perversely. It is nong the tantras of mantra, some haphazardly translated guage. This being so, hereafter to translate haphazardly the nd the mantra terms except nantras and tantras whose oined on order from above.
n60)

Despite the attempts to regulate the translation and transmission of mahāyogatantras and yoginītantras, it is clear that some of these works were translated into Tibetan prior to the late 10th century, when the latter transmission period began. Among the Tibetan texts preserved at Dunhuang, dating to the 10th century, are a number of mahāyoga ritual treatises (see Dalton & van Schaik, 2006), and both the Guhyasamājatantra and Sarvabuddhasamāyogatantra are included in the Rnying ma rgyud 'bum, which apparently preserves older translations of these works that very well may have been made during the Imperial Period or shortly thereafter, that is, at some point from the late 8th to the early 10th century (Gray, 2009, 20). C. Cantwell and R. Mayer (2012, 8) have noted the preponderance of "kāpālika- style" charnel-ground imagery, which is characteristic of the mahāyogatantras and yoginītantras, in the Dunhuang mahāyoga literature, and they have argued that at least one of these texts, a mahāyogatantra entitled 'Phags pa thabs kyi zhags pa padma 'phreng gi don bsdus pa (A Noble Noose of Methods, the Lotus Garland Synopsis) was likely initially translated into Tibetan during the Imperial Period or shortly thereafter, that is, circa the 9th century (2012, 11).

The descriptions of violent and erotic practices to which some Buddhists objected were not only present in the mahāyogatantras and yoginītantras but also evident in the earliest strata of tantric literature (Gray, 2011a, 434–461), and the early transmission, as reflected by the older strata of rNying ma literature, is likewise replete with violent and erotic imagery (Cantwell, 1997; Dalton, 2011). However, violent and erotic ritual practices are even more prominent in the mahāyogatantras and yoginītantras. They feature a series of "consecration" (Skt. abhiṣeka; Tib. dbang) initiation rituals that, if literally undertaken, involve sexual union (Gray, 2013). They contain descriptions of a number of ritual practices that either involve sacrificial ritual violence (Gray, 2005a) or were to be undertaken for the purpose of destroying enemies (Sinclair, 2014). This led some Buddhists to view them with suspicion.

There were reports of unorthodox teachers in Western Tibet during the 10th century, most notably the notorious "red ācārya" (atsarya dmar po), named Prajñāgupta, who were disseminating "unorthodox" practices involving sexual union and violent sacrifice (Seyfort Ruegg, 1984, 377; Karmay, 1997, 29–30). In 985 CE Lha bla ma Ye shes 'od wrote an ordinance criticizing these practices as well as the "[h]eretical tantras, pretending to be Buddhist" (Karmay, 1980, 154) that advocate them. The king reportedly sent 21 Tibetan monks, including Rin chen bzang po (958–1055), to India precisely "to find out whether these practices were correct at all" (Karmay, 1980, 151).

When Rin chen bzang po arrived in Kashmir circa 975 CE, he soon discovered that these scriptures were not deemed heretical by the Buddhists that he met there, but that they were rather considered to be among the "highest" teachings. With the help of several Kashmiri Buddhist scholars, he translated a number of tantric works into Tibetan, including the Cakrasaṃvaratantra, which is probably one of the Buddhist tantras most open to the charge of being a "heretical tantra, pretending to be Buddhist" (Gray, 2005a). This assessment of authenticity was confirmed several decades later by the great Indian scholar Atiśa Dīpaṅkaraśrījñāna (982–1054), who journeyed to Tibet at the invitation of the king of Western Tibet, conveyed in this case by the monk Nag tsho lo tsā ba ("Naktso the Translator"; 1011–1064), who was sent to study at the monastery of Vikramaśīla in Bihar (Decleer, 1997).

From the mid-11th century onward, the authenticity of the "new" tantras and associated ritual literature were not seriously challenged in Tibet. They were considered to be "unexcelled tantras" (bla na med pa'i rgyud), the highest category of Buddhist teaching. Their high status was due to the fact that many of the them (all of them, if creative commentarial strategies are employed) teach "perfection-stage" (or "completion-stage"; Skt. niṣpannakrama; Tib. rdzogs rim) yogic practices involving manipulation of the "channels, winds, and drops" (Skt. nāḍī, prāṇa, and bindu; Tib. rtsa, rlung, and thig le), the network of subtle channels and the energy centers (Skt. cakra; Tib. 'khor lo) that house the "wind" or vital energy and "drops" of subtle consciousness. Collectively these constitute what was known as the "subtle body" (Skt. sūkṣmadeha; Tib. lus phra ba). Advocates of the new Tibetan traditions based on these scriptures claimed that yogic practices involving the manipulation of the subtle body were requisites to complete awakening. It appears that these sorts of practices did not develop until relatively late, perhaps as late as the 9th century, which is likely why these practices are largely absent from the texts and practice traditions of the early transmission period.

The "new" schools that developed in Tibet beginning in the 11th century were largely based on these "highest- tantra" (bla med rnal 'byor) scriptures, also known as mahāyogatantras and yoginītantras, and the exegetical and ritual literature associated with them. They include the Kadam (Bka' gdams), Kagyü (Bka' brgyud), Sakya (Sa skya), Jonang (Jo nang), and Geluk (Dge lugs pa) traditions, which were established between the 11th and 14th century.

The translators associated with these traditions translated a large amount of Indian Buddhist ritual literature, which include the tantras themselves and a wide array of ritual texts associated with their practice traditions. These, in turn, served as the paradigms that later Tibetan masters followed when they composed new ritual manuals for their developing practice traditions.

Genres of New Ritual Literature

As tantric literature is overwhelmingly ritual in its focus, the issue of the performance of these rituals is obviously a key concern. In tantric Buddhist traditions, however, the need to clearly describe how rituals are performed was counterbalanced by a perceived need to preserve the secrecy of these practice traditions. The duties of performing these rituals and teaching them to qualified students was the role of the "adamantine master" (Skt. vajrācārya; Tib. rdo rje slob dpon).

Esotericism has characterized tantric Buddhism since its inception, as R. Davidson (2006) has argued. Ritual literature was thus typically held to be secret teaching that was only cautiously and reluctantly put down into writing. H. Isaacson (2001, 460–461) has noted that the Indian scholar Vanaratna, who visited Tibet during the 15th century, apparently either brought to Tibet or put down into writing there a compendium of 42 ritual texts that was preserved at Ngor Monastery. The manuscript contains an apology for the transgression of putting secret teachings down into writing, in which the scribe writes that he has "written this special teaching so that I may not forget it; may the ḍākas, ḍākinīs etc., [and] all the wrathful deities forgive [me for putting so secret a teaching down in writing]" (Isaacson, 2001, 460n10). Despite this apparent reluctance, the history of tantric literature is basically the history of the disclosure of secrets, although the exact nature of these secrets was always contestable and contested and changed over time as newer, deeper secrets were revealed (Gray, 2005b).

Tantric ritual literature is an extremely rich field with a great deal of diversity. However, if one looks broadly across this literature, there are three main subgenres that cover the five main types of tantric Buddhist ritual. These include, above all, (1) the tantras themselves and their commentaries, (2) "oral-transmission" texts that claim to record secret instructions for ritual and meditative practices, and (3) ritual manuals (Skt. vidhi; Tib. cho ga) and collections (saṃgraha).

The Tantras and Commentaries

The content of the tantras vary, with some containing narrative text, such as the opening "context" (nidāna) passages found at the opening sūtras as well as many of the tantras. These passages typically relate the context in which the teaching preserved in the work was originally taught, typically a teaching given by a buddha to a select audience at a certain place and time. Many tantras, such as the Caṇḍamahāroṣaṇatantra, preserve a dialogical structure that reflects the initial context passage, with each chapter opening with an interlocutor asking a question, with the remainder of the chapter largely dedicated to the answer. In the case of the Caṇḍamahāroṣaṇatantra, it is the "Lady" Vajradhātvīśvarī posing questions to the "Lord" Vajrasattva (George, 1974).

The remaining content of the tantras, which is typically the vast majority of their content, is dedicated to descriptions of ritual and meditative practices. However, this content is usually related in an obscure fashion. That is, the tantras typically do not provide complete accounts of the entire ritual procedure being described. This is due to the deliberate esotericism of these traditions.

One of the responses to this problem was the composition of auxiliary works associated with the major tantras. These include "appendices" (Skt. uttaratantra; Tib. rgyud bla ma), such as the well-known text simply given this title associated with the Guhyāsamājatantra, as well "explanatory tantras" (Skt. vyākhyātantra; Tib. bshad rgyud). These works treat in much more depth topics that were either cryptically covered or neglected entirely in the main "root tantra" (Skt. mūlatantra; Tib. rtsa rgyud), the core scripture of the practice tradition. Not surprisingly, these works tend to focus almost entirely on ritual and meditative practices.

While the appendices and explanatory tantras purport to be revealed scriptures taught by an awakened being, the Indian Buddhist tradition also produced a number of commentaries on the tantras that are often attributed to accomplished masters, or siddhas, such as Kāṇha and Kambala. The commentaries also typically explain ritual practices in greater depth. One of these works, the

---

Sādhananidhi (The Treasury of Mea ment; P1401/D rgyud 'grel vol. ba, 1b– tary on the Cakrasaṃvaratantra, at siddha Kambala, lives up to its nam what is basically a compilation of s meditative manuals for the pract the root text alludes. Many great T such as Sa chen Kun dga' snying Bu ston Rin chen grub (1290–1364) (1359–1419), and Tāranātha (1575–16 the footsteps of their Indian predec posed commentaries that were mo their students than the Tibetan tra Indian commentaries, which are of a stilted "translationese" style.

The tantras, and thus the comn associated with them, contain desc the major types of rituals that are d However, some tantras also contair rituals that are not found elsewher macabre rituals such as the rite for i people who have been reborn as m whose bodies contain a special sub (rocanā), that supposedly confers n consumed (see Gray 2005a). The la uals describing such practices in d ably due to the fact that these ritual rarely or never practiced.

A number of tantras, such as th samāyoga, Cakrasaṃvara, and Abhi (D 369), feature chapters that pres for the primary deities in coded for involves coding for the mantras' sonants using a system in which alphabet are mapped out on a grid coded. Several of the works that d ritual practice called "mantra sele dhara), which involves establishi space as one does when creating ing the chart, and then ritually sele phonemes (Tomabechi, 2007; Gray

Oral-Transmission Texts

Another important genre of tantri so-called oral-transmission teac passed down from a master to a the latter's initiation. These teachi upadeśa, āmnāya, and āgama in S ngag, man ngag, and lung in Tib These are written works that pur oral-practice instructions given They were considered to be e intended only for qualified – t hese include, above all, (1) the tan- nd their commentaries, (2) "oralxts that claim to record secret ual and meditative practices, and (Skt. vidhi; Tib. cho ga) and collecl Commentaries

tantras vary, with some contain-
, such as the opening "context" found at the opening sūtras as he tantras. These passages typintext in which the teaching pre-k was originally taught, typically y a buddha to a select audience and time. Many tantras, such as ṣaṇatantra, preserve a dialogical ects the initial context passage, r opening with an interlocutor with the remainder of the chapted to the answer. In the case āroṣaṇatantra, it is the "Lady" osing questions to the "Lord" e, 1974).

content of the tantras, which is ajority of their content, is dedins of ritual and meditative prac-s content is usually related in an at is, the tantras typically do not ccounts of the entire ritual probed. This is due to the deliberate traditions.

onses to this problem was the xiliary works associated with . These include "appendices" Tib. rgyud bla ma), such as the mply given this title associated ājatantra, as well "explanatory hyātantra; Tib. bshad rgyud). n much more depth topics that lly covered or neglected entirely ntra" (Skt. mūlatantra; Tib. rtsa ipture of the practice tradition.
ese works tend to focus almost d meditative practices.

ndices and explanatory tan- revealed scriptures taught by the Indian Buddhist tradition mber of commentaries on the en attributed to accomplished such as Kāṇha and Kambala. also typically explain ritual depth. One of these works, the Sādhananidhi (The Treasury of Means of Achievement; P1401/D rgyud 'grel vol. ba, 1b–78a) commentary on the Cakrasaṃvaratantra, attributed to the siddha Kambala, lives up to its name by providing what is basically a compilation of short ritual and meditative manuals for the practices to which the root text alludes. Many great Tibetan masters, such as Sa chen Kun dga' snying po (1092–1158), Bu ston Rin chen grub (1290–1364), Tsong Kha pa (1359–1419), and Tāranātha (1575–1634), followed in the footsteps of their Indian predecessors and composed commentaries that were more accessible to their students than the Tibetan translations of the Indian commentaries, which are often rendered in a stilted "translationese" style.

The tantras, and thus the commentarial works associated with them, contain descriptions of all of the major types of rituals that are described below. However, some tantras also contain descriptions of rituals that are not found elsewhere. These include macabre rituals such as the rite for identifying those people who have been reborn as men seven times, whose bodies contain a special substance, a bezoar (rocanā), that supposedly confers magical powers if consumed (see Gray 2005a). The lack of ritual manuals describing such practices in detail is presumably due to the fact that these rituals are fortunately rarely or never practiced.

A number of tantras, such as the Sarvabuddhasamāyoga, Cakrasaṃvara, and Abhidhānottaratantra (D 369), feature chapters that present the mantras for the primary deities in coded form. This typically involves coding for the mantras' vowels and consonants using a system in which the letters of the alphabet are mapped out on a grid and numerically coded. Several of the works that do this prescribe a ritual practice called "mantra selection" (mantroddhara), which involves establishing a consecrated space as one does when creating a maṇḍala, drawing the chart, and then ritually selecting the mantra's phonemes (Tomabechi, 2007; Gray, 2007, 131–136).

Oral-Transmission Texts

Another important genre of tantric literature is the so-called oral-transmission teachings that were passed down from a master to a disciple following the latter's initiation. These teachings are known as upadeśa, āmnāya, and āgama in Sanskrit and gdams ngag, man ngag, and lung in Tibetan, respectively. These are written works that purport to contain the oral-practice instructions given by great masters. They were considered to be esoteric teachings intended only for qualified – that is, initiated – practitioners (Kapstein, 1996, 275). As such, they typically describe practices in far greater detail.

An example of a very influential text in this genre is the Mukhāgama (Oral Transmission; P 1854/D rgyud 'grel vol. di, 17b–28b) of Buddhaśrījñāna, the founder of the Jñānapāda school of Guhyasamāja exegesis who was active during the 8th century. This text relates a number of important details concerning ritual practices and was so influential that some of these details, such as his analysis of the different types of fire sacrifice, were incorporated into tantras composed during the 9th and 10th centuries, such as the Vajramālātantra, Vajraḍākatantra, and Mahāmudrātilakatantra, as well as later ritual manuals (Gray, forthcoming).

Oral-instruction texts were also important in Tibet, most notably in the Bka' brgyud traditions, which preserve esoteric instruction texts known as "aural transmissions" (snyan brgyud), one of the most important being the Aural Transmission of Saṃvara (Bde mchog snyan brgyud), a collection of texts that preserve oral instructions that are believed to have been transmitted from the founder of the school, the great saint Milarepa (1052–1135), to his disciple Ras chung Rdo rje grags pa (1084–1161). As M. Sernesi has observed,

> This esoteric cycle is based on the Saṃvara-tantra and plays a central role in the spiritual practice of the bKa'-brgyud-pa: it includes some of the main teachings of the school and the sādhanas (sgrub thabs) devoted to Cakrasaṃvara and Vajrayoginī. (Sernesi, 2004, 251–252)

One of the great masters in the Bka' brgyud traditions, Padma Dkar po (1527–1592), wrote a well-known work on practice in this tradition called the Snyan rgyud yid bzhin gyi nor bu'i bskyed pa'i rim pa rgyas pa 'dod pa'i re skong (The Fulfillment of the Hope that Aspires for the Extensive Creation Stage that is the Wish-Fulfilling Jewel of the Aural Transmission; see TBRC website W10736). This was a very influential work that in turn inspired a number of commentaries by later Bka' brgyud authors.

Another well-known practice tradition that originated in oral instruction texts is the "path-and-fruit" (lam 'bras) tradition of practice preserved by the Sa skya tradition. This is a tradition of advanced tantric practice based on the Hevajratantra and its scriptural tradition. This tradition is reputed to have originated in a succinct teaching revealed by the goddess Nairātmyā, the chief goddess of the Hevajratantra's maṇḍala, to the accomplished master Vīrupa, who formulated her teaching into a song known as the Rdo rje tshig rkang (Adamantine Verses). The song describes the entire tantric path of practice (Stearns, 2001, 9). Vīrupa orally transmitted it to his student Kāṇha and, through a lineage of students, up to the Tibetan translator 'Brog mi (993–1077), who likewise memorized the song and transmitted to his Tibetan students. The Sa skya master Sa chen Kun dga' snying po, who played a major role in the development of Sa skya teachings, put it down in writing in the process of teaching it to his students (Stearns, 2001, 10–11). As in the case of the bKa' brgyud "aural-transmission" teachings, as the "path-and-fruit" tradition developed, great Sa skya masters such as Sa chen Kun dga' snying po and Grags pa rgyal mtshan (1365–1448) composed a number of ritual manuals for the various rituals that practitioners would need to undertake.

There is no doubt that the oral-transmission genre played a major role in the development of Indian and Tibetan Buddhist practice traditions. Often they are the source of the ritual manuals later composed by Tibetan masters for practitioners of these traditions.

Ritual Manuals

While every sort of tantric ritual is addressed in the *tantra*s, and explained in the exegetical literature (including the "oral-transmission" texts), it is obviously not felicitous for a ritual master to face such a textual morass to gain access to the details concerning rituals that he or she needs to perform. The solution to this problem is the genre of ritual manuals. This is a tertiary genre, deriving from the ritual instructions preserved both in the canonical scriptures and in the teachings of great masters.

These works are short, typically ranging in length from one to ten folios in Tibetan translation. They contain step-by-step instructions, oriented toward ritualists who already know the basic tantric ritual techniques. These works are usually given the title of vidhi, meaning rule, ordinance, formula, or direction, with each type of ritual having its own subgenre of ritual literature. Hence the guidebooks for creating maṇḍalas are typically called maṇḍalavidhi, and the rites for performing initiations therein are labeled abhiṣekavidhi, and so on.

All of the living tantric practice traditions have preserved a wide range of ritual literature of this sort. Very often these works are attributed to the masters who are believed to have founded the tradition, who often are counted among the 84 greatly accomplished masters (mahāsiddha) of the Indian tantric Buddhist traditions. Hence the Jñānapāda school of Guhyasamāja practice and exegesis attributes many of its ritual texts to Buddhaśrījñāna, while the Ārya school attributes many of its ritual works to Nāgārjuna and Āryadeva.

In some cases ritual practices for a particular tradition were compiled into a single volume. One example of a work that does this is the Kriyāsaṃgrahapañjikā (Commentary that Brings together the Ritual Practices). It is a work composed in the 12th century by the Nepali master Kuladatta, and it brings together a number of rituals associated with the Sarvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha practice tradition (Tanemura, 2004, 5–12). Works such as this would have been particularly useful for those *vajrācārya*s who teach and practice in this tradition.

The ritual works attributed to accomplished masters are sometimes key works for practice traditions that link scripture, commentary, and practice traditions, past and present. For example, one of the most prominent *sādhana*s in the Cakrasaṃvara practice tradition is the Cakrasaṃvarābhisamaya (Realization of Cakrasaṃvara; P 1427/D rgyud 'grel vol. wa, 186b–193a), a work attributed to the accomplished master Lūipa, who is reputed to have been one of the two people to whom the root scripture of this tradition was revealed. This work draws on sādhana-like passages contained in two of the Cakrasaṃvara explanatory *tantra*s, the Abhidhānottara and the Yoginīsaṃcāra. This text was very popular in India, as the Tibetan canon contains a dozen translations of commentaries on this sādhana. One of them was composed by Atiśa. Tsong Khapa (1357–1419) likewise wrote a commentary on it, thus enshrining it as one of the major Cakrasaṃvara practice traditions for the Geluk tradition. Contemporary Geluk Buddhists do not use the translation of Lūipa's work for their meditation, but they do use *sādhana*s composed by more contemporary Geluk masters who follow the exegetical tradition established by Atiśa and Tsong Khapa (Gray, 2011b).

Each of the major Tibetan practice traditions developed its own sets of ritual manuals. While typically based on Indian precursors, these works were, at the very least, more readily understood by Tibetan practitioners. But the Tibetans also introduced a number of innovations, and created in the process new genres of ritual texts, which are discussed below.

Types of Tantric Ritual

The overall number of different tan rituals is not easy to ascertain; to do not be sufficient to simply look at the preserved in archives of Sanskrit m Tibetan canons, or in the collected 'bum) of great Tibetan masters. One w to read through the *tantra*s, their c and the ritual compilations. Doing t us a good sense of the types of rituals f are dedicated stand-alone manuals. ber of the overall types of ritual de literature must amount to scores if However, many of these ritual forms cal significance only, since living pra have not preserved them.

The majority of ritual texts prese Buddhist communities fall into five rituals:

1. meditation manuals;
2. consecratory rituals;
3. rituals focusing on worship and
4. rituals focusing on the co *maṇḍala*s; and
5. the initiatory rituals perform constructed *maṇḍala*s.

These are actually overlapping categ tice of worship (Skt. pūjā; Tib. mcho the basic elements of tantric Buddhi is thus found in all of the ritual types the third category indicates those r worship and the giving of offerings the primary foci of the ritual and not ment in a larger ritual procedure.

Meditation Manuals

The term sādhana (Tib. sgrub thabs) ally came to designate meditation m stands for means of achievement, an designates any procedure for achievi The term is mainly used, however, f goal is the supreme accomplishmen rather than mundane goals. It is that have this lofty aim that functio manuals. Moreover, the sādhana manuals" typically exhibit the ba tantric Buddhist ritual that is also fo variation, in most other ritual proce

*Sādhana*s are the textual basis fo deity yoga, uniting oneself with on (Skt. iṣṭadevatā; Tib. yi dam), a pract ically pledges to undertake on a re ers (mahāsiddha) of the Indian ditions. Hence the Jñānapāda āja practice and exegesis attri-itual texts to Buddhaśrījñāna, ol attributes many of its ritual nd Āryadeva.

itual practices for a particu-compiled into a single vol-of a work that does this is the kā (Commentary that Brings ractices). It is a work composed y the Nepali master Kuladatta, ner a number of rituals asso-arvatathāgatatattvasaṃgraha anemura, 2004, 5–12). Works ave been particularly useful for ho teach and practice in this tributed to accomplished masey works for practice traditions ommentary, and practice tradit. For example, one of the most in the Cakrasaṃvara practice asaṃvarābhisamaya (Realizaa; P 1427/D rgyud 'grel vol. wa, ttributed to the accomplished eputed to have been one of the the root scripture of this tra-This work draws on sādhana- ed in two of the Cakrasaṃvara the Abhidhānottara and the ext was very popular in India, contains a dozen translations his sādhana. One of them was Tsong Khapa (1357–1419) like-ntary on it, thus enshrining it Cakrasaṃvara practice tradiadition. Contemporary Geluk he translation of Lūipa's work ut they do use sādhanas commporary Geluk masters who tradition established by Atiśa ay, 2011b).

r Tibetan practice traditions ets of ritual manuals. While dian precursors, these works
, more readily understood by . But the Tibetans also intronovations, and created in the of ritual texts, which are dis-

Types of Tantric Ritual

The overall number of different tantric Buddhist rituals is not easy to ascertain; to do this it would not be sufficient to simply look at the titles in works preserved in archives of Sanskrit manuscript, the Tibetan canons, or in the collected works (gsung 'bum) of great Tibetan masters. One would also need to read through the tantras, their commentaries, and the ritual compilations. Doing this would give us a good sense of the types of rituals for which there are dedicated stand-alone manuals. The total number of the overall types of ritual described in this literature must amount to scores if not hundreds. However, many of these ritual forms are of historical significance only, since living practice traditions have not preserved them.

The majority of ritual texts preserved by tantric Buddhist communities fall into five main types of rituals:

1. meditation manuals;
2. consecratory rituals;
3. rituals focusing on worship and offerings;
4. rituals focusing on the construction of maṇḍalas; and
5. the initiatory rituals performed within the constructed maṇḍalas.

These are actually overlapping categories; the practice of worship (Skt. pūjā; Tib. mchod pa) is one of the basic elements of tantric Buddhist ritual, and it is thus found in all of the ritual types listed above. So the third category indicates those rituals in which worship and the giving of offerings in worship are the primary foci of the ritual and not an ancillary element in a larger ritual procedure.

Meditation Manuals

The term sādhana (Tib. sgrub thabs), which eventually came to designate meditation manuals, literally stands for means of achievement, and it accordingly designates any procedure for achieving a desired end. The term is mainly used, however, for works whose goal is the supreme accomplishment of awakening, rather than mundane goals. It is precisely works that have this lofty aim that function as meditation manuals. Moreover, the sādhana qua "meditation manuals" typically exhibit the basic structure of tantric Buddhist ritual that is also found, with some variation, in most other ritual procedures.

Sādhanas are the textual basis for the practice of deity yoga, uniting oneself with one's chosen deity (Skt. iṣṭadevatā; Tib. yi dam), a practice that one typically pledges to undertake on a regular basis once one has been initiated by one's guru. This practice typically involves preliminary practices as well as the "creation-stage" (Skt. utpattikrama; Tib. bskyed rim) practice of visualizing oneself as the deity. Some sādhanas also contain instructions for advanced perfection-stage practices involving the manipulation of "winds" and "drops" in the network of channels and energy centers that constitutes the subtle body. These works are liturgies that are recited in conjunction (ideally) with visualization practices. Many sādhanas contain not only text to be recited but also instructions for what is to be visualized in conjunction with these recitations. For sādhanas that lack such instruction, it is necessary that one receive oral instructions on how to do the practice from one's guru. Many older sādhanas contain only the text to be recited; this is the reason why many of the famous Indian works had commentaries composed for them. But newer sādhanas composed by Tibetan masters typically contain these instructions embedded within them. Regarding the preliminary practices, many sādhanas begin with the sevenfold supplication that derives from far older Mahāyāna rituals. This involves the following:

1. paying homage to the central deity or deities;
2. making offerings to them;
3. confessing one's misdeeds;
4. expressing admiration for others' good deeds;
5. requesting that the deities teach;
6. asking the deities to remain in the world to do so; and
7. dedicating one's merits to others (Cozort, 1996, 336).

One then engages in the creation-stage process of visualizing the deity. In many of the early tantras, one generates the deity in front of oneself (mdun skyed), typically in the object being consecrated. But in the so-called higher yoga tantra practice, sādhanas typically call on one to visualize oneself as the deity and to generate it as oneself (bdag skyed), with the aim of transforming and purifying one's self-understanding and one's environment as the sacred environment of the deity's maṇḍala.

The practice typically begins with contemplation of oneself dissolving into emptiness. Then from the realm of emptiness, one visualizes a protected space, beginning with the "adamantine ground" (Skt. vajrabhūmi; Tib. rdo rje sa) that is established by visualizing that a massive crossed vajra underlies the ritual space, serving as its foundation. This space is surrounded by a flaming wall of vajras and protected from above by an arrow net canopy. It is described as follows in the Abhidhānottaratantra:

> The adamantine ground is established,
> As well as the arrow net canopy,
> Outside one should lay down from a distance,
> The adamantine fence of blazing fire.
> (D 369, rgyud ’bum ka, 254b3)

One visualizes the divine mansion of the deity within this sacred enclosure, namely the maṇḍala in its "actual" three-dimensional form. In its midst is a lunar disk atop a lotus, on which one typically visualizes the deity's seed syllable, which radiates light throughout the cosmos, which when recollected transforms into oneself as the deity. This visualized image is termed the "symbolic being" (Skt. samayasattva; Tib. dam tshig sems dpa’); one then invites the "gnostic being" (Skt. jñānasattva; Tib. ye shes sems dpa’) to enter one and visualizes its dissolution into the visualized image, effecting one's transformation into the deity (Beyer, 1973, 105–106).

Some sādhanas add further steps, such as the "purification" (viśuddhi) process, in which one visualizes that aggregates, elements, and sense powers are deities (Sferra, 1999; Gray, 2011b). An even more advanced practice, found in some tantric traditions, is the "body-maṇḍala" practice, in which one visualizes one's body as the maṇḍala, the abode of all the tradition's deities (Gray, 2007, 54–64). There are also sādhanas that add perfection-stage contemplations involving meditation on the channels, winds, and drops of the subtle body, but these are uncommon, given the great secrecy surrounding these advanced practices (Cozort, 1996, 337).

Many Tibetan traditions treat sādhanas as secret texts that should only be made accessible to initiated students. This is particularly the case with sādhanas that feature any sort of advanced yogic practices. But sādhanas that only feature creation-stage visualizations of oneself as the deity are sometimes made publically available. For example, the Geluk tradition in India has assembled a collection of meditation texts designed for beginner students that has been published in a volume that is readily accessible in Tibetan bookstores in India. It is entitled Bla ma'i rnal 'byor dang yi dam khag gi bdag bskyed sogs zhal 'don gces btus (The Essential Liturgical Selection for Guru Yoga, Self-Generation as Meditation Deities, Etc.). It is an important purchase for novice students who have received initiation and need to begin undertaking basic meditation practices of this sort.

Consecratory Rituals

Tantric traditions also developed a considerable number of consecratory rituals (Skt. pratiṣṭhā; Tib. rab gnas), in which a master consecrates an object, such as a painting or a sculpture. Many tantras contain descriptions of consecratory rituals, but in Tibet the premier scriptural authority on this topic is the Rab tu gnas pa mdor bsdus pa'i rgyud (Consecration Summary Tantra), a hybrid work found only in Tibetan translation that excerpts the consecratory ritual passages found in a number of other tantras (Bentor, 1996, 299).

Consecratory rituals focus on an object to be consecrated such as a painting, sculpture, or stūpa. But the ritual proceeds in a very similar manner to a sādhana visualization, the main difference being that the deity is visualized in or as the consecrated object, which is known as "the receptacle" (rten) in this literature. These visualizations typically have five steps:

1. the master performing the ritual meditates on emptiness and imagines that the object to be consecrated dissolves into emptiness;
2. the practitioner generates the receptacle by visualizing it as the symbolic being of the deity;
3. the gnostic being of the deity is then invited into the receptacle;
4. the receptacle is visualized in its conventional form as the painting, and so forth; and
5. the gnostic being is requested to remain in the receptacle for as long as saṃsāra lasts (Bentor, 1996, 291–292).

Given the fact that tantric masters are frequently called on to perform consecratory rituals, this is a very important genre of tantric literature. Every major practice tradition has preserved ritual manuals for the performance of the consecration of sacred objects. South Asian Buddhist traditions produced a number of ritual manuals for consecration rites, particularly for the consecration of stūpas, which traditionally are major ritual foci in both Indian and Tibetan Buddhist traditions (Handurukande, 2000).

Worship Rituals

